[2] Plaintiff was bound to observe the insecurity of the rail if it was reasonably observable to him. But he was not bound to inspect particularly and make sure of the condition of the rail. If its unsafe condition was not known or visible to him as he pushed the truck, he had the right to rely on the duty of the master to keep it reasonably safe. There is no evidence in this case to charge plaintiff with contributory negligence in this particular.

It was not error to permit a copy of the writ to supply the place of the lost original. The evidence sufficiently establishes that the copy is a true one. Nor was it error to overrule the demurrer to the declaration. That pleading is good.

The plea of the statute of limitations of course was not sustained. There is no evidence showing that the injury occurred more than a year before the institution of this suit. The evidence undoubtedly proves the contrary.

The case was fairly submitted to the jury. An examination of the instructions given and refused convinces us that no error was committed in regard to them.

Let the judgment be affirmed.

AVERILL v. BOYER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
May 9, 1911. Rehearing Denied
June 17, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 174*)—APPEAL—PLEADING.

If plaintiff's account, filed with a justice of the peace, is sufficient to inform defendant of the nature and amount of his claim, it is not error for the trial court, on appeal, to refuse a motion by defendant to require plaintiff either to file a written declaration of his claim or to amend his bill of particulars.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 682; Dec. Dig. § 174.*]

2. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 183*)—ORAL AGREEMENT—EXCHANGE OF LAND—RECOVERY OF CONSIDERATION.

The statute of frauds will not avail to defeat an action on a money demand growing out of, or constituting a part of the consideration for, an oral agreement for the exchange of lands, after deeds have passed.

Error to Circuit Court, Kanawha County.
Action by Mary J. Averill against Lula D. Boyer. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

W. S. Laidley, for plaintiff in error.
Everett E. Robertson and Littlepage, Cato & Bledsoe, for defendant in error.

WILLIAMS, P. This suit was originally brought before a justice of the peace to recover money on contract for exchange of lands. Appeal was taken from the judgment of the justice to the intermediate court of Kanawha county. The case was there tried by a jury, and a verdict and judgment obtained by plaintiff for $282.22. Defendant was denied a writ of error by the circuit court of Kanawha county, and then obtained one from this court. The verdict rests upon conflicting oral testimony, as to the weight of which the jury are the sole judges; and, unless it is contrary to the evidence, or clearly against the great weight of evidence, we cannot disturb it.

The testimony of plaintiff and of her witnesses tends to prove that about the last of August, 1906, plaintiff and defendant made an agreement whereby plaintiff was to convey a small farm, located at lock No. 5 in Kanawha county, and pay $2,500 cash to boot, in exchange for two houses and lots in the city of Charleston; that shortly after this agreement was made plaintiff ascertained that she could not pay the $2,500 cash, and the original contract was then modified to the extent that plaintiff was to exchange her farm for one of said houses and lots, the one on Morris street in the city of Charleston, and defendant was to pay plaintiff $1,000 boot in cash; that shortly after this the contract was again modified to the extent that plaintiff agreed to take from defendant a vacant lot in the city of Charleston in lieu of the $1,000 in cash; that at the time the contract was first made it was agreed that plaintiff should deliver immediate possession of her farm to defendant, and that defendant should collect the rent for the house on Morris street under a lease made by her to a certain tenant, prior to the first agreement, and should account to plaintiff for such rent from the 1st day of September, 1906, thereby giving plaintiff constructive possession of the house and lot; that plaintiff turned over possession of the farm to defendant the last of August, 1906, and that defendant immediately leased the same to one Harless by written contract for the period of one year, beginning January 1, 1907, and ending January 1, 1908, in consideration of one-half of the crops to be raised on the farm. It is proven that Harless took possession of the farm the 1st of September, 1906, but that he paid defendant no rent for the remainder of that year. Defendant collected the rent from the Morris street property, $40 per month, from the 1st of September, 1906, until the 1st of June, 1907, and refused to account to plaintiff for it. This suit is to recover that rent money, less certain credits admitted to be due defendant.

There were no formal pleadings before the justice of the peace, but plaintiff's claim then filed designates it as "nine months rent, beginning Sept. 1st, 1906, property, at $40.00 per month, $360.00." The account is credited with taxes, $54.78, and money paid out for obtaining release deeds, $25, thus leaving a balance of $280.22.

[1] The court overruled defendant's motion to require plaintiff to file her declaration, or complaint, setting forth her cause of action, and defendant excepted. This was not error. The pleadings in a justice's court are informal, and may be either oral or in writing. Section 50, c. 50, Code 1906; O'Connor v. Dils, 43 W. Va. 54, 26 S. E. 354; White v. Emblem, 43 W. Va. 819, 28 S. E. 761; Poole v. Dilworth, 26 W. Va. 583. Subsection 8 of said section 50 is as follows: "In an action or defense founded upon an account, note, or other writing for the payment of money, it shall be sufficient for the party to deliver the account, note, or other writing to the justice and to state that there is due to him thereon from the adverse party a specific sum, which he claims to recover or set-off in the action." Mt'n. City Mill Co. v. Southern, 46 W. Va. 754, 34 S. E. 782. The trial judge did not abuse his discretion in refusing to require plaintiff to file a declaration of her claim, or an amended bill of particulars; such amendment was not necessary to promote substantial justice. Section 169, c. 50, Code 1906; Drinkard v. Heptinstall, 55 W. Va. 320, 47 S. E. 72; Simpkins v. White, 43 W. Va. 125, 27 S. E. 361. The account filed before the justice was sufficient to advise defendant fully of the nature of plaintiff's demand. The fact that the account states that the money was due for "rent" does not necessarily imply a lease by plaintiff to defendant. It is rent money which, according to plaintiff's proof, defendant had collected as the agent of plaintiff.

Defendant twice moved the court to direct a verdict in her favor, once after plaintiff had given her testimony, and again after plaintiff had closed her case. These motions were overruled, and exceptions taken. These motions were properly overruled, because plaintiff's testimony made out a good cause of action. But, even if there had been merit in these motions, defendant waived them by subsequently introducing her own evidence and suffering the case to go to the jury upon the evidence introduced on both sides. Williams & Davisson Co. v. Ferguson Contracting Co., 60 W. Va. 428, 431, 55 S. E. 1011, and cases cited in opinion.

[2] The statute of frauds is relied on as a defense, but we cannot see that it has any application. It matters not whether the contract to exchange lands was oral or in writing. It was finally consummated, in May, 1907, by an exchange of deeds. Moreover, this is not a suit for specific performance of a contract for sale of land; but it is an action for money which plaintiff claims was received by defendant for plaintiff's use, pursuant to an agreement fully executed by plaintiff, according to her evidence. Plaintiff's right to recover does not depend upon the time when the deeds were exchanged, but upon the agreement as to the time when she should be entitled to the rent for the Morris street property, which she testifies defendant had agreed to collect and turn over to her. It did not require a writing to constitute a valid assignment of the rent reserved; and plaintiff's evidence tends to prove that the rent from the Morris street property was to go to her after September 1, 1906, in lieu of the possession of the farm, which plaintiff says she turned over to defendant the 1st of September, 1906. Actual possession of the Morris street property could not be delivered on the 1st of September, 1906, because of the existence of the lease made by defendant prior to the land trade, and to run for several months. The fact that defendant charged no rent, and collected none, for the occupancy of the farm between September 1, 1906, and January 1, 1907, does not affect the case. The surrendering of possession of the farm by plaintiff was a sufficient consideration to support defendant's promise to account to her for the rent to accrue from the Morris street property.

It is not material that the contract, as originally made, was not fully carried out. The subsequent modifications of it do not relate to the questions of possession of the farm, and rent from the Morris street property. The suit having been brought originally before a justice of the peace, and there being no formal pleadings, it may very properly be regarded as an action in assumpsit, either for money had and received to plaintiff's use, or for money due on contract fully executed by plaintiff.

Shortly after the agreement for the exchange of lands was made defendant employed counsel to investigate plaintiff's title. It was discovered that there was an unreleased lien upon it, and defendant employed counsel, on her own account, to obtain proper releases, which he did. Defendant also paid certain taxes for plaintiff. These items aggregate $79.78, and are admittedly proper credits, or sets-off. They reduce plaintiff's demand to the jurisdictional amount in a justice's court.

The evidence upon some matters is very conflicting, but as to the credibility of witnesses the jury are the sole judges. They had a right to believe some witnesses, rather than others, wherein their testimony conflicted. We cannot say the jury were wrong in finding for plaintiff; and the judgment of the intermediate court of Kanawha county will be affirmed.

HARMAN v. ALT.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
June 17, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. BOUNDARIES (§ 46*)—ORAL AGREEMENTS—BINDING EFFECT.

Disputed boundaries between adjoining tracts of land may be settled by express oral agreement, executed immediately, and accompanied by possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 212-226, 249-251; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 106*)—FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER (§ 8*)—EFFECT—UNLAWFUL ENTRY AND DETAINER.

Actual, open, notorious, exclusive and continuous adverse possession of land for more than ten years, confers good legal title, enabling the owner to maintain an action for unlawful entry and detainer against one who enters unlawfully.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 604-623; Dec. Dig. § 106.* Forcible Entry and Detainer, Cent. Dig. §§ 35, 36; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 108*)—ACQUISITION BY MISTAKE—ESTOPPEL.

The rule that acquiescence or admissions by a landowner, made under a mistake as to his rights, will not estop him from subsequently enlarging his possession to the limits of his deed, does not apply as against one who has acquired good title by adverse possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Dec. Dig. § 108.*]

4. FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER (§ 4*)—PEACEABLE ENTRY—RIGHT OF ACTION.

If an entry on land, though peaceable, be unlawful, the owner may recover the possession from the intruder in an action of unlawful entry and detainer.

Error to Circuit Court, Tucker County.

Action by S. C. Harman against W. E. Alt. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

C. O. Strleby, for plaintiff in error. J. Wm. Harman, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. In an action of unlawful entry and detainer the court below directed a verdict for plaintiff, and entered judgment thereon that plaintiff recover the land sued for. To review that judgment this writ of error was awarded the defendant.

There is no substantial merit in the first point, that the summons is defective. Cunningham v. Sayre, 21 W. Va. 440, we think decisive of this question.

We are of opinion also, that the judgment below should be affirmed on two grounds: First, that there was an agreement as to the boundary line in dispute, fixing it where plaintiff claims it, and binding defendant; second, that plaintiff by actual, open, notorious, exclusive and continuous adverse possession of said land, for more than ten years, acquired good title thereby, rendering his ouster by defendant, though peaceable, unlawful, entitling plaintiff to judgment for possession.

On the question of the agreed line, the uncontradicted evidence is, that plaintiff and defendant own adjoining lots, parts of a larger tract, owned and divided into lots by a former owner. Plaintiff's lot of forty-seven acres lies north east of defendant's tract, described as containing one hundred and ten and one-fourth acres, more or less. The dividing line called for in plaintiff's deed, and in the deed to W. F. Nine, defendant's immediate grantor, and in deeds prior to his, is a line, N. 64° W. The distance called for in plaintiff's deed, and in the deeds to and from his predecessors, is eighty-three poles; in defendant's deed the distance called for is one hundred and fourteen poles. W. F. Nine, from whom defendant purchased his lot by title bond, May 1, 1903, and took his deed, May 11, 1903, bought this lot of Eli Nine in 1890. In 1897, Harper owned the lot immediately east, and F. M. Pearson, the one on the west. There was uncertainty and dispute about the exact location of the division lines. Harper and Pearson were unwilling to build division fences, as desired by Nine, until these lines should be definitely and certainly located. Nine employed R. P. Pearson, a surveyor, to make a survey, calling in as parties, not only Harper and Pearson, but also the plaintiff Harman. Harman carried the chain, at least a part of the time. All agreed on the south east corner of the Nine lot as the beginning corner. The survey definitely located the lines and corners. There was no dissent. Nine insisted on planting stones at each corner, which was done, and pointers were also made to the corners. As then located by Pearson, the division line between plaintiff and defendant is a line, between stone corners, S. 59¼° E. When Alt bought his lot in May, 1903, Nine pointed out to him all these lines and corners, as located by Pearson. In Nine's deed to Alt these stone corners are specifically called for, and the land further described as the same land purchased by Eli Nine from A. C. Harness, and conveyed by said Eli Nine to W. F. Nine, February 19, 1890. Immediately after the survey by Pearson, Harman and Alt joined in building a division fence, on the line S. 59¼° east, building it for thirty or forty rods of posts, wire and boards, to a point where they struck the timber, and from thence out of logs and poles to a stone bluff and a laurel thicket, and to and over it, using logs and poles, making a complete barrier along the entire line, and so maintained this fence until Alt bought from Nine, and afterward the fence was continued and maintained jointly by Alt and Harman, without controversy as to its location, until in November, 1908, when defendant, without plaintiff's knowledge or consent entered and cut some timber, claiming the right to go over on Harman to a marked line, some three or four rods north of the Pearson line, because of an alleged mistake in the Pearson survey. The land between these two lines is the land now in controversy. After cutting the timber Alt was notified by Harman to cease trespassing. A few days afterwards, however, in the absence of Harman, Alt entered, tore down the division fence, and moved it over on a so called old line. Wherefore the suit.

[1] It is said that because Nine, at the time of the survey by Pearson, in 1897, had not disputed with Harman as to the location of the line, and Harman had not agreed before hand to be bound by that survey, though he participated therein, and afterwards acquiesced, and accepted the same, neither Nine nor Alt are concluded or estopped from enlarging their boundary by going over to the old marked line. This, however, is not the law. Gwynn v. Schwartz, 32 W. Va. 487, 9 S. E. 880, and Teass v. City of St. Albans, 38 W. Va. 1, 17 S. E. 400, 19 L. R. A. 802, hold, that disputed boundaries between two adjoining tracts of land may be settled by express oral agreement, executed immediately, and accompanied by possession according thereto. And, as particularly applicable to the contention of defendant's counsel in this case, point six of the syllabus in the first case, declares that, long acquiescence by one adjoining proprietor in a boundary established by the other is evidence of such agreement so fixing the division-line between them. "What is meant by long acquiescence," says Judge Green, in this case, "is not definitely settled by the decisions," but, as particularly applicable to the case here, point eight of the syllabus says: "Such acquiescence, in this State for a period of over ten years will justify a jury in inferring, that such parol agreement establishing such division-line existed; and a verdict based on such inference ought not to be set aside as plainly contrary to the evidence." It was wholly unnecessary, however, for the court below in this case to have submitted to a jury the question of the fact of the agreement by plaintiff, for the evidence proves beyond doubt, and there is nothing to the contrary, that Harman was a party to that agreement. He participated in the survey, and testifies positively, that he did, and he is not contradicted by Nine, that after that said survey, he and Nine agreed on the line established by Pearson, and pursuant thereto built the fence on that line. The fence was intended to, and did, to the satisfaction of the parties, constitute a complete barrier between their respective lots. It constituted a real and substantial inclosure by Harman of his land, sufficient we think to satisfy all the requirements of the statute of limitations, and the decisions of this court in Parkersburg Industrial Co. v. Schultz, 43 W. Va. 470, 27 S. E. 255, and other cases, much relied on by counsel for defendant.

[2] But conceding that there was no agreement binding Harman, there was actual, open, notorious, exclusive, and continuous adverse possession by him, for more than ten years before defendant entered and tore down the division fence. This gave him the absolute, indefeasible title to the land by adverse possession, even though it be conceded arguendo, that originally the defendant or his predecessors in title may have had the better title. Plaintiff's title became good title by adverse possession. Such title by adverse possession confers legal title, enabling the owner not only to defend, but to maintain ejectment or other actions thereon. Parkersburg Industrial Co. v. Schultz, supra, syllabus, point five.

[3] The proposition of defendant's counsel, based on White v. Ward, 35 W. Va. 418, 14 S. E. 22, that acquiescence or admission by a landowner, made under a mistake as to his rights, will not estop him from subsequently enlarging his possession to the limits of his deed, does not apply as against one who has acquired good title by adverse possession. This case distinctly so decides.

[4] The point is made, however, that defendant's entry was peaceable, not forcible. This is not a defense if his entry was unlawful. This action goes against one who enters peaceably, if his entry be unlawful; and his entry is unlawful, though peaceable, as against the true owner of the land. In this case we hold that plaintiff had acquired by adverse possession absolute title to the land in controversy, on which he could maintain ejectment or other action. The entry by defendant was therefore unlawful, if not forcible. His entry was that of a stranger to the paramount title of the plaintiff. He must therefore surrender the possession thus unlawfully acquired. Fisher v. Harman, 67 W. Va. 619, 625, 68 S. E. 885, citing Duff v. Good, 24 W. Va. 682; Franklin v. Geho, 30 W. Va. 27, 8 S. E. 168; Davis v. Mayo, 82 Va. 97; Fore v. Campbell, 82 Va. 808, 1 S. E. 180; Olinger v. Shepherd, 12 Grat. (Va.) 462.

These conclusions, we think, constitute a complete answer to all the points presented in argument, calling for no further reply thereto, and resulting in an affirmance of the judgment below. Judgment affirmed.

SPENCER v. RICKARD.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
June 17, 1911.)

1. PROCESS (§ 164*)—RETURN—AMENDMENT.

It is proper to permit a return of service to be amended according to the fact, in proceedings of the case which attack the validity of the judgment on the ground of an insufficient return, though the amendment defeats the proceedings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Process, Cent. Dig. §§ 239-248; Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

2. PROCESS (§ 164*)—AMENDMENT—RETURN OF SERVICE.

An insufficient return of service on the summons to answer an action may be amended, on a motion to quash an execution issued on a default judgment therein, notwithstanding the defendant appeared specially in the action and unsuccessfully sought to quash the return.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Process, Cent. Dig. §§ 239-248; Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

Poffenbarger, J., dissenting.

Error to Circuit Court, Mason County.

Action by John H. Spencer against O. B. Rickard. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Somerville & Somerville, for plaintiff in error. Rankin Wiley, for defendant in error.

ROBINSON, J. This writ of error seeks the reversal of an order refusing a motion to quash an execution.

Spencer sued Rickard before a justice of the peace for money due on contract. Defendant appeared specially and moved to quash the return of service on the summons. This motion the justice overruled. Defendant then retired and made no further appearance in the suit. A judgment for plaintiff was pronounced and entered. When an execution was issued on the judgment, defendant by proper notice moved the justice to quash the same. The motion to quash the execution was sustained, and plaintiff appealed from the order of the justice in that particular to the circuit court. When the appeal came on to be heard, the circuit court permitted the return of service on the summons to be amended. The execution was quashed on the ground that it was not properly directed, but the ground that there was no valid judgment because of illegal service was distinctly overruled.

Subsequent to these proceedings, plaintiff filed a transcript of his judgment in the office of the clerk of the circuit court of the county, and execution was issued thereon. It is that execution which defendant attacks in the proceedings now before us.

Defendant says that the execution is not supported by a valid judgment. He insists that the judgment is void because no proper return of service appeared on the summons when defendant moved to quash the return. In other words, he maintains that there has been no due process of law—no notice to him.

[1] The amended return of service, however, shows that defendant was regularly served. It shows that legal notice of the suit was given him. Now, the main question is: Must the judgment be held to stand on the alleged invalid return of service which defendant unsuccessfully attacked, or on the amendment of the return showing that he really had the character of notice which the law requires when he refused to enter a general appearance in the case?

The judgment against defendant is plainly a judgment by default, though he contested the showing of jurisdiction. The judgment is the same as if he had not specially appeared. The special appearance really availed him nothing, since his motion thereunder was denied by the justice. He can take only the same advantage that he could have taken if he had not appeared for any purpose. When there is no general appearance, as in this case, a judgment rendered is one by default. A default judgment is void and unenforceable if there was no jurisdiction to render it—if the defendant was not notified in the manner prescribed by law. It has been held that, in cases before justices, improper or illegal notice is waived by a general appearance. Railroad Co. v. Wright, 50 W. Va. 653, 41 S. E. 147. But the defendant in the case at hand waived nothing by his special appearance. He may still avoid the judgment if he was not legally brought in to answer the action. He may quash the execution issued thereon, if he was not served with process in the action. But may he thus avoid the judgment merely because the original return was bad, though by an amendment properly made it appears that he actually had notice in the manner the law prescribes? He insists that he may.

The judgment is not absolutely void if defendant was duly notified, though the return of service did not show due notice to him. If process had been legally executed on him at the time of trial, he knew it. He knew the actual manner of the service of notice to answer the suit. If he was served in an illegal way, he could rely on that fatal defect, make no general appearance, and defeat the enforcement of the judgment whenever undertaken. But if he knew that legal service was made on him, he could not allow judgment to go against him by default and thereafter be sure to defeat it simply because the original return did not show the legal service that actually was made; for, by well established law the fact of a sufficient service may thereafter be shown by an amendment of the return. When defendant declined to make a general appearance, knowing, as he must have known, that legal service had been executed on him and only badly returned, he suffered a judgment by default and took the risk of an amendment according to the actual fact which would fully support that judgment. He could only safely take the course which he pursued when he knew that no amendment according to the fact could ever show a valid service of the summons. He has not been unjustly denied an opportunity to defend on the merits, as he submits. He had that opportunity but refused to take advantage of it.

We need not pass on the sufficiency of the original return of service. It is conceded that the amended return, made pending the proceedings to quash the first execution, is good. The amended return shows that defendant had notice of the suit in which the judgment was rendered, as required by law. It proves that the justice had jurisdiction of defendant to render the judgment against him. It supports the judgment and denies the ground on which defendant would quash the last execution issued thereon.

[2] To allow a return of service to be amended according to the fact, in proceedings of the original case which attack the validity of the judgment on the ground of the insufficient return, though the amendment defeats the proceedings, is usual practice. Capehart v. Cunningham, 12 W. Va. 750; Laidley v. Bright, 17 W. Va. 779; Anderson v. Doolittle, 38 W. Va. 633, 18 S. E. 726; Hopkins v. Railroad Co., 42 W. Va. 535, 26 S. E. 187; McClure-Mable Lumber Co. v. Brooks, 46 W. Va. 732, 34 S. E. 921; Gauley Coal Land Ass'n v. Spies, 61 W. Va. 19, 55 S. E. 903; 1 Enc. Digest Va. & W. Va. 356-359. It was merely this practice that was followed in the case under consideration. The course pursued was fully warranted. On the motion to quash the execution, now before us by this writ of error, the amendment of the return of service that had been made in the proceedings to quash the former execution was shown. That amendment stood as a former adjudication, from which no appeal had been taken. As we have said, the amendment proved that there was due notice to defendant before the rendition of the judgment in question. It validated the judgment attacked by the motion to quash the execution. Though it took away the foundation of the motion to quash the execution, the amendment of the service was properly relied on.

A motion to quash an execution is a proceeding in the case in which the judgment was rendered. In this instance it was a proceeding in the nature of a motion to reverse the default judgment because the summons to answer the action had not been legally served. Clearly was it analogous to a motion for that purpose. No direct method of reversal on that ground is provided by statute as to cases before justices. Defendant could not appeal and contest the point of insufficient service, for his appeal would have operated as a general appearance and the point would thereby have been waived. Railroad Co. v. Wright, supra. But when final process was issued in the case, he could then seek a substantial reversal of the judgment by motion to defeat that process. The motion to quash the execution was indeed a motion to reverse the judgment on the ground of the insufficient return. Then, the holding of this court in Anderson v. Doolittle, 38 W. Va. 633, 18 S. E. 726, is applicable and justifies the amendment of the return of service: "It is proper, on the hearing of a motion to reverse a judgment by default for defective return of the summons in the action, to allow the sheriff to amend his return, and then overrule the motion to reverse, if the amended return be good. The amended return relates back, and takes the place of the original defective one."

An order will be entered affirming the judgment.

POFFENBARGER, J. (dissenting). I do not regard the result attained in this case as consistent with legal principles and orderly procedure. The true principle is declared in Crowley v. Fisher, 57 W. Va. 312, 50 S. E. 422, Chapman v. Maitland, 22 W. Va. 345, and Price v. Pinnell, 4 W. Va. 296. The general policy of the law is to save a litigant the benefit of all proper exceptions taken in due time. There can be no such thing as compulsory waiver. Voluntariness is the essential, dominant element of a waiver. The exception here presented, starting with the unfortunate suggestion in Railway Co. v. Wright, 50 W. Va. 653, 41 S. E. 147, is the only instance of violation of the principle found in the jurisprudence of this state, so far as I know.

Nor do I think the error in a judgment, entered over the protest of a defendant on insufficient process or a defective return, can be cured by an amendment, for this works a compulsory waiver. Such was the reasoning of Judge Stannard in Wynn v. Wyatt's Adm'r, 11 Leigh (Va.) 585, in the following concise and forceful terms: "The argument presents the singular dilemma, that a party cannot free himself from the present or past effect of erroneous process, without forfeiting his right to exemption from judgment until proper process shall be sued and duly served upon him. It would subject him to judgment without any future regular process, as the consequence of his objecting the nullity and irregularity of past process." President Tucker approved this reasoning. To the same effect see Fisher v. Crowley, cited; Chapman v. Maitland, 22 W. Va. 329; Price v. Pinnell, 4 W. Va. 296; Hickman v. Lerkey, 6 Grat. (Va.) 210. The apparent departure from the rule in Gauley Land Ass'n v. Spies may be justified by disclosure of lack of any defense. An insufficient answer having been rejected, nothing further was offered. The decisions of this court, cited as authority for cure of such defect by amendment, were all in cases of default judgments and decrees.

They do not justify the application of the rule under the circumstances of this case. Acting upon the suggestion in Railway Co. v. Wright, the defendant rested his case upon the motion to quash the return, seeing submission of his defense thereafter would be treated as a waiver of the defect. He has not been allowed to make his defense without giving up his legal right to a sufficient return. The statute gives that right. Denial thereof by a compulsory waiver—mere coercion—is judicial legislation pure and simple.

For these reasons, I dissent.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia.
June 8, 1911.)

BOUNDARIES (§ 9*)—LOCATION AND QUANTITY OF LAND.

A vendor thought that he was selling all the land he owned, but his possessions were greater than he supposed. The purchasers were placed in possession of what each believed he purchased, and each knew the exact boundaries of the premises conveyed, and each received the identical parcel purchased. Held, that the purchasers acquired only the identical parcel purchased, as bounded by the lines pointed out, though they did not obtain the quantity of land they supposed they purchased.

Appeal from Circuit Court of City of Norfolk.

Suit by one Lagorio and others against A. B. Wells and others. From a decree granting relief, defendant Wells appeals. Reversed and rendered, dismissing the bill.

A. T. Stroud and W. L. Williams, for appellant. Wm. W. Old & Son and M. W. Talbot, for appellees.

KEITH, P. The children and heirs at law of Augustine Lagorio filed their bill, in which they pray that a certain tract of land be partitioned among them and certain persons whom they name as defendants interested in the land as tenants in common. They also name A. B. Wells, from whom the land sought to be partitioned was derived, and T. B. Edwards, a coterminous landowner, as parties defendant. All of the defendants answered the bill; the cotenants confessing its equity and expressing their willingness to have the land partitioned. Wells demurred to and answered the bill, and claimed title in himself in fee to the land in the bill mentioned. Proofs were taken, and the circuit court entered a decree in accordance with the prayer of the bill, and, it appearing that partition could not be made in kind, appointed commissioners, who were directed to sell the land, so that its proceeds might be divided among those entitled. From this decree an appeal was taken by A. B. Wells.

The facts are as follows: Wells was the owner of a certain tract of land in the county of Norfolk, and by deed dated November 1, 1883, he sold to Claude Lord a portion of it—"the same being the westerly half of a tract of woodland, said to contain 60 acres, lying on the north side of Sewell's Point road, and bounded on the west by the lands occupied by Jackson Denby, on the north by Talbot's land, and on the east by Phillips' land, the said lands being a part of lands deeded by Mrs. Martha Upshur and others, dated October 18, 1882, to A. B. Wells and John C. Lord; the said land to be divided by a line starting at the center of the tract on the Sewell's Point road, thence running in a northerly direction to the center of the north line dividing the tract in halves, said westerly half, sold to said Claude Lord, said to contain 30 acres more or less." By deed dated September 25, 1886, Wells sold to Abram Beckett "all that tract of land lying and being in Tanner's Creek district and county of Norfolk, state of Virginia, and bounded and described as follows, to wit: On the west by lands owned by Claud Lord, and on the north by one Talbot, and on the east by lands of Phillips, and on the south by Sewell Point road, containing 30 acres more or less, being a part of the same that was conveyed to A. B. Wells and John C. Lord by deed bearing date on October 18, 1882, and duly of record in the clerk's office of Norfolk county court; the said John C. Lord having subsequently conveyed his interest to the said A. B. Wells."

The controversy in this case arises with respect to the location of the western line of the original tract owned by Wells; his deed to Claude Lord calling on the west for "lands occupied by Jackson Denby." That line is shown on the plat which accompanies this opinion as B, H.

The lands sold by Wells to Lagorio appear on this plat as B, H, G, D; the lands sold to Beckett as D, G, F, E. At the date of these deeds the wife of Jackson Denby held title to the triangle A, I, J; but her husband seems to have extended his occupancy beyond the limits of her title, so as to embrace A, I, H, B, which is the land in controversy.

Lagorio was put in possession of the western half of the tract owned by Wells, which was supposed to contain 30 acres, but which upon survey was ascertained to contain only 17¼ acres. Some years thereafter the Denbys conveyed to a man by the name of Edwards, who, upon investigating his title and having a survey of the premises made, found that his line upon the east was I, A, and not H, B, as had been theretofore supposed. He disclaimed all interest in that quadrilateral containing 14.2 acres, and so informed Wells, who thereupon made claim to it. The land is in a wild state, grown up in scrubby woods and bushes—practically in a state of nature.

The controversy in this case is as to the ownership of that quadrilateral of 14.2 acres; Lagorio and those interested with him claiming that the land purchased by him was bounded on the west by the land occupied by Jackson Denby, and that he was entitled by the terms of his deed to the line I, A; as his western boundary, and that, as he only bought one-half of the entire tract, that, of course, would throw his eastern line further to the west, and so with the tract sold to Beckett, so that, each having purchased half of the original tract, the purchase of each would be increased by one-half of the 14.2 acres—at least that would be the logical result of their claims. Certainly, if all the facts had been known at the date of the deed from Wells to Lagorio, and he had sold one-half of the quadrilateral A, I, F, E, the dividing line G, D, on the plat, would have fallen further to the west, and would have left in the half which Beckett afterwards bought 7.1 acres now embraced in the quadrilateral B, H, G, D. They agreed among themselves, however, that, instead of readjusting their rights in that way, they would consider themselves coparceners of the land in dispute, and that it be sold and the proceeds divided among them.

It appears from the evidence that the line B, H, was shown to Lagorio and accepted by him as his western boundary at the date of his deed, and so the line G, D, was the western boundary of Beckett. Lagorio and Beckett were both placed in possession of what they bought, or what they believed at the time of the transaction they were buying, and they and their assigns are still in the enjoyment of it. As the facts have since developed, it appears that the western line of Wells' original tract is further west than either he or his vendees at the time supposed. They were under the impression that his western line was H, B. It turns out now, in the light of subsequent developments, that his western line was I, A, and at the time of making the deeds to Lagorio and Beckett he was the actual owner, though ignorant of the fact.

As was said by the commissioner to whom the cause was referred: "It is true that Wells thought he was selling all of the land that he owned; but his possessions were greater than he knew, and it cannot be reasoned that he intended to sell that which he did not know that he owned. It is true that Wells thought he was selling 30 acres to each of the parties, Lord and Beckett, and they thought they were getting approximately that amount, and it is further true that they did not get approximately 30 acres apiece; but they did get a tract of land, the exact boundaries of which they knew and had been pointed out to them. They got the identical piece of land that they purchased, bounded by the very lines which they had contemplated and which had been pointed out to them—the exact lands they had proposed to purchase, although their lands contained less acreage than was supposed."

For the foregoing reasons, we are of opinion that the decree of the circuit court should be reversed, and an order entered dismissing the bill of complaint.

Reversed.

SAUNDERS et al. v. BANK OF MECKLENBURG et al.

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 106*)—VALIDITY.

The taking of a note by a bank, pending proceedings for its dissolution, to secure a pre-existing indebtedness, was not engaging in new business, as affecting the right to enforce the note.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Dec. Dig. § 106.*]

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 608*)—DISSOLUTION—ENFORCEMENT OF CONTRACTS.

Generally no defense can be made to a suit by a corporation on a contract made with it, that it has forfeited its charter for acts of non-user or misuser, or that it has been dissolved, until such forfeiture or dissolution has been determined in a proceeding brought for that purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 2416-2419; Dec. Dig. § 608.*]

3. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 106*)—OBLIGATION FOR ANOTHER.

A note in ordinary form, payable to a bank and given pending proceedings for dissolution, to secure a pre-existing overdraft by a third party, is sufficient, within statute of frauds (Code 1904, § 2840), requiring a promise to answer for another's debt to be in writing.

4. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

Under a defense to a note that it was given to avoid "indictment and prosecution" of a cashier, an instruction predicating the defense on a "prosecution or trial" was not reviewable error, where other instructions show that the terms "indictment" and "prosecution" were used synonymously.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 705-713; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

5. CONTRACTS (§ 71*)—ASSUMPTION OF ANOTHER'S OBLIGATION—CONSIDERATION.

Mere forbearance to sue, without agreement to that effect, is not sufficient consideration for a third person's promise to pay the debt, though forbearance be induced by the promise; but an agreement to forbear may be implied from conduct of the parties and the nature of the transaction.

6. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 538*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSIDERATION.

Under a defense of want of consideration for a note given to secure a debt of another, an instruction which authorized recovery without finding of an agreement, express or implied, that plaintiff should forbear to sue the original debtor, but merely on finding that plaintiff did so forbear, was erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Dec. Dig. § 538.*]

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 263*)—REVIEW—INSTRUCTIONS—EXCEPTIONS—NECESSITY.

An instruction to which no exceptions were taken will not be reviewed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1518-1532; Dec. Dig. § 263.*]

8. JUDGMENT (§ 184*)—ON MOTION—NOTICE.

Since pleadings on a motion for a judgment for money after notice, under Code 1904, § 3211, are intended to be very informal, except where statutes require otherwise, as under section 3269, authorizing special pleas of failure of consideration, etc., instructions offered by defendant on the ground that the terms of the notice of the motion for judgment are not such as to warrant recovery on a note made and delivered as collateral to secure payment of a debt to plaintiff from a third party were properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 346; Dec. Dig. § 184.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Mecklenburg County.

Proceeding by notice and motion, under Code 1904, § 3211, brought by the Bank of Mecklenburg and others against Mrs. A. A. Saunders and others to recover judgment on a note. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Reversed and remanded.

John A. Lamb and Samuel A. Anderson, for plaintiffs in error. E. P. Buford and W. E. Homes, for defendants in error.

BUCHANAN, J. This is a proceeding by notice and motion, under section 3211 of the Code of 1904, to recover a judgment on a promissory note for $10,000, made by the plaintiffs in error, Mrs. A. A. Saunders, Mrs. Clara C. Saunders, and Mrs. Neva S. Prince, payable to the defendant in error the Bank of Mecklenburg, dated April 28, 1908, and due 12 months after date.

The Bank of Mecklenburg suspended business on the 13th of April, 1908, on account of its insolvency. It had been in business from the year 1872 or 1873, with a principal office at Boydton and a branch office at Chase City. The insolvency of the bank seems to have resulted from the action of the cashier at Boydton in permitting one of its customers, who became insolvent, to overdraw his account by more than $100,000, and the action of the cashier at Chase City in allowing the Kershaw Manufacturing Company, another of its customers, which was also insolvent, to overdraw its account to the extent of some $29,000. When the stockholders ascertained the condition of the bank, one-fourth or more of them in interest, who were also creditors, filed their bill in the circuit court of Mecklenburg county, pursuant to the provisions of section 1105a, subsec. 15, Code Va. 1904, for the purpose of winding up and dissolving the corporation, and enjoining the bank, its officers, and directors from disposing of its assets, and praying for the appointment of a receiver or receivers to take charge of its affairs, to collect the debts due and payable to it, for such disposition of its assets as might be just and equitable, and for general relief.

The bank filed its answer, in which it admitted the allegations of the bill. As prayed for, the court granted an injunction and appointed receivers. Afterwards, on the 28th day of April, 1908, the note sued on was made.

Upon the trial of the cause, there was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff bank for the benefit of its receivers. To that judgment this writ or error was awarded.

The principal errors assigned, in substance, are: (1) That the bank, at the time the note was made, was a dissolved corporation, and could not be legally made the payee thereof; (2) that if the note was a promise to pay the debt of another, it is not a sufficient promise in writing under the statute of frauds; (3) that it was given for an illegal consideration; (4) that the note was without consideration.

The questions involved in these assignments of error were raised in the circuit court by pleas, objections made to evidence, instructions given and refused, and by a motion to set aside the verdict as contrary to the law and the evidence. The assignments of error will be considered, for the most part, without reference to the manner in which the questions involved were raised.

[1] As to the first assignment of error: It is true that at the time the note sued on was made the makers thereof were not indebted to the plaintiff bank; but it was executed in part payment, or as collateral for the payment, of the debt due from the Kershaw Manufacturing Company by overdraft, before the bill for winding up the affairs and dissolving the bank was filed. The taking of the note, however, was not in any sense engaging in new business, as is argued on the part of the bank, but was merely a means of securing the payment of an existing indebtedness. While the object of the proceeding under section 1105a, subsec. 15, Code Va. 1904, was to wind up the business and dissolve the bank corporation because of its insolvency, no decree, when the note sued on was made, had been, or so far as the record shows has ever been, made dissolving the corporation.

[2] The general rule (and there is nothing in the statutes under which the bill was filed to wind up and dissolve the corporation to change that rule) is that no defense can be made, to an action by a corporation on a contract made with it, that it has forfeited its charter for acts of nonuser or misuser, or that it has been dissolved, until after such forfeiture or dissolution has been judicially determined in a proceeding instituted for that purpose. See Banks v. Poltiaux, 3 Rand. 136, 15 Am. Dec. 706; Crump v. Mining Co., 7 Grat. 352, 56 Am. Dec. 116; Pixley, etc., v. Roanoke Nav. Co., 75 Va. 320; 1 Min. Inst. 637; 2 Cook on Stockholders, § 637; 2 Clark & Marshall, § 324; 10 Cyc. 1345.

[3] The next question to be considered is whether or not the note for the payment of the debt of another is sufficient, under section 2840 of the Code, which provides, among other things, that no action shall be brought "to charge any person upon a promise to answer for the debt, default or misdoings of another * * * unless the promise, contract, agreement, representation, assurance, ratification, or some memorandum or note thereof be in writing and signed by the party to be charged thereby or his agent; but the consideration need not be set forth or expressed in the writing, and it may be proved (where a consideration is necessary) by other evidence."

Our statute does not require, as did the fourth section of the English statute of frauds, that a writing evidencing a promise to pay the debt of another shall show on its face the agreement between the parties in order to be valid. The difference between the two statutes is commented upon by the judges delivering opinions in the case of Colgin v. Henley, 6 Leigh, 85. At that time there was no provision in our statute that the consideration for the promise need not be stated in the writing, but could be shown by parol evidence. In that case the court seemed to think that the statute was satisfied if the promise to pay the debt of another was in writing.

In the case of Packard v. Richardson, 17 Mass. 122, 9 Am. Dec. 123, in which the Massachusetts statute (substantially the same as the English, it seems) was construed, it was said by Chief Justice Parker that the object of the statute was to secure certain and definite evidence of the existence and terms of the promise sought to be enforced against the defendant, and it ought not to be carried further by arguments founded upon the technical meaning of the word "agreement." It was therefore decided in that case that, if the nature and extent of an undertaking for the debt or default of another appear in writing, the demands of the statute are satisfied, and the consideration by which the agreement is upheld may be shown, as in other cases, by parol evidence.

And as the learned editors of Smith's Leading Cases say, in their note to the case of Wain v. Walters, vol. 2 (5th Am. Ed.) p. 291, the same course of decision has been generally followed in the New England states, as well as in most other parts of the Union, citing a number of cases, "and there can be little doubt of its soundness where, as in some of the states, the word 'promise' (as in Virginia) has been substituted for or introduced with the word 'agreement' in the fourth section of the statute."

The writing sought to be enforced against the defendants in this case shows clearly the nature and extent of their undertaking, and, as it seems to us, satisfies the requirements of that section of our statute of frauds, the construction of which is involved in this case.

[4] Although the writing was a sufficient compliance with the requirement of the statute of frauds, it was not binding unless supported by a valuable consideration. Colgin v. Henley, supra. The defendants insist that the consideration for the note was that Haskins, the cashier of the Chase City branch of the plaintiff bank, should not be indicted or prosecuted, and, as this was an illegal consideration, there can be no recovery upon the note. There was evidence tending to show that the defendants made the note upon that understanding.

That question was submitted to the jury upon the following instructions:

(1) "The court instructs the jury that, to render the note for $10,000 sued on in this cause illegal on the ground that it was given on the consideration of an agreement that C. Haskins, the late cashier of the Chase City branch of the Bank of Mecklenburg, should not be prosecuted for a felony committed by him as such cashier, it is necessary that there should have been an agreement to that effect, either express or implied, between the parties to this cause, and it is essential that such agreement must have been that the said C. Haskins should not be prosecuted for such felony."

(4) "The court instructs the jury that, even though they may believe from the evidence that the defendants and each of them signed the note dated April 28, 1908, for $10,000, and introduced in evidence in this case, yet if the jury further believes from the evidence that the said note was executed under an agreement, expressed or implied, between the parties to this cause, that one C. Haskins, who had been an employé of the Bank of Mecklenburg, and had been charged with a criminal offense, to wit, a felony, would not be indicted or prosecuted for said criminal offense, then the court instructs the jury that there was no legal consideration for said note, and that the same is void, and the jury should find for the defendants."

Exception was taken to the giving of instruction No. 1. The objection made to that instruction is that it told the jury, in effect, that in order for an agreement between the parties to the note to render it invalid there must be an agreement that Haskins should not be prosecuted or tried, and that an agreement that he should not be indicted would not invalidate it.

When instructions Nos. 1, 4, and 5 are read together, and in connection with the plea setting up that defense that the note was made for unlawful consideration, it seems to us that the terms "indicted" and "prosecuted" were treated as synonymous by the court and counsel, and that the question whether or not the consideration for the note was unlawful was fairly submitted to the jury.

[5] The consideration for the writing sued on, as claimed by the plaintiff, was (1) that "the note was given for a present indebtedness of the Kershaw Manufacturing Company, was made payable at a future date, and was accepted and acted upon by the receivers" of the plaintiff bank; and (2) that it was given "as a part of the subscriptions made by various persons who contributed to make the restitution" (that is, to pay the overdraft debt of that company), and having been accepted by the receivers, who on the faith thereof forbore to sue on the bond of the cashier or on the notes of the Kershaw Manufacturing Company, indorsed by C. H. and W. H. Saunders.

There was evidence tending to sustain the plaintiff's contention as to the consideration, and two instructions, numbered 2 and 7, on that question, were given.

No. 2 is as follows: "The court instructs the jury that the forbearance to sue for a debt which is due is a legal and valuable consideration for a promise made by a third person to pay such debt, and that a note payable at a future date, given for a present debt, is evidence of an agreement to suspend the remedy for the debt until the note is due, and, if the jury believe from the evidence that at the time the note sued on in this case was executed the Kershaw Manufacturing Company was indebted to the Bank of Mecklenburg in the sum of about $35,000, evidenced by notes indorsed by C. H. Saunders and W. H. Saunders, and that the note sued on was given as part payment of the said indebtedness, and that in consideration thereof the plaintiffs in this case have, from the time the said note was delivered to them hitherto, forborne to sue on the said indebtedness of the Kershaw Manufacturing Company to the said Bank of Mecklenburg, said note for $10,000 is supported by a consideration deemed legal and valuable in law, and the jury should find for the plaintiffs."

The objections urged to instruction No. 2 are that there is no evidence of an agreement between the parties to forbear suing in consideration of the undertaking to pay the debt of the Kershaw Manufacturing Company, and that it does not correctly state the law, even if there were such evidence.

It is true that there is no evidence of an express agreement to forbear suing; but the evidence shows that the receivers of the plaintiff bank did forbear bringing suit, and there is also evidence tending to show that they did not sue because of the undertaking of the defendants and others to pay the overdraft debt of the Kershaw Manufacturing Company.

While it seems to be settled that the mere forbearance to sue, without an agreement to that effect, is not a sufficient consideration for a promise to pay the debt of the person liable, even though the act of forbearance was induced by the promise, yet an agreement to forbear may be implied from the conduct of the parties and the nature of the transaction. 9 Cyc. 343; 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 744, and cases cited.

In Boyd v. Freize, 5 Gray (Mass.) 553, it was held that forbearance to sue on a debt due and payable, upon receiving a personal promise of payment from the assignee in pais of the debtor, was evidence from which a jury might infer an agreement to forbear.

[6] While forbearance to sue is evidence from which a jury may infer an agreement to forbear, it is not conclusive. The facts that the defendants did execute the note sued on, and that the plaintiff did forbear to sue because of its execution, do not show a consideration for the undertaking to pay the debt of another, unless there was an agreement, express or implied, that the plaintiff would forbear to sue. Such an agreement is absolutely essential; yet under instruction No. 2 the jury might have rendered a verdict for the plaintiff, without finding that there was any such agreement. The instruction was therefore erroneous.

Instruction No. 7 was in the following language: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the note dated April 28, 1908, was given in consideration of the fact, and with the understanding that the sum of $28,000 would be raised by the friends of C. Haskins for the purpose of making up a deficit alleged to be due by C. Haskins to the Bank of Mecklenburg, and that the sum of $28,000 was not raised, but only a part thereof was raised, then the consideration of said note failed, and the jury should find for the defendants."

[7] That instruction in effect declares that the note sued on was given for a sufficient consideration, if the full amount undertaken to be raised by the friends of Haskins, cashier, was in fact raised. Some questions were discussed here which involve the correctness of that instruction; but, as no exceptions were taken to it in the trial court, they will not be considered.

[8] Error is also assigned to the action of the court in refusing to give instructions numbered 7 and 9, offered by the defendants, upon the ground that the terms of the notice of the motion for judgment are not such as to permit the plaintiff to recover upon a note made and delivered as collateral to secure the payment of a debt due the plaintiff bank from the Kershaw Manufacturing Company.

The court properly refused to give those instructions, because the pleadings on a motion for a judgment for money after notice are intended to be of a very informal nature, except where statutes require otherwise, as under section 3299 of the Code. See Liskey v. Paul, 100 Va. 764, 42 S. E. 875; Board of Sup. of Washington Co. v. Dunn, 27 Grat. 608; Blanton v. Commonwealth, 91 Va. 1, 20 S. E. 884; Union, etc., Co. v. Pollard, 94 Va. 153, 26 S. E. 421, 36 L. R. A. 271, 64 Am. St. Rep. 715.

As the case must be reversed because instruction No. 2 given by the court was erroneous, and the cause remanded for a new trial, it is unnecessary to consider the assignment of error that the verdict of the jury is contrary to the law and the evidence, as the evidence may not be the same on the next trial.

The judgment complained of must be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial, to be had not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed.

LAMBERT v. JENKINS.

1. COURTS (§ 91*)—FORMER DECISION—STARE DECISIS.

Where, in a prior action between plaintiff, an owner, and a subcontractor, it was material that the court should construe the written contract for the construction of a building between plaintiff and the present defendant, and it was there held, on appeal by the Supreme Court, that defendant was an independent original contractor, and not plaintiff's agent in the employment of the subcontractor, and that plaintiff could not, therefore, recover against such subcontractor, the court, in the subsequent action by plaintiff against defendant in construing the same contract, properly held that defendant was an independent contractor, and that the subcontractor was defendant's agent, though defendant was no party to the prior suit.

2. CONTRACTS (§ 198*)—ORIGINAL CONTRACTOR—MATERIALS—GUARANTY—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where a contractor for a building guaranteed that the workmanship should be first-class and satisfactory in every respect, and plaintiff sued for damages caused by the failure of a subcontractor to provide proper materials for the construction of a granolithic floor, a request to charge that defendant contractor was not a guarantor that the floor would be perfect, but only agreed to use his best knowledge, skill, judgment, and energy in the business, and if he did that, and kept all the other parts of the contract with reference to workmanship, the jury should find for him, was properly refused, as contrary to the terms of the contract.

3. CONTRACTS (§ 198*)—BUILDING CONTRACTS—GUARANTY OF WORKMANSHIP—MATERIALS—"WORKMANSHIP."

Where a contractor for the construction of a building guaranteed that the workmanship should be first-class and satisfactory in every respect, the term "workmanship," as used in such guaranty, was sufficient to protect the owner against the use of bad or unsuitable materials by a subcontractor.

4. DAMAGES (§ 123*)—BREACH OF CONTRACT—MEASURE.

Where a contractor for the construction of a building guaranteed that the workmanship should be first-class, and a granolithic floor put in by a subcontractor was soft and defective, the court properly charged that the owner's measure of damages was such a sum as it would reasonably take to make the floor conform to the contract.

5. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

In an action against a contractor for damages because of a defective granolithic floor in a building constructed by a subcontractor, defendant was not entitled to an instruction as to his right to set off the value of other work done by such contractor, where there was no offer of evidence at the trial as to the cost or value of such work; and this, notwithstanding the jury saw the same, and by taking measurements could have placed a valuation thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

6. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 182*)—NOTICE TO AGENT—EVIDENCE—STATEMENTS MADE TO AGENT.

In an action against a contractor for damages resulting from a defective floor in a building constructed by a subcontractor, the latter being the agent of the contractor, the owner was entitled to testify that he complained to such subcontractor, and told him that the floor could not be used, that it was soft, and did not seem right.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—EVIDENCE—PREJUDICE.

Where, in an action for damages caused by the defective construction of the floor in a building, the jury were permitted to view the premises, defendant was not prejudiced by the introduction of photographs thereof.

Action by L. H. Jenkins against George W. Lambert. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

W. L. Royall, for plaintiff in error. Garrett & Pollard, for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. This case and that of Veitch v. Jenkins, 107 Va. 68, 57 S. E. 574, arose out of a contract entered into between plaintiff in error, G. W. Lambert, and defendant in error, L. H. Jenkins, which was construed in the first-named case.

The essential features of the contract are set out in Veitch v. Jenkins, supra, as follows:

" * * * L. H. Jenkins entered into a written agreement with * * * George W. Lambert, by which the latter engaged to purchase material, employ labor, and superintend and erect for the former a building in the city of Richmond for a book factory, in accordance with certain plans in hand, to use his best efforts to secure materials and labor at the lowest cost, and to render his employer a true account thereof. The estimated cost of the building was $12,110, which amount was not to be exceeded without the consent of the owner, and Lambert guaranteed that the workmanship should be first-class and satisfactory in every respect, while Jenkins agreed to pay the net cost of material and labor, together with a commission of $1,300 to Lambert.

"The plans called for a granolithic floor in one of the rooms of the building, and the contractor (Lambert) employed Veitch to supply the material and lay the floor."

The controlling question in Veitch v. Jenkins, supra, was whether or not Lambert was an independent contractor, or merely an agent of Jenkins, and it was held that he was an independent contractor—the result of the decision being that Jenkins could not recover of Veitch the cost and expense incurred by Jenkins in consequence of Veitch's failure to supply suitable material and lay the granolithic floor as called for in Lambert's contract with Jenkins; that Veitch was the employé of Lambert, and not of Jenkins, and, therefore, was not answerable to the latter in damages for defective work. After that decision, Jenkins brought this suit against Lambert, and recovered the judgment herein complained of, for $1,032.38, as the amount expended by Jenkins, made necessary by reason of the granolithic floor in question being so defective that it could not be used, and therefore did not conform to the requirements of the contract between the parties.

[1] The giving of instructions Nos. 1 and 2, offered by defendant in error, plaintiff below, is assigned as error, and the only reasons given for objection thereto are: (1) "Telling the jury that Lambert was an independent contractor"; and (2) "telling the jury that Veitch was Lambert's agent."

It is very true that plaintiff in error was not a party to the record in Veitch v. Jenkins, supra; but the contract construed in that case is the same contract to be construed in this, and as the contract was in writing and unambiguous in its terms, the opinion in the first case said that it was the province of the court to construe the instrument, and as a matter of law to determine the relation between the parties thereto, and then followed the language construing the contract quoted above. Not only was it there decided that plaintiff in error here stood in the relation to defendant in error of an independent contractor, but that there was no privity between the latter and the former's "employé, Veitch," and therefore it was held that Veitch was plaintiff in error's agent in the matter of supplying the necessary material and putting down the granolithic floor called for in the contract. The contract being the same, and the evidence in the two cases practically the same, the rule that, "where the contract is in writing and unambiguous in its terms, it is the province of the court to construe the instrument and as a matter of law to determine the relation between the parties," applies as well here, and parol evidence intended to alter or vary the terms of the contract cannot be considered.

The case of Lambert v. Phillips, 109 Va. 632, 64 S. E. 945, relied on by the plaintiff in error, has no controlling influence in this case, for the all-sufficient reason that in that case the contract was oral, not written, and the sole question involved was to whom credit was given, a question for determination by the jury under proper instructions from the court.

The assignments of error with respect to the giving of defendant in error's instructions Nos. 1 and 2 are without merit.

[2] The refusal of the trial court to give an instruction (No. 3) asked by plaintiff in error is assigned as error.

It was sought by the instructions to have the jury told that plaintiff in error "was not a guarantor that the granolithic floor in the building he undertook to erect would be perfect, but only agreed that he would use his best knowledge, skill, judgment, and energies to the business, and that if he did that, and kept all the other parts of his contract (that as to workmanship being meant), the jury should find for him."

It is very clear that this instruction would have been contrary to the plain terms of the contract, which, so far as is material, we have adverted to, and there was no error in refusing it.

[3] The modification by the court of instruction No. 4, asked for by plaintiff in error, is assigned as error.

The instruction as asked is as follows: "The jury are instructed that the defendant, Lambert, agreed by his contract with the plaintiff, that has been produced in the evidence, that the workmanship upon the granolithic floor to be laid should be first-class in every respect and such as would be satisfactory to a reasonable man. But they are further instructed that the burden of proving that the workmanship upon said floor was not first-class in every respect and such as would be satisfactory to a reasonable man rests upon the plaintiff. If, therefore, the jury believes from the evidence that the plaintiff has failed to prove that the workmanship upon said floor was not first-class in every respect and such as would be satisfactory to a reasonable man, and if they believe, further, from the evidence that the defendant kept all of his other agreements with the plaintiff, then their verdict should be for the defendant."

The modification of the instruction complained of is in these words: "But the court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence the defendant or his agents, or any of them, was negligent in furnishing bad material for the construction of the granolithic floor, or negligent in mixing said material, or negligent in the construction of the said floor, then he violated the duty laid upon him by the contract that the workmanship should be first-class."

The insistence of the learned counsel for plaintiff in error is "that, in guaranteeing that Veitch's workmanship would be first-class, he (Lambert) did not guarantee Veitch would use the best material, and if bad material crept in without his (Lambert's) knowledge, his guaranty that the workmanship would be first-class, should not make him responsible for that bad material."

It is difficult to perceive what plaintiff in error undertook to do pursuant to his guaranty that the "workmanship should be first-class and satisfactory in all respects," if it was not to protect defendant in error against the use of bad or unsuitable material in doing the work undertaken. The modification of instruction No. 4, in effect, merely told the jury that if they believed that plaintiff in error or his agents were negligent in furnishing bad material, or negligent in the construction of the granolithic floor, then he violated the duty imposed upon him by the contract that the workmanship should be first-class. As the instruction was offered, it was calculated to mislead the jury, and the court's modification of it was necessary and proper.

[4] As to the measure of damages, the jury were instructed as follows: "The court instructs the jury that, if you find for the plaintiff, then, in assessing your damages, you will find such as it would reasonably take to make the granolithic floor conform to the contract aforesaid."

The giving of this instruction is assigned as error, although plaintiff in error, as is to be inferred from the state of the record, did not ask for a counter instruction, or a modification of the instruction complained of. It is perhaps well to note in this connection, also, that it is not denied that plaintiff in error had been paid in full, before the cause of action against him arose, for the work he had undertaken to do for defendant in error.

With respect to the instruction as to the measure of damages, we deem it only necessary to say that it conforms to the general rule stated in the case of Burruss v. Hines, 94 Va. 416, 26 S. E. 875, as follows: "The general rule in awarding damages is to give compensation for pecuniary loss; that is, to put the plaintiff in the same position, so far as money can do it, as he would have been if the contract had been properly performed."

"The object of the law," says the opinion by Judge Joynes in Peshine v. Shepperson, 17 Grat. 485, 94 Am. St. Rep. 468, "is to give amends or reparation."

This general rule, as stated, is fully sanctioned in Stillwell, etc., Co. v. Phelps, 130 U. S. 520, 9 Sup. Ct. 601, 32 L. Ed. 1035; and in the case of Wright v. Sanderson & Sims, 20 Mo. App. 534, quite similar to the case at bar, the following instruction to the jury was approved: "If the jury find for the plaintiff, the measure of damages is the amount it would cost to make the foundation and cellar wall of the size and as good as the contract required."

The rule is also sanctioned in the case of Leathers v. Sweeney, 41 La. Ann. 287, 5 South. 662, Plunkett v. Meredith, 72 Ark. 3, 77 S. W. 600, and Hebb v. Welch, 185 Mass. 335, 70 N. E. 440. The action in Leathers v. Sweeney, supra, was to recover damages of a steamboat builder for defects of construction which occasioned loss to the owner, and it was held that the measure of damages was the amount of reasonable costs incurred and paid by the owner to remedy the defects and to place the boat in a proper condition, as contemplated by the contract.

[5] It is claimed, however, for plaintiff in error here, that the instruction should have told the jury that he was entitled to set off the value of the office floor, porch, and coping laid or constructed by Veitch; but a complete answer to this contention is that he did not at the trial offer any evidence as to the costs of the office floor, porch, and coping. Under these circumstances, the contention, for the first time made in this court, that the jury "saw the office floor, and by measuring and taking it from the dimension of the rest of the floor they could have put a valuation on it," cannot avail plaintiff in error. It comes too late. Warren v. Warren, 93 Va. 73, 24 S. E. 913, and note to the case at page 195, 2 Va. Law Reg; Sul. Mines Co. v. Insurance Co., 94 Va. 355, 26 S. E. 856. Moreover, when the jury were sent to view the premises, it was not asked that they be told to take the measurements which it is here contended they should have taken; and, besides, the jury did not assess damages to defendant in error to the full amount he had paid to Veitch for putting down the floor in question, to say nothing of what he had paid to plaintiff in error for seeing to it that the work was properly done and "satisfactory in all respects."

[6] Since Veitch was the agent of plaintiff in error, and not of defendant in error, the trial court did not err in permitting the latter, when testifying in his own behalf, to testify: "I complained to Mr. Veitch, and told him we could not work in that place; that the floor was soft or something—didn't seem to be right."

[7] Nor did the court err in permitting the introduction of photographs of the floor in question, especially in view of the fact that the jury viewed the premises, and, therefore, could not possibly have been influenced to the prejudice of plaintiff in error by the photographs.

We are now brought to the remaining assignment of error with respect to the refusal of the court to set aside the verdict of the jury and grant plaintiff in error a new trial, which assignment is not argued in the petition for this writ of error.

The case was fairly submitted to the jury by the instructions given them, and stands here as on a demurrer to evidence, and we can see no reason for our interference with the verdict of the jury, approved by the learned judge below. Therefore the judgment complained of must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

BROWN CARRIAGE CO. v. DOWD et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 26, 1911.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 49*)—"ACCOMMODATION BILL."

An "accommodation bill" or note is one to which the accommodating party has put his name, without consideration, to accommodate some other party who is to issue it and is expected to pay it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. § 86; Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, pp. 73, 74.]

2. SALES (§ 451*)—CONDITIONAL SALES—REGISTRATION.

Where a contract of conditional sale was not made or to be performed in North Carolina, it was valid without registration under the common law, in the absence of proof that the law of the state where it was executed or to be performed required registration; the North Carolina registration law being inapplicable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. § 1323; Dec. Dig. § 451.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 35*)—JUDICIAL NOTICE—STATUTES OF OTHER STATES.

Statutes of other states will not be judicially noticed, but must be proved as facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 35, 51; Dec. Dig. § 35; Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2859.]

4. SALES (§ 468*)—CONDITIONAL SALES—INSTRUCTION—LIEN—RETENTION.

An agency contract for the sale of vehicles required the agent to execute a series of notes for the invoice price for the accommodation of the principal and to pay the proceeds of sales thereon, and, if the notes were not paid before maturity, to give new notes in place thereof. The contract referring to the first series of notes provided that they should be considered as accommodation notes only, and that no title to the vehicles should pass to the agent by reason of giving them, nor should the fiduciary relation established by the contract change on that account. The stipulation for payment of the final renewals was followed by a declaration that the vehicles, until sold by the agent, remained the property of the seller with full control thereof, and that the proceeds of any sale to the amount of the invoice price should be paid to it. Held, that the provision for payment of the last renewals did not change the seller's right to retain control of the vehicles in possession of the agent until their claim was paid in full, nor release their lien on the vehicles remaining in the hands of the agent unsold as security for the debt.

5. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 115*)—DISCHARGE OF SURETY—ABANDONMENT OF SECURITY.

Plaintiff, having contracted with the bankrupt to sell plaintiff's vehicles at B., entered into an agency contract with him requiring the execution of accommodation notes to plaintiff for the invoice price of vehicles shipped to be paid by the proceeds of sales as made, and, if not paid when due, to be renewed in accordance with the terms specified. The contract also provided that the title to all the vehicles in the bankrupt's possession should belong to plaintiff until paid for, and that the making of the renewal notes should not change the fiduciary relation existing between the parties. Renewal notes having been executed by the bankrupt and signed by defendants as sureties, after bankruptcy plaintiff voluntarily surrendered to the bankrupt's trustee the vehicles on hand, the value of which exceeded the notes on which defendants were sureties, and filed its claim as a general creditor for the balance due on such notes, without making any attempt to claim the vehicles remaining unsold. Held, that defendants were discharged as sureties under the rule that a surety, when he pays the debt, is entitled to an assignment of the securities held by the creditor, and, if the latter has voluntarily rendered himself unable to make such assignment or has caused the security to become unavailable to the indorser, the latter is discharged pro tanto.

6. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 115*)—INDORSERS—SECURITY—IMPAIRMENT—PROMISE TO PAY.

Sureties on certain notes given by a bankrupt in payment of vehicles under a sales agency contract, reserving ownership of the vehicles unsold in the payee of the notes until paid for, by promising to pay the notes, did not impair their right to have the vehicles, remaining unsold at the time bankruptcy intervened, preserved and their value applied to their exoneration; nor did such promise authorize the payee to voluntarily surrender the vehicles so remaining to the bankrupt's trustee for sale and distribution of the proceeds among creditors.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mecklenburg County; E. B. Jones, Judge.

Action by the Brown Carriage Company against W. C. Dowd and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The plaintiff appointed James G. Dowd as their agent at Birmingham, Ala., for the sale of their vehicles, under a contract dated January 14, 1907 (Exhibit A), by which it was provided that the agent should pay all freight and storage charges and taxes, insure the property in the name and for the benefit of the plaintiff, and sell the vehicles, in the usual course of business, to bona fide customers for cash, at not less than the consigned invoice value of the same. It further provides, as follows:

"(5) Said agent shall sign and send to the Brown Carriage Company accommodation notes for the amount of each invoice as soon as it is sent to him, said notes being dated the same day as the invoice and to be payable one-third in four months, one-third in five months, one-third in six months, said notes being considered as accommodation notes only and no title in said vehicles pass to said agent by reason of giving same, nor does the fiduciary relation established by this contract change on that account.

"(6) On the first of each month, following the date of shipment, said agent is to make a full and complete report of all sales made, at the same time remitting to the Brown Carriage Company proceeds of said sale, retaining as his commission only such amount as shall have been received in excess of the invoice value of said goods.

"(7) Ten days before the first accommodation note referred to in paragraph No. 5 comes due, should the monthly payment for goods sold not have equaled an amount sufficient to pay same, said agent is to mail a new note at four months to said Brown Carriage Company for the difference between the total of said payments and the amount of this note. The Brown Carriage Company is to return to them the accommodation note referred to. Should said monthly payments exceed the amount of the first note falling due, the note is to be returned to said agent by the Brown Carriage Company, and the amount in excess is to be credited as a part payment on the second note falling due, and other payments made from that time to be credited on this second note in the same manner as provided for with the first note. Should these payments not be sufficient to pay the second note, ten days before its falling due, said agent is to send a new note at four months for the amount remaining after deducting these remittances, and the Brown Carriage Company is to return the second accommodation note, as provided for the first accommodation note. Should the amount so paid exceed the amount of the second note, the surplus is to be credited on the third note in the same manner as on the previous notes. Should it not be sufficient to pay the third note, however, a new note is to be given at four months, as provided for with the two preceding notes. When the three renewal notes given as provided for above fall due, they are to be renewed in like manner, the renewal notes falling due twelve months from the time of shipment. These notes are to be paid at maturity, without reference to the amount of work still on hand unsold at that time.

"(8) Said agent shall make a report of goods on hand at any time the Brown Carriage Company shall request same, giving stock number and catalogue number of the vehicles. The attorney or agent of the Brown Carriage Company shall have access to the premises wherein said goods are kept, for the purpose of ascertaining their condition or whatever information they may desire with respect thereto, also the privilege of examining books and records pertaining to the sale of said vehicles.

"(9) If at any time, through the carelessness or neglect of said agent, any of the vehicles on hand be damaged or their condition be such as to impair their value, said agent agrees to pay to said Brown Carriage Company such an amount as will put the vehicles in good condition.

"(10) All the vehicles supplied to said agent by said principal, until in good faith sold by the latter as provided herein, shall remain the absolute property of said principal, who may at will require same to be delivered or reshipped to it or delivered to any agent of said company. All the proceeds of sales received by said agent accruing from sale of goods supplied hereunder shall belong to said principal, excepting only such amount as shall be in excess of invoice value of the same, which excess said agent shall accept as full recompense of his services, charges and expenses of every kind and description."

"(12) It is expressly understood and agreed by and between the parties hereto that this is a special agency contract for the sale of vehicles of the Brown Carriage Company, and that no act or omission on the part of said agent shall in any wise bind the Brown Carriage Company, no further authority being conferred upon said agent.

"(13) If said agent shall fail to comply with any of the conditions of this contract, he shall upon noncompliance forfeit all commissions, or remuneration due or which may become due the said agent hereunder."

The agent gave the notes described in clauses 5 and 7 of the contract and this action was brought to recover the amount of the three renewal notes mentioned in the last part of the seventh clause. The first of these notes, dated February 1, 1908, is for $500 and due May 30, 1908; second, dated February 25, 1908, for $416.36, due July 1, 1908; third, dated March 25, 1908, for $416.36, due August 1, 1908—the total amount of the notes being $1,332.72. All the notes, both original and renewals, were indorsed by the defendants W. C. Dowd and W. F. Dowd. Plaintiff also alleges that on July 4, 1908, after the maturity of the note for $500 and the note for $416.36 due July 1, 1908, the defendants, for a valuable consideration, promised to pay the same. The agent sold vehicles from time to time and accounted to the plaintiffs for the proceeds of sale. On January 6, 1908, he was adjudicated a bankrupt, and, at that time, he had in his possession vehicles exceeding in value the total amount of the notes in suit. The defendants answered and averred that the notes upon which this suit was brought were accommodation notes by the terms of the contract of agency and given by James G. Dowd and indorsed by the defendants only for the accommodation and benefit of the plaintiff, who wished to use them in bank to supply a deficiency in their capital, caused by a withdrawal of the money which they had invested in the vehicles shipped to their agent at Birmingham, and therefore they were not liable thereon to the plaintiff. They further alleged that the plaintiff had surrendered the vehicles to the trustee in bankruptcy of James G. Dowd, had proved the claim against him as a general creditor without asserting any lien on or right to the vehicles, and had actually accepted a dividend from the bankrupt's general assets as an unsecured creditor, and that by this conduct the defendants as indorsers, or even as sureties, were released. The plaintiff admits that it proved its claim in bankruptcy without asserting any right to or lien upon the vehicles, which they permitted to be taken by the trustee and applied to the payment of the bankrupt's debts generally, and also that it received its dividend from the trustee, knowing that he had the property, but it relied on the fact that the defendants, by promising, after the bankruptcy, to pay the notes, induced the plaintiff to desist from taking possession of the goods, and tendered an issue to that effect, which was refused. The court submitted issues to the jury which, with the answers thereto, are as follows:

"(1) Were the originals of the notes sued on executed by James G. Dowd pursuant to the terms of the contract marked 'Exhibit A'? Answer: Yes. (2) Were the originals of the notes sued on and all renewals thereof executed by James G. Dowd and indorsed by the defendants for the accommodation of the plaintiff? Answer: Yes. (3) Were the defendants induced to indorse said notes by reason of the representations of the plaintiff that said notes were only to be paid from the proceeds of the sales of the vehicles shipped said J. G. Dowd by the plaintiff under the terms of the contract marked 'Exhibit A'? Answer: Yes. (4) What amount of the proceeds of the sale of the original shipment of vehicles by the plaintiff to James G. Dowd were paid to the plaintiff by the said James G. Dowd? Answer: $690. (5) What was the invoice price or value of the balance of said original shipment left on hand when James G. Dowd filed his petition in bankruptcy? Answer: $950. (6) What disposition was made of the balance of said first shipment so left on hand when said petition in bankruptcy was filed? Answer: Trustee in bankruptcy. (7) What disposition was made of the other vehicles shipped to James G. Dowd by the plaintiff which were on hand when said petition in bankruptcy was filed? Answer: Trustee in bankruptcy. (8) What was the invoice value of all vehicles shipped by the plaintiff to James G. Dowd which were on hand when said James G. Dowd filed his said petition in bankruptcy? Answer: $1,700. (9) Did the plaintiff file its claim as a general creditor of James G. Dowd with the referee in bankruptcy for the alleged balance claimed to be due it by said James G. Dowd, for vehicles shipped to the said James G. Dowd by the said plaintiff? Answer: Yes. Stating partially secured by indorsement of notes sued on. (10) Did the defendants, after the maturity of the notes, described in the plaintiff's second cause of action, and after the said notes had been protested for nonpayment, agree to settle same? Answer: No. (11) Did the defendants waive the right to have the funds, received from the goods sold by J. G. Dowd, applied as payment on the notes? Answer: No."

Judgment was entered upon the verdict for the defendant, and plaintiff appealed.

Pharr & Bell, for appellant. Burwell & Cansler and Thaddeus A. Adams, for appellees.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). The vital question in this case arises out of the somewhat vague wording of a clause of the contract between the plaintiff and James G. Dowd, who was appointed agent at Birmingham, Ala., to sell its vehicles. The material parts of the contract are generally expressed with sufficient clearness to be easily understood; but the last clause in the seventh section is given different constructions by the respective parties. The original notes and the successive renewals thereof, except the last, were undoubtedly for the accommodation of the plaintiff, and if the last renewals, being the notes sued on, are of a like character, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and the verdict and judgment were right. But what does the language of that one sentence mean? "These notes (the last renewals) are to be paid at maturity without reference to the amount of work still on hand unsold at that time"; that is, at their maturity, which was 12 months from the time the vehicles were shipped. The plaintiff says that this provision changed the character of the notes and they became ordinary promissory notes indorsed by W. O. Dowd and W. F. Dowd, not for its accommodation, but for the benefit solely of their brother, James G. Dowd, and that they were due and payable at their maturity, to the plaintiff, by both maker and indorsers, who were really sureties for their payment. The defendants, on the contrary, contend that, as shown by the proof, the object in giving the notes was that plaintiff might use them as a basis of credit in bank and supply the deficiency in funds for carrying on its business, which had been caused by the withdrawal of money invested in the vehicles held by their agent, James G. Dowd; that they were executed solely for the benefit of the plaintiff, and not to create any liability of the defendants for their ultimate payment; and, further, if it had been intended that the defendants should, in the end, become absolutely bound for their payment, it was no advantage to them that they were originally accommodation paper. The defendants, therefore, insist that they continued to be accommodation notes, and that the stipulation for their payment at maturity meant a payment by the payee, who is the party legally bound to pay them, and this position is sound, provided the premise is correct that they did not cease to be accommodation notes because of that provision.

They also contend that, if this language is obscure, any doubt as to its meaning should be resolved in their favor, and in this connection rely on Hill v. Manufacturing Co., 79 Ga. 105, 3 S. E. 445, in which Chief Justice Bleckley said: "We recognize that the party who wrote the contract, made it ambiguous, and executed it in that condition, must explain the ambiguity in order to obtain a construction of it in his favor. The author of the ambiguity has the burden of explaining it when he seeks to take the benefit of a construction favorable to himself, and, if he does not clear up the meaning beyond doubt, the doubt must be given against him." They further contend that, if not accommodation paper, and the stipulation is to be considered as having changed the character of the notes so that the defendants became liable upon them as indorsers or sureties to the plaintiff, it follows that the terms upon which James G. Dowd held the vehicles were also changed, and the shipment, instead of being a consignment as originally contemplated, was converted into a sale, not absolute, but conditional, the title to vest when the notes are paid, or that the vehicles in the possession of James G. Dowd were thereafter to be held by him as a security for the payment of the notes. If this be so, it is then argued that, by relinquishing the property thus held for it as security, whether by way of conditional sale or otherwise, to the trustee in bankruptcy, to become a part of the general assets of the bankrupt and by proving its claim as unsecured and receiving a dividend from the general assets, plaintiff waived its lien upon the property, and discharged the defendants W. O. Dowd and W. F. Dowd. It was admitted that all the notes were executed pursuant to the terms of the contract. We are inclined to the opinion, upon a view of the entire transaction, that the notes retained their original quality of accommodation paper, notwithstanding the clause of the contract which gave rise to this litigation; but we need not decide that question, as our opinion is with the defendants upon their second proposition.

[2] We may as well state now that the contract between the plaintiff and James G. Dowd was not made in this state, nor was it to be performed here, and if the stipulation in the contract, as to the payment of the last renewals at maturity, turned the consignment into a conditional sale, or impressed a lien upon the property, by way of mortgage or otherwise, as a security for the payment of the notes, either of which it may be conceded would require for its validity probate and registration, if the contract had been subject to our registration law, the contract is nevertheless valid without registration, as there is no evidence in the record that registration of such a contract is required to be in writing and registered in order to be valid against creditors, either by the law of Ohio or Alabama. The case, therefore, is not affected by what is said in Godwin v. Bank, 145 N. C. 320, 59 S. E. 154, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 985; Lance v. Taintor, 137 N. C. 249, 49 S. E. 211. At common law such contracts were not required to be registered, and not in this state until required by statute, and we presume that the common law exists in other jurisdictions until the contrary is shown.

[3] We do not take judicial notice of the statutes of other states; but they must be brought to our attention by proof. It was said by Judge Pearson, in Hooper v. Moore, 50 N. C. 130: "What is the law of another state or of a foreign country is as much a question of law as what is the law of our own state. There is this difference, however: The court is presumed to know judicially the public laws of our state, while in respect to private laws and the law of other states and foreign countries, this knowledge is not presumed. It follows that the existence of the latter must be alleged and proved as facts, for otherwise the court cannot know or take notice of them. This is familiar learning. 3 Wooddeson, Lec. 175." To the same effect are the following cases: Knight v. Wall, 19 N. C. 125; Moore v. Gwynn, 27 N. C. 187; State v. Jackson, 13 N. C. 564; Hilliard v. Outlaw, 92 N. C. 266; Minor on Conflict of Laws, page 531, where it is said that: "If the foreign law in issue is the unwritten law of a state not originally subject to the common law, or, in any event, if it is a statute or written law, the presumption (as in the case of the common law) does not apply." In Hall v. Railroad, 146 N. C. 345, 59 S. E. 879, we said: "It was stated by counsel for the plaintiff that the law of Virginia was similar in its provisions to our statute; but there is nothing in the record to show what the law of that state is. We do not take judicial notice of the statutes of another state. They must be pleaded and proven." Griffin v. Carter, 40 N. C. 413; Brown v. Pratt, 56 N. C. 202. However, therefore, the fact may be, we must hold, in the absence of proof showing the contrary, that the new contract, if we may so call it, did not require registration and, consequently, the vehicles in the hands of James G. Dowd, at the time he was adjudged a bankrupt, did not pass to the trustee. When the verdict upon the sixth and seventh issues is read and interpreted in the light of the evidence and the charge of the court, it means that the plaintiff intentionally abandoned the property to the trustee; and, when taken in connection with the admission that it proved its claim as an unsecured creditor and received a dividend paid by him from the general assets, it further means that the plaintiff, quietly and without a protest, and certainly without any assertion of its right to the property, assented to, if it did not ratify, the act of the trustee in taking and appropriating the property for the benefit of the bankrupt's general creditors.

There is but one question remaining for our consideration, and that requires us to determine the legal effect of the conduct of the plaintiff with reference to the property upon both its and the defendant's rights. In the first place, if the provision of the contract as to the payment of the last renewals at maturity changed the relation of the defendants to the note as accommodation indorsers, did the plaintiff still retain a lien on the property for the security of the debt?

[4] It is impossible to read the contract throughout, without concluding that it was the clear intention of the plaintiff to retain control of the vehicles in the possession of James G. Dowd, until their claim was satisfied in full. Referring to the first series of notes, the contract provided as follows: "Said notes being considered as accommodation notes only and no title in said vehicles to pass to said agent by reason of giving same, nor does the fiduciary relation established by this contract change on that account." The stipulation as to the payment of the final renewals is in the seventh section of the contract, and it is followed by the tenth section, which positively and emphatically declares that the vehicles, until sold by James G. Dowd, shall remain the property of the plaintiff, with full control thereof, and the proceeds of any sale to the amount of the invoice price shall be paid to it. If the plaintiff intended to wipe out this provision and part entirely with all its interest in the property and all control thereof and to surrender it altogether, as a security, to James G. Dowd, when the last renewals were executed, why did it not say so in plain and unmistakable language? If the provision that the notes should be considered as accommodation paper, and the giving of them should not have the effect of passing the title of the property to their agent, extends to the renewals, and is not confined to the original notes, and a majority of the court is disposed so to think, though we do not decide the point, the contract would retain its legal designation and character as a simple consignment for sale, or upon a del credere commission, and the plaintiff must fail in this suit, or if the indorsers of the notes are to be regarded as simple guarantors of the good conduct and fidelity of plaintiff's agent, James G. Dowd, the same result would follow, unless some delinquency of the agent had been shown, i. e., that he had sold vehicles and had not accounted for the proceeds.

As tending to support this view of the case, it may well be suggested, as it was by the defendant's counsel, that the stipulation for the payment of the last renewals at maturity could not have been intended to change the liability of the indorsers, as it requires payment "without reference to the amount of work on hand and unsold at that time," and the parties could not have contemplated that James G. Dowd and his indorsers should pay the notes in full if nearly all the property had been sold and the plaintiff had received the proceeds of the sale, and only an inconsiderable part of the property remained in the hands of the agent. But, however this may be, it is evident that the plaintiff did not intend to release the property, to let it go, until the notes had been paid, even if the liability of the indorser was changed by giving the last renewals. This idea pervades the whole contract. If the indorsers had become insolvent, their nominal principal having become a bankrupt, we apprehend the plaintiff would be in court and claiming that it had never parted with its right to the property and seeking to recover it, or at least to charge it with a lien or as security for the payment of the notes, upon the ground that title to the property did not pass from it by the giving of the last renewals and not until the payment of the same. They would have been surprised by the suggestion, and justly so, that they had relinquished all of their rights therein, as they did not intend a sale to their agent. If this be the correct view to take of the case, we think the indorsers were discharged by the conduct of the plaintiff with regard to the property. In Brandt on Suretyship & Guaranty (3d Ed.) § 480, the doctrine is thus stated: "If the creditor has a surety for the debt, and also has a lien on property of the principal for the security of the same debt, and he relinquishes such lien, or by his act such lien is rendered unavailable for the payment of the debt, the surety is, to the extent of the value of the lien thus lost, discharged from liability. This rule does not depend upon contract between the surety and creditor, but results from equitable principles inherent in the relation of principal and surety. It is equitable that the property of the principal, pledged for the payment of the debt, should be applied to that purpose, and it is grossly inequitable that in such case the property should be diverted from that purpose, and the debt thrown upon a mere surety. Upon obtaining such a lien, the creditor becomes a trustee for all parties concerned, and is bound to apply the property to the purposes of the trust." The creditor, it is true, must have the means of satisfaction in his hands or under his control, either a lien on the property or something equivalent to it and just as effective, conferred by law or by agreement, or a right with respect to the property, which the law requires him to assert and preserve or enforce for the benefit of the indorser. "The creditor must part with no security for the payment of the debt; but the security must be a mortgage, pledge, or lien—some right or interest in the property which the creditor can hold in trust for the surety, and to which the surety, if he pay the debt, can be subrogated; and the right to apply or hold must exist and be absolute." Brandt, § 484.

[6] The indorser, when he pays the debt, is entitled to an assignment of the securities held by the creditor, and if the latter has voluntarily rendered himself unable to make it, or has caused the securities to become unavailing to the indorser, the latter is discharged, at least pro tanto. In this case, it appears that there was enough property on hand to pay the notes. A familiar illustration is a release by a creditor of a lien acquired by the levy of an execution upon the property of the principal debtor. "If the creditor recovers a judgment against principal and surety, or against the principal alone, and execution is issued thereon and levied upon real or personal property of the principal subject thereto, and such property is, by act of the creditor, released from the levy and lost as a security, the surety is discharged to the extent that he is injured thereby." Brandt, § 489; Cooper v. Wilcox, 22 N. C. 90, 32 Am. Dec. 695, in which it is said: "Between the creditor and a surety, the former is not bound to active diligence to protect the latter; but, if by his act he deprives him of a security, the latter is pro tanto discharged, and where, upon an appeal from the county to the superior court, the judgment was affirmed, and execution issued against the defendant and the sureties to the appeal bond, and was levied upon property of the principal debtor sufficient to satisfy it, and the plaintiff discharged the levy, he discharges the sureties. The rights of a surety to protection are recognized in all courts, if his character as a surety can be averred; as at law, in cases between the holder and drawer of a bill, if the former release the acceptor, he thereby discharges the latter." And again: "So in Law v. East India Company, 4 Ves. 829, it was considered as incontestable that where a creditor has a fund of a principal debtor sufficient for the payment of a debt, and gives it back to the debtor, the surety can never afterwards be called upon. The creditor, by virtue of the seizure in execution, or of the deposit, becomes a trustee of the security so acquired, or of the fund for the benefit of all concerned, and is responsible to any party injured by unfaithfulness in execution of that trust. For it is a rule that if he be not only creditor but trustee, then even his neglect, if it occasion the loss of that to the benefit of which the surety is entitled, will pro tanto discharge the surety. Capel v. Butler, 2 Sim. & Stew. 457 (1 Cond. Eng. Chan. Rep. 543)." Page 91, of 22 N. C. (32 Am. Dec. 695). The principle is clearly defined by Chief Justice Brickell in Knighton v. Curry, 62 Ala. 404: "The principle upon which the whole doctrine of subrogation, not only as it is applied for the protection of sureties, but as it is applied to compel him who is primarily liable, or the thing which may be primarily liable to bear a burden, to continue to bear it for the relief of him, or another thing, secondarily liable, does not depend upon contract, but has its foundation in natural justice, and is said by Ch. Kent to be 'recognized in every cultivated system of jurisprudence.' No doctrine can be more firmly established than that a surety who has paid the debt of the principal is entitled to stand in the place of the creditor, as to all securities for the debt, held or acquired by the creditor, and to have the same benefit from them as the creditor might have had, if the surety had not paid, and the creditor had resorted to them. 1 Story's Eq. § 499 et seq.; 1 Lead. Eq. Cases (4th Ed.) 136; 2 Lead. Eq. Cases (4th Ed.) 277; Brandt on Suretyship, §§ 260-282. As a necessary consequence of this right of the surety, it is well settled on authority that if the creditor, without the consent of the surety, parts with or renders unavailable any security or fund, which he has the right to apply in satisfaction of the debt, the surety is exonerated to the extent of the value of such securities. The reason is that such securities or fund are impressed with a trust for the payment of the debt, and the creditor is bound to apply them, or hold them as a trustee, ready to be applied for the benefit of the surety. Cheeseborough v. Millard, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 409, 7 Am. Dec. 494; Hays v. Ward, 4 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 123, 8 Am. Dec. 554; Brandt on Suretyship, §§ 370-372. The principle is sometimes expressed in another form: 'That when a creditor has the means of satisfaction in his own hands, and chooses not to retain it, but suffers it to pass into the hands of the principal, the surety to that extent will be discharged.'" Cullum v. Emanuel, 1 Ala. 29, 34 Am. Dec. 757. It would be useless to multiply authorities to support so familiar a doctrine.

[8] The plaintiff contends, though, that it was lulled into security and induced to part with the property by a promise of the indorsers to pay the notes, and the court refused an issue intended to present this phase of the matter. We do not see how a promise to pay the notes could impair the right of the indorsers to have the property preserved and applied to their exoneration. If they had actually assumed their principal's obligation or paid the notes, the right of subrogation would arise at once, and it would be, if anything, more the duty of the creditor to protect them when it is known that they must suffer, or when they have actually been subjected to loss. It can make no difference what kind of indorsers the Dows were, or whether they were guarantors or sureties, for, in either of those relations to the notes, they were entitled to the protection of the creditor, and plaintiff should not have slept upon their rights, nor should it have relaxed its energies in their behalf, simply because they promised to pay the debt. As we have said, its obligation to them was increased thereby, for they were in greater jeopardy of loss, and the plaintiff's solicitude for their protection should have been correspondingly increased and quickened. At any rate, plaintiff failed in its duty, and it would be most inequitable for the consequent loss to fall upon the indorsers. This contract was not intended as a sale, either in its inception or development, but as something far different. The plaintiff surely did not propose to let go the property before it had actually received, not merely notes or a promise to pay, but all of its money. This is apparent, if we give its words—for the contract was prepared by plaintiff—their natural meaning; but settling all doubts against it and fairly and reasonably construing it, as a harmonious whole, so as to effectuate the real intention and to do justice and right, and square our decision with the principles of equity, we cannot but conclude that the defendants have been released, as indorsers or promisors, by the fault of the plaintiff.

We have not considered the correspondence between the parties, which was introduced to show that defendants were actually regarded as accommodation indorsers, though we think the court erred in admitting secondary evidence as to the contents of the lost letter; the proof as to search and loss not being sufficient to dispense with the primary proof—the letter itself. But this is not material, in the view we have taken of the case, as we think the rights of the parties can be sufficiently determined by the contract itself and the undisputed facts, without the aid of extraneous proof.

Perhaps we should further inquire whether the relinquishment of the property to the trustee is such a dealing with the security by the plaintiff as to discharge the indorsers of the notes; but this would seem to be too plain to need any demonstration. The very question was presented in Fleming v. Odum, 59 Ga. 362, and the creditor held to have forfeited his right of recourse to the surety for payment. The court said: "In respect to this property so levied on, the assignee stood in the shoes of the defendant, and the sheriff had no more right to deliver up the property to the assignee than he would have had to deliver it to the defendant himself; therefore Lumsden v. Leonard [55 Ga. 374] controls this case. Indeed, this case is stronger for the surety than that. In that case the defendant still had the property, and another levy might have been made, and the only hurt the surety sustained was the danger that defendant, his principal, might have run it off. This risk was increased, because the creditor, through the sheriff, had in hand enough to pay the debt from the principal's property, and let it go; but in this case much more has the surety been hurt, for the property has gone to another. The assignee has it, and probably has disposed of it to pay other debts. At least, it has not been heard of since. This creditor has not pursued it, either against the sheriff or the assignee, or claimed the proceeds in the bankrupt court. It is gone—a dead loss to this judgment—and the surety is hurt to the extent of its value, and that is enough to pay the whole judgment. So that the result is that the surety's property is levied on to pay a judgment which the creditor had enough of the principal's property to pay; but, by his fault and the sheriff's—one or both—let it unlawfully get away from under the levy. We think it clear that the surety is discharged." It is not suggested, and cannot successfully be contended, that, if the property was held on consignment at the time of the bankruptcy, it passed to the trustee.

We have reached our conclusion in this matter with less hesitation, because we believe it accords, not only with well-settled rules of law, but with the very justice of the case. Had the plaintiff intended to change the character of the notes and convert what was a consignment into an absolute sale, and not a conditional one, nor into a lien or security, it should have expressed that intention clearly, and not left it to uncertain, if not unwarranted, inference. If the plaintiff expects the courts to enforce this kind of contract according to its present contention, it should use language which more plainly carries that idea with it, or, at least, should free it of its present ambiguity; otherwise it cannot complain if it is construed favorably to indorsers. Our rendering of its provisions makes it consistent, while that of the plaintiff, we think, produces discord and repugnancy and frustrates its leading purpose. We would not be understood as even intimating that the plaintiff inserted the disputed clause in the contract for a double purpose, and so that, in certain eventualities, it might claim either way that might subserve its interests, though such a suggestion is made in this case and was made in Bank v. Scott, 123 N. C. 539, 31 S. E. 819, cited by the defendant's counsel, in regard to a contract somewhat similar. It is not necessary that we should search for a bad motive, when the rights of the parties must depend upon the contract as it is written; there being no allegation of fraud. The plaintiff has merely failed to state in the written instrument what it now says was its intention, and that is all. It is not a question of motive, but of construction.

We find no reversible error.

HUGHES v. ATLANTA STEEL CO.

ATLANTA STEEL CO. v. HUGHES.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 18, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SUNDAY (§ 26*)—VIOLATION OF LAW—PERSONAL INJURIES—DEFENSES—ILLEGAL ACTS—FELLOW SERVANTS—NEGLIGENCE.

The collateral fact that the plaintiff and the defendant are engaged in violating the law does not prevent the former from recovering damages of the defendant for an injury negligently inflicted, unless the unlawful act contributed to produce the injury.

(a) A servant who is injured by the negligent conduct of an incompetent fellow servant, the incompetency being unknown to him, may recover from the common master damages arising from his breach of duty in knowingly employing and retaining the incompetent servant, where the proof shows that at the time of the injury the plaintiff, the negligent and incompetent fellow servant, and the master were all three engaged together in the violation of a penal statute of this state, viz., the statute making penal the pursuit of one's business or work of ordinary calling on the Lord's Day.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sunday, Cent. Dig. §§ 59-63; Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

2. NEGLIGENCE (§ 76*)—VIOLATION OF LAW—PERSONAL INJURIES.

The ruling in Wallace v. Cannon, 38 Ga. 119, 95 Am. Dec. 385, Martin v. Wallace, 40 Ga. 52, and Redd v. Muscogee R. Co., 48 Ga. 102, to the effect that when two or more parties engage in an act violative of a penal law, and one of them is injured by the carelessness or negligence of the other, the injured party is not entitled to damages, should be so qualified as to provide that, to defeat a recovery in such case, the violation of the statute must be a contributing cause of the injury.

Certified Question from Court of Appeals.

Action by Robert Hughes against the Atlanta Steel Company. From the judgment, both parties appeal to the Court of Appeals, who certified a certain question of law to the Supreme Court. Question answered.

F. M. Hughes and Westmoreland Bros., for plaintiff. Smith, Hammond & Smith, for defendant.

EVANS, P. J. The Court of Appeals has certified to us the following question of law: "Can a servant who was injured by the negligent conduct of an incompetent fellow servant, the incompetency being unknown to him, recover damages from a common master, arising from his breach of duty in knowingly employing and retaining the incompetent servant, where the proof shows that at the time of the injury the plaintiff, the negligent and incompetent fellow servant, and the master were all three engaged together in the violation of a penal statute of this state, viz., in pursuit of their business and work of ordinary calling on the Sabbath day? Penal Code 1910, § 422."

[1] One injured through the negligence of another ordinarily has a right of action against a tort-feasor. The query submitted by the Court of Appeals raises the question whether this right of action is lost because, at the time of the happening of the tort, the injured person was violating a penal law. In Massachusetts it was held that a plaintiff who gratuitously assisted the defendants in clearing out a wheel pit on the Sabbath, for the purpose of preventing the stoppage, on a week day, of the defendants' mills, could not recover for the defendants' negligence, by reason of the statute making penal such work on the Sabbath day. The court based its decision on the premise that the plaintiff's act, working on the Lord's Day, was so inseparably connected with the cause of action as to prevent his maintaining the suit. McGrath v. Merwin, 112 Mass. 467, 17 Am. Rep. 119. In most jurisdictions, including the Supreme Court of the United States and the courts of England, it is held that a collateral unlawful act, not contributing to the injury, will not bar a recovery. The mere fact that the plaintiff on the one hand, or the defendant on the other, was engaged in violating the law in a given particular, at the time of the happening of the accident, will not bar the right of action of the former, nor make the latter liable to pay damages, unless such violation of law was the efficient cause of the injury. 1 Thomp. Neg. §§ 82, 249; 37 Cyc. 573; P. W. & B. R. Co. v. P. & H. Steam Towboat Co., 23 How. 209, 16 L. Ed. 433; Black v. City of Lewiston, 2 Idaho (Habb.) 276, 13 Pac. 80; Knowlton v. Railway Co., 59 Wis. 278, 18 N. W. 17; Osaphe v. Judd, 30 Minn. 126, 14 N. W. 575; Sharpe v. Evergreen, 67 Mich. 443, 35 N. W. 67; Bigelow v. Reed, 51 Me. 325; Mohoney v. Cook, 26 Pa. 342, 67 Am. Dec. 419; Ill. Central R. Co. v. Dick, 91 Ky. 434, 15 S. W. 665; Baldwin v. Barney, 12 R. I. 392, 84 Am. Rep. 670; W. U. Tel. Co. v. McLaurin, 70 Miss. 26, 13 South. 36. As said by Judge Cooley: "The principle is that, to deprive a party of redress because of his own illegal conduct, the illegality must have contributed to the injury." 1 Cooley on Torts (3d Ed.) 269. The statute denouncing as penal the following of one's ordinary calling on the Lord's Day defines and declares a duty to the state. A breach of duty to the state does not necessarily involve a breach of duty to the defendant in such cases; and when it does not, it is simply an irrelevant fact, unless the law gives it relevancy in some express form. Hence the conclusion is irresistible that the plaintiff's violation of a penal statute cannot be pleaded in defense of a tort, unless such violation is a contributing cause of the injury for which compensation is asked.

But it is contended that, where both plaintiff and defendant are engaged in violating a penal statute when the former is negligently injured by the latter, the rule should be different from that applied to cases where the plaintiff alone was committing an illegal act at the time of his injury. In support of this contention the cases of Wallace v. Cannon, 38 Ga. 199, 95 Am. Dec. 385, Martin v. Wallace, 40 Ga. 52, and Redd v. Muscogee Railroad Co., 48 Ga. 102, are cited. These decisions rule that when two or more parties are engaged in the same illegal transaction, in violation of the supreme law of the land, and one of them is injured by the carelessness or negligence of the other, the court will not lend its assistance in favor of either party to recover damages. Is this ruling decisive of the question of law submitted; and, if so, are those cases so wrong in principle that they should be reviewed and modified, a request to review these cases having been made? Each of these cases arose during the late war between the states, and the alleged illegality consisted in the transportation of troops in aid of the Confederate government and in opposition to the government of the United States. In the Cannon Case, Cannon was the engineer of a train which carried Confederate soldiers and munitions of war in addition to passengers, and was killed in collision with another train of the defendant on its return trip after having transported Confederate soldiers to their destination. In none of the cases did the court discuss or recognize the principle that the plaintiff would be cut off from recovery because of his own illegal conduct, unless its illegality contributed to the injury. Should the ruling be modified to this extent? At the outset we venture to say that no rational differentiation can be made between cases in which it is held that the plaintiff may recover for a tort inflicted while he alone was violating the Sunday law, and cases where both he and the tort-feasor were simultaneously violating the Sunday statute, where in neither instance the violation of the statute did not contribute to the injury. If a carpenter undertakes to repair his house on Sunday, and negligently lets fall a piece of timber, which injures his neighbor, a gardener, while working in his garden, can it be said that the gardener shall go without redress because he was following his ordinary vocation on the Lord's Day? In the case hypothesized there can be no causal connection between the carpenter's negligence and the gardener's work on Sunday. The occurrence would have happened on any other day under similar circumstances. It would be offering a premium upon negligence to hold that if two persons are engaged in violating the Sunday law, and one should negligently injure the other, he could escape liability when the violation of the law was not a contributing cause of the injury. In effect it would be to allow an independent public offense to be set off against a private wrong. It was held in Gross v. Miller, 93 Iowa, 72, 61 N. W. 385, 26 L. R. A. 605, that the mere fact that both parties were violating the Sunday law by hunting on that day will not prevent one of them from recovering from the other for injuries caused by the negligent discharge of a revolver by the other. In the course of demonstrating the proposition the court said: "If one violates the Sunday law, he is amenable to the state—is subject to the punishment inflicted by the statute. We cannot see, upon principle, why the mere act of violating such a law should in any case be held a contributing cause to the injury, if one follows. If the boys had not gone into the woods, the accident would not have happened; and the same is true if they had not been in existence. So far as the pleadings show, there is nothing surrounding the accident that was in any way peculiar to the day upon which it happened. It was not more likely to happen upon Sunday than on any other day. It was not a necessary, or even, we think, a probable, result of the violation of the law." The fact that a party injured was at that time violating the law does not put him out of the protection of the law. The law should not absolve from responsibility the perpetrator of a private wrong, solely because the injured party may have violated a penal law, which violation in no wise contributed to his injury.

Again, the argument is advanced that the rule that a person violating the Sunday law is not precluded from recovering damages for injuries received from the negligence of another is not applicable where the parties sustain the relation of master and servant, for the reason that it is a necessary part of the injured servant's case to prove the contract, and a contract to labor on the Sabbath is void; that without the contract no legal duty of the master to employ competent fellow servants is shown. It may be admitted that the test whether a demand connected with an illegal transaction is capable of being enforced by law is whether the plaintiff requires the aid of the illegal transaction to establish his case. This comes from the universally accepted principle of public policy that no court will lend its aid to a party who grounds his action upon an immoral or an illegal act. In the case hypothesized by the Court of Appeals the action is founded on a breach of duty, which the law imposes as an incident to the relation of master and servant. The master's duty under the law is to exercise due care in the selection of servants, and not to retain them after knowledge of incompetency. The terms of the contract of the master with his incompetent servant are of no relevancy to the plaintiff's case. The relevant fact is that the master had put the incompetent servant to work with the injured servant as a fellow servant. Nor is the injured servant, in making out a prima facie case, required to prove more than that he was at work for the master, subject to the latter's orders and control, and liable to be discharged by him for disobedience of orders or misconduct. Brown v. Smith, 86 Ga. 274, 12 S. E. 411, 22 Am. St. Rep. 456. A servant who is required to report for work on Sunday, and while working on that day is injured, may not be able to recover for services rendered on the faith of the contract; but he is not for that reason to be physically disabled by a negligent master, and denied a recovery for his injury solely because the injury happened while he and the master were working on Sunday. Solarz v. Manhattan Ry. Co., 8 Misc. Rep. 1123, 29 N. Y. Supp. 1123; L. N. A. & C. Ry. Co. v. Frawley, 110 Ind. 18, 9 N. E. 594; Taylor v. Star Coal Co., 110 Iowa, 40, 81 N. W. 249; Johnson v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 18 Neb. 690, 28 N. W. 347. Persons who are fellow servants of a master do not cease to be such because the work on which they were employed at the time of the injury was being done on the Sabbath and the work was in violation of the Sunday law. H. & T. C. Ry. Co. v. Rider, 62 Tex. 267. An employé of an industrial corporation is engaged in the primary work of earning his wage, and ought not to be placed at the master's mercy because the master conducts his work on Sunday as well as weekdays. A compositor in a printing office, who sets the type from which a criminal libel is printed by his master, ought not to be denied a recovery for an injury sustained by him from the master's negligence while engaged in setting the type. The true rule is that a master who negligently injures his servant while working on the Lord's Day is liable to the injured servant, notwithstanding that at the time of the injury both may have been violating the Sunday law.

[2] We therefore think that the ruling in the cases of Wallace v. Cannon, 33 Ga. 199, 95 Am. Dec. 885, Martin v. Wallace, 40 Ga. 52, and Redd v. Muscogee R. Co., 48 Ga. 102, that where two or more persons are engaged in the same transaction, which is in violation of a penal statute, and one of them is injured by the carelessness or negligence of the other, the injured person is without remedy, should be modified, with the qualification that, to prevent a recovery, the violation of the penal statute must be a contributing cause of the injury. All the Justices concur.

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. GIFTS (§ 25)—PAROL GIFT OF LAND—RIGHTS OF DONEE—DAMAGES TO LAND.

A child, in possession of land under a parol gift from the father, who was the true owner, the child having made valuable improvements on the land on the faith of such gift, is the owner of the freehold relatively to all persons except the father and those claiming under him, though such possession of the child may not have continued for seven years. Where the premises are damaged by another, the child is entitled to full compensation, especially when showing affirmatively the acquiescence of the father in the claim of the child, which may be done by introducing in evidence upon the trial of the case a conveyance from the father to the child made pending the action, and passing the absolute title in fee simple in the latter. Fulton County v. Amorous, 89 Ga. 614 (3), 16 S. E. 201.

(a) This is true, though the child in the suit for damages alleged that at the time of the acts complained of, producing the damage, he was "seised and possessed in fee simple" of the premises.

(b) If the father had not made the deed above referred to, he might have been able to recover nominal damages; but the execution of the deed barred him of this right.

LANCASTER v. HILL, Sol. Gen.

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. OFFICERS (§ 66)—REMOVAL—"SUFFICIENT CAUSE."

A statute authorizing the removing of an officer for "sufficient cause," including incapacity and official misbehavior, contemplates a cause relating to and affecting the administration of the office, restricted to something of a substantial nature, directly affecting the rights and interests of the public.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, pp. 6760, 6761.]

2. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES (§ 13*)—MISFEASANCE—REMOVAL FROM OFFICE.

The plaintiff in execution or his lawful attorney has control of the execution, and may direct the executing officer as to the time and manner of enforcing it. If the plaintiff directs the levying officer to temporarily withhold the execution, the officer has no right to levy it, contrary to the plaintiff's direction, notwithstanding his fees may be included in the costs taxed in the judgment. But the mere insistence of the officer upon a levy of the execution unless his fees are paid (without an actual levy), inspired by a bona fide belief of his right to demand his fees as a condition of suspending action, is not such misfeasance as would authorize his removal from office.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sheriffs and Constables, Cent. Dig. § 28; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

3. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES (§ 13*)—REMOVAL FROM OFFICE.

Rudeness of an officer, not amounting to illegality of conduct or to oppression under color of office, is not such misconduct as will give cause for the removal of a constable from office.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sheriffs and Constables, Cent. Dig. § 28; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

4. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES (§ 13*)—REMOVAL FROM OFFICE—INDIVIDUAL MISCONDUCT.

It is misbehavior in office which the statute specifies as a ground for removal of a constable, and not individual misconduct, disconnected with the discharge of any official duty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sheriffs and Constables, Cent. Dig. § 28; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

5. EXTORTION (§ 4*)—SPECIFICATION OF WHAT CONSTITUTES—SUFFICIENCY.

The specification of conduct constituting the crime of extortion is sufficient allegation of misbehavior.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3, pp. 2622-2624.]

6. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES (§ 111*)—OFFICIAL MISBEHAVIOR—ILLEGAL LEVY.

It is official misbehavior for a constable to knowingly make an illegal levy, with the purpose of oppressing one against whom he is illegally executing the process.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Application of C. D. Hill, Solicitor General, on the relation of J. D. Cromer, to remove from office C. M. Lancaster. From a judgment of removal, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Moore & Branch, Anderson, Felder, Rountree & Wilson, E. D. Thomas, Mayson & Johnson, J. E. & L. F. McClelland, J. A. Boykin, and Daley, Chambers & Smith, for plaintiff in error. C. D. Hill, Sol. Gen., Wm. A. Fuller, and Geo. Gordon, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. This is a proceeding by the solicitor general of the Atlanta circuit, on the relation of J. D. Cromer, to remove from office C. M. Lancaster, a constable of Fulton county. The original petition assigned as grounds for his removal: (1) That he insisted on levying a fi. fa. after the defendant and the plaintiff in execution had agreed that the fi. fa. should be temporarily stayed, unless his costs were paid, which insistence was in the business office of the relator and in the presence of some of his patrons, and that the constable only desisted when the defendant had taken further legal steps by procuring a supersedeas of the judgment on which the execution issued; (2) that the officer is unreasonable, rough, and domineering in his methods, delighting to oppress the poor and the weak and to humiliate the innocent, and that he has an exaggerated conception of the importance of his office; (3) that on three occasions he had been convicted of being drunk and disorderly in the recorder's court of the city of Atlanta, and in the last two offenses his disorderly conduct consisted in the use of vile, vulgar, and profane language; (4) that the constable had been guilty of divers and sundry other acts of cruelty and misconduct, and the plaintiff asks permission of the court to produce evidence thereof. The constable demurred to the sufficiency of the complaint. Whereupon the relator amended by alleging the following additional grounds for the officer's removal: (5) The officer went to the house of Mrs. J. A. Burton to execute a fi. fa. against her and her husband, by levying on the household goods of the defendants. Mrs. Burton exhibited her exemption certificate, legal in form and substance, and duly allowed by the ordinary, embracing the household goods upon which the officer indicated his intention to levy. Mrs. Burton was sick, and requested the officer to desist from levying the fi. fa. Whereupon the constable said he would levy the fi. fa. unless she paid to him $3.90. She borrowed the money and paid it to the officer. It is charged that the defendant deliberately harassed, threatened, and humiliated Mrs. Burton, by threats of an illegal levy, into paying him money to which he was not entitled in law at the time, and that the defendant thereby extorted from her, by color of his office, money that was not due him. (6) He received a certain sum of money from a claimant of property on which he had levied, with the understanding that it would be returned to him upon the execution of proper claim and forthcoming bonds with good security. Such bonds were executed and tendered to the officer, who refused to accept them or to deliver the money to the claimant. It is charged "that the act of the said Lancaster in receiving a cash bond from a third party was illegal and improper, and that the taking and receiving of said money by color of his office was illegal and improper. Relator further charges that the keeping of said money when proper bond and security were tendered him was illegal and improper." (7) The constable executed a writ of attachment by an excessive levy on household goods. The levy was made outside of the district where the officer held his commission, and the goods were taken to the courtroom of justice of the peace in the officer's district. It is charged "that the said defendant, in making the said grossly excessive levy and in removing said property as aforesaid, was guilty of the most reprehensible misconduct and misbehavior in office." Other amendments were allowed, amplifying the specific charges by supplying details of the averments. The defendant objected to the amendments, because the original petition was so defective in the statement of a legal cause of action that it did not serve as a basis for amendment, and that as amended no sufficient cause was alleged for his removal from office. Certain special demurrers were urged, and, with one exception, were overruled, and the general demurrer was also overruled. The exception is to the overruling of the demurrers.

[1] 1. Constables are subject to be removed from office on the same grounds and on the same proceedings as clerks of the superior court are, and on conviction for malpractice in office as justices of the peace are. Civ. Code 1910, § 4681. Clerks of the superior court "are subject to be removed from office by the judge of the said court for any sufficient cause, including incapacity or misbehavior in office, charges for which must be exhibited to the court in writing and the facts tried by a special jury, such clerk being entitled to a copy of the charges three days before trial." Civ. Code 1910, § 4897. Constables may therefore be removed from office for any sufficient cause, including official incapacity, misbehavior, or as a result of a conviction for malpractice in office. The first ground for removal is that prescribed for clerks of the superior court, made on written specification of charge, and the last is the automatic result of a conviction for malpractice in office. The petition in the present case is framed under Civ. Code 1910, § 4897, and the subject-matter of inquiry is the sufficiency of the various charges as alleging cause for removal of a constable under this code section. Sufficient cause means legal cause, and that which specially relates to and affects the administration of the office, and must be restricted to something of a substantial nature, directly affecting the rights and interests of the public. Boggs Case, 11 Coke, 93b; State v. Duluth, 53 Minn. 238, 55 N. W. 118, 39 Am. St. Rep. 595. The specification that sufficient cause includes official incapacity and misbehavior would seem to import that these items of specification, were intended rather as an enlargement than a restriction, as to what constitutes sufficient cause to remove an officer. We do not think that the words 'sufficient cause' should be construed to embrace any cause not affecting the competency of the officer and his official conduct.

[2] 2. A plaintiff in execution has control of the process, and may direct the executing officer as to the time and manner of enforcing it. Hatcher v. Lord, 115 Ga. 623, 41 S. E. 1007, 81 L. R. A. 353; Gorham v. Gale, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 739, 17 Am. Dec. 549; Isler v. Colgrove, 75 N. C. 835; Patton v. Hammer, 28 Ala. 618. The inclusion of the officer's fee in the execution does not give the officer the power of enforcement contrary to the plaintiff's direction, since the court costs, embracing the officer's fees, are a part of the plaintiff's recovery, for the payment of which to the officer the plaintiff is ultimately bound. If the plaintiff prevent or obstruct the levying officer from executing the process, the officer may have judgment against the plaintiff for his costs, and have execution issued thereon. Robertson v. Smith, 37 Ga. 604. It may be that a sheriff or constable would be permitted to sell, in case of collusion between the parties and when the plaintiff is irresponsible. Jackson v. Anderson, 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 474. However, this record does not present such a case. The first count or charge as a basis for the constable's removal, when reduced to its bare facts, is that the constable insisted on a levy of the fi. fa. after the plaintiff's attorney had directed him to postpone his levy, unless his costs were paid. The constable was entitled to his costs, but was not entitled to enforce collection by a levy of the fi. fa. after he was directed by the plaintiff to withhold action for a time. Still we do not think the officer's insistence on the payment of his costs, or, on default thereof, that he would levy the fi. fa., ground for removal from office, where there was no actual levy, and nothing to show that the officer was instigated by a desire to oppress the defendant, or other motive than a purpose to collect his costs in a manner supposed by him to be proper and legal.

[3] 3. That an officer may be rude and domineering in his methods of administering his office is not ground for removal, unless his rudeness extends to illegality of conduct or to oppression under color of office. Lack of civility in official acts very probably will cause the electorate to decline to re-elect an incumbent who is wanting in the temperamental qualities which the ethical standard of the community may prescribe, but is not sufficient, when disassociated from illegal conduct, for the officer's removal from office by the court. Individual idiosyncracies and temperament of an officer capacitated to discharge his official duties is not the official incapacity recognized by the statute as a ground for removal from office.

[4] 4. It is official misbehavior which the statute specifies as a ground for removal from office, and not individual misconduct wholly apart from the discharge of official duty. Hawkins v. State, 54 Ga. 653. It is not alleged that the constable was acting in an official capacity when he was drunk, or that as a result, from such drunkenness, he was guilty of any wrongful official act or omission to act. The allegation of the conviction of the defendant in the recorder's court on the charge of drunkenness and disorderly conduct, without connecting such offenses with the defendant's office, is not good as an allegation of official misbehavior.

[5] 5. "Extortion shall consist in any public officer's unlawfully taking, by color of his office, from any person any money or thing of value that is not due to him or more than his due." Pen. Code 1910, § 802. With regard to specifications marked (5) and (6) in the foregoing statement of facts, the facts alleged make a case of extortion.

[6] 6. The last specification of official misbehavior is an excessive levy of an attachment on household goods, made by the constable outside of his bailiwick. It is alleged that the constable seized property three or four times in excess of the amount named in the attachment, and carried the same out of the district where the levy was made to the courtroom of the magistrate who issued the attachment, some five miles away; that the constable knew that he had no legal right to levy the attachment outside of the district of which he was constable; and that he deliberately and willfully removed the property for the purpose of prejudicing the rights of the defendant in attachment, and of making it more difficult for him to protect his property. A constable has no right to execute civil process outside of his district unless specially authorized by statute; and if he does so, knowing that he is without power to lawfully act, and with a purpose of oppressing the defendant, such conduct is official misbehavior, and is cause for removal.

[7] 7. The original petition charged generally that the defendant was guilty of official misconduct, and also specially that he was guilty of certain alleged misbehavior. Even though the particular matters specified be insufficient to constitute official misconduct, the petition was not so defective but that it could be perfected by proper amendments. City of Columbus v. Anglin, 120 Ga. 785, 48 S. E. 318. Judgment affirmed. All the Justices con-

FLORIDA COCA COLA BOTTLING CO. v. RICKER et al.

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. EVIDENCE (§ 183)—BEST AND SECONDARY—DILIGENCE—DISCRETION OF COURT.

In order to admit secondary evidence, it must appear that the primary evidence, for some sufficient cause, is not accessible to the diligence of the party tendering such evidence. The question of diligence is one of sound discretion in the court.

(a) In this case there was no error in refusing to admit secondary evidence of a written assignment.

(b) If an assignee sent a written assignment to another state for record, and left it there, with no effort to obtain its return, it was not an abuse of discretion to hold that this did not sufficiently show that it was inaccessible to the assignee, so as to admit parol evidence of its contents at his instance.

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 448*)—CONTRACTS BEFORE INCORPORATION—ASSIGNMENT.

Where two persons took a written assignment of certain choses in action to themselves as individuals, a corporation not then in existence, but subsequently chartered, with the assignees as corporators, could not sustain a common-law action brought in its own name as the owner of such choses in action, by offering to show by parol that the assignees acted as its agents in taking the assignment.

3. PARTIES (§ 3*)—EQUITABLE TITLE.

An action dependent on the ownership by the plaintiff of a legal title to choses in action cannot be sustained by parol evidence tending to show that the plaintiff is the equitable owner of such choses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parties, Cent. Dig. § 3; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

4. NONSUIT.

There was no error in granting a nonsuit.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Judge.

Action by the Florida Coca Cola Bottling Company against E. A. Ricker and the Commercial & Savings Bank of Macon. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

On March 18, 1908, the Florida Coca Cola Bottling Company sued out an attachment in the superior court of Bibb county against E. A. Ricker on the ground that the defendant was a nonresident. It was levied by serving a summons of garnishment on the Commercial & Savings Bank of Macon. During the term of the superior court to which the writ was made returnable, the plaintiff filed a declaration in attachment, alleging the foregoing facts, and also in substance as follows: On March 15, 1907, H. F. Haley and T. C. Parker, "acting for and in behalf of the Florida Coca Cola Bottling Company, purchased from the said E. A. Ricker, doing business as the Jacksonville Coca Cola Bottling Company, a certain coca cola bottling plant, especially including open accounts. Amongst other open accounts due to the said E. A. Ricker, and so purchased by your petitioner from the said E. A. Ricker," were two specified accounts, amounting to $781 and $150, respectively. "Notwithstanding the fact that your petitioner had bought said accounts, the said E. A. Ricker, after having sold the same to petitioner, and after the same had become the property of petitioner," collected them on March 19th and 29th, respectively. The accounts were the property of the plaintiff, and when so collected Ricker became indebted to it for the amount of such collection. After the summons of garnishment, based on the attachment, had been served on the Commercial & Savings Bank of Macon, Ga., as garnishee, the Commercial Bank of Jacksonville, Fla., filed a bond with security in the superior court of Bibb county, reciting that the garnishee held $3,375 which it had collected upon a draft drawn by Ricker and payable to the order of the Commercial Bank of Jacksonville, and that the Commercial Bank claimed the money thus held. The condition of the bond was that the Commercial Bank of Jacksonville should pay to the plaintiff the sum that might be found due to it by Ricker, upon the trial of any issue that might be formed upon the answer of said garnishee, or that might be admitted to be due in said answer, if untraversed. The plaintiff contends that the filing of this bond alone did not operate as a sufficient claim. The fund in the hands of the garnishee was paid to the Commercial Bank of Jacksonville upon the filing of this bond. That bank asserts some sort of claim or pretended claim against the funds on the ground that Ricker was indebted to it, and deposited as collateral security a bond, which was forwarded for collection. Plaintiff alleges that, if there was any valid claim on the part of the Jacksonville Bank, it was for less than the amount of the fund which was in the hands of the garnishee. "Petitioner has no actual knowledge of the facts recited in the foregoing paragraph, and, although it has repeatedly requested the attorneys of the Commercial Bank of Jacksonville to disclose what amount of indebtedness was claimed by the said bank against said bond, yet petitioner has been unable to get this information, and is now unable to allege the amount of the debt held by the Commercial Bank of Jacksonville, if any debt is so held. It is entitled to know the amount of the debt so claimed, so that it can tender such amount and release the bond." It alleges that the title "to said bond and coupons" was in Ricker at the time of their payment, and that the money paid to the Commercial & Savings Bank was his money and subject to garnishment. Plaintiff prayed discovery from the Jacksonville Bank, and that it should have judgment against Ricker; that, in the event it should be determined that no claim had been filed by the Commercial Bank of Jacksonville, plaintiff should have judgment against the Commercial & Savings Bank of Macon, Ga., as garnishee; and, in the event it should be determined that a claim had been filed by the Commercial Bank of Jacksonville, plaintiff should have judgment against Ricker, and against the American Surety Company of New York, as surety on the bond filed by the Jacksonville Bank. It does not appear that any service of this declaration was made, though it was stated in the bill of exceptions that Ricker appeared and pleaded.

On the trial, evidence was introduced to show that on March 15, 1907, Ricker assigned to Haley and Parker certain enumerated personal property, including books of accounts, notes, and open accounts, and other assets of the Jacksonville Coca Cola Bottling Company, the "firm name" under which he was doing business; that one of these accounts, for $781, had been paid to the Jacksonville Coca Cola Bottling Company on March 21, 1907, by a check payable to the order of the last-mentioned company and dated March 19th; and that another account, for $150, had been paid by a check dated March 29, 1907, payable to the order of Ricker, indorsed by him, and stamped paid April 3d. Haley was introduced as a witness, and testified that the Florida Coca Cola Bottling Company was chartered on or about April 11, 1907, and as to this there was no conflict. He further testified that, after the assignment from Ricker to him and Parker, they made a written assignment, which he called a deed, to the Florida Coca Cola Bottling Company, "of the things we bought from Ricker." In attempting to account for the nonproduction of the paper, he testified, among other things, as follows: "I filed that deed in Jacksonville. Sending it down for filing was the last I have seen of it. The original never came back into your [Malcolm D. Jones's] office that I know of." When questioned by his counsel, he said he turned the paper over to Malcolm D. Jones. Mr. Jones was then introduced as a witness, and testified that he prepared the conveyance from Haley and Parker to the Florida Coca Cola Bottling Company, and had the paper in his possession; that about that time he was taken sick with fever; that he was not able to swear positively what became of the paper; that he had made diligent search in his office, and could not find it; and that he had asked Haley to make search for it wherever he thought he could find it. Haley was then recalled to the stand, and testified that he had made the search which Mr. Jones had requested him to make. When questioned by the court, he answered that he had sent the paper to Florida for record. The court then asked: "And you have not seen it since?" To this he answered: "I have not seen it since, other than that I am positive I carried it to Mr. Jones. When it came back from record, I carried it to Mr. Jones and gave it to him. I am positive of that. I feel very positive that I got back the original from Jacksonville, certified to as having been recorded. It is three years ago, and when we looked for the paper I couldn't find it at all, and I made it a practice of carrying it to him [Malcolm D. Jones] when anything comes up. I have made a diligent search everywhere it is likely to be found, once when the case came up before, and yesterday again. I have never applied to the clerk in Jacksonville, Fla., for the paper, I was so positive Mr. Jones had it. When it came up before, Mr. Jones was ill, and I was positive he had it. Absolutely I carried all my papers to the office of Malcolm D. Jones. He has had full charge of all this transaction, and I turned over all the papers to him, and have never received that paper back from him." He was again asked: "Did you send the paper to Jacksonville, the transfer from Haley & Parker to the Florida Coca Cola Bottling Company?" To this he answered: "I don't think that I did. Malcolm D. Jones was getting up the bonds. He had entire charge of the bond matter. I don't know whether I sent it, or he, or how it was fixed." The presiding judge held the foundation for the introduction of parol evidence as to the contents of the written transfer from Haley and Parker to the Florida Coca Cola Bottling Company had not been sufficiently laid, and rejected parol evidence as to its contents. Parol evidence was also offered on behalf of the plaintiff for the purpose of showing that the Florida Coca Cola Bottling Company was organized solely on the assets of the Jacksonville Coca Cola Bottling Company, purchased from Ricker by Haley and Parker; that they were acting as agents for the Florida Coca Cola Bottling Company in making the purchase, and this was understood by Ricker; that the company issued its stock to Haley and Parker for such assets, and it was the company's money or bonds which went to pay Ricker; that all the assets which Haley and Parker had bought from Ricker were "turned over to the Florida Coca Cola Bottling Company"; and that Ricker was fully acquainted with the fact that Haley and Parker were buying the assets of the Jacksonville Coca Cola Bottling Company, not for themselves, but for the Florida Coca Cola Bottling Company, a corporation not then chartered, but for which an application for charter was pending, and which was afterwards chartered. This evidence was ruled out. Upon motion, a nonsuit was granted. The plaintiff excepted to this ruling, and to the rulings as to the rejection of evidence.

[4] It was contended that under the decision in Kelly v. Strouse, 116 Ga. 872, 43 S. E. 280, and certain cases preceding it, "when a court passes upon a motion for a nonsuit, it decides only one question—that is, do the allegation and the proof correspond"; that there was a correspondence between the allegata and probata in the present case; and that it was error to grant a nonsuit, whether or not, under the evidence adduced by the plaintiff, it was entitled to any recovery. From what has been said above, it will be seen that the evidence did not sustain the allegation of the declaration. But, speaking for myself, I have never been able to satisfactorily reconcile decisions of the character referred to with the unequivocal statement of the Code that "if the plaintiff fails to make out a prima facie case, or if, admitting all the facts proved and all reasonable deductions from them, the plaintiff ought not to recover, a nonsuit will be granted." Civil Code 1895, § 5347; Civil Code 1910, § 5942.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

RAINES v. HINDMAN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 17, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT (§§ 63, 300*)—DISPOSSESSORY WARRANT—DEFENSES—EVIDENCE OF SALE OF PREMISES.

Certain premises were rented by the owner to another for a year, after the expiration of which the former sued out a dispossessionary warrant to evict the latter, on the ground that he was a tenant holding over, and because of the nonpayment of rent, and the alleged tenant arrested the proceedings by filing a counter affidavit. Held:

(1) The general rule that a tenant cannot dispute his landlord's title does not prevent the tenant from showing that the landlord parted with his title to the rented premises during the term of the tenancy.

(a) Where it is shown that the landlord parted with his title during the term of the tenancy, he cannot evict the tenant after the expiration of such term, on the ground that the latter is a tenant holding over beyond his term, or on the ground of the nonpayment of rent.

(b) This is true, though the tenant may not have attained to the grantee of the landlord.

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; G. W. Maddox, Judge.

Action by Taylor Raines against George Hindman. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Geo. A. H. Harris & Sons, for plaintiff in error. M. B. Eubanks, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. The plaintiff in error, on the 1st day of January, 1908, made an affidavit that he rented to the defendant in error a certain tract of land for the year 1907; that the latter failed to pay the rent when due; that the plaintiff desired possession of the property and the defendant refused to give him possession thereof. Upon this affidavit a warrant was issued on January 1, 1908. In order to prevent eviction and arrest the proceedings, the defendant filed a counter affidavit in the language of the statute and gave the required bond. Other allegations were also made in the affidavit, which were stricken upon demurrer thereto. Upon the trial of the case the court directed a verdict in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff excepted.

Upon the trial of the case the only evidence on behalf of the plaintiff was his own testimony, which was substantially as follows: He rented the land to the defendant for the year 1907. The rent was due about the 15th of October. Soon thereafter he demanded of the defendant payment of the rent. The latter has refused to pay him the rent due for 1907, and has refused to deliver the possession of the premises, though the plaintiff demanded of him such possession. The land is the same property that the plaintiff sold to Raper. The defendant introduced testimony substantially as follows: A deed from the plaintiff to Lewis Raper, dated November 23, 1907, wherein the plaintiff conveyed the rented premises to Raper and warranted the title to the same. Allegations in a petition for injunction filed by the plaintiff and Lewis Raper against the defendant, to the effect that the plaintiff bargained with one R. B. McArver for the rented premises on November 14, 1907, and a deed to the same was executed by the latter to the former, and on November 23, 1907, the plaintiff sold to Lewis Raper the property, making a deed to the same, and took from the latter two mortgages, dated November 23, 1907, to secure the balance of the purchase money, a part of which was due October 15, 1909, and the remainder October 15, 1910. The plaintiff objected to the admission in evidence of the documentary evidence just referred to; the main grounds of objection being that the tenant could not dispute the landlord's title to the rented premises until he had surrendered possession thereof to the landlord, and that the plaintiff had the right to recover possession of the property in order to deliver possession to the purchaser from him, and that there were no pleadings to authorize the admission of such evidence.

We do not think there was any error in the admission of the evidence objected to, nor in directing a verdict for the defendant. Under the common law, a chose in action was not assignable, and the landlord's grantee of the reversion could not maintain an action against the lessee on a covenant of the lease, though the covenant might run with the land. Only the grantor, his heirs, or personal representatives could take advantage of a breach of covenant by the lessee. It was also a part of the feudal law that the lord could not transfer the rented premises without the consent of his vassal, because the latter was entitled to the protection of the former, and could not be deprived thereof without his consent, evidenced by his attornment to the grantee of the landlord, or in some other way. These restrictions upon the rights of the landlord's grantee were removed by various English statutes, as the necessity for transferring lands became greater. Under the statute of 32 Henry VIII, c. 34, the grantee of the landlord was entitled to sue the lessee on all the covenants in the lease. In this connection, see 1 Underhill on Landlord & Tenant, § 317; Broom's Common Law (9th Ed.) 556. The contract of the defendant with the plaintiff for the rent of the premises for 1907 was made prior to the sale by the plaintiff of the rented premises to Raper, and the latter took title to the property, subject to the right of the defendant to have possession of the premises during 1907 as a tenant. Raper would have the right to the possession of the premises after 1907, and would have the right to collect from the tenant any rent that might be due for the premises, at least after the year 1907. In 1 Underhill on Landlord & Tenant, § 319, it is said: "Usually a grantor cannot collect rent from his former tenants which has accrued after his sale of the reversion, unless he has expressly reserved his right to do so. This he will have to show, for the contrary will be presumed." After the expiration of 1907, the year for which the defendant had rented the premises from the plaintiff, Raper, the vendee of the plaintiff, had the right to evict the defendant as a tenant holding over. Morrow v. Sawyer, 82 Ga. 228, 8 S. E. 51; Willis v. Harrell, 118 Ga. 908, 45 S. E. 794. See, in this connection, Grizzle v. Gaddis, 75 Ga. 350. Raper had the right, after 1907, to dispossess the defendant as a tenant holding over, upon the failure of the latter to deliver possession to him; but the plaintiff, who leased the rented premises to Raper during the term of the tenancy, had no right after 1907, when the term of tenancy had expired, to evict the tenant on the ground that he was a tenant holding over, or that he had failed to pay rent. The summary remedy of evicting the tenant and recovering double rent does not exist in behalf of both the original landlord and his grantee, but only in behalf of the latter.

As to whether the plaintiff could have dispossessed the defendant during 1907 for the nonpayment of rent need not be considered. The doctrine is generally true that the tenant must deliver possession to his landlord before he can dispute his title. Under this doctrine, one who holds land rented from another will be estopped from claiming that at the time the property was rented the landlord did not have title thereto. This doctrine, however, cannot be so extended as to prevent the tenant from showing that during the term of the tenancy the landlord's title expired by limitation, or that the same has been divested by judicial sale, or that the landlord has voluntarily parted with the title during the tenancy. Showing that the landlord had voluntarily parted with his title during the tenancy does not involve a dispute of the landlord's title at the time the contract for rent was made, but is an implied admission that the landlord had such title, but has parted therewith. The contention that another has acquired title from the landlord during the tenancy necessarily involves an admission that the landlord then had a title. The tenant is not estopped from showing that during the term of the tenancy the landlord has conveyed the title to the rented premises to another. Beall v. Davenport, 48 Ga. 165, 15 Am. Rep. 656; 2 Tiffany on Landlord & Tenant, § 277; 1 Tiffany on Landlord & Tenant, § 78n, p. 493; Jones on Landlord & Tenant, §§ 427, 703; 24 Cyc. 942 (e); Powell on Actions for Land, § 369; 2 Underhill on Landlord & Tenant, §§ 559, 134; 2 McAdam on Landlord & Tenant (3d Ed.) § 421, pp. 1343, 1347. At a judicial sale the purchaser becomes the landlord of the tenant of the defendant in fi. fa. Dollar v. Roddenbery, 97 Ga. 148, 151, 25 S. E. 410. The failure of the defendant to show that he has attorned to the grantee of his original landlord would not give the latter the right to have him evicted by a dispossessory warrant. In the case of Pritchard v. Tabor, 104 Ga. 64, 30 S. E. 415, the question for decision was whether or not the grantee of one held to be the landlord of another could maintain a dispossessory warrant against the latter as a tenant holding over, and it was held that such a proceeding could be maintained. In that case there was no question before the court as to whether or not the original landlord could maintain such a proceeding.

An immaterial and unprejudicial misstatement of a party's contention in the court's summary will not require a new trial.

The charge copied in the second division of the opinion was not open to the criticism that it contained an expression of opinion on the facts.

(a) The rule of law requiring railroad companies to exercise extraordinary diligence in protecting their passengers from injury applies as well to the construction and maintenance of tracks as to the operation of cars thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1085-1092; Dec. Dig. § 280;* Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 436-438; Dec. Dig. § 193.*]

3. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The verdict is supported by the evidence, and is not excessive in amount.

Error from Superior Court, Johnson County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

Action by J. E. Kennedy against the Wadley Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

R. L. Gamble, for plaintiff in error. Oliver & Oliver, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. The Wadley Southern Railway Company constructed a side track upon its main line to serve the interests of a patron of the road, who was operating a sawmill. The railroad company delivered empty cars and received the loaded cars on this siding, which was protected by a switch. The keys to the switch were carried by the employees of the railroad company. The employees of the sawmill firm forced out a staple in shifting the cars on the side track, for their convenience, and left the switch in an unclosed condition; and a passenger train ran into the switch and collided with the freight cars, and the shock of the collision threw the plaintiff, a passenger, against a forward seat, loosening her teeth and otherwise injuring the jaw. The same train had passed along at this point at 2 o'clock, and was on its return trip at about 7 o'clock, after dark, when it ran into the open switch. The switch was not protected by any light or other device to warn the engineer or others upon the train whether it was open or closed. The plaintiff recovered a verdict for $1,500, which the court refused to set aside on motion.

[1] 1. It is complained that the court, in the summary of the railroad's contention, stated that the switch was left open by a party unknown. Error is assigned upon this statement of the contention, because the evidence showed that the switch was opened and left open by the employees of the lumber company, without authority of the defendant and without its knowledge. The erroneous statement by the court that the defendant contended that the switch was left open by an unknown person, when in fact the contention was that it was left open by an employee of the lumber company, could not have harmed the defendant. The carrier was insisting that it was not liable because of the act of an unauthorized person, and whether the name of that person was known or unknown was immaterial to the actual defense set up.

[2] 2. The court charged: "On the other hand, I charge you, if you find from all the facts and circumstances of the case that the defendant company constructed this side track used by certain parties for the purpose of loading cars along its line for the purpose of transportation over its railway, and such parties using said switch left said switch open negligently, and it was known to the defendant company, or could have been ascertained by them by the exercise of extraordinary care and diligence, and it was not ascertained, and they failed to exercise such care and diligence, and the wreck occurred in that way, then I charge you that that was negligence on the part of the defendant company." This instruction is alleged to be erroneous, because it was an expression of opinion that the enumerated facts and circumstances constituted negligence, and because it imposed upon the carrier the duty of exercising extraordinary care and diligence in the discovery of the open switch. It was but a concrete statement of the principle that the failure to exercise due care constitutes negligence, and did not amount to an expression of opinion on the facts. With respect to the criticism that the charge imposed upon the carrier the duty of exercising extraordinary care and diligence in the discovery of the open switch, we do not think that the charge is erroneous for that reason. Extraordinary care is the measure of diligence required of a railroad company towards passengers, and this degree of care in the protection of passengers applies as well to the construction and maintenance of tracks as to the operation of cars thereon. Macon, etc., Ry. Co. v. Barnes, 113 Ga. 212, 38 S. E. 756.

[3] 3. The plaintiff in error asks that the verdict be set aside, because the recovery was excessive. The effect of the injury, as described by the plaintiff and her physician and dentists, was such that we are unable to say that the amount fixed by the jury was excessively large.

PARTITION (§ 14*)—RIGHT TO PARTITION.

Where the lands belonging to the estate of a decedent were divided by agreement between six of his seven surviving heirs, and the six parcels or shares into which the land was divided were allotted in severalty to the six heirs participating in the division, one who had purchased four of the parcels of land so allotted to the heirs, and who subsequently bought from one who inherited the interest of the seventh heir of the decedent, who did not participate in the division, would not, while holding and claiming as his own the four parcels or shares purchased as above stated, be entitled to a partition of another one of the several parcels of land, which had been set apart and allotted to one of the six heirs participating in the division.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. § 37; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

Error from Superior Court, Habersham County; J. J. Kimsey, Judge.

Action by J. T. Peyton against R. D. Stephens. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

J. T. Peyton brought his petition for partition, alleging that on the 3d day of July, 1901, he purchased from Henry R. Shurter, the latter being the sole heir of his deceased wife, who died seised and possessed of a one-seventh undivided interest in the estate of her father, Charles W. Landers, whose death antedated that of his daughter, all of the right, interest, and title which the said Shurter had inherited from his deceased wife, and took the deed of Shurter conveying the same. It is alleged that the estate of Charles W. Landers had never been administered; that the estate had never been divided and distributed to all of the heirs as provided by law; that a large tract of land situated in Habersham county was a part of the estate of Chas. W. Landers; and that Stephens, who is made the party defendant to the application for partition, holds and claims title to a certain described part of these lands, the same being designated as "lot No. 8 of the division of Charles W. Landers' estate." Stephens filed an answer to the petition, admitting that he held and claimed title to the lands as alleged in the application for partition—that is, the lands designated as "lot No. 3 of the division of the Charles W. Landers estate"—but denied that partitioner has any interest whatever in the same. Upon the trial of the issue made, the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the defendant. Whereupon the plaintiff, Peyton, made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

J. C. Edwards, for plaintiff in error. P. Cooley and J. B. Jones, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. It appears from the evidence in the record that, when the lands belonging to the estate of Charles W. Landers were divided by agreement between the living heirs of Charles W. Landers, the living heirs were of the opinion that Henry Shurter, who had intermarried with Lola Landers and who survived her, had no interest in the estate of Chas. W. Landers, although the death of the latter antedated the death of Henry Shurter's wife, and under this impression they made a division of the lands belonging to the Charles W. Landers estate, awarding and assigning certain parcels of land, which had been divided into six lots, to the living heirs of Charles W. Landers. The applicant for partition bought from the heirs of Charles W. Landers four lots of land awarded to the heirs under the distribution referred to, and subsequently bought all of the interest of Henry Shurter in the estate of Charles W. Landers, that is, a one-seventh undivided interest in that estate; and he now contends that he is entitled to a partition, not of all the lands belonging to the estate of Charles W. Landers, but of that lot or parcel of land which had been awarded to Sanford Landers, one of the sons of Charles W. Landers, and which had passed by purchase to the defendant, Peyton.

We are of the opinion that the finding in this case in favor of the defendant was the only verdict that could have been rendered under the facts of the case. The interest which the petitioner took under the deed from Henry Shurter was a one-seventh undivided interest in all the lands belonging to the Charles W. Landers estate, and under that deed he would have been entitled, as against all the heirs of Charles W. Landers, to a partition of those lands. But where there had been a division of the lands of Charles W. Landers among his living heirs, as appears to have been made among those parties, and the several lots into which the land was divided were awarded to the several claimants, one who bought an undivided interest in the entire estate of Charles W. Landers could not, after having purchased four of the six lots or parcels into which the entire estate of Charles W. Landers had been divided by agreement, hold those lots which he had purchased and insist upon a partition of a single one of the segregated lots or parcels of land which had been set apart and awarded in the division of the Landers estate to one of the heirs. The deed of Henry Shurter conveyed to the petitioner a one-seventh interest in the entire body of land belonging to the estate of Charles W. Landers, but did not give to him a one-seventh interest in any particular segregated portion of those lands. We do not think that the petitioner can hold as his own the four parcels of land which he bought from the other heirs of Charles W. Landers as the lots which were awarded to them in the division of their ancestor's estate, and have that division of the estate held good so far as regards the lots of land purchased by him, and yet, without regard to the considerations which may have moved Sanford Landers, another one of the heirs, to consent to the division, claim and have awarded to him under partition proceedings a one-seventh interest in the parcel of land which was originally awarded to Sanford Landers.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

SOUTHERN LIFE INS. CO. v. LOGAN.
(No. 8,101.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911.
Rehearing Denied July 1, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INSURANCE (§§ 621, 646*) — ACTIONS ON POLICIES — RIGHT OF ACTION — BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where a policy of life insurance provides that the insured shall belong to a named division of policy holders, and the insurance company therein promises, within a designated time after the death of the insured, to pay to the beneficiary, "out of the mortuary fund on hand in the division to which the member belongs, an amount not exceeding [a named sum], or the full amount raised by one mortuary assessment upon all members in good standing in said division at the time of the assured's death, not in excess of said sum," after the designated time has elapsed the beneficiary may maintain an action at law against the company upon the policy. Prima facie the beneficiary is entitled to recover the amount stipulated in the policy, but the insurance company may show in defense that it has made an assessment on all the members in good standing in the division involved and has not raised the amount stated, and thus diminish the recovery to the amount actually realized. The burden of showing how many members there are in the division, and whether the assessment regularly made would or would not have produced the amount named in the policy, is upon the insurance company.

2. INSURANCE (§ 360*) — WAIVER OF FORFEITURE — NONPAYMENT OF ASSESSMENTS.

Though a policy of insurance may provide for the payment of assessments and semiannual dues, and may stipulate that "failure to pay semiannual dues or assessments, when due, renders this policy null and void," still if, at a time when the policy is legally in force, the company declines a tender of the assessments or dues, on the ground that the insured is not a policy holder, and notifies the insured and the beneficiary that it regards the policy as no longer of force and effect, it is not incumbent upon the insured or the beneficiary to continue to tender the dues or assessments. The notification in advance that the dues or assessments will not be accepted waives the tender of them.

3. INSURANCE (§ 151*) — CONTRACT — APPLICATION AS PART OF POLICY.

Under the act of August 17, 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 107), the application on which an insurance policy is based is not to be considered as part of the policy or contract between the parties, unless a copy thereof is attached to or accompanies the policy. Statements made in the application are not to be treated as warranties or covenants, on account of the failure or falsity of which the policy may be avoided, unless a copy of the application is attached to the policy or accompanies it, though representations contained in the application, if fraudulently made, may give to the insurance company the right to avoid the policy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 308-311; Dec. Dig. § 151.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 645*) — ACTION ON POLICY — ISSUES AND PROOF.

Although in the proof at the trial it may be shown that one of the representations made in the application upon which the policy was issued, but which did not accompany the policy, was untrue, still, if the company desired to avoid the policy on account of this misrepresentation as an act of fraud, it was incumbent upon it to plead the matter specifically, and in the absence of such a plea it cannot take advantage of the particular misrepresentation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1632-1644; Dec. Dig. § 645.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1002*) — REVIEW — QUESTIONS OF FACT.

The evidence as to whether the policy was procured by fraud was conflicting, but was amply sufficient to support the verdict, and no sufficient reason appears for this court interfering with the discretion of the trial judge in refusing to grant a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3935-3937; Dec. Dig. § 1002.*]

Error from City Court of Americus; C. R. Crish, Judge.

Action by L. L. Logan against the Southern Life Insurance Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

M. C. Edwards, for plaintiff in error. W. T. Lane and Shipp & Sheppard, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Mrs. Logan sued upon four policies of insurance issued by the defendant company (here plaintiff in error) upon the life of her father, W. T. Wilson. There were four separate policies, but they are alike in all of the substantial details; the only difference among them being as to the particular division of policy holders to which each of them relates. The salient provision of each policy is that in consideration of the statements and warranties contained in the application, and of the payment of the policy fee and semiannual dues and the mortuary assessments, "the Southern Life Insurance Company, upon satisfactory proof of the death of William Thomas Wilson, the assured, and the surrender of this policy properly receipted, will pay within thirty days to Lora Langford Logan (daughter), the beneficiary under this policy, out of the mortuary fund on hand in the division to which the member belongs, an amount not exceeding one thousand dollars, or the full amount raised by one mortuary assessment upon all members in good standing in said division at the time of the assured's death, not in excess of said sum." The policy also contains the following provision: "This contract is not binding upon the company until the policy fee is paid and the policy delivered to the assured while in good health. Failure to pay semiannual dues, or assessments, when due, cancels this contract and renders it null and void." The material part of the company's plea is as follows: "This contract is not binding on the defendant, for the reason that there was no contract, and this particular contract is void under the very terms of said contract. Paragraph 4 of each policy sued on states: 'This contract is not binding upon the company until the policy fee is paid and the policy delivered to the assured while in good health.' Said policies have never been delivered to the assured in good health. At the date of the delivery of the policies said W. T. Wilson was in bad health, which fact was known to said W. T. Wilson and was unknown to defendant. Said Wilson was afflicted with Bright's disease, or diabetes, and other diseases, which were fatal to him, and was so afflicted at the time the policy was delivered. There was fraud in the procurement of said policy; said Wilson having stated, for the purpose of receiving said policy, that he was in good health, when in fact such was not true and said Wilson knew that same was not true. Immediately upon the discovery of this fact defendant canceled said policies, so notified plaintiff and said Wilson, and did not receive any premiums or dues; but said plaintiff, continuing her attempt to defraud said company, would not surrender said policies, but, knowing in all probability that her father's death was imminent, attempted to continue said policies to defraud said company. Defendant filed to the May term of Sumter superior court a petition to cancel said policies, setting up these allegations; but said Wilson died before the May term of court, and it was impossible to try said case, for want of parties. Defendant proposes to proceed to the final prosecution of said petition, and refers to same as part of the answer, in so far as same may be pertinent. Defendant says that no definite and fixed sum is promised to be paid, and, as members have the right to lapse policies at pleasure, it is impossible to ascertain what amount can be collected."

At the trial there was much evidence pro and con as to whether the insured was in good health at the time the policy was issued. According to some of the witnesses, a clear case of ill health and of fraud was established. According to a number of other witnesses, the insured's ill health did not begin until some time after the policy was issued, and at the time of the issuance of the policy he was in good health. The policy fee was duly paid upon the issuance of the policy, and subsequently the payments were tendered; but it also appears that shortly after the policy was issued the company tendered back the policy fee and refused to accept any payments from the insured or the beneficiary, asserting that the insured was not a policy holder and that the policies were obtained by fraud, because of misrepresentations as to the state of the insured's health at the time the policy was issued. There was no proof submitted by either party as to whether an assessment had or had not been made upon the members for the purpose of paying off this policy, or as to whether such an assessment would or would not have produced the amounts named in the policy. The jury found in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $1,000 and interest upon each of the policies, and the insurance company excepts to the judgment of the trial judge overruling the motion for a new trial.

[1] By demurrer, as well as by ground for motion for a new trial, counsel for the insurance company insist that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover (at least not to recover more than a nominal sum), in the absence of proof that the assessments had been made, or that the membership of each division was such that the assessment thereon would have produced the amount sued for, or some other definitely ascertained amount. Cognate to this point and somewhat involved in it is the insistence that the liability under the policy is upon the surviving membership, and not upon the insurance company, and that it is not suable upon the policy, at least until it has been ascertained that the members of the divisions have paid into the mortuary fund the requisite amount to pay off the policy. We may dispose of this insistence at once by the statement that under the policy the company as such, and not the members of the divisions, contracts to insure and contracts to pay the amount of the insurance to the beneficiary within a designated time after the death of the insured. The amount to be paid may, in a sense, be conditional; but the promise to pay, as such, is not conditional. The point as to whether the burden is upon the plaintiff or upon the insurance company to furnish the data upon which the liability is to be determined is not a new one, and, while there is some conflict in the authorities, the point is now very well settled by the strong consensus of judicial opinion throughout the American states that, when the time stated in the policy has elapsed since the death of the insured, the beneficiary makes a prima facie case of liability for the full amount stated in the policy by showing the death of the insured, without further showing that the assessment has been made, or that the membership of the body upon which the assessment was to be made was such as that the assessment thereon would produce the amount designated. The company as a defense may show that the amount stated in the policy cannot be realized by an assessment, and thus diminish the recovery. Most courts base this doctrine upon the theory that the insurance company, and not the insured or the beneficiary, is in possession of the facts essential to showing whether the amount named could be raised by the assessment, and whether the assessment had been made or not. While there are a great many cases laying down this doctrine, the one of Lake v. Minnesota Ass'n, 61 Minn. 96, 63 N. W. 261, 52 Am. St. Rep. 538, is squarely in point, and is cited here as authority for the proposition, especially because of the fact that, as this case is reported in 52 Am. St. Rep. 538, it is followed by a lengthy note citing a large number of cases which assert the same doctrine. See, also, Cooley's Briefs on the Law of Insurance, p. 825 et seq.

[2] 2. Even should we concede that there is not sufficient evidence of the tender of all the semiannual dues and assessments that normally would have accrued against the policy holder in the present case, still the conclusion is irresistible that tender of them had been waived; for, before any of them became due and payable, the company repudiated the policy, and from time to time as they were tendered refused to accept them, and reiterated its repudiation of the policies—indeed, brought an action in the superior court, which was pending at the time of the death of the insured, to cancel the policies. There can be no doubt that this conduct on the part of the insurance company (which the jury by its verdict has found to be unwarranted) excused further specific tender. As Judge Russell pointedly says in Arnold v. Empire Ins. Co., 3 Ga. App. 635 (5), 708, 60 S. E. 470, 480: "A formal tender is unnecessary, where express declarations are made by the party to whom money is payable that he will not accept it if tendered. The law takes one who makes such a statement at his word, and does not thereafter require the doing of the vain thing." In this connection it may be proper to note that counsel for the insurance company in his argument contends that there was not sufficient evidence that proofs of death had been submitted in accordance with the terms of the policy. Even if the company's repudiation of the policy did not waive this—see Phenix Ins. Co. v. Searles, 100 Ga. 97 (4), 27 S. E. 779—still there is in the record enough to show that this proof was duly made. The sixth paragraph of the petition alleges the furnishing of these proofs according to the company's requirements, and the answer does not deny this allegation of the petition. The answer does state that for lack of sufficient information the company is unable to admit or deny this paragraph; but, as this is a matter within the company's knowledge, the equivocal answer must be taken as an admission. Raleigh R. Co. v. Pullman Co., 122 Ga. 700 (5), 50 S. E. 1008; Jones v. Pope, 7 Ga. App. 538, 540, 67 S. E. 280.

[3] 3. Exception is taken to an instruction of the court to the jury that, while the utmost good faith is required in all applications for life insurance, still, under the law of Georgia, for the answers of the insured in the application for insurance to be express covenants or warranties that the answers are true, the application must be attached to the policy, and that in this case, the application not being attached to the policies sued on, it was not a part of the contract sued on, and therefore that the answers given in the application were not express warranties or covenants that they were true. This charge follows the law as contained in the act of August 17, 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 107; Civ. Code 1910, § 2471). It was held by the Supreme Court, in Johnson v. American National Life Ins. Co., 134 Ga. 800, 68 S. E. 731, that a failure to attach the application for life insurance to a policy prevented such application from being treated as a part of the contract, or being introduced as evidence of such contract, or from being used to show that certain statements therein contained were warranted to be true; but it did not prevent the defendant from pleading that the insured had made a fraudulent statement as to his age, or health, and that he thus induced the insurance company to issue the policy, so that it was therefore void, not as a matter of contract, but because of fraud in the procurement. Taking the instruction excepted to in connection with the entire context, the court presented the case to the jury in accordance with the ruling in the case just cited. Counsel for the insurance company asks us to certify the question to the Supreme Court as to the review of this case; but as we are of the opinion that the ruling is sound, and that the Supreme Court would so hold, we do not grant this request. An attempt to attack the constitutionality of this act is made on the ground that the body contains matter different from what is expressed in the title; but as this difference between the act and the title is not definitely pointed out, the method of attack is insufficient to authorize a consideration of that question.

[4] 4. From the summary of the plea which we have given in the statement of facts, it will be seen that the insurance company pleaded certain acts of fraud for the purpose of avoiding the policy. In the course of the evidence it appeared that, several years before the date of the issuance of the policy in question, the insured had had an attack of typhoid fever, from which, however, as the evidence shows, he had fully recovered. In his application the insured stated that he had never been afflicted with any severe illness or accident. Counsel for the plaintiff in error now insist that this was such a fraudulent misrepresentation as to avoid the policy. We doubt that this fact alone would be of sufficient materiality to avoid the policy, in accordance with the rule announced in the Johnson Case, supra; but, irrespective of whether it would or would not, it is sufficient to say that this was not one of the issues involved on the trial, because the insurance company had not pleaded this fact as a defense. The rule is that the acts of fraud relied on must be specifically pleaded.

[5] 5. The insurance company, by its evidence, made a very strong showing upon its plea that the policy was procured by fraud, that the insured was in bad health at the time the application was made, and that his last illness had really begun when the policy was obtained; but there was a great deal of evidence introduced in contradiction of this, and the jury was fully authorized to find that at the time the application was made, the policy delivered, and the first premium paid, the insured was in good health, and that he was stricken with the serious illness some few days later. This was the real issue in the case, and it was fairly submitted to the jury. They, and the trial judge, heard all this testimony. They saw the witnesses. On these issues the jury has returned a verdict finding in favor of the plaintiff, and the trial judge has approved it. This court has no jurisdiction to interfere. A careful examination of the entire record shows that the case was legally tried and fairly submitted to the jury. The judgment in the plaintiff's favor must be sustained.

Judgment affirmed.

SHAW v. CHILES. (No. 3,094.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. BROKERS (§§ 50, 10*)—COMPENSATION—PERFORMANCE OF SERVICES—TIME FOR PERFORMANCE—REVOCATION OF CONTRACT.

Where a property owner places it for sale in the hands of a real estate broker, the latter, in order to claim his commission, must perform the services to be rendered within the time set in the contract, if a given time be set, and, if no time be set, then within a reasonable time, under all the circumstances of the case. If there is no limit as to time, the principal may ordinarily revoke the agreement at any time; but he cannot, before a reasonable time has elapsed, revoke it capriciously or capiously, or in such a manner as would be unfair to the broker.

2. BROKERS (§ 54*)—PERFORMANCE OF SERVICES—"ABLE."

The word "able," as used in Civil Code 1910, § 3587, which provides that "the broker's commissions are earned when, during the agency, he finds a purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy, and who actually offers to buy on the terms stipulated by the owner," means financially able.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, pp. 19, 20.]

3. WITNESSES (§ 414*)—EVIDENCE (§ 474*)—CORROBORATION OF WITNESS—TESTIMONY AS TO HANDWRITING—KNOWLEDGE OF WITNESS.

The plaintiff having contended that he made a contract with the defendant on a definitely specified day, and that at the time when the contract was made the defendant was engaged in the performance of the business of taking up tickets as a railroad conductor on a specified train, it was relevant for the defendant to prove, in corroboration of his own testimony denying the conversation and the making of the contract, that at the time named he was not employed in that service, and to prove by the chief clerk of the auditing department of the railroad that another person was during that period employed as train auditor upon that train, and that he made daily reports, sending in the tickets from that train, although this clerk, as a witness, did not actually see the train auditor engaged in his duties, and though his knowledge of the handwriting of the reports was not derived from actually having seen the train auditor write, but merely from his business transactions with him.

(a) One person may have knowledge of the handwriting of another from having seen him write, from correspondence between them, or in any other way that would furnish a reliable basis for knowledge of the general character of the person's handwriting.

Error from City Court of Valdosta; J. G. Cranford, Judge.

Action by M. S. Shaw against M. S. Chiles. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Denmark & Griffin and Hendricks & Christian, for plaintiff in error. B. K. Wilcox and J. R. Walker, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Shaw sued Chiles to recover a sum which he claimed to be due him for commissions as a real estate broker. The plaintiff claimed that the defendant had listed a farm with him for sale, with the understanding that he might have all he could obtain above $5,000 as commissions, and that, if he could not sell it for more than $5,000, the defendant would pay a commission of 5 per cent. on a sale of $5,000. The plaintiff claimed that this agreement was made in August, 1909, and that in December of that year he sold the property for $8,000 to one Mr. Heath, on the terms proposed by the defendant, namely, $2,000 cash and the remainder in two equal deferred payments, and that the defendant had refused to consummate the sale, whereby he lost his commission. The defendant denied that he had ever made any such agreement. He contended that the only conversation that he had had with the real estate agent was in January, when he had merely expressed a willingness to sell, but named no price. By his plea he denied all the allegations of the petition, including the allegation that the proposed purchaser presented by the plaintiff was ready and able to comply with his offer. The jury, under the charge of the court, returned a verdict for the defendant. There are a number of exceptions, but many of them are unimportant, and, even if well taken, would not be sufficient to justify a reversal. Certain of them which present substantial questions will be discussed.

[1] The court in effect charged the jury that, if they should find that an agreement of the nature claimed by the plaintiff to have been made between him and the defendant, the defendant would be bound to pay the commissions, provided that the plaintiff presented a purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy on the terms proposed, and presented him within a reasonable time, if no time limit was stated in the agreement. The objection made to this charge is that it confined the plaintiff to proof of a proposed sale within a reasonable time after the making of the agreement between him and the defendant. The contention is that the agreement remained open indefinitely, unless it was sooner withdrawn. The plaintiff in error relies with some confidence upon the case of Reese v. Fellow, 97 Fed. 167, 38 C. C. A. 94 (before the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Sixth Circuit, Judges Taft, Lurton, and Swann presiding), in which it is held that "brokers' agencies for the sale of property having no time limit may be terminated at any time by the principal, subject to the ordinary requirements of good faith," and from this they attempt to draw an argument converso, that, unless it is terminated by some affirmative act of the principal, the agency continues indefinitely. We do not think that the argument thus sought to be drawn is sound. When the owner of land has placed it for sale with a broker, without setting a time limit, he is bound to exercise such good faith toward his agent as that he will not capriciously withdraw the property for the purpose of defeating the agent's commissions about to be earned. If a time limit is set, the agent must complete his work within that limit; and, if the parties set no limit, the law sets the limit of reasonable time. After the expiration of the limit which the parties themselves have set, or the limit which the law sets in the absence of agreement on their part, the question of capriciousness in the refusal is not involved. By this fact are the case of Reese v. Fellow, supra, and the cases on which it is based, including Stitt v. Huldekoper, 17 Wall. 384, 21 L. Ed. 644, distinguished. It is an almost universal canon of construction that where a contract confers upon a party the right to do some act beneficial to himself, or the right to perform in such a way as will benefit himself, and no time limit is set, and from the nature of the contract the grant of the privilege is not of essentially permanent duration, the privilege must be exercised or performance consummated within a reasonable time.

[2] 2. The court, in charging the jury as to the proposition of law expressed in Civil Code 1910, § 3587, that "the broker's commissions are earned when, during the agency, he finds a purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy, and who actually offers to buy, on the terms stipulated by the owner," explained to them that the word "able" meant financially able. The plaintiff in error excepts to this, contending that the broker in such a case is not an insurer of the solvency of the proposed purchaser, and that the ability referred to is merely ability to make the cash payment required, and ability to execute the necessary papers evidencing the deferred payments. Counsel for plaintiff in error base this proposition upon what we think is a misconception of Odell v. Dozier, 104 Ga. 203 (2), 30 S. E. 813; Fenn v. Ware, 100 Ga. 563, 28 S. E. 238; Moore v. Irwin, 89 Ark. 289, 116 S. W. 662, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1168, 131 Am. St. Rep. 97. These cases hold that the broker is never an insurer of the deferred payments, or of a full performance of the contract, unless made so by the terms of the agency, to the extent that, if the property owner accepts the proposed sale, the right of the broker to commissions is not defeated by any subsequent failure of the purchaser to perform his contract. But these cases in no wise militate against the proposition that the word "able," as used in the section of the Code which has just been quoted (and the Code section is merely a codification of a common-law principle, recognized generally throughout the entire country), means financially able. As the Supreme Court of Rhode Island said in Butler v. Baker, 17 R. I. 582, 23 Atl. 1019, 33 Am. St. Rep. 897: "We find no case which holds that a broker has fulfilled his undertaking by presenting a person as a purchaser who is not financially able to make the purchase." And a number of cases are there cited as authority for the proposition that the proposed purchaser must be financially able to buy. If the broker's principal once accepts the purchaser, he waives the right to question his financial ability, so far as the broker's rights to compensation are concerned. If he has refused the contract, the financial inability of the purchaser is a good defense to the broker's claim of commissions.

[3] 3. The plaintiff contended that he made the agreement, which the defendant denied, upon a train between Tifton and Jacksonville; that the defendant was conductor upon that train, and that the proposition was broached when the defendant, as conductor, came to the plaintiff as a passenger, in order to take up his ticket. The defendant testified that he did not take up tickets on the train on the day named, but that a named train auditor was employed at that time upon that train and took up the tickets. To corroborate his evidence as to this, he introduced the testimony of the head clerk of the auditing department of the railroad company, who testified that throughout the month involved the train auditor named by the defendant was engaged on the train in question, and that this auditor made return of the tickets to the general office in Macon. He did not know of his own personal knowledge that the auditor actually performed the duties on the train, or that the reports were in the train auditor's handwriting, except in so far as he knew the auditor's handwriting from a number of similar reports which he had received. This evidence was objected to on the ground that it was irrelevant and that the witness' knowledge was not such personal knowledge of the facts as to render it admissible in evidence. We think that the evidence was properly admissible. Even though this chief clerk did not actually see the train auditor performing his duties, still the fact that he had come in every day with the reports and the tickets was a circumstance of some probative value. The fact that he did not know the auditor's handwriting from having seen him write was no sufficient reason for excluding his testimony as to the signatures to the train reports, as he knew the handwriting through a course of business dealings, and this is one of the methods by which one person may become acquainted with the handwriting of another, and through which he may testify as to the genuineness of the handwriting. Bessman v. Girardey, 66 Ga. 18 (1), 28.

Having carefully examined the testimony, the charge of the court, and the grounds of the motion for new trial, we find no reversible error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

GLAWSON et al. v. SOUTHERN BELL TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO.
(No. 2,956.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 45*)—OPERATION—CARE REQUIRED.

A public telephone company is a public service corporation. It is under the duty of using ordinary care and diligence to afford the usual means of intercommunication to its subscribers, and to this end is under the duty of using ordinary care and diligence to keep its instrumentalities in working order; and the operators at the exchanges must use a like degree of care in answering calls and affording the necessary connection of subscribers' lines. A breach of this duty is a tort, and may give a cause of action. Only reasonable diligence is required; and in determining whether this degree of diligence has been exercised, the nature of the service, the delicacy of the instruments, and all other similar matters should be taken into consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Dec. Dig. § 45.*]

2. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 67*)—OPERATION—RIGHT OF ACTION FOR NEGLIGENCE.

An action to recover damages on account of a negligent homicide under Civil Code 1910, § 4424, is not an action seeking to recover for mental pain and suffering within the purview of the decisions holding that no recovery can be had in cases based on simple negligence, where no damage other than mental pain and suffering is shown.

3. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 67*)—COMPENSATORY DAMAGES—PROXIMATE AND REMOTE CONSEQUENCES OF INJURY.

In an action against a telephone company, wherein the petition asserts that the plaintiff's wife was threatened with an acute bodily disorder; that he had arranged with a physician, ready, willing, and able to come at once to her relief upon notification by telephone, if certain dangerous symptoms appeared; that the symptoms appeared, and the plaintiff endeavored to communicate with the physician by telephone, but through negligence of the agents of the telephone company the plaintiff was unable thus to summon the physician, and was unable to get in communication with him for several hours; that in the meantime the threatened disorder came upon his wife, and, before the physician could reach her after he received the belated summons, proved fatal, through her bleeding to death; that the disorder was one which is readily relievable by the appliances which were in the hands of the physician, and, if the physician had received the call promptly, he could have prevented the disorder from coming on, or, if it had come on, could, by means of the appliances at hand, have prevented any serious results; and that the sole cause of his wife's death was the fact that she bled to death through inability to get the necessary medical or surgical attention—the court erred in dismissing the petition on the grounds that it does not appear that the death of the wife was a legal and natural result of the defendant's negligence, and that damages for the homicide are too remote and speculative in their nature to be legally attributable to the wrong charged.

4. DEATH (§ 89*)—ACTION FOR CAUSING DEATH—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

In an action by a husband for damages on account of the negligent homicide of his wife, the measure of damages is prescribed by the Code as being the "full value of the life of the deceased," and mental anguish occasioned by the bereavement is not also recoverable.

Error from City Court of Americus; C. R. Crisp, Judge.

Action by J. L. Glawson and others against the Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Company. From a judgment dismissing the petition, plaintiffs bring error. Reversed, with directions.

R. L. Berner and J. A. Hixon, for plaintiffs in error. W. P. Wallis, B. J. Clay, and H. E. W. Palmer, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Glawson, on behalf of himself and minor children, filed a petition seeking to recover damages from the Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Company on account of the death of his wife, alleged to have been occasioned through the defendant's negligence. The trial court sustained demurrer to the petition, and the case comes to this court on exception to this ruling.

The petition alleges, in substance, that the defendant is a telephone company engaged in the public service of operating telephone exchanges and long-distance telephone lines, and that it holds itself out as ready and willing to serve the public in this capacity; that Glawson and his family were subscribers to the defendant's exchange at Americus, and that one Dr. Prather, their family physician, was a subscriber to the same exchange; that Dr. Prather lived in Americus, and the plaintiff lived about seven miles away in the country; that on the 3d day of October, 1909, Mrs. Glawson, who was then about seven months advanced in pregnancy, was threatened with a miscarriage and Dr. Prather examined her condition and returned to the city, but agreed to remain at his residence, ready to answer any telephone call, and to come at once to Mrs. Glawson if his services were needed, and he so remained in readiness to come upon telephone communication. About 8 o'clock in the morning Mr. Glawson called up Dr. Prather and had a short talk with him about his wife's condition, but at the moment of that conversation it was not deemed necessary that the physician should come; but, immediately after this conversation was discontinued, Glawson found that more serious symptoms had set in, and went back to the telephone for the purpose of calling the physician to come at once. He was unable to get the operator in the central office at Americus to answer his call or to give him communication with the physician. He kept up his efforts to get into communication, and after a period of 2 hours and 20 minutes succeeded, and the physician came at once in his automobile, arriving within 20 minutes after the call reached him. In the meantime Mrs. Glawson's condition grew precarious, and neighbors who sometimes acted in the capacity of midwives were called in; also a negro was dispatched on a mule with a message for the physician to come at once. About an hour after Mr. Glawson began his attempt to summon the physician, the miscarriage set in, from which Mrs. Glawson bled to death; she having lived only about 20 minutes after the physician arrived. It is alleged that the failure of the telephone company's agent to answer the call was both willful and negligent; both simple and gross negligence being charged. It was alleged that there was in the central office a gong, which could be sounded at night by the ringing of the subscribers, so as to wake the operator if he were asleep, and that this gong had either been disconnected or was willfully disregarded in the present case, though the petition seems to be somewhat ambiguous in this respect, since it also seems to be alleged that the operator was awake at the time and had just answered a previous call from Mr. Glawson to the physician. It is alleged that the highway from Americus to the Glawson home was in excellent condition, and that Dr. Prather had an automobile in which he could have made the trip in 20 minutes, and in which he did make the trip in that time when the message finally reached him. It is alleged that, if the message had reached the physician within a reasonable time after Mr. Glawson first attempted to get communication with him, the miscarriage of the wife could probably have been prevented, and, even if this could not have been prevented, the post-partum hemorrhage could have been stopped, and her death would not have resulted therefrom. It is also alleged that "in the checking of the post-partum hemorrhages there is nothing specially uncertain or problematic, but that the same can with certainty be done and performed by skillful physicians, and that said physician [Dr. Prather] had done and performed the same for his [Mr. Glawson's] wife various times before, had successfully attended her in the birth of five of her children, * * * and could have and would have checked and stopped said post-partum hemorrhages and saved the life of petitioner's wife, but for said delay." It is further alleged that Mrs. Glawson was not afflicted with any other malady or trouble that would have caused her death, and that her death resulted solely from her lack of medical attention, and the failure to get the physician to stop the post-partum hemorrhages "that drained her life blood away on said occasion," which would not have resulted if the physician had reached her in time. There is some amplification of all these allegations, but the foregoing fairly states the substance of the petition.

[1] 1. Two of the points involved in this case have recently been decided by this court. In Southern Bell Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Beach, 8 Ga. App. 720, 70 S. E. 137, it is held that "a corporation holding itself out as furnishing telephone service to the people of a community is a public service company, and is charged with the duty of furnishing, for a reasonable compensation, to any inhabitant of the locality served by it, the usual telephone service for legitimate purposes," and also that it is bound to exercise this function with ordinary care and diligence. Telephone companies in respect to this duty stand very much on the same footing with telegraph companies, though the particular modus operandi of transmitting the message is somewhat different. Telephone companies are under the duty of furnishing to their subscribers reasonably prompt and efficient service in the way of giving them connection with other subscribers. Of course, in considering the actual quantum of diligence required, the delicacy of the instrumentalities involved and the difficulty of keeping them in repair and in perfect working order must be considered; and it may be said that a telephone company is held to only ordinary diligence in keeping its plants, instruments, etc., in working order for the purpose of facilitating conversations between its subscribers. As a part of the duties resting upon them, they should employ at the central office an adequacy of competent operators for such reasonable office hours as may be established, and, if night service is afforded, they are bound to use ordinary diligence in respect to the signals employed to give notice to the operator that some one is calling, and the operator must use ordinary diligence in answering the signal. Now in the present case it is alleged that the plaintiff and his family were subscribers to the defendant's exchange at Americus, and that he gave the ordinary signal, that the line was in order, and that by the negligence of the operator the signal was not answered, and as a consequence of this negligence communication was not established with the physician, who was also a subscriber. We have no hesitancy in holding that this sets up such a breach of public and private duty as constitutes a tort, and, if legal damage be shown, gives a cause of action.

[2] 2. The other proposition to which we referred as having been decided by this court was involved in the case of Western Union Tel. Co. v. Ford, 8 Ga. App. 514, 70 S. E. 65. In that case it was held that "while damages for mental and physical suffering alone, disconnected from any physical injury or pecuniary loss, cannot be recovered from a telegraph company for negligence in failing to transmit and deliver a telegraphic message with due diligence, yet the company is liable for any physical or bodily injury, or pecuniary loss, directly traceable to its negligent conduct as the proximate result thereof." In the case just cited the case of Chapman v. Telegraph Co., 88 Ga. 763, 15 S. E. 901, 17 L. R. A. 430, 30 Am. St. Rep. 183, and a line of cases which has been based thereon (especially the case of Seifert v. Telegraph Co., 129 Ga. 181, 58 S. E. 699, 11 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1149, 121 Am. St. Rep. 210, in which it was held that there can be no recovery on account of mere negligence where no loss other than pain and suffering ensued), were distinguished. The Ford Case, just referred to, is very much in point, because in that case the injury complained of was the loss of an eye, which might have been saved if the telegraph company had not failed to deliver a message addressed to the physician, who, if the message had been promptly delivered, could have saved the eye.

We do not construe the present action as being a suit brought for pain and suffering alone. While mental anguish on the part of the husband and of the children who were bereft of wife and mother is set up, still, as will be seen later, these elements are to be eliminated. The action is based upon section 4424 of the Civil Code of 1910, which provides: "The husband may recover for the homicide of his wife, and, if she leaves child or children surviving, said husband and children shall sue jointly, and not separately, with the right to recover the full value of the life of the deceased, as shown by the evidence, and with the right of survivorship as to said suit if either die pending the action." The next succeeding section of the Code provides that the word "homicide," as used in that context, includes "all cases where the death of a human being results from a crime or from criminal or other negligence." This section, as well as the section referred to above, provides that the measure of damages shall be the "full value of the life of the deceased, as shown by the evidence." The damages contemplated by these sections are not damages for pain and suffering, but are such as are intended to compensate for the loss of the monetary value which is assumed to exist in every human life, and which is somewhat measured by the decedent's earning capacity. In the light of the number of cases in which such recoveries have been allowed, it is hardly to be questioned that an action under these sections of the Code can be brought for simple negligence, and that in such cases the rule in Chapman v. Telegraph Co., supra, and in Seifert v. Telegraph Co., supra, is not applicable.

[3] 8. The only troublesome question in the case is whether Mrs. Glawson's death can be regarded as the legal and natural result of the defendant's tortious acts, or whether they are too remote or speculative in their character. While there is some insistence on the part of the defendant in error that the action sounds in contract, and that the rule of damages applicable to that class of cases (that only such damages as are in contemplation of the parties can be recovered) should be applied, still there can be no reasonable doubt that the petition sounds in tort, and that the rules of damages applicable to tort cases are to be applied. On this subject our Code provides (Civil Code 1910, § 4509): "If the damages are only the imaginary or possible result of the tortious act, or other and contingent circumstances preponderate largely in causing the injurious effect, such damages are too remote to be the basis of recovery against the wrongdoer." Also section 4510 provides: "Damages which are the legal and natural result of the act done, though contingent to some extent, are not too remote to be recovered. But damages traceable to the act, but not to its legal or natural consequence, are too remote and contingent." (In the Code as published, the word "material" has, by typographical error, been substituted for the word "natural.")

We are aware of the fact that the courts are in wide disagreement as to whether damages which result through the failure to get a physician, so that the progress of a malady can be checked or the effects of a wound can be allayed, and injurious results prevented, are speculative and remote within the meaning of the rules just quoted. Some courts go almost to the extent of holding that it is impossible from a human standpoint to say what would be the result of a physician's services in checking almost any known disease or of relieving almost any imaginable physical hurt or injury. But to our minds this difficulty which many courts assume to exist as to this question is largely factitious. To attempt to anticipate the result of almost any human act is always more or less problematical, but the fact that a thing may be problematical does not always prevent its being capable of reasonably accurate solution through the ordinary functions of the human intellect. There are some diseases and human ills which so readily respond to the treatment of a physician, according to the general experience of mankind, as to make it merely an ordinary inference, such as we are daily accustomed to indulge and to act upon, to say that if the treatment were applied the malady would be relieved. On the other hand, there are many diseases the results of which are so uncertain, even when the best treatment is had, as to make the chances of recovery always a matter of doubt. Whether any particular disease or any particular ill stands within the category of the reasonably certain or of the doubtful is a question that must be determined as the individual cases are presented.

There are some diseases, such as cancer, tuberculosis, typhoid fever, meningitis, etc., as to which the court might say, as a matter of law (basing its conclusion upon the state of common knowledge), that the chances of recovery were always speculative and doubtful. There are other diseases as to which, perhaps, the court might say, as a matter of law, that they would yield to proper treatment, basing this conclusion upon the common knowledge of mankind. Between these two classes exists a wide class as to which common knowledge is not so well established; and in these cases the question as to whether the results of a physician's or a surgeon's services would or would not be doubtful or uncertain is a question of fact, and, being a question of fact, is a question for the jury. Juries are frequently called upon to settle the probability of things, and to determine according to human experience whether this or that result likely did ensue or will ensue from this or that somewhat problematic cause. For instance, it is a common thing for a court to submit to a jury the question as to whether an injury will prove permanent, and to allow them to assess the damages with reference to their finding as to this question—a question often problematical to a high degree.

Now, if it is practically certain that a physician, by the application of known and available remedies, can stop a post-partum hemorrhage, such as the one which the decedent in this case suffered, and likewise practically certain that if the hemorrhage is not stopped the woman will die, and that if the hemorrhage is stopped she will recover; and if the decedent in the present case was suffering from a post-partum hemorrhage, and from nothing else that would likely have produced her death, and she did die, it seems perfectly plain to us that it is merely to indulge a natural and ordinary inference to say that the failure to get the physician, so that the remedies could be applied, was the direct and natural cause of her death. The petition alleges all these things, and we are not in a position to say as a matter of law that they are not true. We do not know whether they are true or not, and it is not a matter of common knowledge; and it seems to us that courts ought not to take judicial cognizance of things which they do not know, and which by common knowledge they cannot know. Yet the effect of insistence of counsel is that we ought to hold as a matter of judicial cognizance that the cause of the woman's death was speculative, and that the petition alleges a matter incapable of proof by ordinary methods. It may be that, when the dead woman's condition just prior to her death is described, those who are informed upon the subject can testify to the jury as to the course of human experience as to these matters, and as to what drugs and appliances the physician had by which the hemorrhage could have been stopped; and if it appears that it was not merely possible that the woman's life would have been saved, but that, with practical certainty, it would have been saved, the jury, without exercising any extraordinary function, may be able to say that the failure to get the physician was the direct, natural, controlling, and proximate cause of her death.

Those who hold that cases such as this are too problematic and speculative for solution by the jury seem to us to make an unwarranted distinction between causal acts of omission and causal acts of commission. For example, suppose that a woman had been recently delivered of a child, and that the physician or midwife had applied packing or some other appliance to her organs with a view of preventing a hemorrhage, and by some wrongful act of commission these appliances were removed and the hemorrhage ensued, but few courts, if any, would hesitate to hold that it was for the jury to say whether the removal of the appliances was or was not the proximate cause of the ensuing hemorrhage, and, if death should ensue, of the homicide. Still many of these same courts would refuse to let the jury pass upon the question as to whether a negligent act which prevented this same woman from procuring the benefits of these same medical or surgical appliances was the proximate cause of her death, resulting from hemorrhages started on account of the lack of them. We do not see the difference. In the range of criminal law we find the courts holding that parents can be convicted of murder or of manslaughter for allowing a child to die through neglecting to supply the child with food, with clothing, or with medical attention. A number of such cases are referred to in Wharton on Homicide, § 452. As Wharton well says (§ 451): "A man who is apparently inactive is actually doing something, even though that something is the canceling of something else that he ought to have done. Even sleeping is an affirmative act, and may become the object of penal prosecution, when it operates to interrupt an act on the part of the defendant which the law requires of him, with the penalty of prosecution for his disobedience." Taking the cue from the last sentence in the quotation just made, we may ask that if the picket on duty sleeps, and the enemy slips by him and destroys the camp, is not the negligence of the sentinel the proximate cause of the injury to those whom he is engaged in guarding?

Now, coming back to the case at bar: We are going to reverse the judgment of the lower court in sustaining the general demurrer, and it will thus become a question of proof as to whether the woman's death in this case was the direct and natural result of the defendant's act or not. Before it will be proper to award the plaintiff any damages, the jury should be able not only to trace a connection between a negligent failure of the telephone company to give the plaintiff communication with the physician and the death of the woman, but they should also be able to say with practical certainty that her death was the natural consequence of the defendant's neglect. They must be able to go further and say that the death was not merely the imaginary or possible result of the tortious act, but that according to the course of human experience it was the direct result—that in all human probability this result would not have happened if the defendant's neglect had not happened, and that the consequences of the neglect itself, and not something else, preponderated most largely in causing her death. But, as the Code says, if these damages are the legal and natural result of the act done, they are not too remote to be recovered. For instance, if the jury should believe from the evidence merely that the physician would have had a chance of saving the woman's life, but that her condition was such and the character of the hemorrhage was such that it would not be possible, in the light of human experience in such cases, to say with practical certainty whether she would have survived or not, irrespective of the physician's coming, then they ought to find for the defendant; on the other hand, if they find that the defendant was negligent in its failure to give the husband communication with the physician, and that the physician, stood ready and willing to come, and would have come upon the summons, and that he could have arrived at such a time as that his services would have been available, and that it is practically certain that, through his services and the application of such remedies as would have been at hand, he could have prevented or stopped the hemorrhage, and that by the stopping of it he would in all reasonable probability have saved the woman's life, and that by reason of the failure of these things the woman's death was directly brought about, the plaintiff may recover. We do not know what the evidence will be, and we are merely attempting to lay down certain rules which will so guide the jury as that their verdict will not be based on their speculations, or upon the conjuring up of imaginary or possible results, but upon what they find to exist with practical certainty according to the law of ordinary human experience; and that is about all we have to guide us in any case.

[4] 4. The petition alleges the decedent's age, expectancy, and earning capacity, and thereby gives the basal facts for measuring the amount of the damages, in the event the jury finds that the plaintiff is entitled to recover. The plaintiff also sets up as an element of damage the mental anguish, etc., suffered through the bereavement. The measure of liability fixed by our Code in similar cases of homicide is the full value of the life of the deceased person, and additional damages are not allowed on account of mental anguish suffered on account of the bereavement occasioned by the death. Therefore, while, the judgment of the lower court sustaining the general demurrer is reversed, direction is given that the trial court shall cause the plaintiff so to amend his petition as to pray for only such damages as are allowable under the rule stated in the Code just referred to.

Judgment reversed, with directions.

MENDEL v. LEADER et al.

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§§ 75, 81)—CONTRACT OF SALE—CONSTRUCTION—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Under the written contract the vendors of the land covenanted to free the title from incumbrances by January 1, 1908, or within a reasonable time thereafter. What would be a reasonable time is to be determined by all the attendant circumstances; and under the peculiar facts of this case it was for the jury to say whether the vendors' failure to comply by January 4, 1908, with the covenant to remove incumbrances, was a reasonable or unreasonable time.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 461*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—CONTRACTS.

Where a written contract is unambiguous, it will be construed according to its plain meaning, without reference to extrinsic parol proof of the intention of the parties in making the instrument.

3. DAMAGES (§ 71*)—BREACH OF CONTRACT—ATTORNEY'S FEES.

Attorney's fees may be allowed in the computation of damages for breach of contract, where the defendant has acted in bad faith and caused the plaintiff unnecessary trouble and expense.

Error from Superior Court, Toombs County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge

Action by Carl Mendel against Moses Leader and others. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the petition, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The action was to recover damages for breach of contract. The plaintiff alleged that he entered into a written contract with the defendants, wherein the defendants contracted to sell to him for $2,500 a certain tract of land which they had bought from Mrs. Grimes. The terms of sale were expressed as follows: "It is agreed that the payments shall be made as follows: One hundred ($100) dollars cash in hand paid by said party of the second part, receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged; the sum of four hundred ($400) dollars to be paid on the 1st day of January, 1908, or as soon thereafter as delivery of said lands can be made free from all leases or incumbrances; and the balance, the sum of two thousand ($2,000) dollars, in twelve (12) months after the date of the delivery of the land, which delivery shall be from or at the time the attorneys pass on the title, and said sum of two thousand dollars shall bear interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum from the date of delivery of said land as above." It was further provided that the defendants would make to the plaintiff a warranty deed to the land upon payment of the purchase money.

The plaintiff alleged that he contracted for the purchase of the land for the purpose of dividing it into lots and selling them, which purpose was known to the defendants at the time of making the contract; that, pursuant to its terms and acting on the faith of the contract, the plaintiff had the land surveyed and platted into lots; that he incurred certain expenses, which were itemized, in preparing for the sale of the lots, and had actually sold several of them, which sales he had to cancel because of the defendants' failure to remove the incumbrances from the land as they obligated to do; that the "defendants failed and refused to deliver said land in accordance with the terms of their contract; that your petitioner, on December 30, 1907, wrote to said defendants, offering to comply with his obligation in said contract, and offering to pay the amount he was due to pay on the 1st day of January, 1908, if said defendants would complete and comply with said obligations in their contract of sale, but defendants failed and refused to comply with said contract, or even to notice your petitioner's communication, until your petitioner afterwards, on the 4th day of January, 1908, wrote to said defendants, calling off said purchase and demanding the payment of the amount of the cash payment and the amount of your petitioner's expenses"; that the defendants never owned the lands, but held a bond for title from the Claxton Bank of Tattnall County; that they owed the bank $1,700, with interest, which indebtedness became due on December 17, 1907; that this sum is still due the bank by the defendants, and the bank is threatening to proceed against the defendants and the land for the collection of the indebtedness; that the defendants did not and could not comply with the terms of their contract with plaintiff; and that they had acted in bad faith and fraudulently in making the contract of sale with him. There was attached an itemized statement of expenses alleged to have been incurred by the plaintiff in surveying, platting, dividing into lots, and selling them on the faith of the contract with the defendants to deliver the lands to plaintiff according to the terms of the contract. The prayers were for the recovery of these alleged expenses, the $100 cash payment, and attorney's fees incurred by plaintiff, and for the cancellation of the contract of sale. The defendants demurred to the petition, and their demurrer was sustained and the petition dismissed.

EVANS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. There is no unequivocal statement in the contract as to the time when the purchaser was to be put in possession of the land. In the stipulations regulating the time of making the payments of purchase money, it appears that the second payment of $400 was to be made on January 1, 1908, or "as soon thereafter as delivery of said lands can be made free from all leases or incumbrances," and the final payment was due "twelve months after the date of the delivery of the land, which delivery shall be from or at the time the attorneys pass on the title." From these stipulations it seems that the parties contemplated that the vendors were to put the vendee in possession as soon as the title had been passed on by the attorneys—that is, the legal title was found to be in the vendors—and that all leases or incumbrances were to be removed before the second installment of $400 was to become due. Inasmuch as this installment was made payable on January 1, 1908, or "as soon thereafter as delivery of said lands can be made free from all leases and incumbrances," and in view of the other provisions as to the delivery of the land, it is fair to impute an intention on the part of the seller to free the land of leases and incumbrances by January 1, 1908, or within a reasonable time thereafter. The vendee had the right to demand of the vendors that on January 1, 1908, or within a reasonable time thereafter, the vendors clear the title of incumbrances. According to the petition it was in contemplation of the parties, at the time the contract of sale was made, that the vendee was purchasing the land for the purpose of dividing it into lots and selling the same. The contract of sale was made about four months before the second installment was to fall due, by which time it was contemplated by the parties that all incumbrances were to be removed. In the meantime the titles were to be examined, and, when passed on by the attorneys, the purchaser was to be put in possession, so that he might make the preliminary preparations for the sale of lots.

Construing the contract as evincing a mutual intention of the parties that the vendors were to clear the title of incumbrances by January 1, 1908, or within a reasonable time thereafter, we are confronted with the proposition whether, under the facts alleged, the time transpiring before the plaintiff's renunciation of the contract was so short as to deny the defendants a reasonable time within which they were to rid the land of incumbrances. When the time of performance of a covenant of contract is not fixed therein, but depends upon extrinsic facts known to both parties at the time of the execution of the contract, it is for the jury to determine, in the light of such facts, what a reasonable time is. When we consider the nature of this transaction as alleged in the petition, and the allegation that the defendants could not comply with their covenant to remove incumbrances, we cannot say as a matter of law that the vendors had not breached their contract at the time the vendee notified them of his intention to abandon it because of their failure to remove the incumbrances. If the jury should find, from the attendant circumstances, that, at the time the vendee wrote to his vendors that he would not further perform his contract, a reasonable time had elapsed within which the vendors could have removed the incumbrances, then the failure of the vendors to remove the incumbrances from the land within such time would be an unreasonable delay, and the vendors' dereliction in this respect would be a breach of the contract. But if at the time the vendee wrote to the vendors that he would abandon the contract the vendors had not breached it, in that they had a reasonable time after January 1, 1908, to remove the incumbrances on the land, which had not expired, the renunciation of the contract by the vendee, accepted by the vendors, would bar the vendee of an action for its breach. Where both parties to a contract abandon it, one cannot recover for its breach by the other. Eaves v. Cherokee Iron Co., 73 Ga. 459.

It is true that the petition does not allege that a reasonable time had elapsed when the plaintiff notified the defendants of his intention to abandon the contract. It is a rule of pleading that, where time for the performance is not specified in an agreement, it should be averred that it was to be done within a reasonable time, and that such reasonable time had elapsed when performance was required. Osborne v. Lawrence, 9 Wend. (N. Y.) 135. But where all the facts of the case are pleaded, the failure to specifically denominate the time appearing from such facts to be a reasonable time does not render the petition open to general demurrer on that ground. The plaintiff's case as stated is: (1) An executory contract for the sale of land, by the terms of which the vendors are to remove all incumbrances therefrom within a reasonable time after January 1, 1908; (2) a breach of that contract by failing to remove the incumbrances by January 4, 1908, under circumstances authorizing an inference that a reasonable time had elapsed by that date, within which the defendants ought to have removed the incumbrances; and (3) special damages resulting from the breach. The plaintiff alleged compliance with his contractual obligations, and it was error to dismiss the petition on general demurrer.

[2] 2. The amendment, which the court disallowed, alleged matters variant with the theory of the plaintiff's case as originally pleaded. The petition alleged a contract and its breach, and claimed resultant damages. The proffered amendment alleged that, 10 days after the execution of the contract, the vendee discovered that the vendors did not hold title to the land, but held under a bond from the Claxton Bank, and that the vendors assured him that they would pay the indebtedness to the bank by the 15th of December, 1907, and that, acting on such representation, the vendee made the expenditures, the value of which was sought to be recovered in the original action. These assurances and the vendors' representations as to their title were fraudulently made to deceive, and did deceive, the vendee. It was further alleged that it was the intention of the parties in making the contract of sale that actual possession of the land should be delivered to the vendee by January 1, 1908, and that the words, "as soon thereafter as delivery of said lands can be made free from all leases or incumbrances," were intended to apply to such persons occupying buildings on the land to remove therefrom, in the event sickness or the weather should prevent their removal by January 1, 1908. The amendment was properly rejected. The amendment contained no prayer to reform the contract. Where a written contract is unambiguous, it will be construed according to its plain meaning, without reference to extrinsic parol proof of the intention of the parties in making the instrument. Nor would allegations of false representations made to induce the plaintiff's conduct, pleaded as a ground of rescission of the contract, be appropriate to a petition claiming damages for its breach.

[3] 8. The defendants demurred specially to the paragraph of the petition claiming attorney's fees as damages, because of the defendants' bad faith and fraudulent conduct in refusing to comply with their contract. "The expenses of litigation are not generally allowed as part of the damages; but if the defendant has acted in bad faith, or has been stubbornly litigious, or has caused the plaintiff unnecessary trouble and expense, the jury may allow them." Civil Code 1910, § 4392. The allegations of the petition, taken in connection with the paragraph directly attacked, were sufficient to bring the case within the cited section.

HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 107*)—INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 236*)—CRIMES OF WIFE—LIABILITY OF HUSBAND—ILLEGAL SALE.

A husband is not liable criminally for his wife's offenses, unless he aids, procures, or acquiesces in their commission. In order to show that the sale of a liquid denominated as a beer is unlawful, and consequently that the keeping of the liquid for sale is likewise unlawful, it must be shown that the beer in question comes within one of those classes whose sale is regulated by law.

W. M. Lumpkin was convicted of violating an ordinance of the City of Atlanta, and brings error. Reversed.

Burton Cloud, for plaintiff in error. Jas. L. Mayson and W. D. Ellis, Jr., for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff in error was convicted in the recorder's court of the city of Atlanta of violating a municipal ordinance which forbids keeping for unlawful sale any spirituous, fermented, or malt liquors at any place within the limits of the city of Atlanta. He excepts to the judgment overruling his certiorari, and insists that the evidence adduced upon the trial was insufficient to authorize his conviction.

We think this contention is well sustained. The evidence upon the trial is set out fully in the answer of the recorder, and the following facts appear therefrom: The defendant's wife had a municipal license authorizing her to conduct a boarding house or lodging house at No. 16 Piedmont avenue, in the city of Atlanta. Rumor gave the house such a questionable reputation that the police decided to raid it, and ascertain the exact nature of the business being transacted there. As some of the officers were approaching the house they saw the defendant going down the alley. They stopped him and inquired his name. He gave his name correctly. They then asked him where he lived, and pointed to the house which was under suspicion. He was required to return to the house, and when told that it was suspected that intoxicating liquors were being sold there, he readily agreed for the house to be searched, and gave the officers the keys. In going through the house the officers found a man in a drunken stupor upon a bed in one of the rooms, and a woman upon the same bed, who had a flask of whisky. On the lower floor of the house they found some beer and some empty bottles. Above the overhead ceiling in the room upstairs they found about 55 flasks of whisky. Both before and after the search the defendant emphatically denied that he had any whisky in the house, and after the officers discovered the whisky and beer the woman who was reputed to be his wife admitted that it was hers. Upon the trial a witness testified that he frequently sold the defendant's wife quantities of beer, and the woman who was found with the pint of whisky at the time of the raid testified that she bought it from Kirk Bane Lumpkin (the wife) and paid her for it. Kirk Bane Lumpkin admitted before the court that both the whisky and the beer were her property, and that the defendant, Will Lumpkin, knew nothing about it. There was no evidence that he had either bought or sold any of the proscribed liquids.

The only circumstance which really tends to criminate the defendant (outside of an admission that the beer in the house belonged to him, of which we will speak later) is the fact that the defendant's wife admitted that she had sold both whisky and beer. This raises the question of the extent of the husband's criminal liability for the acts of his wife, and the inquiry as to whether the evidence shows that the husband participated in any way in the criminal act of his wife. It may be stated in passing that there was no direct proof that these two persons are actually husband and wife. Neither of them so stated upon the trial, and it does not appear that any witness knew that the parties sustained to each other the relation of husband and wife, or that they held themselves out to be husband and wife, though two witnesses denominated the woman in the case as the defendant's wife, and the defendant neither affirmed nor denied that he was married. Granted that the woman, who was shown by undisputed testimony to have purchased the beer, and who was the only person who was shown to have sold any whisky, or to have known of the presence of whisky in its hiding place above the ceiling of the bathroom, was the wife of the plaintiff in error, the question which naturally arises is whether proof of a violation of a law by the wife in a house jointly occupied by herself and her husband, without more, will justify the inference that the husband was concerned in or authorized his wife's infraction of the law. If it had been shown that the husband was present at any sale of the intoxicating liquors in question, and acquiesced or did not protest against it, or if it had been shown that he had purchased either the whisky or the beer, or that he assisted in secreting them, these circumstances might have had some probative value, and might have authorized the inference that he was in some way concerned in the violation of the ordinance; but there is no evidence to this effect. Of course, the fact that the house was rented by the wife, and that it was her place of business as a boarding house under the city license, is entirely immaterial, as is also the soundness of the woman's statement that it was her house, and that the plaintiff in error was a mere interloper, and only permitted to stay there by her clemency. Whether the man and the woman in this case were married or not, if he aided and abetted in any way in the violation of the municipal ordinance, he would be guilty.

On the other hand, the mere existence of the marriage relation and the occupancy of the same residence are not strong enough circumstances of themselves to support the inference (to the exclusion of every other reasonable hypothesis) that a husband has knowledge of and consents to every act done by his wife. A husband is not liable criminally for his wife's offenses, unless he aids, procures or acquiesces in their commission. It is just as reasonable to suppose, from the care used to secrete the whisky, that this defendant was unaware of its presence as that he knew it was being kept for illegal sale; for there is no evidence that he knew that any whisky was in the house. As to the beer, it is reasonable to suppose that he knew that it was kept in the house; but aside from the fact that there is no evidence that he knew that it was kept for sale, or for any other purpose than as a beverage, there is no evidence that it was intoxicating, or even such a beer as that it could not be sold without a license. One of the policemen testified that the defendant admitted that the beer was his; another, that he denied knowing anything about it. But, conceding that he admitted that the beer in the house was his, this would not establish the fact that it was such a beer as could not be lawfully sold by him, even without a license. Not every liquid called beer is judicially known to be intoxicating. Cripe v. State, 4 Ga. App. 832, 62 S. E. 567; Snider v. State, 81 Ga. 753, 7 S. E. 612, 12 Am. St. Rep. 850. Some beers are known to be nonintoxicating. In order to show that the sale of a liquid denominated as beer is unlawful, and consequently that the keeping of the liquid for sale is likewise unlawful, it must be shown that the beer in question comes within one of those classes whose sale is regulated by law. Persimmon, locust, corn, and other beers are perhaps not intoxicating. On the other hand, liquid may be called by the most innocent name, and yet the proof may show that the name is but a disguise, and that the sale of the fluid in question is prohibited by law.

Even if the large number of bottles of beer in the defendant's house were a suspicious circumstance sufficient to authorize the inference that the beer could only have been kept for sale (and this circumstance alone would not be sufficient to authorize conviction), a conviction cannot be supported in this case, because there is no evidence that the beer was of such character as that it would have been unlawful to sell it. On the other hand, even if the beer in question was intoxicating liquor, in the absence of any evidence that the husband knew that his wife was engaged in its sale, the conviction would not be authorized. Furthermore, though the husband must generally be recognized as the head of the house (Patterson v. State, 8 Ga. App. 454, 69 S. E. 591), still he is not criminally liable for the malfeasance of his spouse, unless he at least acquiesces in her offense. If he cannot prevent or dares not to protest in a case where the "weaker vessel" will not acknowledge his dominion, he may be an object of ridicule and pity, but is not subject to the penalties of the criminal law.

Judgment reversed.

1. EVIDENCE (§§ 182, 818*)—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 22*)—LOST LETTER—PAROL EVIDENCE—AGENCY—DECLARATION OF PURPORTED AGENT—HEARSAY.

The evidence in behalf of the defendants was insufficient to rebut the presumption that the plaintiff purchased the acceptance for value before maturity. Parol evidence is admissible to prove the contents of a letter which has been lost or destroyed, if the letter has first been shown to have been written by a duly authorized agent of one of the parties to the cause pending. But agency cannot be established by mere declarations of the purported agent; and statements in a letter, in which the writer claimed that he was an attorney representing another, in the absence of proof to that effect, are objectionable as hearsay, and are without any probative value.

Error from City Court of Lumpkin; E. T. Hickey, Judge.

Action by the Johnson County Savings Bank against W. L. Richardson & Son. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

G. Y. Harrell, for plaintiff in error. J. B. Hudson, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. The defendants entered into a contract with the United Jewelers' Manufacturing Company for the purchase of an assortment of jewelry. It is unnecessary to consider the terms of the contract or its subsequent modification by the insertion of new terms which were ingrafted upon it; for the record really presents but one question, to wit, whether the plaintiff was a bona fide purchaser for value and before maturity of the acceptance which was admitted to have been executed by the defendants, and which is the foundation of the present suit. If the plaintiff purchased the paper for value, before its maturity, and without any notice of the defendants' counterclaim, the defendants would be precluded from setting up the defense which they attempted to present. As an innocent purchaser, the plaintiff would be protected, and entitled to recover upon the acceptance, no matter what might be the defendants' rights in a contest with the jewelry company. On the other hand, if the plaintiff really purchased the paper, or even took the formal written transfer, after its maturity, the plaintiff would be charged with notice, and subject to any equities which the defendants might be entitled to present as a defense to the action. The holder of a negotiable instrument is presumed to have purchased it for value, before its maturity, and without any notice of defects. Therefore, when the holder seeks to enforce the instrument, the burden rests upon the maker to prove affirmatively that the acceptance or other obligation was purchased after its maturity. The defendants attempted to do this, and the controlling question in this case is whether the acceptance was assigned to the plaintiff before its maturity. If it was not, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, so far as that branch of the case is concerned. If it was, the defendants would be permitted to set up and establish any matter of affirmative defense which they would have been permitted to assert against the original payee. The defendants sought to show primarily that the plaintiff bought the note after its maturity. The acceptance purported to have been executed on April 18, 1908, and to have been indorsed and transferred in writing by the jewelry company to the plaintiff on May 18, 1908. It was payable six months after date, and consequently it was apparently assigned several months before its maturity.

[1, 2] The trial court permitted one of the defendants to testify, over objection, that he had received a letter from one Otto, an attorney, stating that he represented the jewelry company and requesting the payment of the defendants' acceptance; also that he received another letter from Otto, after the maturity of the paper, soliciting payment for the jewelry company as holder. The witness also testified that thereafter he received another letter from Otto, in which he stated that he no longer represented the jewelry company for the collection of the paper, but represented the Johnson County Savings Bank for the purpose of collecting the paper in question. We think the court erred in admitting this testimony. There was no proof whatever that Otto was the agent of the jewelry company except his own statement to that effect, and agency cannot be shown by the mere declaration of one who claims to be an agent. If the jewelry company itself, after the maturity of the obligation, had demanded payment and asserted that it still owned the paper in question, and it had been shown that the jewelry company had possession of the note at the time of the declaration, any statements made by it would have been admissible, of course. Parol evidence of similar statements made by any person shown to be the agent of the jewelry company would likewise have been admissible, because it was shown that the letters were also destroyed. The proof upon the latter point was clear and distinct, and therefore the controlling question in the case is whether there was enough evidence of Otto's agency to charge the defendants with knowledge. We think not, and that the judge erred in admitting the statements upon that point. If the defendants could have shown that Otto was in fact the agent, as he said he was, then his statement that he no longer represented the jewelry company, but had taken up the matter for the Johnson County Savings Bank, would have been most material. As it was, there being no evidence of agency, except Otto's own declaration to that effect, the statements contained in the letter were merely hearsay, without any probative value whatever; and, this being true, the defendants, for lack of evidence, failed to rebut the presumption that the Johnson County Savings Bank was a bona fide purchaser of the negotiable instrument.

The remaining assignments of error are immaterial. A new trial should have been granted, solely because the evidence objected to was hearsay.

Judgment reversed.

SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. v. PEEPLES.
(No. 3,041.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 29, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 773*)—DISMISSAL—FAILURE TO SERVE BRIEFS.

The failure to serve counsel of the opposite party with the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error, as required by rule 15 (57 S. E. vi), may subject counsel to a penalty for contempt of court, but does not afford ground for dismissing the writ of error.

2. RAILROADS (§ 439*)—KILLING STOCK—PETITION—DEMURRER.

There was no error in overruling the demurrer, which complained that plaintiff's petition did not point out the particular train or trains by which the plaintiff's cattle were killed, nor the hour of the day when any of the cattle were killed, nor the direction in which the train was going.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 439.*]

Error from City Court of St. Marys; D. S. Atkinson, Judge.

Action by D. T. Peebles against the Seaboard Air Line Railway. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Crovatt & Whitfield, for plaintiff in error.
S. C. Townsend, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. [1] A motion is made to dismiss the bill of exceptions in this case, upon the ground that counsel for the plaintiff in error did not serve counsel for the defendant in error with a copy of their brief five days prior to the time set for its hearing upon the calendar of this court. Rule 15 (57 S. E. vi) of this court provides as follows: "Counsel for each party must exchange briefs (and written arguments, if any) with his opponent at least five days before the day set for the call of the calendar to which the case is assigned. This may be done by delivering a copy to his adversary personally or by mail." It appears, from the exhibits attached to the motion to dismiss, that counsel for the defendant in error was not served with a copy of the brief of opposing counsel until the 15th day of December, 1910, and the case was set for hearing upon the calendar on December 19, 1910. Clearly, therefore, rule 15 was not complied with. The brief should have been served prior to the 14th, as the intervening Sunday should not be counted as one of the five days allowed. However, this does not require the dismissal of the writ of error, though it may subject counsel for the plaintiff in error to a penalty for contempt of court, under the express provisions of rule 15, if the circumstances were such as to demand such action on the part of this court.

[2] 2. The plaintiff sought to recover in one suit damages for the killing of several head of cattle. In different paragraphs the petition set out the date on which each animal was killed, and the point on the line of the defendant company's railroad where the killing occurred, and thereafter alleged that all of the animals were his property, and were killed by the collision of an engine drawing a train of cars of the defendant at the points and times designated, and was due to the negligence of the defendant. The negligence alleged was as follows: That the engine was not properly sanded; that the engineer did not keep a proper lookout, and by reason thereof did not discover the cattle on the track ahead as soon as he would otherwise have discovered them; that the engineer did not blow the whistle, and did not ring the bell, nor try to stop the train on discovery of the plaintiff's cattle on the track, but, on the contrary, ran the train in a very fast and reckless manner; that the engineer, after discovering the cattle on the track failed to stop the train or to blow the whistle and ring the bell, although he had ample time to have done so. It was also averred that the company was negligent in permitting grasses and other vegetation, suitable for grazing purposes and attractive and enticing to cattle, to grow and accumulate on its roadbed. The defendant demurred to the petition generally, as not containing any cause of action and as not stating sufficient facts to entitle the plaintiff to recover; also because the fact that the defendant permitted grasses attractive to cattle to grow on its roadbed was not negligence as related to the plaintiff, and because the petition failed to identify the different cattle alleged to have been injured, and to point out the particular train or trains by which in each instance the act was done, the hour of the day of its doing, and the direction in which the train was then going. The court sustained so much of the demurrer as to require the plaintiff to more fully identify the cattle alleged to have been injured, but overruled the general demurrer, and all other special demurrers, and the plaintiff amended his petition by setting out the marks upon the cattle. Exception is taken to the overruling of the demurrers. We think the court ruled properly. The plaintiff was entitled to denominate as acts of negligence the facts which he contended constituted negligence; and then it became a question of fact for the jury to determine, under the particular circumstances of the case, whether the acts omitted or committed in fact constituted negligence; and this the plaintiff did.

Judgment affirmed.

GEORGIA RY. & ELECTRIC CO. v. RICH.
(No. 3,356.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 29, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 283*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGER—TORTS OF CONDUCTOR.

If a railway conductor, in the course of his duties on a car carrying passengers, strikes one passenger and knocks him against another passenger, injuring the latter, it is no defense to a suit brought against the company by the injured passenger that the other passenger had used opprobrious language to the conductor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 283.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 348*)—INJURY TO PASSENGER—TORTS OF CONDUCTOR.

Under the evidence as it appears in the record, it was not error for the court to fail to charge the jury as to the general rule, usually applicable in tort cases, that the plaintiff cannot recover where he, by ordinary care, could have avoided the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1404; Dec. Dig. § 348.*]

3. VERDICT AUTHORIZED.

The evidence fully authorizes the verdict.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; A. E. Calhoun, Judge.

Action by M. J. Rich against the Georgia Railway & Electric Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Colquitt & Conyers, for plaintiff in error. W. M. Smith and F. Roland Alston, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. This much of the facts may be stated as being undisputed: The plaintiff, an old negro woman, was a passenger on a street car. The conductor demanded fare of a negro man, who replied that he had paid once and would not pay again. The dispute waged throughout a few short exchanges of words; when the conductor struck the man. The conflict in the testimony is as to whether the plaintiff was injured or not. The plaintiff testified that the conductor knocked the man down upon her, and thereby inflicted severe injuries upon her person; and her testimony is corroborated by those who saw the fresh physical signs upon her shortly after the occurrence. Several witnesses testified, for the defendant, that, while the conductor struck the man, he did not knock him down upon the plaintiff, but knocked him in another direction. The jury found a small verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant assigns as error the following instruction of the court to the jury: "If, in the dispute about the paying of the fare, the conductor was trying to get the fare, and the passenger used opprobrious words or abusive language to the conductor, and the conductor was justified in hitting him on account of such language, then the railroad company would not be liable, provided it used as to this plaintiff that extraordinary diligence which the law required him to use. While he might be justified in striking the passenger that he was in the fuss with, still he would not be justified in hurting this passenger, the plaintiff in this case, unless he still was in the exercise of that extreme care and caution which a prudent man would exercise under the same or similar circumstances."

[1] The contention is that, if the conductor was justifiable in striking the other passenger, his act would not be a tort against the plaintiff; that the qualification as to the liability for a failure to exercise extraordinary care and diligence was improper and misleading. This instruction was certainly fully as liberal to the defendant as the law will warrant. Even if the law will ever excuse a railway conductor for resenting mere opprobrious language with violence (conductors being police officers, with power to arrest, see Penal Code 1910, § 926), we have no hesitancy in saying that if, in his so doing, he endangers and injures a passenger lawfully behaving himself upon the car, the conductor and his employer are liable for the injuries. Railway companies are under the duty of using extraordinary care and diligence to protect passengers, and conductors must use that high degree of care to protect them from the violent, though provoked, acts of themselves, as well as of others. We are not unaware of the trying situation in which street car conductors in many of our Southern cities are often placed by the insolent and designedly offensive conduct of that lower element of the negro race which makes it a point to take advantage of their position as passengers to use to street car employes, while on duty, wanton and insulting language which they would not dare to use under other circumstances. The writer, who happened to be in Atlanta when the race riot occurred some five years ago, believes that this one thing of the street car employes being required by their positions to endure in patience the insults of negro passengers was, more largely than any other one thing, responsible for the engendering of the spirit which manifested itself in the riot. All the members of this court were born in this state and have lived here ever since. We are well acquainted with the character of the negro race. We know that there are good negroes and bad negroes, that a good negro is a useful and often honorable citizen, and that a bad negro is just about the meanest, the most vicious animal ever created. So we can understand the practical phases of the situation involved in the case; but as judges we must lay down rules of law which are applicable to all races alike, and it will not do to say, as a general rule of law, that a railway conductor can be allowed to imperil the safety of his passengers by his acts of violence, provoked, even though most naturally, by mere insulting or abusive language.

[2] 2. There is complaint that the court did not instruct the jury that the plaintiff was under the duty of using ordinary care to avoid the consequences of the defendant's wrong, and that if she failed in this duty she could not recover. There was nothing in the evidence to require such a charge. Of. G., F. & A. Ry. Co. v. Sasser, 4 Ga. App. 276, 61 S. E. 505.

dict, and there was no error in refusing a new trial.

WILLIAMS v. HOLLAND. (No. 8,303.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 29, 1911.)

COSTS (§ 277*)—DISMISSAL—RENEWAL OF ACTION—PAYMENT.

Where a plaintiff dismisses or discontinues his action, or suffers nonsuit, he has the privilege of recommencing the action only upon the payment of all the costs which accrued in the former suit, unless he files the pauper affidavit allowed by Civil Code 1910, § 5628. This condition as to payment of costs applies to all the costs, whether due to officers or to the opposite party, and applies whether a formal judgment taxing the costs has ever been entered or not.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. §§ 1048, 1049; Dec. Dig. § 277.*]

Error from City Court of Statesboro; J. H. Smith, Judge.

Action by R. M. Williams against M. M. Holland. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

A. M. Deal, F. T. Lanier, and R. Lee Moore, for plaintiff in error. Brannen & Booth, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Williams sued Holland, and after there had been several trials in the city court, and after the case had come to this court on one occasion, and the grant of a new trial had been affirmed, he voluntarily dismissed his action, and a judgment in the following language was rendered: "Upon motion of counsel for the plaintiff, it is considered, ordered, and adjudged that the above-stated case of R. M. Williams against M. M. Holland be and the same is hereby dismissed, at the cost of the plaintiff, R. M. Williams." He renewed his suit, and plea in abatement was filed. It appeared from the evidence that, although the plaintiff before renewing his action, went to the clerk and to the sheriff and paid them such portion of the costs as had not been previously paid to them by the defendant, he made no payment or tender to the defendant of a certain amount of costs, which the defendant had paid out in the course of the proceedings which had been had in the former suit.

Civil Code 1910, § 5627, provides that "the plaintiff in any action, in any court, may dismiss his action either in vacation or term time and, if done in term time, the clerk or justice shall enter such dismissal on the docket." It is also provided by Civil Code 1910, § 5625, that where a suit is so dismissed or is discontinued, or a nonsuit is granted, the plaintiff "may recommence his suit on the payment of costs." The nonpayment of the costs upon the renewal of the action is a matter which must be raised by plea in abatement, but, when so raised, is efficient to cause a dismissal of the recommenced action, unless, of course, the plaintiff has filed the pauper affidavit provided for in Civil Code 1910, § 5628. Langston v. Marks, 68 Ga. 435; Bland v. Bird, 134 Ga. 74, 67 S. E. 427. Not merely costs due to the officers are to be paid but costs due to the opposite party as well. Sweeney v. Malloy, 107 Ga. 80, 84, 32 S. E. 858. Payment, or at least a bona fide tender of payment is required, and no mere arrangement whereby some collecting officer gives a receipt without payment is sufficient so far as relates to the costs due to other officers or to private persons. Board of Education v. Kelley, 126 Ga. 479, 55 S. E. 238; McLaurin v. Fields, 4 Ga. App. 688, 62 S. E. 114.

The plaintiff makes the point that the judgment in the former suit did not tax the costs; but this makes no difference. The Code section on the subject includes no such condition as that the costs shall be taxed or a formal judgment rendered for them, in order to make payment of them a condition precedent to the recommencing of the action. When the judgment of dismissal in the former action was offered in evidence in this case on the trial of the plea in abatement, counsel objected to it on the ground that it was a nullity, because the amount of costs was left in blank. As pointed out by Judge Bleckley in McLendon v. Frost, 59 Ga. 350, it is not usual for the court, at the time of the rendition of the judgment, to enter up the amount of costs, and it is the duty of the clerk to fill in the blank later, which may be done at any time whenever it becomes necessary; and, following this, it was held in Williams v. Sewell, 121 Ga. 685, 49 S. E. 732, that a judgment for costs in which no amount is stated is not void. The court did not err in directing a verdict in favor of the defendant upon the plea in abatement.

Judgment affirmed.

AMERICAN AGRICULTURAL CHEMICAL CO. v. GRAHAM. (No. 3,069.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 29, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 427*)—PAYMENT TO HOLDER—VALIDITY.

Where a promissory note is made payable to bearer, or is indorsed in blank, any person having it in possession will be presumed to be entitled to receive payment thereof, unless the maker has notice to the contrary; and payment to the person having possession of the note will be valid.

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 537*) — PAYMENT — QUESTION FOR JURY.

On the trial of an action upon a promissory note payable to bearer, where the defendant set up that the note had been paid by installments, and it appeared that some of the payments were made to one who held possession of the note at the time of the payments and was therefore presumptively entitled to receive such payments, but that another payment was made to one not in possession of the note and who showed no authority to receive such payment, and it did not appear that this last payment had reached the real owner of the note, the direction of a general verdict for the defendant was not authorized.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. § 1885; Dec. Dig. § 537.*]

Error from City Court of Douglas; J. G. Cranford, Judge.

Action by the American Agricultural Chemical Company against T. L. Graham. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The American Agricultural Chemical Company sued T. L. Graham as maker of a note payable to it, or bearer, originally for the sum of $102. There was a credit of $40 thereon, dated November 9, 1906. The defendant admitted the execution of the note and pleaded payment in full.

The evidence in support of the plea was that of the defendant, as follows: "I am the defendant in this case, and executed this note sued upon. This note was given to Mr. Charlie Butler, who was agent for the plaintiff at the time. Mr. Butler is now dead. I have fully paid off this note. On Saturday before the 9th day of November, 1906, Mrs. R. C. Butler came to my house. She had the note, and demanded payment of me for the same. I saw the note, and knew she had it in her possession. On the Thursday next following, which was November 9, 1906, I paid to Mr. Samp Smith $40 on this note at Bushnell, Ga., and took his receipt for same, and Mrs. Butler later told me that she received this money, which is the $40 credited on the note. On March 1, 1907, on the stairway of the Union Banking Company building in Douglas, Ga., I paid to Mrs. R. C. Butler on said note $40, and her son, W. M. Butler, gave me a receipt for same, signed by himself and R. C. Butler. Mrs. Butler at that time stated to me on the stairway, in the presence of her son, that she did not have the note with her, but that the same was at home in Bushnell, Ga.; and on the 25th day of March, 1907, I paid to W. M. Butler on said note, in the grocery store of W. W. Southerland, in the city of Douglas, Ga., $10, for which he gave me a receipt, signed by himself and Mrs. R. C. Butler, his mother. On the 29th day of November, 1909, I paid to Levi O'Steen, attorney for plaintiffs, $15.72. This last payment was made after the suit was filed, and, according to my contention, paid this note in full."

It was admitted that Mrs. R. C. Butler was the administratrix of the estate of Charlie Butler. There was no other evidence, and the plaintiff moved the court to direct a verdict in its favor, on the ground that the defendant had failed to show any valid payments on the note, binding upon the plaintiff, for the reason that he had shown no agency between Mrs. R. C. Butler and W. M. Butler and the plaintiff, and had failed to show any authority whatever in either Mrs. R. C. Butler or her son, W. M. Butler, to collect the money on this note from the defendant for the plaintiff. The court overruled this motion, and the plaintiff excepted. The defendant then moved the court to direct a verdict in his behalf, which the court did, and to this direction the plaintiff excepted.

O'Steen & Wallace, for plaintiff in error.
Quincey & McDonald, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The evidence of payment in support of the plea is sufficiently specific as to when, how, and to whom the payment was made. It is insisted by the plaintiff that the evidence did not disclose that the payments were made to the person or persons authorized to receive them. The note was made payable to bearer, and the person having in his possession a note made payable to bearer or indorsed in blank is presumed to be entitled to receive payment thereof, unless the payer has notice to the contrary; and the authorities even go to the extent of holding that payment to the person who has possession of the note will be valid, although he may be a thief, finder, or fraudulent holder. Ogden on Negotiable Instruments, 169. The evidence shows that Mrs. R. C. Butler, who was the administratrix of Charlie Butler, to whom the maker had given the note as the agent of the plaintiff, was apparently claiming the right to collect the note as the owner thereof. She was in possession of the note when the first payment of $40 was made, and presumptively, therefore, had the right to collect it as the owner; it being a universal principle of law that the holder of a note payable to bearer is the owner of the note and entitled to collect it. Paris v. Moe, 60 Ga. 91; Walton Guano Co. v. McCall, 111 Ga. 114, 36 S. E. 469.

[2] This first payment of $40 was not only made to Mrs. Butler, the holder of the note, but was indorsed as a credit on the note, and therefore there can be no sort of question but that this was a valid payment on the note, not only because it was paid to the party who held it, but because the amount was actually credited on the note; and the plaintiff only claims the balance on the note after this payment had been deducted from the face thereof. The second payment of $40 was made three months after the first payment, and at that time the maker of the note, who paid it to the son of Mrs. Butler for her—Mrs. Butler admitting that she had received the payment—did not know absolutely that Mrs. Butler still held the note; but, as she did hold possession of it on the occasion of the previous payment, it was reasonable and fair to presume that she continued to hold the note, as she was still collecting on it, and this presumption is aided by her statement, made as a part of the res gestæ, that she did have the note at her home. At least, these facts were sufficient to raise a presumption that she was entitled to receive this payment because the note was still in her possession, and to shift the burden to the plaintiff of showing that she did not have the note in her possession at the time of this second payment, and was not authorized to collect it. Now, as to the payment of $10 made to the son, there is no evidence that he had the note in his possession when the payment was made, or was authorized to collect it.

As to the payment of the $15.72 made to the attorney for the plaintiff after this suit had been filed, this was unquestionably a valid payment, because it was made to the attorney of record for the plaintiff, the payee and holder of the note at the time the suit was filed and when payment was made. Leaving out of consideration the first payment of $40 credited on the note and the last payment of $15.72, made to the attorney of record for the plaintiff, the evidence as to the validity of the other payments did not authorize the direction of a general verdict for the defendant.

Judgment reversed.

The judge of the superior court rendered a final judgment in favor of the defendant, but added a direction that the magistrate dismiss the action in his court. Held, that the judge should not have rendered final judgment, but should have sustained the certiorari, and should have sent the case back to the justice's court for another trial with direction that, if the evidence on the next trial was substantially the same as that on the former trial, the jury should render a verdict in favor of the defendant. Holmes v. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 145)—RIGHT OF APPEAL—JURISDICTION OF AMOUNT.

The right of appeal from the judgment of a justice's court to the superior court, rather than to a jury in the justice's court, is determined by whether the amount claimed exceeds $50. The right of appeal is not dependent upon the amount of the judgment which it is sought to review, but by the amount originally claimed. Even if some of the items sought to be recovered in the original suit in the justice's court are not recoverable, this does not affect the right of appeal, because the validity of this portion of the amount claimed to be due is one of the questions to be determined upon appeal.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 183*)—MARSHAL—DISCHARGE FROM OFFICE.

There was no error in directing a verdict for the defendant. Even though the municipal corporation had contracted with the plaintiff as town marshal for a period of one year, his refusal to carry a night clock authorized his discharge. It is within the power of municipal authorities to prescribe reasonable rules and regulations for the conduct of its police officers, and to discharge such officers if they refuse to obey them.

1. NEGLIGENCE (§ 113*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

There was no error in overruling the demurrer, nor in refusing a new trial. One who seeks to recover for the negligence of another is not required to negative contributory negligence on his part.

2. NEGLIGENCE (§ 138*)—"ACCIDENT"—CULPABLE NEGLIGENCE.

So far as the requests for instructions to the jury were pertinent and proper statements of the law, they were clearly covered by the general charge. The judge did not err in his charge to the jury upon the subject of accident. Where there is culpable negligence, the result cannot be legally an accident. It was not error to instruct the jury that a pure accident must be "unmixed with the want of ordinary care by either party."

The defendant answered denying the allegations of the petition, and further asserting that his account with the plaintiff for the time in question was only $75, and that he had given his note for that sum, and had paid it through the payments credited on the account. Held, that the suit was an action to recover only the excess of the account claimed after deducting the conceded payments; that the defendant's answer was not a plea of payment, was not an affirmative plea at all, but was merely a denial that the alleged indebtedness sued on ever existed; and that the court did not err in ruling that the burden of proof rested upon the plaintiff.

question as to whether the plaintiff was or was not a bona fide holder for value, it was an error as to which the plaintiff cannot complain.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 762, 785*)—CREDIBILITY—DETECTIVES—INSTRUCTIONS—OPINION OF COURT.

On the trial of one for a violation of the prohibition law, where the principal witness for the prosecution was an employed detective, the trial judge charged as follows: "I charge you that, while you may consider the witness' manner of testifying, and his interest or want of interest in the case, yet it is entirely legitimate for the city of Dublin to employ detectives to run down and ascertain those who violate the law." Held: (1) This instruction was not erroneous because "it placed the detective witness on an equal basis of credence with other witnesses wholly disinterested." (2) This instruction did not convey an intimation of opinion by the court as to the credibility of the witness, was not an inaccurate statement of the law relative to the standard by which the detective's evidence should be weighed, and was not calculated to make the jury believe that the law looked with favor, instead of distrust, upon this kind of testimony.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 789, 806*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REPETITION—REASONABLE DOUBT.

Where the trial judge, in the beginning of his charge to the jury, properly instructed them that they could not convict the accused unless they believed he was guilty beyond all reasonable doubt, he was not required to repeat this instruction when directing the jury as to the form of their verdict in the event they found the defendant guilty. The principle of reasonable doubt in criminal cases is so well established and so well known that the law does not require a trial judge to make constant repetition of the rule throughout his charge. One clear and distinct enunciation of the rule in the beginning, or at the conclusion, or elsewhere in the charge is sufficient to enlighten the jury on this subject.

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 236*)—ILLEGAL SALE—EVIDENCE.

Upon trial of an indictment for selling intoxicating drinks, if the evidence show a sale of beer, the state has made a prima facie case for conviction, and need not give evidence that the beer is intoxicating; but the defendant may give evidence to prove that the beer sold is not intoxicating.

Error to Circuit Court, Randolph County.

E. W. Durr was convicted of selling intoxicating liquors, and brings error. Reversed and remanded.

J. L. Wamsley, C. H. Scott, James Coberly, and W. E. Baker, for plaintiff in error. Wm. G. Conley, Atty. Gen., and H. G. Kump, Pros. Atty., for the State.

BRANNON, J. An indictment charged E. W. Durr with selling, without license, spirituous liquors, wine, porter, ale, or beer, and drinks of like nature. He was found guilty by a jury, and judgment for $50 fine and 60 days' imprisonment was rendered against him.

[1] On the trial the evidence was that he sold a drink called and labeled "Temperance Beer." The defendant offered to give evidence, by persons who knew and had drunk and tested it, that it was not intoxicating, and that the stomach could not contain enough of it to produce intoxication. The court rejected the evidence proposed. The argument of the prosecution is that beer is specifically named in Code 1906, c. 32, § 1, as a prohibited drink; that the sale of beer is unlawful without license, and no proof of its intoxicating character is required; that when once it is shown that beer is unlawfully sold the offense is proven, and there can be no evidence by the defendant that it is not intoxicating. I do not conceive that the word "temperance" before the word "beer" is material, any more than would be the word "apple" before the word "brandy." Whisky, brandy, gin, rum, and some other liquors are, by judicial cognizance, known to be intoxicating, and no proof that they are is required; nor is any evidence admissible to the contrary, when it has been proven that such liquors have been sold. 23 Cyc. 61. But we have the question in this case whether beer stands on like ground, though specified in the statutes. Is it, like whisky, to be held conclusively intoxicating? Where the thing sold is not by judicial cognizance known to be intoxicating, it must be proven to be so. "If the liquor be not judicially known as a prohibited liquor, then it must be alleged that it is an intoxicating, spirituous, distilled, malt, fermented, alcoholic, or vinous liquor, if the terms used in describing it are not judicially noticed as being descriptive of such liquor, and these allegations established by proof." Woollen & Thornton on Intoxicating Liquors, § 78. Where whisky, brandy, or other known spirituous liquor is sold, it is not necessary to allege that the particular liquor was sold, because our statute prohibits sale of spirituous liquors, and, such drinks being known to be spirituous, it is not necessary to prove their character.

[2] The cases of State v. Gillispie, 63 W. Va. 152, 59 S. E. 957, and State v. Good, 56 W. Va. 215, 49 S. E. 121, and State v. Cool, 66 W. Va. 86, 66 S. E. 740, are not authority on the question before us; that is, can the defendant, selling beer, prove that it is not intoxicating? They do hold that, as to drinks not mentioned in the statute, such defense may be made; they do hold that, as to such drinks, intoxicating quality is the test. They involved drinks called "malt," "senoj cider," and "rikk," not by name mentioned in the statute, and not judicially known to be spirituous and intoxicating, and in such cases the intoxicating quality is the test, and open to proof on both sides; but in this case we have the sale of beer, a drink prohibited by name in the statute, and prima facie intoxicating. We hold that, when it is proven that a liquor called "beer" has been sold, the case is proven prima facie; but, as all beers are not intoxicating, the defense that it is not is admissible. Woollen & Thornton on Intoxicating Liquors, § 76, says: "Whether or not courts will take judicial notice that beer is an intoxicating or malt liquor has been one of much contrariety of opinion, and this arises from the fact that there are many kinds of beer well known to be neither malt, nor fermented, nor intoxicating liquors. Therefore, upon a proof of a sale of 'beer,' and nothing more, many cases hold that it is not shown that there was a sale of either malt or intoxicating liquor. But by the better line of cases, on proof of a sale of 'beer,' even without additional words, the courts will construe it as a sale of fermented, malted, or intoxicating liquors, and the burden is upon the person claiming it is not a malted, fermented, or intoxicating liquor to show that fact. These decisions are based on the primary meaning of the word 'beer.' 'Webster,' said the Supreme Court of Indiana, 'defines beer to be "a fermented liquor made from any malted grain, with hops and other bitter flavoring matter." In other words it is a malt liquor, which the same author declares to be "a liquor prepared for drink by an infusion of malt, as beer, ale, porter, etc." It may, therefore, be said that beer is a liquor infused with malt and prepared by fermentation for use as a beverage. As a consequence, when "beer" is called for at a place at which intoxicating drinks are sold, the bartender, having in view the primary meaning as well as the common use of the word, is justified in inferring and must reasonably infer that malted and fermented beer is wanted. If any other kind of beer is desired, it is expected that qualifying words will be used, such as spruce beer, root beer, small beer, ginger beer, and the like, thus attaching a remote and secondary meaning to the word "beer" as descriptive of particular beverages. When, therefore, a witness testifies to the sale or giving away of beer under circumstances which make the sale or giving away of any intoxicating liquors unlawful, the prima facie inference is that the beer was of that malted and fermented quality declared by the statute to be an intoxicating liquor, and the court trying the case ought to take judicial notice of the inference which there arises from the use of the word "beer" in its primary and general sense.' So, where the term 'lager beer' is used in testimony, the inference is that an intoxicating beer was meant. In days gone by, when the term 'strong beer' was used to distinguish it from 'small beer,' courts took judicial notice that it was intoxicating. Where a statute declares that lager beer is an intoxicating liquor, it cannot be shown that it in fact is not, for the Legislature has fixed its status by a statute the courts cannot question. The courts cannot, however, take notice that rice beer is an intoxicant; that is a question for the jury."

We know as a court, people know, that there are beers innocent, and not intoxicating, and extensively used, and some that are intoxicating, and it seems consonant with reason, with justice, that one charged with selling "beer" should be allowed to prove that it is of a kind not intoxicating. In every case it is a jury question upon the evidence. State v. Oliver, 26 W. Va. 422, 53 Am. Rep. 79, is cited. We do not think it is apposite in this case. It held that sale of cider or crab cider was not unlawful; the reason being that it was not named in the statute, and did not come under the head of spirituous liquors, and not a "mixture" or "preparation" known as "bitters," producing intoxication. As the court held it immaterial that crab cider was intoxicating, the state would use that case in this case to show that whether the beer sold was intoxicating is irrelevant and evidence on that question not admissible; but that case does not so direct in this case. It was under a statute (Laws 1877, c. 107, § 1) prohibiting sale of spirituous liquors, and saying that all "mixtures or preparations known as 'bitters' or otherwise, which will produce intoxication shall be deemed spirituous liquors." Since then, in 1887 the section (as amended by Laws 1885, c. 17) was amended by inserting the word "liquids" in addition to "mixtures" and "preparations" (Laws 1887, c. 29), and now cider would be a liquid, and, if strong enough to produce intoxication, would be, in law, deemed spirituous liquor, and evidence to prove and disprove its intoxicating properties would be admissible.

We think that the circuit court erred in rejecting all the evidence proposed to deny the intoxicating quality of the beer.

Judgment reversed; case remanded.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. FARRAR LUMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 21, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

CARRIERS (§ 94*) — FAILURE TO DELIVER FREIGHT — ACTION BY CONSIGNEE — EVIDENCE.

Excluding from consideration hearsay testimony, which has no probative value, the verdict directed by the court was demanded under the other evidence introduced upon the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 94.*]

Error from Superior Court, Whitfield County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by the Farrar Lumber Company against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Maddox, McCamy & Shumate, for plaintiff in error. C. D. McCutchen, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. The Southern Railway Company transported a car of shingles from Jellico, Tenn., to Dalton, Ga., for delivery to the Farrar Lumber Company, and insisted as a condition precedent to delivery that the consignee pay a freight charge of something over $400, which included its own charges for transportation over its line and an advance payment made by it to the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company of about $370. The lumber company tendered the amount of freight charges on the shipment from Halsey, Ky., to Dalton, Ga., and demanded the goods, and, upon the Southern Railway Company refusing to comply with this demand, brought trover to recover them. Upon the trial of the case, the court directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the railway company excepted.

It appears from the evidence that, several months prior to the shipment from Jellico to Dalton, the lumber company procured the shipment of the shingles from the state of Washington, consigned to its order at Halsey, Ky., to which point they were carried by various connecting lines, arriving at destination by the Louisville & Nashville Railroad. The secretary of the lumber company testified that that company directed the Louisville & Nashville to deliver the shingles to the Red Ash Coal Company at Halsey, and that this was done; that the coal company, to which company the lumber company sold the shingles, was to pay the freight, which the lumber company was to deduct from the invoice price of the shingles; that he did not authorize the railroad company to deliver them without collecting the freight charges; and that the railroad company extended credit to the coal company for the freight. It appears from the evidence that the coal company used something over 30,000 of the shingles, and that the shipment remained in their possession for some length of time—several months, as we infer from the testimony. Thereafter, about the 1st of February, 1909, the unused shingles were carried from Halsey to Jellico, and the joint agent of the Southern Railway and the Louisville & Nashville at the latter point billed them to the lumber company at Dalton. This agent testified: That he "couldn't say by what authority they were brought there [Jellico]. The conductor brought them in there. When I sent these shingles to Dalton, I made an entirely new transaction out of it. They were in an entirely different car from the cars on which the original charges were based." He further testified that he paid the advance charges (which included everything except the freight from Jellico to Dalton) to the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, and tacked these charges onto the freight bill to be collected by the Southern Railway at Dalton. The secretary of the lumber company testified that, learning that the coal company had become involved financially, he commenced taking steps to protect his company with respect to the shingles, and accepted a proposition of the manager of that company to take back the unused shingles and credit the account of the coal company therewith; that soon thereafter he was notified that the Louisville & Nashville Railroad had seized the shingles, and he employed a lawyer at Jellico to stop them there, "and finally the railroad company turned them over to us at Jellico, and I instructed our lawyer to have them forwarded here to Dalton. * * * I did get my shingles back at Jellico, and they were forwarded to Dalton by the Southern Railroad. * * * I wanted the Southern Railway to bring those shingles from Jellico to Dalton for me, and I pay the freight from there here; and I so directed it, and it was done. When these shingles reached Dalton, the agent of the Southern Railway very promptly placed them at our side track." No attempt has been made to detail the evidence, but the foregoing substantially states the facts from the standpoint of the lumber company.

The Southern Railway Company contends that after a small portion of the shingles had been used the coal company became involved financially and the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company retook the remainder of the shingles; the coal company paying it the contract price for those which it had used. This contention is made in the brief of counsel, where it is further stated: "The coal company advised Farrar of the situation, and he agreed to take back the shingles in settlement of his account against the coal company. Farrar then directed the shingles shipped to Dalton, Ga., which was done." This contention has its basis in statements contained in certain letters which were introduced in evidence by the plaintiff, and is supported only by this hearsay evidence, which has no probative value. In a letter from the freight claim agent of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company to the lumber company, introduced in evidence, this statement appears: "I understand the contents of this car [referring to the car in which the shingles originally reached Halsey, Ky.] was sold to the Halsey Red Ash Coal Co., Halsey, Ky., and that consignees opened this car without authority and removed the shingles without payment of freight."

Discarding this purely hearsay testimony, along with other testimony of the same character, the proven facts in the record make substantially the following case: The lumber company sold a car of shingles to the coal company. The shipment was consigned to the lumber company at Halsey, and it directed the railroad company to deliver it to the coal company; it not appearing that any instructions were given with respect to the collection of freight. The railroad company delivered the shingles and gave credit for the freight. Civil Code 1910, § 2741, declares: "The carrier has a lien on the goods for the freight, and may retain possession until it is paid, unless this right is waived by special contract or actual delivery." The hearsay evidence before adverted to is not proof that the coal company obtained possession by a trespass, and there is no evidence that there was any fraud on the carrier whereby he was induced to part with the goods. The delivery to the coal company under the facts established constituted a waiver of its lien for freight charges. Afterwards—just how and when it does not clearly appear—the Louisville & Nashville regained possession of the greater portion of the shingles. There is no proof, other than hearsay, how this possession was acquired. It appears from the positive testimony in behalf of the plaintiff that it took back the unused shingles from the coal company, agreeing to credit its account with them, and thus obtained the title thereto; the title to the shingles having gone into the coal company upon the railway company delivering them to it under the instructions of the lumber company. As against this title, the plaintiff in error shows only a possession obtained from the Louisville & Nashville Railroad for the purposes of shipment; and this possession the lumber company claims to be derived through it, as its secretary testified that the shingles were turned over to it by the Louisville & Nashville at Jellico, and were to be shipped to the lumber company at Dalton. The Louisville & Nashville Railroad, having once lost its lien by an actual delivery of the freight at Halsey, could not revive that lien merely by afterwards getting possession of the shingles. Jones on Liens, § 310.

The question as to whether or not the carrier still had a lien for the original freight charges would be the same in this case, whether or not the original delivery to the coal company at Halsey was a delivery to them as purchaser, passing title, or a delivery to it as agent of the lumber company, title remaining in the latter. It is enough that there was an actual delivery under such circumstances as to occasion a loss of the lien. Even if the delivery was to the agents of the lumber company, so that the latter still owed the freight as a debt, this fact could not avail the defendant in the present action, since the plaintiff in either event would have the title to the goods, and the defendant only the right to retain possession until the payment of the amount of his lien for freight. It being undisputed that the plaintiff tendered all freight charges other than those accruing on the original shipment from the state of Washington to Halsey, Ky., a verdict in favor of the plaintiff was demanded, and the court did right in so directing.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

LANHAM & SONS CO. v. CITY OF ROME et al.

BOSWORTH v. SAME.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 14, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. VALIDITY OF STATUTES—PASSAGE THROUGH LEGISLATURE.

The attack upon the passage of the acts of the Legislature here involved is controlled by the decisions in De Loach v. Newton, 134 Ga. 739, 68 S. E. 708, and Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. State, 135 Ga. 545, 69 S. E. 725.

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 290*)—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS.

Where a municipal charter authorized the paving of streets and the assessment of a specified portion of the cost thereof upon lots abutting upon them, required notice to be given to the owners of such lots, and provided a method by which such owners should have an opportunity to question and have a judicial determination as to the validity and amount of such assessments in proceedings for their collection, this satisfied the constitutional requirement of due process of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 871-875; Dec. Dig. § 290.*]

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 290*)—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS.

A statute which afforded such opportunity for contest by means of an equitable proceeding for injunction was not obnoxious to the provision of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States which declares that no state shall deprive any person of property without due process of law, because such act required that the contesting property owner should pay the amount which he admitted to be due, if any, and that this should be set out in the proceedings and verified.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 527*)—SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS—COLLECTION—STATUTES—REPEAL.

While the act of 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 897), and the act of 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 904), amending the charter of the city of Rome, were repealed by the act of 1909 (Acts 1909, p. 1255), the last-mentioned act covered the subject-matter of the two former, and substantially re-enacted their provisions, with certain changes. It did not destroy the right of the municipality to collect executions which had previously been issued for assessments upon abutting property for street paving.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078*)—OBJECTIONS—ABANDONMENT—BRIEFS.

A ground of attack upon executions issued to collect assessments for street paving, alleging that they did not follow the law under which they were issued in relation to the property upon which a levy should be made, will be treated as abandoned, where not referred to in the brief.

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 536*)—SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS—OBJECTIONS—WAIVER.

As the acts of the Legislature under which these proceedings were had were not unconstitutional for any reason urged against them, as an ample opportunity was furnished to the owners of abutting lots to contest the amount of the assessments or the legality of the proceedings to levy and collect them, if owners of such property did not pursue the remedy thus provided, but proceeded by general equitable petition to enjoin the collection of such assessments, on the ground that the proceedings were not in accordance with the law and certain items of the assessments were improper, an injunction was properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1253; Dec. Dig. § 536.*]

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County:
Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Actions by the Lanham & Sons Company and by E. L. Bosworth against the City of Rome and others, to enjoin the collection of a street assessment. Judgment for defendants in each case, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Maddox & Doyal and M. B. Eubanks, for plaintiffs in error. Max Meyerhardt, Nathan Harris, J. Branham, and Lipscomb, Willingham & Wright, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. Lanham & Sons Company and Bosworth each filed an equitable petition against the city of Rome, seeking to enjoin against executions which had been issued against them and their lots, respectively, on account of a street improvement. In each case the injunction was refused, and exception was taken. The cases were argued together in this court.

The grounds of attack by the plaintiffs may be summarized under the following general heads: (1) That the act of the Legislature under which the executions were issued was unconstitutional on account of the defects in the record as to the method of its passage; (2) that the original act, as amended, was in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States; (3) that the original and amended act were repealed by the subsequent act creating a new charter for the city of Rome; (4) that there was a failure to comply with the act in regard to the methods of procedure, both before and after the work was done; (5) that certain items included in the assessments were improper.

By the act of August 22, 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 897), the charter of the city of Rome was amended, and, among other things, provision was made in regard to grading, paving, and macadamizing the streets. By the eighth section the board of public works was directed to cause a survey to be made of the streets, sewerage, and waterworks system, and to proceed as in the act set forth. By the ninth section an assessment of one-third of the cost of paving or macadamizing such a street was authorized to be made against the owners of abutting property, which should become a lien on such property, "to be enforced by execution issued as provided for collecting other city taxes." By the act of August 11, 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 904), the charter of the city of Rome was again amended. It was provided that, upon the completion of one or more sections of pavement between intersecting streets, the board of public works should ascertain the proportionate cost chargeable to owners of abutting property, and certify this to the mayor and city council; that the latter should make an examination, and, if the action were found correct, they should approve it, and cause the clerk to give written notice of the result to such owners of abutting property; that the amount so assessed should become immediately due and payable; that a copy of the notice should be served on the owner or occupant; and that the city should proceed immediately to collect and pay over the money to the board of public works. It was also provided that if any owner of abutting property should desire to contest the amount of the assessment thereon, or the legality of any proceeding growing out of or connected with the pavement of the streets of the city, he might do so by means of an application for a writ of injunction, but that no temporary restraining order or permanent injunction should be granted unless and until such contestant should first pay to the city the full amount admitted by him to be due, with interest thereon; and it was required that these facts should be fully stated in detail in the petition and verified by the applicant.

On August 17, 1909, an act was approved the purpose of which was to amend, consolidate, and supersede the several acts incorporating the city of Rome, and to create a new charter and municipal government therefor. Acts 1909, p. 1255. This included provisions in regard to the board of public works, the paving of streets, etc., of a generally similar nature to those in the former act, but declared that the previous acts were repealed. The method of contesting the amount of the assessment against abutting property or the legality of any proceeding growing out of or connected with the pavement of the streets, provided by the last-mentioned act, was by means of an affidavit of illegality, stating the cause of such illegality and the amount which the affiant admitted to be due. The amount so admitted was required to be paid to the levying officer before the affidavit should be received; and upon the filing of such affidavit it was to be returned to the Superior Court for trial. The work involved in the present controversy was done after the passage of the act of 1908, and upon the refusal to pay the assessment executions were issued in May, 1909. In January, 1910, they were levied and petitions were filed to enjoin further proceedings under them.

[1] 1. The objections made to the passage of the acts involved are concluded by the decisions in De Loach v. Newton, 134 Ga. 739, 68 S. E. 708, and Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. State, 135 Ga. 545, 69 S. E. 725.

[2] 2. The next question which arises is whether the act of 1907 (as amended by that of 1908) and the act of 1909 were void, on the ground that they afforded no due process of law by which the owner of property abutting on a paved street might contest the amount and legality of the assessment. On behalf of the plaintiffs in error it was contended that they did not do so, and that therefore such an assessment amounted to taking property without due process of law. In Londoner v. City and County of Denver, 210 U. S. 373, 385, 28 Sup. Ct. 708, 52 L. Ed. 1103, referring to the assessment, apportionment, and collection of taxes, it was said that due process of law requires that at some stage of the proceedings before the tax becomes irrevocably fixed, the taxpayer shall have an opportunity to be heard, of which he must have notice, either personal or by publication, or by a law fixing the time and place of the hearing. In Hagar v. Reclamation District, etc., 111 U. S. 701, 4 Sup. Ct. 663, 28 L. Ed. 569, it was said: "The law authorizing the imposition of a tax or assessment upon property according to its value does not infringe that provision of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution which declares that no state shall deprive any person of property without due process of law, if the owner has an opportunity to question the validity or the amount of it, either before that amount is determined, or in subsequent proceedings for its collection." Winona & St.

Peter Land Co. v. Minnesota, 159 U. S. 526, 537, 16 Sup. Ct. 83, 40 L. Ed. 247; Kentucky Railroad Cases, 115 U. S. 321, 331, 6 Sup. Ct. 57, 29 L. Ed. 414.

[3] In McMillen v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 37, 24 L. Ed. 385, it was held that a statute which gives a person against whom taxes are assessed a right to enjoin their collection, and have their validity judicially determined, afforded due process of law, notwithstanding he was required to give security in advance. The legislative act then under consideration authorized an injunction to stay the wrongful collection of a tax. It regulated the proceedings, and declared that they should be treated as preferred cases, and imposed a double tax upon a dissolution of the injunction. It was argued that this was not due process of law, because the judge granting the injunction was required to take security of the applicant, and that no remedial process could be within the meaning of the Constitution which required such a bond as a condition precedent to its issue. Of this argument Mr. Justice Miller said: "It can hardly be necessary to answer an argument which excludes from the definition of due process of law all that numerous class of remedies in which, by the rules of the court or by legislative provisions, a party invoking the powers of a court of justice is required to give that security which is necessary to prevent its process from being used to work gross injustice to another." If an assessment is not wholly unlawful, but only excessive, it does not deprive an owner of abutting property of due process of law for the act giving such remedy to require him to pay what he admits to be due in order to contest that part which he claims to be excessive. Such a requirement is recognized as a sound rule of equity. In National Bank v. Kimball, 103 U. S. 732, 733, 26 L. Ed. 469, it was said that a person should not be permitted, because his tax is in excess of what is just and lawful, to screen himself from paying any tax until the precise amount which he ought to pay is ascertained by a court of equity. State Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, 23 L. Ed. 663. Both the act of 1907, as amended by that of 1908, and the act of 1909, required notice of the assessment to be given to the owner of property abutting upon the paved street, and provided a legal method of contesting the legality of the proceedings and the amount of the assessment. Neither of them denied to the property owner due process of law in this respect. Speer v. Mayor and Council of Athens, 85 Ga. 49, 11 S. E. 802, 9 L. R. A. 402.

Counsel for plaintiff in error cited, in regard to what is known as the "front foot rule" of assessment, the case of Norwood v. Baker, 172 U. S. 269, 19 Sup. Ct. 187, 43 L. Ed. 443. That decision has been discussed by the Supreme Court of the United States in several other later cases. See French v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co., 181 U. S. 324, 21

Sup. Ct. 625, 45 L. Ed. 879; Tonawanda v. Lyon, 181 U. S. 389, 21 Sup. Ct. 609, 45 L. Ed. 908; Webster v. Fargo, 181 U. S. 394, 21 Sup. Ct. 623, 45 L. Ed. 912; Cass Farm Co. v. Detroit, 181 U. S. 396, 21 Sup. Ct. 644, 45 L. Ed. 914; Detroit v. Parker, 181 U. S. 399, 21 Sup. Ct. 624, 45 L. Ed. 917; Wormley v. District of Columbia, 181 U. S. 402, 21 Sup. Ct. 609, 45 L. Ed. 921; Shumate v. Heman, 181 U. S. 402, 21 Sup. Ct. 645, 45 L. Ed. 922; Farrell v. West Chicago Park Commissioners, 181 U. S. 404, 21 Sup. Ct. 609, 45 L. Ed. 924. It would not be profitable to enter into a discussion of the views entertained by the majority and minority of the court in those cases. It might not be amiss, however, to suggest that if the general rule is to allow assessments by the front foot, and the exception is only where such an assessment becomes confiscatory in character, whether wholly or partially so, it would seem that the person who seeks to bring himself within the exceptional status ought to allege facts sufficient for that purpose. In the case at bar, as we have stated, the plaintiffs in error were afforded ample opportunity to contest the assessments, either as to their amount or legality; and neither on the face of the statute nor in the pleadings or evidence was there anything to show that the assessment was confiscatory in character, either wholly or partially. Indeed, the Norwood Case seems to have been put into the brief of the plaintiff in error rather suggestively and tentatively than as applicable to any substantial point made by the pleadings or evidence.

[4] It was contended that the acts of 1907 and 1908 were repealed by that of 1909, and that this destroyed any right on the part of the city to collect executions issued prior to the passage of the last-mentioned act. It has been said that, as a general rule, the repeal of a statute without any reservation takes away all remedies given by the repealed statute. But where a new statute is a substantial re-enactment of an old one, and expressly recognizes and makes provision in regard to rights and remedies which accrued under it, the general rule is not applicable. Section 6 of the Civil Code of 1910 declares that "laws looking only to the remedy or mode of trial may apply to contracts, rights, and offenses entered into or accrued or committed prior to their passage; but in every case a reasonable time subsequent to the passage of the statute should be allowed for the citizen to enforce his contract, or protect his right." The act of 1909 did not merely repeal the prior acts and stop. It dealt with the same general subject-matter of the board of public works, and the pavement and improvement of streets, and in the same general manner. It made provision for the contest of the amount or legality of the assessment by means of an affidavit of illegality; and it recognized and substantially preserved the existing order of things. It expressly referred to executions issued under the act of 1907, and authorized their transfer. It declared that all the rights, powers, titles, property, easements, and hereditaments then belonging to the city of Rome should be vested in it under its new charter. Such an enactment did not destroy the right of the city to collect executions issued under the act of 1907, nor did it leave the owner of abutting property without a remedy to contest the amount or legality thereof.

[5] The executions involved in these cases commanded that the city marshal should cause to be made the amount of the assessment, with interest, "of the goods, chattels, lands, and tenements of [the named owner of abutting property], and especially of the property" abutting on the paved street, describing it. They were levied on the property of the plaintiffs so described. In the equitable petitions it was alleged that such executions were against the plaintiffs personally, as well as being made a special lien against the property abutting on the street which had been paved, "while, under the law, it could only be issued as a judgment in rem against the particular property abutting on said street so paved." By the expression "under the law" reference was doubtless made to the legislative act, and no attack was made upon the act itself in reference to this provision. This complaint was not referred to in the brief on behalf of the plaintiff in error, and will therefore be treated as abandoned. It is accordingly unnecessary to compare the provisions of the act with the fi. fa. issued under it.

[6] As we have held that the acts of the Legislature under which these proceedings were taken were not void for any of the reasons urged against them, and that the charter of the city of Rome furnished an ample remedy to the owner of an abutting lot to contest the amount of such assessment or the legality of the proceedings to levy and collect it, the present petitions, as brought, would not authorize an injunction. Regenstein v. City of Atlanta, 98 Ga. 167, 25 S. E. 428. We do not, therefore, deal with the numerous complaints made in regard to a failure by the city officials to comply with requirements of the act before and after the work was done. The injunction was properly refused in both cases.

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 40*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where contributory negligence of the plaintiff is not pleaded, either as a complete defense or in mitigation of damages, it is not ground for new trial, in the absence of a written request, that the court omitted from his instructions the principle that, if plaintiff and defendant are both at fault, the former may recover; but his damages will be diminished in proportion to the amount of default attributable to him. (Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1106*)—WRIT OF ERROR—DISMISSAL.

When it appears that the clerk of the trial court has failed to transmit to the Court of Appeals within the time prescribed by law, the bill of exceptions and the transcript of the record, and that an attorney for the plaintiff in error "has been the cause of the delay, by consent, direction, or procurement of any kind," the writ of error will be dismissed. Civil Code 1910, §§ 6185, 6186; Budden v. Brooks, 123 Ga. 882, 51 S. E. 727; Wilson v. State, 124 Ga. 30, 52 S. E. 81; Pope v. State, 93 Ga. 216, 18 S. E. 649; Calhoun v. State, 91 Ga. 112, 16 S. 2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1106*)—WRIT OF ERROR—DISMISSAL—DELAY IN FILING TRANSCRIPT.

The bill of exceptions in this case was filed in the clerk's office of the city court on January 4, 1911. The transcript of the record was certified by the clerk on March 14, 1911, and reached the Court of Appeals March 16, 1911. The clerk of the city court certified that the delay was caused by reason of the fact that the attorney for the plaintiff in error requested him not to send the case up, and finally said that he would dismiss the case. The clerk further certified, that subsequent to this request by the attorney for the plaintiff in error he certified and sent up the record as soon as possible, in pursuance of the request made by the solicitor general that he do so. The facts place the attorney for the plaintiff in error in the attitude of consenting to, directing, or procuring the delay of the clerk in making out and certifying a transcript of the record within the time prescribed by the statute. For these reasons the writ of error is dismissed.

1. CARRIERS (§ 196*) — ACTION FOR FREIGHT EARNED — SET-OFF AND COUNTERCLAIM — DAMAGES.

Where an action is brought by a carrier to recover freight charges upon a shipment delivered by the carrier to the defendant without requiring payment of the freight it is permissible, under the procedure in this state, for the defendant to file a plea of recoupment, setting up that the carrier damaged the shipment, and thereby to set off the amount of these damages against the plaintiff's recovery, and, if the damages exceed the amount of the freight charges, to recover a judgment against the carrier for the excess.

2. CARRIERS (§ 196*) — ACTION FOR FREIGHT CHARGES—SET-OFF—DAMAGES.

Under the act of Congress commonly known as the "Hepburn Act" (Act July 29, 1906, c. 3591, 34 Stat. 584 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1906, p. 1149]), a common carrier cannot accept anything but money in payment of freight and other transportation charges. Nevertheless, if in the course of the transportation the carrier has damaged the goods, and has delivered them without requiring payment of the charges at the time, and brings an action against the shipper for the recovery of the charges, there is nothing in the letter or the spirit of the act of Congress which prevents the defendant from filing a plea of recoupment, alleging the damages done to the shipment, and setting them off against the plaintiff's recovery of the freight charges, and, if the damages exceed the freight charges, recovering a judgment against the carrier for the excess.

Error from City Court of Moultrie; J. D. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by H. M. Atkinson, receiver, against J. J. Battle. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

T. W. Mattox and T. H. Parker, for plaintiff in error. J. H. Merrill, J. A. Wilkes, and Rosser & Brandon, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The receiver of the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railroad Company brought suit in the city court of Moultrie against Battle for the recovery of $387 and interest on an account for freight charges on two cars of live stock shipped from a point in Illinois to Moultrie, Ga.; it being alleged that at the time of the arrival of the live stock at destination it was important for them to be unloaded promptly, that for that reason the defendant was allowed to take possession without first paying the freight bill and other charges, that the shipment was delivered upon the defendant's promise to pay these amounts as soon as they could be ascertained, and that he had failed and refused to do so. The defendant's answer admitted that the account sued on was prima facie correct, that it represented correctly the amount of freight charges due upon the shipment, and that the shipment had been delivered to him without these things being paid for. He denied that he had made any express promise to pay them, but admitted that he would be liable therefor, were it not for the other matters which he pleaded, namely, that the shipment was delivered in bad condition, having been damaged in transit, and that he accepted the shipment from the agent of the railroad company on the understanding that the damages would be adjusted and paid within a few days, which had not been done; that the damage caused to the shipment in the course of transportation amounted to $1,225, for which amount he pleaded recoupment against the plaintiff's claim, and a judgment for the excess. The plaintiff demurred to this answer, contending first that it was an effort to set off a cause of action ex delicto against a cause of action ex contractu, which is not permissible in this state, and then that to allow the defendant to maintain this defense against the suit for freight charges would be in violation of the act of Congress of June 29, 1906, which provides: "No carrier shall refund or remit, in any manner or by any device, any portion of the rates, fares and charges so specified." The court sustained the general demurrer to the defendant's answer and struck the defense.

[1] The first question presented is one of local jurisprudence. It merely involves the question of whether a defendant, under the procedure in this state, can recoup damages to a shipment in an action brought by a carrier for the recovery of the freight charges. This question is determined by the Code of this state. Civil Code (1910) § 4350, provides: "Recoupment is a right of the defendant to have a deduction from the amount of the plaintiff's damages, for the reason that the plaintiff has not complied with the cross-obligation or independent covenants arising under the same contract." Section 4353 provides: "Recoupment may be pleaded in all actions ex contractu, where from any reason the plaintiff under the same contract is in good conscience liable to defendant. And in all cases where, under the laws of this state, recoupment may be pleaded, if the damages of the defendant shall exceed, in amount, those of the plaintiff, the defendant shall in such cases recover of the plaintiff the amount of such excess." Whether recoupment may be pleaded or not depends, not so much upon whether the defendant who seeks it asserts it as if it arose ex contractu or ex delicto, but upon whether, for any reason, the plaintiff in good conscience is liable to the defendant for the amount under the same contract. The plaintiff in this case sued to recover compensation for the services it had performed in the execution of its part of the contract, and the defendant seeks to recoup certain losses which he incurred by reason of the fact that there was a failure on the plaintiff's part to perform this contract as it should have been performed. Therefore the plea of recoupment was permissible, under the practice in this state.

[3] 2. The other point presents a federal question. Is there anything in the act of Congress, commonly known as the "Hepburn Act," which would prevent a court from allowing the defendant to take advantage of this right of recoupment as against the carrier's suit to recover charges upon a shipment? Under the act of Congress and the decisions that have been made in reference thereto relating to the carrier's charges for interstate shipments, it is now settled beyond controversy that no device or arrangement of any kind is permissible by which the carrier can accept anything but money in payment of freight charges, and that the sum so charged must be the published rate applicable to all persons alike and subject to no rebate for any cause whatever. The act of June 29, 1906, amending the previous law, prohibited the carrier from charging, collecting, or receiving from any person or persons, not only a "greater or less compensation" for any services to be rendered than is charged, collected, or received from all other persons for like services, but also from charging, collecting, or receiving "different compensation"; and to require one person to pay in money and to allow another person to pay in commodities or in promises, or in any other way than in money violates this prohibition. L. & N. R. Co., v. Mottley, 219 U. S. 487, 31 Sup. Ct. 265, 55 L. Ed. —; Chicago Ry. Co. v. United States, 219 U. S. 486, 31 Sup. Ct. 272, 55 L. Ed. —. The carrier cannot agree to collect less than the published rate from the shipper in consideration of a release of a claim for unliquidated damages arising out of other transactions. Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Goodridge, 149 U. S. 690, 13 Sup. Ct. 970, 37 L. Ed. 896. This much may be taken as established; and still, with this as one of the postulates of the proposition before us, we are of the opinion that the court has the right to allow the plea of recoupment, and to allow the defendant to avail himself of the defense, provided he makes proof of the facts at the trial. The established rates and charges are allowed and are payable as compensation for the performance of a contract of carriage executed according to its express and implied terms, and there is nothing in the letter or the spirit of the federal statute on the subject tending to defeat or diminish the carrier's liability for damages arising from its failure to perform its contract accordingly. The contract of the carrier is not merely for transportation, but for safe transportation, for the carrying of the goods without causing damage thereto, and even for the insuring of their safety to the extent of the recognized rule as to the liability of a common carrier as a quasi insurer of goods bailed to it for carriage. If the carrier has completed transportation and has collected the usual charges from the shipper, but has damaged the goods or has allowed them to become damaged by causes for which it is liable, the shipper has a right of action against the carrier for the damage, and these damages are payable in money, just as the carrier's claim for transportation charges is payable in money. The United States Supreme Court referred to this principle (that the carrier must pay as well as be paid only in money) in the Mottley Case, supra, saying, "The passenger has no right to buy tickets with services, advertising, releases, or property, nor can the railroad company buy services, advertising, releases, or property with transportation."

Here we have a case where the carrier did not receive cash for the transportation, and where it did not pay cash in settlement for the damages it had done to the shipment; and it brings its action against the shipper, asking the court to lend the aid of its processes for the collecting of the money due for the freight charges, and the defendant merely asks the court, while it has both parties thus before it, also to collect for him the money due by the carrier for its delinquency in executing the same contract. The amount due to the one party is liquidated, and the amount due to the other is unliquidated; but the court has the means and the power to liquidate the latter claim, and to place it upon the same footing as the former. The very object of allowing pleas of recoupment and set-off and all similar pleas is to prevent a multiplicity of suits, and to enable the court, when it has all the necessary parties before it, to adjudge all their respective rights, and to render a judgment which will finally end the controversies pending between them. Now, if the shipper had sued the carrier in a separate action and had recovered judgment, say for the $1,200 he alleged to be the amount of the damage done to the shipment, and the carrier had paid over to him twelve $100 bills, there would certainly be nothing in the spirit or the letter of the act of Congress to prevent the shipper from taking four of these bills and paying to the carrier its claim for the freight charges. The effect of the plea in the present case is simply a prayer on the defendant's part that he be allowed to consummate this same end through the offices of the court, which the plaintiff has first invoked. It is true that the court, in rendering its judgment, will dispense with the necessity of the plaintiff's paying over the full amount of the damages, and of requiring the defendant to hand back the amount due the plaintiff, and will strike a balance, and will merely render a judgment requiring the losing party to pay the difference; but it is not with mere incidentals such as these that the act of Congress deals, or which it was intended to prohibit. It is the substance of the thing at which the act of Congress aims, and the form which the transaction assumes is immaterial. No matter how plausible or ingenious may be the form of the transaction, if the spirit or the letter of the act is violated, the transaction is illegal. And, on the other hand, any form may be adopted which does not violate the letter or the spirit of the law; and for the court to proceed to adjust the respective rights of the parties in a transaction such as this is in no sense a device for the remitting or the refunding of any portion of the rates and charges with which the act of Congress deals. It is not a means by which a particular shipper can pay anywise differently from what other shippers may pay, for every shipper standing in a similar situation may pay the same way; that is to say, the rule which we are now announcing is that the damages due to the shipper may be recouped against a suit for the freight charges in any and all cases where the carrier sues for the freight, and it appears that the carrier did not perform shipment according to his contract, but damaged it in the course of the transportation. We think, therefore, that the court erred in striking the defense.

GARNISHMENT (§ 241*)—PROCEDURE—JUDGMENT AGAINST GARNISHEE.

A. sued B. in a justice's court on an account, and had process of garnishment issued and served. The garnishee answered, admitting indebtedness, and setting up that this indebtedness was exempt from process of garnishment, because it was an indebtedness for daily, weekly, and monthly wages. B. dissolved the garnishment by giving the statutory bond. Before obtaining a judgment against B., and without any traverse of the garnishee's answer, the justice rendered a judgment on the dissolution bond in favor of A. for the amount of the indebtedness admitted by the garnishee's answer. Held, that this judgment was erroneous, first, because there was no previous judgment entered against the main defendant; and, secondly, because there was no traverse of the garnishee's answer and no judgment rendered finding the property or funds in the hands of the garnishee subject to the garnishment. Civil Code 1910, §§ 5281, 5282, 5292; Smith v. Kennedy, 125 Ga. 880, 54 S. E. 731, and cases cited.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 29, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EXEMPTIONS (§ 84*)—PRIORITY—LIEN FOR SUPPLIES.

A mortgage lien given to a merchant for supplies, fertilizer, etc., to enable the mortgagor to make a crop, is not superior to the statutory exemption allowed under Civil Code 1910, § 8418, and the personal property so set apart as exempt is not subject to be seized and sold under an execution issued on a foreclosure of the mortgage.

2. REPLEVIN (§ 120*)—FORTHCOMING BOND—BREACH OF BOND.

Where a fi. fa., issued on a mortgage given for supplies furnished to the mortgagor, was levied on personal property, and subsequently the property was replevied and a forthcoming bond given, but before the sale day the property was set apart as a statutory exemption under Civil Code 1910, § 8418, the levying officer could not make a sale of the property, and there was no breach of the forthcoming bond by reason of a failure to produce the property on the day of sale.

Error from City Court of Cordele; E. F. Strozler, Judge.

Action by J. H. Jones, Deputy Sheriff, for use, etc., against Julia Spillers and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

In the year 1908 the Royal Supply Company furnished supplies, fertilizer, etc., to E. J. Spillers for the purpose of making his crop for that year, and he executed to the supply company a mortgage on his crop of cotton, corn, cane, potatoes, and peas, to secure this indebtedness. The mortgage recited that it was given for fertilizers and supplies to enable the mortgagor to make his crop for that year. The indebtedness for these supplies was not paid, and the Royal Supply Company foreclosed its mortgage and had an execution issued and levied on the mortgagor's crops, gathered and growing.

The wife of the mortgagor filed her claim to a portion of the property levied on, claiming that it was not subject to the fl. fa., for the reason that it was set apart as exempt from levy and sale in accordance with Civil Code 1895, § 2866 (Civil Code 1910, § 3416). She gave a forthcoming bond to the deputy sheriff. When the claim case was called for trial in the city court of Sylvester, the claim was withdrawn. The Royal Supply Company brought suit on the forthcoming bond, alleging that there had been a breach of the bond, for the reason that the property claimed had been disposed of by the claimant. Mrs. Spillers and her surety were both sued, and they filed an answer, in which they contended that there had been no breach of the bond, for the reason that the property was not subject to levy and sale, because it had been set aside as exempt in accordance with the Code section cited above. On the trial of this case the plaintiff proved its allegations, and proved the value of the property set out in the forthcoming bond. In fact, these allegations were not disputed; but in support of their plea the defendants offered in evidence a properly exemplified copy of the homestead exemption granted by the ordinary. On objection this evidence was excluded by the court, and the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendants duly made a motion for a new trial on the general grounds, and on the special ground that the court erred in excluding the documentary evidence of the homestead exemption. The trial judge granted the motion, on two specific and controlling grounds: (1) That it was erroneous to exclude the exemption papers, for the reason that there could be no breach of the defendant's bond, inasmuch as the property had been set aside as exempt from levy and sale; and (2) that the mortgage lien on the crop, even though for supplies furnished to make the crop, unless the supplies were furnished by the landlord, was inferior to an exemption of personalty set aside in accordance with section 2866 of the Civil Code of 1895. Exceptions to the grant of a new trial on these two specific grounds were duly made, and the case is brought here for review.

J. T. Hill and J. W. Dennard, for plaintiff in error. Pearson Ellis, for defendants in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The one controlling question raised by the record is whether a mortgage lien on crops, given for supplies furnished to the mortgagor to make the crops, the mortgagee not being the landlord, is superior to an exemption of personalty (or "short homestead") set aside in accordance with section 2866 of the Civil Code of 1895 (Civil Code of 1910, § 3416). This section provides that the property so set apart "shall be exempt from levy and sale by virtue of any process whatever under the laws of this state." The act of 1874 (Acts 1874, p. 19), codified in section 2873 of the Civil Code of 1895 (Civil Code 1910, § 3423), provides that property exempted from levy and sale as provided for in section 2866, supra, "shall not be exempt from levy and sale for the purchase money, or state and county or municipal taxes"; and it is insisted by the plaintiff in error that, under former rulings of the Supreme Court, supplies furnished to make the crops are in the nature of purchase money. He relies upon the case of Tift v. Newsom, 44 Ga. 600, in which it was held that "where a factor makes advances to a planter and takes a lien upon the growing crops, under the Revised Code [1873] § 1977 [section 1978], such advances are in the nature of purchase money, and the lien is therefore superior to the wife's title, where the crop was set apart to her as personalty under the homestead laws, after it was made"; and it is insisted that this decision has never been overruled.

The Code section referred to therein was taken from the act of 1873 (Acts 1873, p. 43), which provides that "landlords * * * and all other persons furnishing supplies, money, farming utensils, or other articles of necessity to make crops, and also all persons furnishing clothing and medicines, supplies, or provisions for the support of families," etc., "shall have the same right to secure themselves from the crops of the year in which such things are done or furnished, upon such terms as may be agreed upon by the parties," etc. By the act of 1874 (Acts 1874, p. 18), the act of 1873, except in so far as it referred to landlords, was repealed, and section 1978 of the Code of 1873, as thus changed, appears in the Code of 1895, as section 2800, and section 2800 by its terms restricts the right of a lien for supplies furnished by landlord to tenant; and this is the law as it now stands. Civil Code 1910, § 3348. In Watson v. Williams, 110 Ga. 321, 35 S. E. 344, it is held that "personalty set apart as exempt under section 2866 of the Civil Code [1895] is not subject to levy and sale except for 'the purchase money' and taxes"; and in that case it was also held that "farm products so set apart are not subject to be seized under an execution issued on the foreclosure of a laborer's lien, notwithstanding it be shown that the amount due the laborer was for work done in making the products which were set apart as exempt." And in Willcox v. Cowart, 110 Ga. 320, 35 S. E. 283, it is held that property exempted under section 2866 of the Civil Code of 1895 is not subject to a debt for fertilizers used thereon.

[2] We deduce from these authorities and the Code sections cited that, under the law as it now exists in the state, no one but a landlord has a statutory lien for supplies furnished which is superior to that of the statutory or what is commonly known as the "pony" exemption, or any of the exemptions not waived or not subject to waiver. The decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Chalker v. Thompson, 72 Ga. 478, is really controlling on the question raised in this case. In that case the Supreme Court held that where a fi. fa. was levied on property, and the defendant in fi. fa. replevied the property and gave a forthcoming bond therefor, but before the day of sale had it exempted to him as the head of a family, the levying officer could not make a sale of the property, and there was no breach of the forthcoming bond by reason of the failure to produce the property on the day of sale. We therefore conclude that the trial court was right in granting a new trial on both of the specific grounds mentioned. The documentary evidence showing that the property levied upon, which was claimed by the wife and for which she gave a forthcoming bond, had been duly set apart as a homestead under section 2866 of the Civil Code of 1895, was admissible for the purpose of showing that there was no breach of the forthcoming bond, and also for the purpose of showing that the property so exempt and set apart was not subject to the execution issued on the mortgage foreclosure.

Judgment affirmed.

CAVANAUGH v. BIGGIN. (No. 2,982.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 29, 1911.)

1. NEGLIGENCE (§ 119*)—PLEADING—EVIDENCE.

Where three separate and distinct acts of negligence are relied upon for a recovery, it is not necessary to a recovery that proof should be made of each and all, if the defendant's liability to respond in damages would be shown by establishing the commission of one or more of them; and in such a case it was not error for the trial judge to instruct the jury that if the plaintiff proved the negligence of the defendant in one or more of the ways stated in his petition, and such act was the proximate cause of the injury, the plaintiff could recover. Savannah Ry. Co. v. Evans, 121 Ga. 392 (5), 49 S. E. 308.

2. TRIAL (§ 255*)—INSTRUCTIONS—NECESSITY OF REQUESTS—COMPARATIVE NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a suit to recover damages for personal injuries, where the plaintiff contends, and the evidence introduced in his behalf supports his contention, that he is entitled to recover full damages, as being entirely without fault, and the defendant, on the contrary, insists that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover damages at all, because the defendant was without fault, and the injuries complained of were due entirely to the negligence of the plaintiff, and the evidence introduced in behalf of the defendant tends to establish this theory, the law of comparative negligence or diminution of damages is not necessarily applicable, and there was no error in the failure of the court to submit to the jury the law relating to this subject, in the absence of any request. Hill v. Callahan, 82

Ga. 109 (2), 8 S. E. 780; Southern Ry. Co. v. Hooper, 110 Ga. 779 (2), 36 S. E. 232.

3. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REPETITION.

The pertinent written requests to charge were substantially covered by the general charge, and the charge as a whole was a full, clear, and correct presentation of the law applicable to every issue made by the pleadings and the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 651; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

4. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

The controlling issues in the case were questions of fact. The evidence in behalf of the plaintiff entitled him to recover, and the damages awarded by the jury were fair and reasonable, and no reason whatever appears for granting another trial.

STATE v. BAZEN.

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 140*)—DISQUALIFICATION OF GRAND JURORS—EVIDENCE.

A motion to quash an indictment on the ground that the foreman of the grand jury was disqualified under Const. art. 22, § 5, prescribing the qualifications of grand jurors, is properly denied, in the absence of proof of the disqualification.

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 10*)—DISQUALIFICATION OF GRAND JURORS.

The disqualification of a single grand juror does not invalidate an indictment, unless the grand jury was composed of only 12 men.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 761*)—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

A charge assuming facts proved by the undisputed evidence and the reasonable inferences deducible therefrom, and applying the law thereto, is not a charge on the facts.

Hydrick, J., dissenting.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Florence County; Ernest Gary, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

R. L. Bazen was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed. A motion to quash the indictment on the ground that the foreman of the grand jury was over the age of 65 years, and therefore disqualified from sitting as a juror, by Const. art. 22, § 5, was overruled.

J. W. Ragsdale and Le Roy Lee, for appellant. W. H. Wells, Sol., for the State.

JONES, C. J. The exceptions should be overruled, and the judgment affirmed.

There was no error in refusing to quash the indictment.

[1] First. Because there is nothing in the record showing that proof was made of the alleged disqualification of the grand juror. State v. Brownfield, 60 S. C. 514, 39 S. E. 2.

[2] Second. Because the disqualification of a single grand juror will not invalidate an indictment, unless it appears that the grand jury was composed of only 12 men. It is not disputed that the grand jury was composed of 18, including the alleged disqualified juror. State v. Rafe, 58 S. C. 379, 34 S. E. 660; State v. Graham, 79 S. C. 116, 60 S. E. 431. There was no error in the charge considered as a whole and in the light of the undisputed facts.

[3] No testimony was offered for the defense, and the only reasonable inference from the state's testimony was that the insulting language was used by defendant to the deceased in an angry, hostile manner, and that such language did actually bring on the difficulty. Hence there was no error for the court to assume these circumstances and charge the law applicable. It is not a charge on facts to assume as established those facts which are the only inferences that can be drawn from the testimony.

Under no view of the law and the testimony could a verdict more favorable to defendant be properly rendered. Hence there should not be a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

GARY, A. J., and WOODS, J., concur.

HYDRICK, J. (dissenting). The defendant was tried for the murder of Lofton E. Poston, and was convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to three years at hard labor on the public works of the county or in the penitentiary.

The first ground of appeal alleges error in the refusal of the circuit court to quash the indictment on the ground that the foreman of the grand jury, which found the bill, was a disqualified juror, being above the age of 65 years. The record contains no other statement than that the motion was made on that ground before the petit jury was impaneled, and that it was refused. It was held in the case of State v. Rafe, 58 S. C. 382, 34 S. E. 660, that, before such an objection can avail appellant, he must make it appear that he was prejudiced by the fact that the juror was disqualified; and it is there said that if it appeared that every grand juror on the panel was disqualified, or that the bill was found by a grand jury composed of only 12 men, one of whom was disqualified, the court would necessarily conclude that the bill was not found by a legal grand jury. Upon the principle announced in State v. Rafe, the case of State v. Graham, 79 S. C. 116, 60 S. E. 431, was decided. I desire to express my dissatisfaction with the principle stated in those cases, because it requires an impossibility, since, on grounds of public policy, no inquiry into the proceedings of a grand jury is permissible. According to these cases, there might be six disqualified jurors on the panel, each of whom in fact argued and voted in favor of finding a true bill, while six of the qualified jurors argued and voted against such action; yet, as that fact could not be shown, and because there were 12 qualified jurors on the panel, the bill could not be successfully assailed. Without entering upon any elaboration of the reasons, it seems to me that those decisions practically annul a mandatory provision of the Constitution, to wit, section 22 of article 5, which says: "The grand jury of each county shall consist of eighteen members, twelve of whom must agree in a matter before it can be submitted to the court. * * * Each juror must be a qualified elector under the provisions of this Constitution, between the ages of twenty-one and sixty-five years and of good moral character."

It appears from the testimony that what is called a "box party" was given at a neighborhood schoolhouse one night in January, 1910. The teacher, Miss Godwin, requested deceased to take charge of affairs, keep order, and attend to the finances. A cake was offered for sale to the highest bidder, and it was knocked down to the defendant, who, for some reason, not clearly stated in the testimony, refused to take it and pay for it. Deceased insisted on his paying for it, and suggested that, if he did not have the money, he could borrow it from some of his friends. During the colloquy defendant became angry and began to curse, and called deceased a "God damn son of a bitch," and asked him to go out to the road with him and settle it. The teacher went to defendant and requested him to leave. He said he would leave, but he was not done with it, as he had not been treated fairly. Deceased went out either with him or about the same time, and hot words were passed between them on the outside; the defendant again calling deceased a "God damn son of a bitch." A friend of deceased's interfered and induced him to go back into the house, where he remained some 20 or 25 minutes, and appeared to one of the witnesses to be in a normal frame of mind, and not to be very angry with defendant, so that the witness thought the difficulty was over with, and there would be no further trouble. After remaining in the house some 20 or 25 minutes, deceased again went out in company with two friends. At this point—when deceased went out the second time—the testimony is not entirely clear upon the question whether the defendant immediately and again called deceased a son of a bitch, or referred to him as such, before anything was said by Arthur Poston, who was with deceased, or by the deceased himself, or whether Arthur Poston or the deceased first referred to the previous application of the epithet to deceased. Upon that point Arthur Poston testified that as deceased went out defendant said: "There comes the God damn son of a bitch I want to see." Deceased said: "Where is the man and who is the man that cursed me for a son of a bitch?" Defendant said: "Here he is. I am the man that cursed you for a son of a bitch." Thereupon they ran together, and, after passing a few blows, deceased ran into the house where it was found that he had received a stab in the neck of which he died in a few minutes. D. D. Prosser testified that, when deceased and Arthur Poston went out, Arthur Poston said: "Lofton, some one in this crowd (referring to a crowd standing on the outside) cursed you." Deceased said: "What one in this crowd cursed me?" Defendant stepped out of the crowd and said: "I am the man that done it." Still another witness, McIver Poston, testified that deceased said, when he came out: "Where is the man that cursed me for a son of a bitch?" That defendant replied: "I am the man that cursed you for a son of a bitch." This witness said, also, that defendant said nothing until deceased asked the question. Defendant offered no testimony, but relied on the plea of self-defense. Upon the law of that defense the court charged, in part, as follows: "The law will not permit one citizen to say to another, 'You are a damn son of a bitch,' and, if he resents it, to strike him to his death. The law will not permit him to say he killed him in self-defense, because the law says you did that which was reasonably calculated to provoke a difficulty, and the law is that where one does an act which is calculated to bring on an encounter, or bring on a difficulty, and he killed under those circumstances, the law will not allow him to shield the killing under the plea of self-defense on the wholesome principle that he was not without fault." The appellant contends that the charge above quoted was not only a charge upon the facts, but, also, that it was erroneous in failing to charge that opprobrious language used by one to another will not deprive the party using it of the right of self-defense, unless it is not only such that a reasonable person would expect it to provoke a difficulty, but also that it actually did contribute to bringing on the difficulty.

The provision of the Constitution prohibiting judges from charging juries in respect to matters of fact has been so frequently and so fully construed and explained that the question here presented requires only the application of settled principles. One of these is that a judge must not, directly or indirectly, give the jury any intimation of his opinion on any material fact in issue. State v. Addy, 28 S. C. 14, 4 S. E. 814; State v. Johnson, 85 S. C. 285, 67 S. E. 453, and cases cited. In the language quoted the judge plainly told the jury that, if one man calls another a damn son of a bitch, he does that which is reasonably calculated to provoke a difficulty, and deprives himself of the right of self-defense. This was error, for in so charging the judge decided for the jury a material issue of fact. The court should not have said as matter of law that the application of that epithet by one to another would under all circumstances be reasonably expected to provoke a difficulty. Whether it would or not would depend upon a variety of circumstances—such as the relation of the parties, the time and place and manner, including the tone of voice and expression of countenance. The court recognized this principle in State v. Rowell, 75 S. C. 510, 56 S. E. 23, when it said as to language used by defendant: "The defendant's testimony as to the language used by him, and his manner in using it, made an issue of fact as to whether he had just reason to suppose his language to the deceased would probably result in a personal difficulty." Whatever we may say or think of the impropriety of persons using such harsh and ordinarily offensive epithets toward each other, it is, nevertheless, true that they sometimes do it in jest, when no offense is meant or taken. Moreover, the question whether the use of that epithet did or did not actually provoke the fatal encounter was one of fact, which should have been, but was not, submitted to the jury. The fact is that it was used several times during the first altercation of words without provoking a personal encounter. There was therefore ground for reasonable difference of opinion as to whether it did, in fact, provoke the fatal encounter; and, if so, whether that encounter was immediately brought on by the defendant again applying the epithet to deceased, when he came out of the schoolhouse the second time, or by Arthur Poston's calling deceased's attention to the fact that defendant had, either then or previously, applied the epithet to him, or by the deceased himself recurring to the previous use of the epithet; and, if the last, whether from the time that had elapsed deceased was not at fault in renewing the difficulty, for surely the law would not allow him to wreak vengeance upon defendant for the previous insult after the lapse of sufficient time for him to cool.

The charge complained of was also erroneous, in that it failed to instruct the jury that to deprive one of the right of self-defense opprobrious language used must, besides being such as should reasonably be expected to provoke a difficulty, actually have contributed toward bringing on the difficulty; for obviously, no matter how offensive language may be, if it, in fact, does not bring on, or contribute to bringing on, the difficulty, it should not deprive him who uses it of his right of self-defense. In State v. Rowell, supra, the court stated the true rule to be "that the plea of self-defense is not available to one who uses language so opprobrious that a reasonable man would expect it to bring on a physical encounter, and which did actually contribute to bringing it on."

OWEN et al. v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 966*)—REVIEW—DISCRETION OF COURT—CONTINUANCE.

The discretion of the trial court in ruling on a motion for continuance will not be disturbed on appeal, in the absence of abuse.

2. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 73*)—OPERATION—DELAY IN DELIVERING MESSAGE—ACTION.

In an action for delay in the delivery of a telegram, where there was testimony tending to show that the delay was unreasonable, a motion to direct a verdict on the ground that there was no testimony tending to show negligence was properly denied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 76; Dec. Dig. § 73.*]

3. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 73*)—OPERATION—DELAY IN DELIVERING MESSAGE—ACTION.

In an action for delay in the delivery of a telegram, where the complaint alleged negligence and willfulness on the part of the defendant, a motion to direct a verdict was properly denied where there was evidence of negligence even if there was no evidence of willfulness.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Hampton County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by Katie L. Owen and husband against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. H. Fearons, Warren & Warren, and Nelson, Nelson & Gettys, for appellant. W. S. Tillinghast and W. B. De Loach, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiffs through the wrongful acts of the defendant in failing to deliver a telegram within a reasonable time.

The allegations of the complaint material to the questions involved are as follows: That on the 15th of May, 1908, the plaintiffs' daughter Daisy became suddenly ill at Yemassee, their home. That the plaintiff Katie L. Owen was at that time on a visit to relatives in Savannah, Ga. That about 8:30 o'clock a. m. the plaintiff delivered to the defendant for transmission the following message: "Yemassee, S. C. May 15th, 1908. To Eugene Owen, No. 603, 39th Street, West, Savannah, Ga. Tell mother to come home this evening. Daisy not well." That about 2 o'clock p. m. on that day the defendant's agent at Yemassee called on the plaintiff A. E. Owen and informed him that the message had not been delivered, as there was no such number and street in the city of Savannah; but, upon inquiry, it was discovered that the defendant had negligently, recklessly, and willfully changed part of the address by substituting the word "East" for the word "West," so that it then read: "No. 603, 39th street, East, Savannah, Ga." That, although the daughter was very ill, the telegram was mildly worded for fear of shocking her mother, but that the agent at Yemassee was informed of her serious illness. That, if the message had been delivered promptly, the plaintiff Katie L. Owen could have reached the bedside of her daughter at a much earlier hour than she did. The defendant denied the allegations of negligence, recklessness, and willfulness. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for $500, and the defendant appealed upon exceptions which will be reported.

[1] First Exception. This exception assigns error on the part of his honor, the presiding judge, in refusing the defendant's motion for a continuance. Such motions are addressed to the discretion of the presiding judge, and his ruling is not subject to appeal, unless there has been an abuse of discretion, which has not been made to appear in this case.

[2] Second Exception. This exception raises the question whether there was error in refusing the defendant's motion to direct a verdict on the ground that there was no testimony tending to show negligence on the part of the defendant. The appellant's attorneys have not argued this exception; but, waiving such objection, it cannot be sustained, as the testimony tends to show that the delay was unreasonable.

[3] Third Exception. This exception assigns error in refusing to direct a verdict as to the cause of action for punitive damages.

At the close of all the testimony, one of the defendants' attorneys in making the motion for the direction of a verdict stated that it was made on the following grounds: "We have no further testimony to offer, and for the purpose of putting myself straight on the record I move that the court direct a verdict in this case, and my ground is * * * that here is evidence of diligence on the part of the company, uncontradicted evidence. * * * Now, the circumstances point clearly to the fact that the company made an effort to deliver, and that they made a failure, and that there was a mistake, and they immediately took it up and straightened up things. We submit that, if there was evidence of an effort to deliver, there could not be any willfulness or wantonness on the part of the defendant company, that being uncontradicted, and, taking the circumstances and the facts, it strikes me that it only becomes a question of law for the court to determine, and not a question for the jury. For that reason, we ask the court to direct a verdict for the defendant." In ruling upon the motion, his honor, the presiding judge, said: "Well, it appears to me that the case will have to go to the jury. The law is that unreasonable delay in delivering the telegram raises a presumption of negligence. Now, as to whether or not that unreasonable delay was not only negligence, but caused by willfulness and wantonness, the burden of proving which is up to the plaintiff, is a question for the jury in this particular case." The motion was for the direction of a verdict generally, and his honor, the circuit judge, so understood it. In the case of Machen v. Telegraph Co., 72 S. C. 256, 51 S. E. 697, the rule as to nonsuits is thus stated: "The cases are numerous to the point that where the complaint alleges damages as the result of negligence, and as the result of willful misconduct, a nonsuit cannot be granted, as to the whole case, if there be any testimony tending to show damages, as the result of either negligence or willfulness. * * * In all the cases cited above the motion for nonsuit was directed to the whole case, and the point decided was that nonsuit was improper, if there be any evidence tending to support a verdict for damages, either for negligence or willful misconduct." This language is quoted with approval in the case of Carter v. Telegraph Co., 73 S. C. 430, 53 S. E. 539. Under these authorities we are constrained to rule that the motion for nonsuit was properly refused.

[4] Fourth Exception. This assignment of error is based upon the proposition that punitive damages are not recoverable, if there is undisputed evidence of an effort to deliver a telegram. It is only necessary to say that time and the degree of diligence used in the efforts to deliver the message must be taken into consideration in determining this question. It would therefore have been error for the circuit judge to have charged the request without modification.

[5] Fifth Exception. This exception raises the question whether the presiding judge erred in refusing to charge that the delivery of the message to the butler at the house in which the addressee of the telegram was residing was a good delivery. This exception must be overruled for the reason that the presiding judge could not have charged as requested without invading the province of the jury.

Sixth Exception. This exception presents practically the same question as is raised by the fifth exception, and is therefore overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

T. P. SIMS & SONS v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

1. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 70*)—OPERATION—TRANSMISSION OF MESSAGES—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Where a telegram as delivered offered flour at $5 per barrel, and the recipient sold a portion of the flour in advance on the basis of that price, and accepted the offer, but the telegram as sent was an offer at $5.50 per barrel, and the market value of the flour, which the addressee was compelled to buy to fulfill his contract of sale, was at least $5.50, the recipient is entitled to the difference between the price stated in the telegram as delivered and that stated in the telegram as sent.

2. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 67*)—COMPENSATORY DAMAGES—SPECULATIVE DAMAGES.

Where the recipient of a telegram sold flour on the basis of the price named therein as delivered to him, and was required to pay for the flour a higher price named in the telegram as delivered to the telegraph company, his damages were not speculative so as to preclude recovery from the telegraph company.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; Robt. Aldrich, Judge. Action by T. P. Sims & Sons against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

John Gary Evans and C. C. Wyche, for appellant. J. B. Atkinson, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This action was commenced before a magistrate, and is for damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiffs, through the negligence of the defendant, in erroneously transmitting a telegram.

The allegations of the complaint, material to the questions presented by the exceptions, are as follows: "That on August 3, 1909, there was delivered to the said defendant, by the El Reno Mill & Elevator Company, for speedy transmission and delivery at Spartanburg to the said plaintiffs, the following paid message: 'T. P. Sims & Sons, Spartanburg, S. C. Offer car best five fifty basis cotton delivered Spartanburg prompt shipment. El Reno M. & E. Co.' That the defendant had notice of the meaning of said message, and its importance, and that a mistake in transmission and delivery would probably result in loss to plaintiffs, if said offer contained therein was accepted. That the said message, as delivered by defendant to plaintiffs, did not contain the word 'fifty,' which meant 50 cents on each barrel of flour, and plaintiffs were led to believe that they were getting an offer of flour at $5 a barrel. That the plaintiffs accepted the said offer contained in said message as delivered, ordering 150 barrels, and immediately resold the said flour, upon a $5 basis. That by reason of the negligence, carelessness, and gross inattention of duty of defendant, the said plaintiff was compelled to pay $75 more than he was led to believe he would, by reason of his acceptance of the offer as delivered as aforesaid."

The defendant denied each and every allegation of the complaint. At the close of the plaintiffs' testimony, the defendant's attorneys made a motion for a nonsuit, which was refused. The defendant did not introduce any testimony. The jury, in the magistrate's court, rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for $75, and the defendant appealed to the circuit court, but the appeal was dismissed. The defendant then appealed to the Supreme Court on exceptions, which will be reported.

[1] We will consider exceptions, 1, 2, 5, 6, and 7 together; as the appellant's attorneys in their printed argument state that they raise practically the same question, to wit, whether there was any testimony tending to show that the plaintiffs have been damaged by the error in transmitting the message. The testimony tends to show the following facts: On the 3d of August, 1909, the El Reno Mill & Elevator Company delivered to the defendant for transmission the following telegram addressed to the plaintiffs: "Offer car best five fifty basis cotton delivered Spartanburg prompt shipment." When this telegram was delivered to the plaintiffs, it did not contain the word "fifty," and when the plaintiffs replied by telegram, they supposed they were accepting an offer of the car load of flour, at five dollars per barrel; and, immediately resold it at the price of $5.50 per barrel. On the 5th of August, 1909, the plaintiffs received another telegram from the El Reno Mill & Elevator Company, notifying them that the offer was to sell the flour at $5.50, and not $5, per barrel.

In his testimony, T. P. Sims, one of the plaintiffs, said, "I sold 150 barrels of the flour. I got $5.50 per barrel. The flour was not shipped at $5 a barrel. I sold the flour on the basis of the first telegram. It is my custom to sell flour for future delivery, both before and after ordering it. In consequence of the telegram omission, I had to pay $5.90 per barrel for the 150 barrels sold. I sold the flour the same day I ordered it. I sold the flour to my son B. A. Sims, on the 3d or 4th of August. He lives with me. The flour was not shipped, they stating that the telegraph company made a mistake. I get all my prices by wire and sell by wire." The record contains this statement: "The plaintiff remits all amounts he lost over $75—the amount sued for."

As there was testimony tending to show that the plaintiffs entered into a contract with B. A. Sims, for the sale of the flour, at the price of $5.50 per barrel, before they had notice that there was a mistake in the transmission of the message, also that the market value of the flour which they were compelled to buy, in order to fulfill their contract with B. A. Sims, was at least $5.50 per barrel, it is only necessary to cite the cases of Bowie v. Tel. Co., 78 S. C. 424, 59 S. E. 65, and Eureka Cotton Mills v. Tel. Co., 88 S. C. 498, 70 S. E. 1040, to show that the defendant was liable for the difference between $5, the price per barrel stated in the telegram delivered to the plaintiffs, and $5.50, the price per barrel stated in the telegram delivered by the El Reno Mill & Elevator Company, to the defendant for transmission. These exceptions are therefore overruled.

[2] The only other proposition argued by the appellant's attorneys is that, if there were damages, they were merely speculative, and not recoverable, as the defendant did not have notice of them, when the message was delivered for transmission. The cases just cited show that the exceptions assigning error in this respect cannot be sustained. Appeal dismissed.

HORKAN v. CITY OF MOULTRIE et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 232*)—CONTRACTS—VALIDITY.

A council of a municipality cannot make a binding contract by which it undertakes to obligate the municipality to furnish "free of charge," for an indefinite time in the future, sufficient water for the closets in a given building situated within the corporate limits, in consideration of the owner of the building allowing the municipality to lay its sewers through his land.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 248*)—CONTRACTS—ESTOPPEL TO DENY VALIDITY.

Such a contract, being ultra vires and void, could not be ratified by the continued use, under the contract, of the sewer through the land by the municipality; nor would the benefit thereby received estop it from subsequently setting up the invalidity of the contract.

Error from Superior Court, Colquitt County; R. G. Mitchell, Judge.

Action by G. A. Horkan against the City of Moultrie and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Shipp & Kline, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Wilkes, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. Horkan, in his petition against the city of Moultrie, alleged in substance as follows: In 1907 he was the owner of described strips of land situated within the corporate limits of the defendant city. During that year, and while he was the owner of such land, he agreed to allow the city "to put its sewers along and across said land, * * * in consideration of which the said city of Moultrie agreed to furnish to this petitioner, free of charge, sufficient water and sewer service for the purpose of water-closets in petitioner's building immediately west of said strip of land." In consideration of this contract the city laid its sewers through the land. Petitioner, relying on the contract, put closets in the building. The city used the sewers so laid continuously from 1907, and is now using the same. The city has recently presented to petitioner a bill aggregating a named amount for the water used in the closets for the months of October and November, 1909, and has notified petitioner that, unless the amount of the bill shall be paid at once, the water will be cut off from the closets. Petitioner alleged "that he and his property will be irreparably damaged if said contract is violated," and that the city will violate the contract, unless restrained from so doing by the court. The prayer was for injunction requiring the city and its officers "to desist from cutting off the water in said building." The petition was dismissed on general demurrer, and the petitioner excepted.

[1] 1. One of the grounds urged by counsel for the defendant in error, in support of the judgment of the trial judge in sustaining the general demurrer to the petition, was that the contract set forth in the petition was void, for the reason there was no limitation fixed as to the time of its continuance. In our opinion this point was well taken. There has been, before various courts, the question of the legal power of a municipal corporation to make a contract or to grant a license extending over a period beyond the official term of the body granting the privilege or the license. The decisions on the question are not uniform. All legislative bodies are limited in their legal capacity in such a manner as not to deprive succeeding bodies of the right to deal with matters involving the same questions as they may arise from time to time in the future, and as the then present exigencies may require. The weight of authority sustains the doctrine that a municipal corporation may make a valid contract to continue for a reasonable time beyond the official term of the officers entering into the contract for the municipality. 3 Abbott's Municipal Corporations, § 904. We have found no case, however, that would tend to support a contract made by a city council in behalf of the municipality to furnish water indefinitely to one of its citizens, in consideration of his permitting it to lay a sewer through his land. Succeeding councils would necessarily have the power, we think, to change the water rates from time to time as circumstances might require or justify, in order to obtain sufficient revenue to maintain its waterworks system on the one hand, and, on the other, in order to serve all its patrons at reasonable rates and on equal terms. To allow one council to legally bind the city by a contract of the kind here in question might so tie the hands of its successors as to result in great injury to the municipality and to the public. Trustees v. City of Jacksonville, 61 Ill. App. 190. In the case just cited it was held that a city could not bind itself by contract to furnish water for a period of years at a fixed rate. "Powers are conferred upon municipal corporations for public purposes; and as their legislative powers cannot * * * be delegated, so they cannot be bargained or bartered away. Such corporations may make authorized contracts; but they have no power, as a party, to make contracts or pass by-laws which shall cede away, control, or embarrass their legislative or governmental powers, or which shall disable them from performing their public duties." 1 Dillon's Municipal Corporations (4th Ed.) § 97. Our Civil Code of 1910 (section 892) declares that "one coun-city cannot by an ordinance bind itself or its successors so as to prevent free legislation in matters of municipal government." If this could not be done by an ordinance, of course it could not be done by a contract. Power in a municipality of making and changing, by ordinance, water rates from time to time, whenever necessary to protect the city in its revenues and to enable it to furnish to all on equal terms and at reasonable rates, is a legislative or governmental power, and therefore cannot be legally bargained or bartered away by one council, so as to forever deprive succeeding councils of the right to exercise it. See Tarver v. Mayor, etc., of Dalton, 134 Ga. 462, 67 S. E. 929, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 183.

[2] The fact that the city has continuously since the execution of the contract, and solely by reason thereof, used the sewer laid through the land of the defendant in error, and is now deriving a benefit under the contract by the use of the sewer, will not amount to a ratification of the contract, or an estoppel upon the city so as to prevent it from contending that the contract was void. Town of Wadley v. Lancaster, 124 Ga. 354, 52 S. E. 335.

PUBLIC LANDS (§ 148*)—SURVEYS.

The court did not err in granting a nonsuit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Dec. Dig. § 148.*]

Error from Superior Court, Camden County; C. B. Conyers, Judge.

Application by H. M. Roberts for a warrant to survey vacant land, opposed by the Hilton & Dodge Lumber Company. Judgment of nonsuit was entered for the Lumber Company, and Roberts brings error. Affirmed.

J. L. Sweat, for plaintiff in error. Crovatt & Whitfield, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. H. M. Roberts made application to the ordinary of Camden county for a warrant to survey a certain tract of land, alleged to be vacant and subject to grant under the headright laws. The Hilton & Dodge Lumber Company caveated the application, and for cause of caveat averred that it was the true and lawful owner of the land, and that the land was not vacant and subject to be granted to applicant under the headright laws. On the trial of the caveat in the superior court, the plaintiff was nonsuited, and he excepts.

In certain parts of the state grants of land by the state were issued under what is known as the "headright system." Each head of a family entitled to a grant of land, preliminary to procuring its issuance by the Governor, was required to make an application for a warrant to survey the land alleged to be vacant and subject to grant under headright to the land court (finally devolved upon the ordinary) of the county where the land was located, who issued a warrant of survey to the county surveyor. This application was subject to caveat by a claimant of the land. All caveats were entered in the office of the county surveyor (later filed with the ordinary), and were returned by that official to the superior court, where the case was tried in the same manner as is usual in all cases for the trial of titles to land. Roberts v. Palmer, 14 Ga. 349; Civil Code 1895, §§ 3223-3236. It was necessary that the application and warrant should so describe the land as to identify it, and enable the surveyor, from the description given in the warrant, to enter upon the particular lands to be surveyed. Miller v. Woodard, 29 Ga. 753. Unless particularity in description were observed, great confusion in the issuance of grants would result. If no caveat was filed, the grant was issued by the Governor as a matter of course. The proceedings in the land court were recorded in that court, and the grant was recorded in the office of the Secretary of State. The purpose of the law was that only one grant should issue to the same tract of land, and consultation of these records to a large extent prevented duplicate grants. In the trial of a caveat to the issuance of a warrant, the applicant held the affirmative of the issue, inasmuch as such issues were tried under the rules pertaining to the trial of title to land. So, when the caveator denied that the land was vacant and that it was subject to grant under headright, the burden was on the applicant to establish these two essentials to his right to a warrant.

The applicant testified to the effect that the land was vacant and had never been occupied; that he lived within a mile and a half of the tract of land for which he sought a warrant to survey, and that he was familiar with the lines of the adjacent landowners; that the tract contained 400 acres, bounded as described in his application, and composed mostly of swamp land; that he had never examined the grant records in the office of the Secretary of State at Atlanta, nor the records in the ordinary's office of Camden county, but that he had examined copies, from the office of the Secretary of State, of grants to different landowners around the alleged vacant land; that according to the records and papers produced by the agent of the caveator the land was granted neither to the Hilton & Dodge Lumber Company nor to the Hilton & Dodge Timber Company. The applicant's testimony, which was the only evidence submitted, was insufficient to make a prima facie case that the land had not been previously granted by the state.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MORTGAGES (§ 535*)—FORECLOSURE—SALE—EFFECT OF LIEN.

An owner of realty, after conveying the same to secure a debt, contracted for improvements on the property with one who, before making the contract and before making improvements thereunder, knew that proceedings were pending in the federal court to have the property sold under the security deed; and the improvements were completed before the sale under these proceedings. The one making the improvements did not intervene in the foreclosure proceedings, nor claim any of the proceeds arising from the sale, but filed his claim of lien within three months after completing the improvements. At the judicial sale under the foreclosure proceedings, the holder of the debt secured by the deed, and for whose benefit the proceedings were had, purchased the property. Held, the judicial sale divested the property from the lien for improvements, and the purchaser thereat obtained title to the property freed from such lien. Civil Code 1910, § 3365; De Give v. Meador, 51 Ga. 160; Loudon v. Coleman, 59 Ga. 653.

2. MORTGAGES (§ 535*)—FORECLOSURE—SALE—RIGHTS OF CONTRACTOR FOR IMPROVEMENTS.

The one making the improvements could not, after such sale, foreclose his alleged lien against the property, nor obtain against the purchaser a judgment for the contract price or value of the improvements, though the purchaser knew, when he purchased the property, that the owner had contracted for the making of the improvements, and gave his assent to the owner making such contract when made. Durham v. Mayo, 32 Ga. 192.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Dec. Dig. § 535.*]

3. REVIEW OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence was insufficient to authorize a finding that the purchaser at the judicial sale had at any time agreed to be liable for the contract price or value of the improvements, or had in any way become legally liable to pay therefor.

PLEADING (§ 248*)—PETITION—AMENDMENT—NATURE OF CAUSE OF ACTION STATED.

A petition in an action based on promissory notes given by the defendant to the plaintiff is not amendable by adding thereto an action ex delicto, on the ground that the defendant has fraudulently converted to his own use collateral notes belonging to the plaintiff, and has refused to pay over the same on demand.

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County; S. P. Gilbert, Judge.

Action by the Columbus Iron Works Company against J. E. Sharpe. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

The substance of the petition was as follows: The defendant is indebted to the plaintiff in a given amount on certain promissory notes made by the defendant and payable to the order of the plaintiff. A copy of one of the notes is attached to the petition, and the other notes are similar, except as to dates and amounts, which are set forth. The defendant delivered to the plaintiff, as collateral security for such notes, the notes of other parties, payable to defendant, which collateral the plaintiff delivered to the defendant upon his written agreement to collect the same and turn over the proceeds to plaintiff, at stated periods, to be applied to the principal indebtedness. The defendant executed to the plaintiff a chattel mortgage, as well as a mortgage on realty to secure the payment of the principal indebtedness. Defendant is insolvent. He has collected a large amount on the collateral notes, and has admitted that he has converted the same to his own use, except a given amount. He has removed the personalty, on which the mortgage was given, beyond the limits of the state, and by consent of the plaintiff has sold the same upon condition that he would pay over the proceeds on his indebtedness to the plaintiff, but has so paid only a part of such proceeds. The plaintiff has demanded of the defendant the proceeds of the collateral notes collected by him, and the delivery to the plaintiff of the collateral notes uncollected; but the defendant has refused to comply with such demands. The conduct of the defendant in appropriating the proceeds of the collateral notes to his own use and in refusing to turn over to the plaintiff the remaining collateral notes, and his conduct in disposing of the mortgaged personalty and converting the proceeds to his own use, and in refusing to turn same over to the plaintiff, constituted a fraud and wrong against the plaintiff. The prayers are for judgment for the balance due on the notes given by the defendant to the plaintiff, for injunction restraining the defendant from making any further collection on the collateral notes, for the appointment of a receiver, and for process. It does not affirmatively appear from the record that a receiver was appointed; but the record shows that the court approved the report of a receiver, and ordered that the proceeds of the sale of the property made by the receiver, less a given amount given him for his services, be credited on the notes given by the defendant to the plaintiff.

The defendant filed a plea to the effect that his petition in bankruptcy was pending, and that the debt, the foundation of plaintiff's action, was scheduled, the plaintiff named as one of his creditors, and that he was seeking a discharge from such debt. The plaintiff thereafter offered an amendment, setting forth the amount of the collateral security notes, and also setting forth the description of one of the tracts of lands which was mortgaged to secure the notes sued on, and amended the prayers of the petition, so as to ask for the foreclosure of the mortgage on realty as to the lot of land described, and for a sale of such land in order that the proceeds might be applied to the payment of the principal indebtedness due by the defendant, and that a decree be rendered declaring that the conversion of the collateral notes described in the original petition was a violation of the trust reposed in the defendant by the plaintiff, and a fraud upon him, and that plaintiff have a judgment or decree for the value of the same. The defendant demurred to the amendment and moved to strike the same, upon the ground, among others, that by the amendment the plaintiff sought to recover a verdict for the amount of the collections made by the defendant on the collateral notes and alleged to have been fraudulently converted by him to his own use, thus seeking to add a cause of action ex delicto to one arising ex contractu. The demurrer to the amendment was overruled, and the court refused to strike the same. The plaintiff introduced evidence showing the value of the collateral notes, the amount of the collections thereon which had been paid to the plaintiff, and showing the balance due on the notes executed by the defendant to the plaintiff. The defendant introduced no evidence. There was a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $8,545.55, which was the balance due on such last-mentioned notes, as shown by the evidence in behalf of the plaintiff. The jury further found: "We also find that the defendant did fraudulently convert to his own use the sum of $13,979.03." Judgment was entered, reciting the verdict, and directing that the plaintiff recover of the defendant $8,545.55 generally, that the mortgage on the described realty be foreclosed, and that the plaintiff recover of the defendant said sum, to be levied on the mortgaged premises. The defendant filed a bill of exceptions, assigning error upon the refusal of the court to sustain the demurrer to the amendment, and to strike the same, and upon the final judgment rendered by the court.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). In the view we take of the case it is necessary to pass upon but one of the points raised by the assignments of error. This point is: Did the court err in overruling the ground of the demurrer to the amendment, and of the motion to strike the same, that the amendment sought to add a cause of action ex delicto to one arising ex contractu? In our opinion the court did err in this respect. In the original petition the plaintiff sought to recover the balance due on certain promissory notes executed by the defendant and payable to the plaintiff's order. While it was alleged in the original petition that the defendant had delivered to the plaintiff, as collateral security for such notes, other notes payable to the defendant, which latter notes the plaintiff had redelivered to the defendant under an agreement that he was to collect the same and turn over the proceeds to the plaintiff, and that the defendant had made collections of such collateral notes and had refused upon demand to pay the same to the plaintiff, there was no prayer in the original petition for a recovery for the collections. Such allegations may have been pertinent in view of the prayers for injunction and a receiver, but they would not authorize an amendment to the petition praying for a recovery for the value of the collateral notes on the ground that they had been fraudulently converted by the defendant to his own use. The amendment set forth a cause of action essentially sounding in tort, that is, the fraudulent conversion by the defendant of collateral notes belonging to the plaintiff; and, of course, it needs no citation of authority to sustain the proposition that such a cause of action could not be joined in a case of this character in an action based on contract.

McCRAV v. HARRISON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 15, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 102*)—COMPUTATION OF LIMITATIONS—EXISTENCE OF TRUST.

Elizabeth McCray, as executrix of the will of Seleta L. Harrison, brought an action, returnable to the September term, 1909, of Hancock superior court, against Maggie L. Harrison, as administratrix of the estate of W. T. Harrison. The substance of the petition was as follows: The plaintiff's testatrix was a legatee under the will of her father, W. D. Harrison. W. T. Harrison, her brother, qualified and acted as sole executor of such will until January, 1900. Under a decree rendered in October, 1901, in two suits for an accounting and settlement, brought against W. T. Harrison, respectively, by two of the sisters of plaintiff's testatrix, in the superior court of Washington county, which were consolidated and tried together, it was in effect adjudged that such testatrix, as one of the five legatees under the will of her father, W. D. Harrison, was entitled to one-fifth of the proceeds of the sale of certain lands in Johnson county, which had been sold by W. T. Harrison by agreement of such legatees, and that W. T. Harrison had failed, on demand, to account to plaintiff's testatrix for her share in such proceeds. The petition alleged that the effect of such decree "was to wind up finally the affairs of the estate of W. D. Harrison; the only duty required of W. T. Harrison being the duty of turning over the proceeds of the sale of said Johnson county lands to each of the heirs at law, and this being a duty which he owed individually, he having held it up to then, claiming the right to hold the same under said will." The petition further set forth that W. T. Harrison, the defendant's intestate, was indebted to the plaintiff's testatrix a given sum as her portion of the rentals of the land belonging to the legatees of her father's estate for the years 1901 and 1902, together with her portion of the interest on such rentals from 1902. Held that, under the allegations of the petition, W. T. Harrison, the defendant's intestate, did not, after the decree against him in Washington superior court in his individual capacity, as shown by a copy of such decree attached as an exhibit to the petition, sustain a fiduciary relation towards the plaintiff's testatrix, and therefore the rule as to the limitation of actions in cases of subsisting trusts was not applicable, and under the ordinary statute of limitations, it not appearing that the case set forth fell within any of the exceptions thereto, the plaintiff's cause of action was barred, and the court did not err in sustaining a demurrer to the petition on that ground.

NEW TRIAL (§ 125*)—MOTION—STATEMENT OF GROUNDS.

The only assignment of error contained in the bill of exceptions is that the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial. The grounds of the original motion for a new trial were that the verdict was contrary to law and the evidence and without evidence to support it. The only ground of the amendment to the motion was that the verdict was contrary to a portion of the charge set out in the amendment, which ground, under many rulings of this court, amounted merely to the general ground that the verdict was contrary to law. The verdict was authorized by the evidence, and the court did not err in refusing to grant a new trial.

HILLYER v. ROBINSON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 23, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 87*)—RESCISSION—RETURN OF BENEFITS.

Where, in a controversy between the representative of the estate of a decedent and another, the latter admits that he is indebted to the estate, and the representative of the estate contends for a larger sum, and both parties, by way of compromise and settlement of their conflicting contentions, enter into an agreement for its effectuation, authority from the court of ordinary is sought and obtained, and the amount agreed upon is paid over to the representative of the said estate, the latter cannot subsequently, without paying back at least such an amount as was in excess of the admitted indebtedness, maintain a suit to recover from a party indebted to the estate another amount, which she insists represents the true amount of the indebtedness to the estate of her intestate, although such representative was induced to execute the compromise agreement by the fraudulent representations of the debtor as to the true amount of his indebtedness to the estate.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. Bell, Judge.

Action by Pauline E. Robinson against S. L. Hillyer. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Mrs. W. E. Robinson, administratrix of the estate of her deceased husband, W. E. Robinson, brought an equitable petition against Shaler L. Hillyer to recover a certain sum which she claimed as due by the defendant. Petitioner alleged that at the time of the death of her husband there were outstanding two policies of insurance on his life, aggregating the sum of $5,000; that prior to his death he had assigned these policies to the defendant in terms which authorized him to collect from the insurance company the full amount which might become due on the policies upon the death of Robinson, and out of the money so received to retain for his (defendant's) own use the amount of any indebtedness of Robinson to the defendant, and to pay over the balance to the beneficiary named in the policies, which was the estate of the deceased; that Robinson died in August, 1908, and shortly thereafter the insurance company paid over the sums due on the policies to the defendant; that it was not until after the death of her husband that petitioner learned that these policies had been assigned to the defendant to secure an indebtedness of the deceased, and on offering to adjust this indebtedness she was informed by the defendant that her husband owed him $3,696, represented by 14 promissory notes; and that, believing the representations of the defendant to be true, petitioner agreed to settle this indebtedness for the sum of $2,460, thereby, as she believed, saving for the estate the sum of $2,000. Petitioner charges that the representations of the defendant as to her husband's indebtedness to him were false and fraudulent, and made for the purpose of defrauding her and her children out of a large sum of money. She charges that at the time of signing said notes her husband was induced to sign the same without any consideration other than certain small sums of money advanced to him, and that the entire indebtedness to the defendant, both for money advanced and premiums paid on the policies, did not in fact exceed the sum of $500, and that the taking of the notes for the several amounts, one being for the sum of $3,000, "was a scheme and effort to enforce fraudulently a usurious contract, * * * and defendant was thus enabled to collect and did collect from the estate usury to the amount of $1,850." Petitioner charges that, "to further cloak his deceit and fraud, said Hillyer caused your petitioner to file in the court of ordinary of said state and county a petition to authorize said settlement, a copy of which is hereto attached," and that the ordinary, upon these false representations (innocently made by petitioner), approved said settlement. Petitioner prays that this judgment of the court of ordinary confirming the settlement be set aside, and that she have judgment against the defendant for the sum of $1,850. The defendant filed a general and a special demurrer, which were overruled, and he excepted.

Kontz & Austin and Candler & Alexander, for plaintiff in error. Jackson & Orme, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. We are of the opinion that the court below erred in not sustaining the general demurrer to the petition in this case. There are no facts alleged in the declaration which take the case without the ruling made in case of East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Ry. Co. v. Hayes, 83 Ga. 558, 10 S. E. 350. Upon the showing made by Mrs. Robinson in her petition, a large part of the sum which she received from Hillyer, the defendant in error, was paid over to her to effectuate a compromise agreement between her and Hillyer; and while, under the allegations in the petition, she was induced to enter into the agreement referred to by fraud upon the part of the other party, and under such circumstances and representations as render the agreement voidable, and one which she would have the right to rescind, before she can exercise her right to have that agreement rescinded and set aside, something must be done by her; that is, she must restore the status quo as it existed previously to the making of the agreement under which she received the sum of $2,460. In her petition to the court of ordinary for authority to make the settlement between herself and Hillyer, she represented to that court that she was saving for the estate some $2,000. In other words, a controversy existed between her and Hillyer as to the amount which Hillyer was due the estate of her deceased husband. She believed the amount so due to be larger than the amount admitted by Hillyer. Her contentions and those of Hillyer were in conflict. They agreed upon a settlement. Authority to make that settlement was granted by the court of ordinary. Before that settlement and compromise can be rescinded and set aside, under the ruling in the case above referred to, at least the amount in excess of what Hillyer admitted to be due the estate of Robinson, deceased, would have to be restored. The case which we have cited above, and other decisions of this court which might be cited, in addition to those cited in the Hayes Case, are conclusive against the defendant in error upon the question involved in this case.

The discussion in the case last referred to and the reasons stated, together with the authorities cited in that decision, render further discussion of the question here unnecessary.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

WESTERN & A. R. CO. v. HAIG & PURYEAR.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 22, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

CARRIERS (§ 44*)—SWITCHING CARS—REFUSAL—RIGHT OF ACTION.

The mere fact that one railroad company had been accustomed in behalf of a firm of merchants to switch to its side track, to be unloaded for the consignees, cars of ice brought to destination by another railroad company, did not make the former liable in damages to the firm merely because of a refusal to continue the practice of switching cars in this way for the firm, with or without notice to it that the practice would be discontinued, where it does not appear that because of the practice, and a belief that it would be continued, the firm did something by reason of which it suffered injury or loss upon a discontinuance of the practice without reasonable notice, and that no such notice was given.

Error from Superior Court, Whitfield County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by Haig & Puryear against the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

The defendants in error (hereinafter called the plaintiffs) sued the plaintiff in error (hereinafter called the defendant) for actual and punitive damages, making, among other allegations, substantially the following: The plaintiffs have been in the "meat market business" in Dalton since March, 1908, and have shipped to Dalton every week four or five cars of ice to be used in this business. It had been the practice and custom of the defendant (a railroad corporation under the laws of this state) since the plaintiffs began business in March, 1908, up to July 20, 1909, when cars of ice consigned to the plaintiffs reached Dalton over the Southern Railway, to take the cars and place them on a side or spur track of the defendant, "in place for unloading at" the warehouse and place of business of the plaintiffs, receiving the sum of $2 for each car thus handled. On July 20, 1909, the defendant, "without notice, failed and refused to receive any car or cars from the said Southern Railway, consigned to your petitioners. That defendant failed to give notice a reasonable time before failure to receive said cars, even if it had the right to refuse at all to receive said cars." On July 20, 1909, the defendant received from the Southern Railway a car of ice consigned to the plaintiffs, kept it 16 hours, and refused to deliver it to the plaintiffs, and after the expiration of the 16 hours returned the car to the Southern, "saying that they did not intend to deliver any more freight to petitioners, coming over any other road. This was done through G. W. Orr, defendant's authorized agent at Dalton, Ga. Petitioners allege that by reason of holding this car, and failure to deliver same, 3600 pounds of ice melted before petitioners could haul the same out, to petitioners' damage $20. Petitioners were forced to haul said ice to warehouse to save said shipment, which cost them $5. The $2 were tendered, as usual, to said defendant." The remaining allegations of the petition, beginning with paragraph 5, are as follows:

"Petitioners further show that on the 22d, 24th, 28th, and 31st days of July, 1909, and the 4th, 9th, 10th, 14th, 17th, 18th, 21st, 23d, 26th, and 28th days of August, 1909, and on each of said days, a car of ice was tendered to said defendant, together with the usual and customary freight charges, which said ice was consigned to petitioners and shipped to Dalton from Southern Railway. Petitioners' loss on said cars was: Hauling said [ice] from Southern depot $5, and loss in weights of ice, occasioned by exposing the same to weather in hauling same, $2.50 on each and every car, to damage of petitioners $105.

"(6) Petitioners further show that the said defendant, by its authorized agent aforesaid, maliciously refuses to receive and deliver any freight consigned to petitioners, although the usual and customary freight charges are tendered to said defendant, and although the said defendant receives from other railroads freight consigned to others in said city of Dalton, and to competitors of petitioners, to wit, Bowen Bros. and others; and by reason of said wrong and malicious conduct of said defendant, done for the purpose of annoying and harassing petitioners and damaging them in their said business, said defendant has injured and damaged petitioner $3,000, said acts being attended with aggravating circumstances, both in the acts and the intention, said defendant is liable to punitive damages, and they ask judgment for the same.

"(7) Petitioners further show that their said warehouse was built by petitioners on the line of defendant, with consent of defendant, and said defendant is in duty bound to deliver freight to petitioners, and would have done so but for the malice toward petitioners, actual on the part of said agent, trying to vent his malice and personal spleen on petitioners, but pretending to try, by colluding with the competitors of petitioners, to force petitioners to purchase exclusively in Chattanooga, so as to get all the freight for shipment, all of which is fully and well known to the defendant. Wherefore petitioners pray that process may issue," etc.

An amendment was made to the petition, wherein it was alleged that the warehouse referred to "is the brick just in the rear of plaintiffs' meat market, and the one just in rear and between the brick warehouse and W. & A. R. R., or close to track of defendant, and just north of freight depot of defendant. Amends paragraph 5 of petition, and alleges the cars mentioned in said paragraph were tendered by the plaintiffs and freight agent of Southern Railway Company, R. C. Craig, by direction of plaintiff, and also by these plaintiffs; said cars were tendered on the arrival of each car, on dates named in said paragraph, and at the place said defendant is accustomed to receive such cars, and had been doing so for years, in the railroad yards in Dalton, Ga.; said tender of cars and charges were made to the agent, G. W. Orr, at Dalton, Ga., and said agent being authorized to receive the same; said usual amount so paid and tendered was $2 per car."

The defendant filed a demurrer to the petition, as follows:

"Defendant, the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company, demurs to the petition served upon it in this case, and moves the court to dismiss the same: (1) Defendant demurs to that portion of paragraph 3, alleging that plaintiffs' place of business and warehouse situated on the side or spur track of this defendant, and that defendant had been accustomed to place cars of ice for unloading at said warehouse and place of business, and moves the court to strike the same, because the same does not sufficiently identify what warehouse and place of business is therein referred to, nor does it describe the same so that this defendant can identify the locality in question. (2) Defendant demurs to paragraph 5, and moves the court to strike the same, because no actionable breach of duty is therein alleged, and no facts giving a right of action are therein set out. It is not alleged who tendered the cars referred to to this defendant, nor where, nor when, nor how the tender was made, nor who tendered the usual and customary freight charges, nor to whom, nor when, nor where such tender was made, nor what amount was so tendered. (3) Defendant demurs to paragraph 6, and moves the court to strike the same, because no facts are therein alleged giving plaintiffs any right against this defendant, or aggravating the damages, or any right which it may otherwise have, and because the same is immaterial and irrelevant."

The demurrer was overruled, and upon the trial of the case a verdict was rendered "in favor of the plaintiff for $125 actual damages, $625 punitive damages." In the bill of exceptions filed by the defendant, the order the order overruling its demurrers are assigned as error.

Tye, Peeples & Jordan and Maddox, McCamy & Shumate, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Mann and W. C. Martin, for defendants in error.

HOLDEN, J. (after stating the facts as above). Haig & Puryear sued the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company for actual and punitive damages for a failure to deliver, for unloading by the plaintiff, cars of ice shipped to Dalton, Ga., to the plaintiffs, over the Southern Railway, on a side track or spur track of the defendant near the warehouse and place of business of the plaintiffs. It was alleged that it had been the practice and custom of the defendant, since March, 1908, down to July 20, 1909, to receive and deliver such cars of ice for $2 per car, but that on July 20, 1909, the defendant received from the Southern Railway a car of ice and refused to deliver it on the side track, but kept it 16 hours, after which time it returned the car to the Southern Railway, saying that it would not thus deliver any more cars of ice consigned to the plaintiffs not brought to Dalton on the road of the defendant. Plaintiffs were damaged by reason of the ice melting and expense incurred in hauling it. It was further alleged, in paragraph 5 of the petition (which paragraph is copied in the statement of facts), that on named dates in July and August, 1909, a car of ice consigned to the plaintiffs and brought to Dalton by the Southern Railway was tendered to the defendant, with the customary freight charges, and plaintiffs were damaged because of the ice melting and expense incurred in hauling the same from the Southern depot. The other allegations of the original petition mainly deal with the liability of the defendant for punitive damages. The receipt of the car by the defendant on July 20, 1909, in accordance with its custom, for delivery on its side track for unloading by the plaintiffs, and its detention, refusal to deliver, and return of the car to the Southern, thereby causing the ice to melt, would give the plaintiff a right of action for damages. However, proof of the allegations with reference to the actual damages sustained, and punitive damages because of a failure to receive from the Southern the cars referred to in the fifth paragraph of the petition and deliver them for unloading at the side track of the defendant, would not authorize a recovery of either actual or punitive damages.

Besides being a suit to recover damages with respect to the car of ice received by the defendant on July 20, 1909, the suit was one to recover damages because it had been the practice and custom of the defendant from March, 1908, to July 20, 1909, to receive cars of ice consigned to the plaintiffs and brought to Dalton by the Southern Railway, and deliver them for unloading on the side track near the place of business and warehouse of the plaintiffs, and because on named dates in July and August, 1909, the defendant refused to thus receive and deliver cars consigned to the plaintiffs and brought to Dalton by the Southern on these days, especially in view of the fact that the defendant did not give the plaintiffs reasonable notice before these dates of its intention to discontinue the practice and custom of thus receiving and delivering such cars. When cars of ice consigned to the plaintiffs were brought to Dalton by the Southern, they had reached their destination, and, independently of any rule of the Railroad Commission of this state, there was no duty on the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company to take these cars and place them on its side track for unloading by the consignees, where this company was under no duty to do so because of a contract, or on account of being a common carrier with respect to such work, or some other special reason. The defendant did not bring the cars to their destination, and there was no statutory or common-law duty on it to place on its side track for unloading cars of ice brought to their destination by another railroad. Outside of the rules of the Railroad Commission, no duty rests on one railroad to take cars brought to their destination by another railroad and switch them at the same point to a side track of the former, where it is more convenient for the consignee to unload; and if it was in the habit of doing so for one person, it could discontinue the practice, with or without giving notice of an intention to cease service of this kind for such person, where it does not appear that because of the practice, and a belief that it would be continued, such person did something by reason of which he suffered injury or loss upon a discontinuance of the practice without reasonable notice to him that it would be discontinued, and that no such notice was given.

The petition alleges that the defendant gave the plaintiffs notice of an intention to discontinue the practice on July 20 or 21, 1909, but it did not give the plaintiffs reasonable notice of such intention. Without alleging that they sustained loss because of a discontinuance of the practice, on account of having done something in reliance on the practice and belief that it would be continued, the discontinuance of the practice without any notice whatever would give no right of action for damages. There is no allegation that the plaintiffs incurred any expense or did anything because of any reliance on the practice and custom referred to and a belief that such practice and custom would be continued. The plaintiffs do allege that they built a warehouse "on the line of the defendant, with the consent of defendant"; but it is nowhere alleged when or for what reason they built the warehouse, or that there was any contract with the defendant with reference to the erection of the warehouse. There is no statutory or common-law duty on the defendant to receive cars brought to their destination at Dalton by the Southern and place them on the former's side track for unloading by the consignee, and it was not alleged that the plaintiffs had any contract with the defendant by virtue of which it was bound to receive and deliver on its side track cars of ice brought to Dalton by the Southern Railway, nor are there any allegations that the defendant was a common carrier with respect thereto. A practice or custom of the defendant in doing this for the plaintiffs would not make it a common carrier with respect to this service, and the allegations in paragraph 6 of the petition that "defendant receives from other railroads freight consigned to others in said city of Dalton and to competitors of petitioners, to wit, Bowen Bros. and others," were made only to show the plaintiffs' right to punitive damages, because defendant "maliciously refuses to receive and deliver" cars of ice consigned to plaintiffs; the right to recover actual damages being based solely on the contention that the defendant discontinued a practice and custom with the plaintiffs without giving the plaintiffs reasonable notice of its intention to do so. There can be no recovery of punitive damages where there is no right to recover actual or nominal damages. This was not a suit based on discrimination or conspiracy, though there were some general charges of malice in connection with the claim to recover punitive damages. It was not to recover under any rule of the Railroad Commission. Nor did the allegations show that as to switching in its yard the defendant held itself out as a common carrier, so as to come under Civil Code 1910, §§ 2711, 2712.

It is therefore unnecessary to discuss any such matters. The case is decided where the pleader put it, on the practice which had previously existed between the plaintiffs and the railroad. The allegations as to the car load of ice actually received were not demurred to. The demurrer to the fifth paragraph of the petition, on the ground that "no actionable breach of duty is therein alleged, and no facts giving a right of action are therein set out," should have been sustained. After the petition was amended, this paragraph was not subject to the other grounds of the demurrer thereto, nor was the third paragraph subject to the grounds of demurrer urged against it. The demurrer to the sixth paragraph should have been sustained. There were introduced in evidence certain rules of the Railroad Commission, making it the duty of one railroad to accept cars from any connecting road tendered it within a specified time and place them at an accessible point on any side track on its line designated by the "shipper, or consignee at interest." Even if damages other than the penalty provided by these rules for a failure to comply therewith could be recovered in a suit based on a violation of the rules, no recovery could be had in this case because of a violation of these rules by the defendant, as the suit was based on a supposed liability of the defendant independent of any duty imposed on it by the rules of the Railroad Commission. Western & Atlantic Railroad Co. v. Exposition Cotton Mills, 81 Ga. 522, 7 S. E. 918, 2 L. R. A. 102. We deem it unnecessary to deal with the assignments of error relating to the charges of the court and the failure of the court to charge, of which complaint is made. Certain demurrers should have been sustained, as hereinbefore indicated; and the verdict should be set aside.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

WRIGHT v. GAMBLE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 18, 1911.)

OFFICERS (§§ 50, 72*)—REMOVAL FROM OFFICE—POWER.

Where the tenure of an office is not prescribed by law, the power to remove is an incident to the power to appoint. In such case the appointee holds at the pleasure of the appointing power, although it attempts to fix a definite term; and no formalities, such as the preferring of charges or the granting of a hearing to the incumbent, are necessary to the lawful exercise of the authority of removal. The provision of Civil Code 1910, § 264, par. 3, is not applicable to such a case.

Error from Superior Court, Clarke County; C. H. Brand, Judge.

Quo warranto by J. B. Gamble against Tate Wright. Judgment for relator, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

An act of the General Assembly, approved December 15, 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 387), created a board of commissioners of roads and revenue for the county of Clarke. Under the provisions of the act the grand jury, at the next regular term of the superior court of Clarke county after the passage of the act, were to elect three citizens and resident freeholders who should constitute a board, one of whom should be elected for one year, one for two years, and one for three years. Each succeeding grand jury at the spring term of such court should elect one commissioner, who should hold office for three years, unless removed as provided by the act. The act declared "that the board of commissioners shall elect their own clerk, with such pay as the board may allow"; his duties being prescribed by the act. The clerk, before entering upon the discharge of his duties, was required by the act to take the same oath prescribed for the commissioners, and to enter into a bond with good security to faithfully perform the duties of the office of clerk. The act fixed no term of office for the clerk. In November, 1909, the board passed a resolution fixing the term of the clerk of the board at two years, beginning with the first Tuesday in January, 1910, and providing that a clerk should be elected under this resolution at that time for the ensuing two years, and subsequently on the same date every two years, unless a vacancy should occur. In accordance with this resolution John B. Gamble, who had been clerk for some years, was on the first Tuesday in January, 1910, elected clerk of the board, and thereafter assumed the discharge of the duties of the position, taking possession of the office and all books, papers, etc., connected therewith. At a regular meeting held on the first Tuesday in May, 1910, being the 3d day of the month, the board passed the following resolution: "Resolved, by the board of commissioners of roads and revenue for Clarke county, in regular monthly session assembled: (1) That the position of clerk of said board is hereby declared vacant. (2) That the action of said board taken at the January meeting of 1910, in electing John B. Gamble clerk of said board, be and the same is hereby revoked from this day. (3) That the board proceed to elect a clerk, who shall begin the discharge of his duties at once."

Subsequently, on May 9, 1910, the commissioners in regularly called session elected Tate Wright as clerk. Gamble refused to recognize the authority of the board to pass the resolution vacating the office of clerk and revoking the action of the board in electing him to that office. The books and papers of the office of clerk having been turned over to the commissioners by Gamble, in obedience to an order of the judge of the superior court, passed in a proceeding brought by the commissioners against Gamble, were by the commissioners delivered to Wright after his election. Thereafter Gamble presented to the judge of the superior court an application for leave to file an information in the nature of a writ of quo warranto to try the question of title to the office of clerk of the board of commissioners. Such leave was granted, and the information duly filed. Respondent, Wright, filed both a demurrer and an answer to the information. The applicant, Gamble, filed a demurrer to portions of the answer of the respondent. After a hearing, the judge passed an order overruling the demurrer to the information, and sustained the demurrer to certain portions of the answer, holding that the pleadings, after these rulings, raised no issue of fact. Judgment was entered, declaring that Gamble was the lawful clerk of the board of commissioners, and was entitled to the possession of the office and the books and papers thereof, and that Wright was not the lawful clerk of the board, and was not entitled to the possession of the of-office or the books and papers thereof. It was further adjudged that the respondent, Wright, deliver possession of the office and all books, papers, etc., connected therewith, to the applicant, Gamble, and that the respondent pay the costs of the proceedings. To these rulings the respondent excepted.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The controlling question presented by the record is whether the board of commissioners of roads and revenue of Clarke county, created by an act of the General Assembly approved December 15, 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 389), the act providing that commissioners "shall elect their own clerk with such pay as the board may allow," had the power, in the absence of any law fixing the term of office of the clerk, to prescribe, by resolution duly passed, the tenure of the office of the clerk at two years, and having subsequently elected a clerk for that time, could remove the incumbent before the expiration of that term, without preferring charges against him and giving him an opportunity to be heard, and to elect another clerk in his stead? We deem it unnecessary to pass upon any other question presented by the record. It seems now to be the universally accepted rule that, where the tenure of the office is not prescribed by law, the power to remove is an incident to the power to appoint. 29 Cyc. 371; 23 A. & E. Enc. Law, 405; Mechem, Pub. Off. § 445; Throop, Pub. Off. § 304 et seq. In such a case no formalities, such as the preferring of charges against, or the granting of a hearing to, the incumbent, are necessary to the lawful exercise of the discretionary power of removal. 29 Cyc. 1408, and numerous cases there cited. See Coleman v. Glenn, 103 Ga. 458, 30 S. E. 297, 68 Am. St. Rep. 108, and Gray v. McLendon, 134 Ga. 224, 67 S. E. 859. Counsel for the defendant in error in the case now before us concede in their brief that, if the board of commissioners of roads and revenue of Clarke county had not fixed the tenure of office of their clerk, then the power to remove the defendant in error as clerk would have existed as an incident to the power of appointment in the board; but they contend that as the board had, as authorized by law, divested itself of such arbitrary power of removal, it could not revert itself with this power during the time for which the defendant in error was elected clerk under the resolution fixing the term of such office. The pivotal point of the case is whether the board had the power to fix the tenure of its clerk. If it had such authority, then Gamble, the defendant in error, who had been elected by the board for the term of two years, was not removable by it before the expiration of this term, without charges, notice, and a hearing. On the other hand, if the board was without power to prescribe a fixed term for its clerk, then Gamble, notwithstanding he had been elected for a purported fixed term, held the office at the pleasure of the board, and was removable at its discretion, without the preferring of charges, notice, or the benefit of a hearing.

The question under consideration has been passed on by several courts of last resort. In State ex rel. Moore v. Archibald, 5 N. D. 359, 66 N. W. 234, it was held: "The grant of power to appoint to public office, where no term of office is fixed by law, carries with it as an incident the absolute power of removal at any time, without notice or charges or a hearing, and without the cause for removal being inquired into by any court. Such power vested in a board cannot be limited by any action taken by such board, whether by appointing the officer for a fixed term, or by by-laws restricting the power of removal to cases where cause for removal exists." In that case Moore applied for a mandamus to compel Archibald to turn over to the applicant the possession of the office of Superintendent of the State Hospital for the Insane, to which office Archibald, the defendant, had been appointed by the trustees of that institution for the term of one year, and from which he had been arbitrarily removed before the expiration of his term by the board of trustees, at a meeting called for that purpose, and at which Moore was appointed in Archibald's place (facts similar to those in the instant case). Prior to the appointment of Archibald, the board had passed by-laws making the superintendent and other named subofficials "subject to removal for good and sufficient cause, at the pleasure of the board of trustees," and that "charges against officers of the institution must be submitted in writing, and that a copy thereof should be furnished the officer against whom the charge is made at least one month before it is acted upon." Corliss, J., in pronouncing the opinion for the court, cogently said: "The by-laws which they [the trustees] are authorized to pass must not be repugnant to the laws of the state. The statute by necessary implication confers upon the board unlimited power of removal. This manifests the legislative policy with respect to this particular office. That statute cannot be annulled, neither can such policy be overthrown, by a by-law passed by a mere creature of the Legislature. The people, under such legislation, have a right to demand that, whenever the board shall deem it for the public interests to remove the superintendent, its power of removal shall be the absolute power vested in it by the Legislature, and shall not be fettered by any restriction whatever. This power is delegated to the board for the public good, and the people cannot be prejudiced by limitations of that power to which they have not consented, and which they have not authorized the board to impose. If the board may lawfully fix the term at one year, it may likewise give the incumbent a life tenure. If it can, with legal effect, declare that the superintendent can be removed for good and sufficient cause, it may narrow the ground of removal to a particular case, and thus place this portion of the discretion vested in the board for the public welfare beyond the possibility of exercise by succeeding boards for years to come. Thenceforth the board of trustees would, for a season, be shorn of the specified power of appointment, of the incidental power of removal, and to this extent of the power of general control and management granted to it by the statute. Even if the by-laws in question were explicit in their limitation of the power of the board, we would be compelled, for the reasons set forth, to treat them as without effect."

In support of this view the following authorities were cited: State v. Lane, 53 N. J. Law, 275, 21 Atl. 302; City of Newark v. Stout, 52 N. J. Law, 35, 18 Atl. 943; Williams v. City of Gloucester, 148 Mass. 256, 19 N. E. 348; Higgins v. Cole, 100 Cal. 260, 34 Pac. 678; Carter v. City of Durango, 16 Colo. 534, 27 Pac. 1058, 25 Am. St. Rep. 294; State v. Johnson, 123 Mo. 43, 27 S. W. 399; Weidman v. Board of Education, 54 Hun, 634, 7 N. Y. Supp. 309. Upon examination we find that the cases cited either decide the point in accordance with the view of Judge Corliss or expressly recognize its soundness. It was held in Parsons v. Breed, 126 Ky. 759, 104 S. W. 766, that "where neither the Constitution nor statute fixes the term of office, the appointee holds at the pleasure of the appointing power, although it was attempted by the appointing power to fix a definite term," citing Johnson v. Cavanah, 54 S. W. 853, 21 Ky. Law Rep. 1246. See, also, Abrams v. Horton, 18 App. Div. 208, 45 N. Y. Supp. 887. So in Mathis v. Rose, 64 N. J. Law, 45, 44 Atl. 875, it was held that, as the charter of Atlantic City authorized the city council to elect a street supervisor, the council had power to remove an incumbent and appoint its successor at their pleasure, notwithstanding an ordinance had been passed making the term of such officer one year. The ordinance being inconsistent with the charter provision, it was held to be void, citing Trowbridge v. Newark, 46 N. J. Law, 140. The case of Bradshaw v. City Council, 39 N. J. Law, 418, was distinguished. Our conclusion is that the board of commissioners of roads and revenue of Clarke county, being invested, by the act of the General Assembly creating it, with the power of appointment of a clerk, which carried with it the authority to remove such officer at its pleasure, as the statute fixed no term for such officer, could not legally by resolution fix a tenure of such office, and thus divest the board of the power of removal at pleasure conferred upon it by statute. It follows that Civil Code 1910, § 264 (3), providing that one of the methods for vacating an office is "by decision of a competent tribunal declaring the office vacant," did not apply to this case, so as to require charges, notice, and a hearing before the board could legally remove its clerk.

Counsel for the defendant in error cite, as sustaining a contrary view, the following cases: Robertson v. Coughlin, 196 Mass. 539, 82 N. E. 678, and State v. Williford, 104 Tenn. 694, 58 S. W. 295. In each of these cases it appeared that the board therein referred to elected a clerk or secretary to fill a vacancy created by the expiration of the term of office fixed by the board for its clerk or secretary, and it was held in effect that the board had the power to do this. The question whether the board could have removed the incumbent prior to the expiration of his term fixed by it was not involved. In our opinion the judgment in each of the cases was correct; but we cannot agree to the soundness of the proposition announced in these cases that the board had authority to fix the term of its clerk or secretary, no term being fixed by law, and no authority being given to the board to prescribe it. Other authorities cited by the defendant in error are not sufficiently relevant, in our opinion, to require discussion.

It follows, from our views as above set forth, that the judgment of the court below must be reversed. All the Justices concur.

CLARKE COUNTY v. GAMBLE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 13, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. OFFICERS (§ 82*)—INJUNCTION—NATURE OF REMEDY—EXISTENCE OF OTHER REMEDY.

Clarke county brought its petition against Gamble, the substance of which, now material, was: Defendant had recently been removed by the board of commissioners of roads and revenue of that county from the office of clerk of such board. Up to the time of his removal, the defendant and the board "occupied offices together," the board paying one-half of the rent for the same, wherein were kept all the records, books, and other property of the county pertaining to the official business of the board. The possession of these records, books, etc., by the board was necessary for the discharge of its public duties. At the time of his removal the defendant notified the board that, on account of the invalidity (as contended by him, for certain reasons) of the order discharging him, "he would not permit any books, papers, or other documents belonging to the county to be removed from the offices where they [were then] located, * * * claiming that the offices were rented in his name and he would control them." The board procured another office, but the defendant refused to allow the board to remove such records, books, etc., from the offices occupied by them. One of the prayers of the petition was that the defendant be enjoined from interfering with the county or the board of commissioners or their agents in the removal of such records, books, etc., from the place where they were. Held: (1) The injunction sought was not purely mandatory, but its essential feature was to restrain the defendant. See MacKenzie v. Minis, 132 Ga. 323, 63 S. E. 900, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1003. (2) Civil Code 1910, § 304 et seq., providing how a successor to an office may obtain the books, papers, etc., appertaining thereto from his predecessor, who refused on demand to turn over the same, did not furnish to the county an adequate remedy, if any at all, under the facts of this case. See, in this connection, Albee v. Watts, 114 Ga. 149, 39 S. E. 940.

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 176*)—PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT—DEFICIENCY OF QUANTITY.

In an action by a vendee against his vendor of land sold by the tract, where the number of acres is stated as "more or less" and only as a part of its description, there can be no recovery on account of the deficiency in the number of acres so stated, where it does not appear that the vendor was guilty of actual fraud in misrepresenting the quantity. Montgomery v. Robertson, 134 Ga. 66, 67 S. E. 431.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 333-340; Dec. Dig. § 176.*]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 44*)—DEFICIENCY OF ACREAGE—FRAUDULENT MISREPRESENTATIONS—EVIDENCE.

If the offered portion of the testimony of the plaintiff, which was excluded by the court, had been admitted, it would not have been sufficient, considered in connection with the testimony before the jury, to authorize a finding that the defendants, who were the vendors of the land, were guilty of any actual fraud in misrepresenting the number of acres contained in the tract. The alleged misrepresentations of the vendors were merely to the effect that they believed that the tract of land, which was described as "containing 30 acres more or less," contained as much as 35 acres, and that they were sure that it contained as much as 30 acres. Moreover, it appeared from the testimony of the vendee, the plaintiff, that one of the vendors prior to the sale pointed out to the vendee the boundaries of the tract, that the vendee in company with such vendor inspected the land, that the vendee at the time he purchased did not believe that the tract contained 30 acres, and that he would not have purchased, but for the guaranty of such vendor that it contained that quantity.

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 176*)—ASSIGNMENTS (§ 24*)—APPORTIONMENT OF PRICE—ASSIGNABILITY OF RIGHT.

The right given by Civil Code 1910, § 4122, to a vendee of land sold by the tract or entire body, where the quantity is specified as "more or less," to have an apportionment of the price for a deficiency in the quantity specified so gross as to justify the suspicion of willful deception, or mistake amounting to fraud, arises only by reason of actual fraud and deception on the part of the vendor (Montgomery v. Robertson, 134 Ga. 66, 67 S. E. 431; Currie v. Collins, 136 Ga. —, supra), which tends to injure or damage the vendee, and therefore, under Civil Code 1910, § 3655, is not assignable by such vendee transferring to the purchaser of the land from him the bond for title given him by his vendor, so as to entitle the transferee of the bond to have the note of his immediate vendor held by the vendor from whom the latter purchased, and given as a part of the purchase price of the land, credited with the value of the deficiency of land according to the price at which the payee of the note sold it.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 12, 1911.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1069*)—HARMLESS ERROR—VERDICT—REMARKS OF COURT.

The court should not unduly press a jury to agree upon a verdict; and in the use of any remarks designed to impress the desirability of reaching a verdict, he should be careful to refrain from any expression of a coercive nature, or which possibly may mislead them into an erroneous method of reaching a verdict. Upon being informed by the jury of their inability to agree upon the amount of recovery, the judge's instruction that verdicts are mostly compromises, and his illustration of that statement, was prejudicial to the defendant. Its tendency was to suggest that the jurors might arbitrarily compromise, divide, and yield for the mere sake of agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1069.*]

2. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

Other than as indicated, no error was committed which would require a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Dade County; A. W. Flite, Judge.

Action by Jessie Daffron, as administratrix, against the Alabama Great Southern Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

A. E. Goodhue and Foust, Payne & Tatum, for plaintiff in error. Reuben R. Arnold, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. Mrs. Jessie Daffron, administratrix of Joseph Daffron, sued the Alabama Great Southern Railroad Company to recover damages for the alleged wrongful death of her husband, who was a fireman in the employment of the defendant at the time of his death. After the case had been submitted to the jury, and they had been deliberating upon the same for about 24 hours, they were called into the courtroom, and inquiry was made by the judge whether they had agreed upon a verdict, or were likely to agree; and, upon being informed that they had not agreed, the court said, "I regret exceedingly, gentlemen, for you to fail to make a verdict in this case, and trust that you will come together on the facts," and, after instructing them that they were the sole judges of the facts, and that the court could not render any assistance in solving the facts of the case, the court said: "You will first determine, as I have before stated, whether or not there should be a recovery; and, if you determine there should be, you will settle the amount, if you possibly can. If you determine there should not, then you will find for the defendant company. Now, gentlemen, see if you cannot get together." The jury returned to their room, and about 24 hours thereafter they were again called into the courtroom, when the following colloquy occurred between the court and the jury: Judge: "Gentlemen of the jury, have you agreed upon the question as to the right to recover?" Jurors: "We have, but differ as to the amount." Court: "It does look like you might agree upon that. You ought to agree upon the amount. I might be going a little too far, but verdicts are mostly all compromises. No man gets all he wants in things of that kind; and, having agreed upon the essential point, the question of whether or not there should be a recovery, it does look like you all might get together on some amount—that is, you might make a conjunction, as defined by an old rural school-teacher, who, when asked what a conjunction was, said, 'A conjunction is the coming together of two or more persons or things, as John and James met.' You may now retire, and see if you can come together." A verdict for the plaintiff was rendered within a few hours after this recharge. The defendant moved for a new trial, which was refused.

[1] 1. This court has indulged judicial urging of a verdict to a considerable extent. Unless the remarks of the judge amounted to coercion, or a direction to arbitrarily compromise individual conflicting views solely for the sake of agreement, the court has declined to set aside the verdict. It has been ruled that a new trial will not be granted, where the court, upon a failure of the jury to agree, addressed to them certain remarks tending to impress upon them the importance of the case, the desirability of rendering a verdict, and the expense of a retrial, and sent them back for further deliberation. Allen v. Woodson, 50 Ga. 53; Parker v. Georgia Pacific Ry. Co., 83 Ga. 539, 10 S. E. 233; Golatt v. State, 130 Ga. 18, 60 S. E. 107. In each of these cases the court recognized the impropriety of unduly pressing a jury to arrive at a verdict, and in one of them stated that the trial judge went to the allowable limit. When informed that the jury is unable to agree upon a verdict, the court in his remarks upon the desirability of reaching a verdict should be very careful not to employ any expression of a coercive nature, nor should he say anything which might mislead them as an instruction that some of them should yield their conscientious opinions and convictions upon a material feature of the case, solely for the sake of making a verdict.

• Georgia Railroad Co. v. Cole, 77 Ga. 77. In the case just cited, which was one closely contested on the facts, after the jury had been charged and retired, the court had them brought into the courtroom, and, after stating to them that he was informed that they were not likely to agree, asked if it were true. The jury replied that it was. The court inquired whether the trouble was upon a matter of law or fact, to which the jury responded that it was upon a question of amount—that they differed about the amount. The court said: "Gentlemen, I cannot aid you in that, as I know of, in any way, further than to say that, upon that matter, the jury ought to make a very earnest effort to agree—to reconcile conflicting opinions as to amounts. I merely give you that as advice of the court. You must make an effort to agree upon the amount. Of course, a juror ought not to give up his convictions, if they are so strong; but there ought to be an effort to come to an agreement. You can retire, and see if you cannot agree upon the amount." This court held that these remarks might have induced some of the jurors to give up opinions entertained in favor of the defendant, simply to make a verdict, and a new trial was granted on this ground.

In the present case the court instructed the jury that "verdicts are mostly all compromises," and his illustration was calculated to induce them to arrive at a common sum by a compromise, without reference to the individual convictions of the jurors as to the amount the plaintiff was entitled to recover. In Goodsell v. Seely, 46 Mich. 623, 10 N. W. 44, 41 Am. Rep. 183, which was a personal injury case, the jury informed the court that they "had not agreed, but stood eleven to one, and divided on $200." The judge in reply told them: "If that is the only difference, it would be better for the county and the parties on both sides that one or both sides yield, so as to come together. It would be unfortunate for all to have a disagreement, when the difference is so small"—and he asked them to get together if possible. A new trial was granted upon this ground, and in the opinion Judge Cooley said: "It is no doubt true that juries often compromise in the way here suggested, and that by 'splitting difference' they sometimes return verdicts with which the judgment of no one of them is satisfied. But it is an abuse. The law contemplates that they shall, by their discussions, harmonize their views, if possible, but not that they shall compromise, divide, and yield for the mere purpose of an agreement. The sentiment or notion which permits this tends to bring jury trial into discredit and to convert it into a lottery. It was no doubt very desirable to the public and to the parties that the jurors should agree, if they could do so without sacrificing what any one of them believed were the just rights of the parties, but not otherwise." Moreover, the court characterized the jury's agreement that the plaintiff should have a recovery as the essential point in the case, thus minimizing the importance of the amount of the recovery. In the petition the damages were laid at $20,000. The verdict was for $7,500. We have no means of knowing the views of the individual jurors as to the amount which each thought the plaintiff was entitled to recover. The tendency of the court's remarks was to create an impression that, having agreed upon the right of the plaintiff to recover, the jurors need not be so careful in fixing the amount, which might be arrived at as a result of an arbitrary compromise of the individual views of the jurors.

[2] 2. The various charges complained of were without substantial error, and the general charge covered the essential features in the requests to charge. Other than as indicated in the first division of the opinion, no error requiring a new trial is made to appear. Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

ALABAMA GREAT SOUTHERN R. CO. v. ALLISON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1911.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 351*)—ACCIDENTS AT CROSSINGS—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE TO SUSTAIN.

The court erred in charging the jury as follows: "To run a train at high rate of speed, and without signals of approach, when the trainmen have reason to believe there are persons in exposed positions on the track, as over an ungarded crossing in a populous district of a city, or where the public are wont to pass on the track with such frequency and in such numbers, and the facts are known to those in charge of the train, as that they will be held to a knowledge of the probable consequence of maintaining greater speed without warning, so as to impute to them reckless knowledge in respect thereto, would render the employer liable for injuries resulting therefrom, notwithstanding there was negligence on the part of those injured, and no fault on the servants after seeing the danger." This charge was not authorized by the pleadings or the evidence in the case.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 274*)—OBJECTIONS IN TRIAL COURT—NEW TRIAL—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE.

Grounds of a motion for a new trial, complaining that the verdict is contrary to certain portions of the charge, raise no question for decision by this court not raised by the general ground in the motion for a new trial that the verdict is contrary to law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 274.*]

3. GRANT OF NONSUIT.

The court below did not err in refusing to grant a nonsuit.

Error from Superior Court, Dade County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by A. B. Allison, administrator, against the Alabama Great Southern Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

A. E. Goodhue and Foust, Payne & Tatum, for plaintiff in error. Ben. T. Brock, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. A. B. Allison, administrator of the estate of W. M. Allison, deceased, brought suit against the Alabama Great Southern Railroad Company to recover damages for the homicide of his intestate in the state of Alabama, alleging that the killing was wrongful and tortious, being the result of the negligent operation of a locomotive and train of the defendant company by its employees. Petitioner pleaded the Alabama statutes authorizing suits by the personal representative of a decedent to recover damages for the death of his intestate in cases of the character set forth in the petition. On the trial a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. Upon the refusal of the court below to grant a new trial, upon a motion duly made, the defendant excepted.

[1] 1. Error is assigned upon the following charge of the court: "To run a train at high rate of speed, and without signals of approach, when the trainmen have reason to believe there are persons in exposed positions on the track, as over an unguarded crossing in a populous district of a city, or where the public are wont to pass on the track with such frequency and in such numbers, and the facts are known to those in charge of the train, as that they will be held to a knowledge of the probable consequences of maintaining greater speed without warning, so as to impute to them reckless knowledge in respect thereto, would render the employer liable for injuries resulting therefrom, notwithstanding there was negligence on the part of those injured, and no fault of the servants after seeing the danger." This charge was unauthorized by the evidence in the case. It was properly challenged on that ground. In fact, neither the pleadings nor the facts as developed on the witness stand afforded any basis for the instructions quoted. While it was alleged that the train approached the crossing in question at a high rate of speed, it was not alleged, nor was there evidence to show, that the train was run or the crossing approached "without signals of approach" or without "warning." Judging from the context, the portion of the charge criticised was in the language of a decision rendered by the Supreme Court of Alabama; but the case from which it is taken is not cited in the charge itself nor in the brief of counsel. But, as was said in the case of Savannah Railway Co. v. Evans, 115 Ga. 318, 41 S. E. 632, 90 Am. St. Rep. 116: "Some of the charges which were complained of in the present case seem to be literal copies of headnotes made by the Supreme Court of Florida in a case decided by that court. It is claimed that it was not error to use the language of the Florida court, for the reason that the case was to be tried according to the law of Florida, and anything which was declared to be the law of that state by its court of last resort was a proper subject of instruction to the jury. This position is not sound. There are many things said by this court, both in headnotes and opinions, that are sound law, but which nevertheless would be improper instructions to a jury. This court as well as the Supreme Court of Florida may use language which would be appropriate in a headnote or opinion, but which would be grossly improper when embodied in a charge to a jury. Merritt v. State, 107 Ga. 676 (4) [84 S. E. 361]; F. C. & P. Railroad Co. v. Lucas, 110 Ga. 127, 128 [35 S. E. 283]." See, also, in this connection, the case of Lay v. N. C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 181 Ga. 345, 62 S. E. 189. The admonitions contained in the extract from the decision of this court above quoted should be observed by judges of the trial courts when instructing the jury.

We base the judgment of reversal of this case upon the error contained in that portion of the charge set forth above. But attention should also be called to the following charge of the court, complained of in the first ground of the amended motion for a new trial: "When a railroad runs its track through a district of a city, town, or village, densely populated, and the demands of trade and public intercourse necessitate the frequent crossing of the track, it is the duty of those operating the engine over the track in such places to keep a lookout. This duty is not specially imposed by statute, but arises from the likelihood that in such places there are persons on the track, and the bounden duty to guard against inflicting death or injury in places and under circumstances where and when it is likely to result, unless due care is observed. This duty arises when the circumstances exist which call for its exercise." This language seems also to have been taken from a decision rendered by the Supreme Court of Alabama, and it might well have been criticised upon the ground that it contains an expression of an opinion on the facts of the case by the judge in his charge to the jury. This specific exception, however, was not made. The exceptions which were urged are themselves somewhat vague and uncertain, and of such a character that we do not feel authorized to declare the charge error upon the specific objections stated in the motion. But inasmuch as a new trial is granted upon another ground, we thought it proper to point out the obvious error in the excerpt last quoted.

[2] 2. Grounds of a motion for a new trial, complaining that the verdict is contrary to certain portions of the charge, raise no question for decision by this court not raised by the general grounds in the motion for a new trial, that the verdict is contrary to law.

1. DAMAGES (§ 32*) — PHYSICAL INJURIES — PAIN AND SUFFERING — CAPACITY TO LABOR.

A physical injury, which impairs the capacity of a married woman to labor, is classified by the law with pain and suffering. Metropolitan R. Co. v. Johnson, 90 Ga. 500, 18 S. E. 49. 3. RAILROADS (§ 397*) — FRIGHTENING HORSES — EVIDENCE.

In a suit against a railroad company for a personal injury caused by a horse, alleged to have been frightened by unusual and unnecessary noises made by the defendant's locomotive, it is competent to show that the horse was road-worthy, and was not subject to fright by the ordinary and usual noises incident to the operation of locomotives and cars.

EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 47*)—CONDEMNATION OF RIGHT OF WAY FOR TRAMWAY.

Civil Code 1910, § 804, which provides that "any person, or corporation, desiring to build or construct any tramways to connect with any waterway or railway, in this state, for the purpose of transporting lumber, naval stores, and timber by means of the same," may condemn a right of way for such tramway, "setting out the length of such way, together with the place of starting and the terminus of the same," only applies to instances where such tramways are necessary to connect with a railway, or waterway, for the purpose of transporting the articles mentioned by means thereof, and does not authorize a person who owns a sawmill located on the line of one railway to condemn a right of way for a tramroad to cross the line of another railway and extend to a lot of timber belonging to such sawmill owner. Garbutt Lumber Co. v. Georgia & Alabama Ry. Co., 111 Ga. 714, 36 S. E. 942; Normandale Lumber Co. v. Knight, 89 Ga. 111, 14 S. E. 882; Chattanooga, etc., R. Co. v. Philpot, 112 Ga. 153, 37 S. E. 181.

Error from Superior Court, Berrien County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Action by the Valdosta, Moultrie & Western Railway Company against the Adel Lumber Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The Adel Lumber Company, being a private corporation, was engaged in operating a sawmill at Adel, Ga., on the line of the Georgia Southern & Florida Railway Company. The lumber which it manufactured was for shipment over the railroad of the Georgia Southern & Florida Railway Company, for distribution to the general lumber trade. In order to conduct its business, it had acquired large timber holdings extending to a remote distance from the mill, and in order to bring the timber from the forests to the mill it was necessary to employ a "tramroad." For the purpose of carrying on a sawmill business, it had so constructed its tramroad that it extended from the mill for a number of miles into the timber lands, but contemplated further extension in the future from time to time as the work of cutting the timber progressed and such extension should become necessary in order to reach the more remote timber lands. Under such conditions the Valdosta, Moultrie & Western Railroad Company, being a chartered commercial railway, constructed its line of road across the proposed extension of the tramroad of the Adel Lumber Company, so that, in order for the tramroad to reach a large part of the timber lands of that company, it was necessary to cross the railroad track. In order to reach such timber with its tramroad, the Adel Lumber Company sought permission from the Valdosta, Moultrie & Western Railroad Company to cross its track with a tramroad at a point in the country on lot No. 487 in the Ninth land district of Colquitt county, which lot was among the timber lands of the Adel Lumber Company; but permission was not granted, and, being unable otherwise to get permission to cross, the lumber company sought to acquire a crossing by the exercise of the power of eminent domain, under sections 658, 659, and 660 of volume 1 of the Code of 1895.

The Valdosta, Moultrie & Western Railroad Company instituted suit to enjoin the Adel Lumber Company from so proceeding to condemn a crossing for its tramroad, on the ground that the proposed condemnation was contrary to law, for the following reasons: (a) The operation of defendant's tramroad for the purpose of hauling to and furnishing its sawmill with crude logs to be manufactured into lumber and other timber products is purely a private enterprise, in which the public has no interest. (b) There is no provision of law authorizing a person or corporation, engaged in a purely private enterprise, to take, injure, or damage the property of a duly chartered railroad company, necessary for and in actual use in the operation of its trains as a part of its right of way and tracks. (c) Sections 658, 659, and 660 of volume 1 of the Code of 1895, under which defendant is undertaking to condemn, do not afford a person or corporation, desiring to construct a tramway for transportation of lumber, naval stores, or timber by means thereof, the right to condemn the right of way or track of a duly chartered railway for the purpose of crossing the same, or for any other purpose. (d) It appears upon the face of said application and notice that it is not necessary for the defendant to build or construct its tramroads across the right of way and track of the plaintiff in order to connect it with the waterway or railway, for which provision is made by sections 658, 659, and 660 of volume 1 of the Code of 1895, for the reason that it has ample means of transportation without the privilege of making said crossing. The judge at an interlocutory hearing found that the way sought was a way of necessity, and declined to grant an ad interim injunction. The Valdosta, Moultrie & Western Railroad Company excepted.

JENKINS v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

RAILROADS (§ 344*) — CROSSING ACCIDENT — DEFECT IN CROSSING — PETITION — SUFFICIENCY.

The petition as amended did not set forth a cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 344.*]

Error from Superior Court, Harris County; S. P. Gilbert, Judge.

Action by W. W. Jenkins against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, on sustaining a demurrer to the amended petition, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Jenkins sued the Southern Railway Company for damages, and his petition, after amendment, was dismissed on general demurrer, to which ruling he excepted. So much of the original petition as is now material was as follows: While plaintiff's servant, about 9 o'clock in the morning, was driving a two-mule team hitched to a wagon belonging to the plaintiff onto the defendant's track, where a public road crossed the same, one of the mules was struck by the defendant's engine and killed. Just as the mules got on the track, upon the unexpected approach of the train, plaintiff's servant attempted to back the team from the track in order to keep the train from striking it, and by reason of the narrowness of a bridge over which he attempted to back the team, constituting a part of the approach to the crossing, and over a drain cut by the defendant company, the bridge being only 10 feet wide, one of the wagon wheels ran off the bridge, so that it was impossible for him to get one of the mules off the track, and it was struck by the engine and killed. The public road ran parallel with the track for 100 feet, and then curved just before crossing the track. There were trees and shrubbery growing between the road and the track where they paralleled each other. The bridge was maintained by the railway company. The acts of negligence charged were: (1) "Said * * * train was at said time * * * running at a very rapid rate of speed in approaching said public road crossing." (2) "Defendant's servants and agents failed and neglected to signal the approach of the train to this public road crossing, and to check and keep checking the speed thereof in approaching the crossing, as by statute required." (3) Defendant, "in maintaining the drain along its track and roadbed, * * * failed to maintain a bridge of sufficient length over said drain; the bridge being only 10 feet long, when it should have been not less than 15 or 18 feet long, especially where the dirt road enters and crosses the track at a curve, and as the usual and customary length of bridges over drains at public road crossings and where bridges more than 10 feet wide are necessary to prevent injuries." And (4) the defendant was negligent "in carelessly and negligently running over and against plaintiff's mule and killing it, and in not checking or stopping said train in time to save said mule." An amendment to the petition was filed, subject to demurrer. By the amendment the word "public," referring to the road, appearing in three different paragraphs of the petition, was stricken. Such word, however, was not stricken where it occurred in the paragraph of the petition charging the acts of negligence complained of. The alleged negligence of the defendant's servants in failing to observe the blow post law as to public crossings was also stricken. The amendment alleged, in substance, that the road which crossed the defendant's track was a private way, which had been used for some 50 years; that the bridge over the drain, and constituting a part of the approach to the crossing, had been constructed by the defendant company and maintained by it for a great number of years, and, being only about 10 feet long, was too short to enable a person to safely back a team from the track across the bridge in order to avoid a train approaching the crossing, and unseen by reason of a cut through which it was passing.

Hatcher & Hatcher, for plaintiff in error.
C. E. Battle and Howell Hollis, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The original petition sought a recovery for the alleged negligence of the defendant company in two particulars, namely: (a) In approaching a public crossing at a high rate of speed, without giving proper signals or checking the speed as required by the statute commonly known as the "blow post law," and thus negligently running against the plaintiff's mule and killing him; and (b) in constructing and maintaining, as a part of the approach to such crossing, a bridge which was too narrow. While certain vague and general expressions in reference to negligence in running upon the plaintiff's mule were not expressly eliminated by the amendment, the sole ground wherein was alleged the negligence in approaching a public crossing both as to speed, signaling, and checking, was withdrawn. As amended, the petition in effect alleged the crossing to be a private one maintained by the defendant company, over which the public was impliedly invited to cross; and the case was left to stand upon the allegation of negligence that the bridge, though 10 feet in width, was too narrow, and that by reason of this, when the plaintiff's servant sought to back the team upon it as the train approached, one wheel of the wagon ran off the side of the bridge, thus preventing one of the mules from being backed off the track, thus causing it to be struck by the train and killed. Treating, therefore, the question of negligence in the operation of the train as eliminated, and the sole act of negligence upon which the plaintiff based his claim for recovery as being the contention that the bridge constructed by the railway company at a private crossing, not shown to be one established by law, was too narrow, the petition was subject to general demurrer. There was no allegation that the bridge was too narrow, or otherwise unsuitable, for passage in the ordinary and usual methods, or for the purpose for which it was constructed and maintained. It was 10 feet in width, which was not alleged for any reason to have been too narrow for a team to safely approach and pass over the track. Not to provide a bridge broad enough for persons to turn teams upon or to back their teams across cannot be said to be negligence. The injury occurred in the daytime, and there was no question as to concealed danger in the bridge by reason of its defective construction or the want of repair, as appeared in the cases of Central R., etc., Co. v. Robertson, 95 Ga. 430, 22 S. E. 551, and Southern Ry. Co. v. Hooper, 110 Ga. 779, 38 S. E. 232. If one were to construct a lane leading to his residence, which the public were impliedly invited to use, and it was sufficient for all ordinary methods of passage, he would not be held to be negligent merely because the lane was not sufficiently wide to turn wagons in, or for teams to back out of, where there was no concealed danger, nor any emergency brought about by the negligence of the one constructing the lane. In the present case, as we have already indicated, the allegations of negligence in respect to the operation of its train by the defendant were substantially eliminated by the amendment, and the case left to stand alone upon the charge of negligence of the defendant in not providing a broader bridge; and as there was no allegation of concealed danger arising from darkness, lack of repair, or other causes, the amended declaration failed to show a breach of duty on the part of the defendant company in not constructing and maintaining a wider bridge, and was therefore properly dismissed on general demurrer.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

2. RAILROADS (§ 439*)—INJURY TO PROPERTY OF THIRD PERSON—PETITION.

The petition, alleging specially that the section boss so alleged to be the agent of the railroad company carelessly ran the horse upon and into the stock gap on the line of railway of the defendant while in the discharge and performance of his duty as such agent, and, further, that the defendant was negligent in employing "such a reckless and careless servant, * * * and in having the said stock gap in a damaged condition, the defect being that it was not such as is built to keep stock from going on the same, but was flat and loose," was not subject to special demurrer on the ground that it failed to allege how the agent negligently and carelessly ran the horse upon the stock gap, or how he was then in the discharge and performance of his duty, nor upon the ground that it did not appear how the railroad company was negligent in employing such a reckless and careless servant, or how or wherein the servant was reckless and careless, nor upon the ground that it did not appear specifically how or where-in the stock gap was defective.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1566; Dec. Dig. § 439.*]

3. INSTRUCTIONS—PROVINCE OF JURY—INVASION.

The instructions of the court upon the credibility of witnesses, though inaccurate, were not subject to the criticism that the judge invaded the province of the jury.

4. RAILROADS (§ 447*)—INJURY TO PROPERTY OF THIRD PERSONS—SCOPE OF EMPLOYMENT—EVIDENCE.

There was no evidence tending to show the duties of the section boss, further than that he was a section boss, and that he was then engaged in walking the track. This evidence was insufficient to authorize a finding that the section boss was acting within the scope of his authority when he drove the horse over the stock gap, and accordingly it was erroneous to charge that "the defendant company had the right to drive the horse out of the inclosure for its own protection, if it was on the line of the track or inclosure, * * * and if the defendant Higgins, acting as an agent and employé of the defendant company, drove the horse across the stock gap, and it was apparently dangerous, and he knew it was so, when he might have reasonably put it out in another way, then I leave you to say whether or not he was exercising all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, and, if so, then neither the company nor he would be liable; but, if he was not exercising all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, then they would be liable."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1642-1650; Dec. Dig. § 447.*]

5. RAILROADS (§ 443*)—INJURY TO PROPERTY OF THIRD PERSONS—SCOPE OF EMPLOYMENT—INSTRUCTIONS—SUPPORT IN EVIDENCE.

There being no evidence, other than as above indicated, that the section boss in driving the horse across the stock gap was acting within the scope of his employment, there was not sufficient evidence to authorize a verdict against the railroad company.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1608-1620; Dec. Dig. § 443.*]

6. RAILROADS (§ 267*)—INJURY TO PROPERTY OF THIRD PERSON—LIABILITY OF SERVANT.

The testimony of defendant Higgins (the section boss) was to the effect that he knew that it was dangerous to drive a horse across the stock gap, and with such knowledge did it, and the horse was injured thereby. There was also evidence to authorize a finding that the horse died from the injury sustained. Under this and other evidence as to the value of the horse, the evidence authorized the verdict against this defendant; and as the court did not err in overruling his demurrer to the petition, and the instructions of the court complained of were not erroneous, relatively to him, for any reason assigned, the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to grant a new trial as to him.

1. SALES (§ 480*)—INFANTS (§ 58*)—CONDITIONAL SALES—REMEDIES OF SELLER—DEFENSES.

Where personal property is sold under a contract by which the seller retains the title by duly recorded written instrument, and the purchaser resells the property to another, who in turn sells or otherwise disposes of it, the original seller may maintain trover against the person to whom the original purchaser sold; and in such a case it is no defense that the original purchaser was a person under the age of 21 years.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. § 1448; Dec. Dig. § 480.* Infants, Cent. Dig. § 150; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

2. SALES (§ 480*)—TROVER AND CONVERSION (§ 40*)—CONDITIONAL SALES—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Where the title of a plaintiff in a trover suit is held by him as security for purchase money or other debt, and he elects to take a money verdict, he is entitled to recover, either the highest value of the property between the date of the conversion and the date of the trial, or the value of the property at the date of the conversion with interest thereon, subject, however, to the condition that under neither choice can he recover more than the amount of the debt for which the property stands as security.

(a) The phrase "the highest proved value between the conversion and the trial" does not mean the highest estimate given by any witness as to the value during the period stated, but means the highest value which the jury, from consideration of all the proof, finds that the property was worth at any time during that period, if during the period there was a change in its value.

Error from City Court of Jefferson; W. W. Stark, Judge.

Action by the Woodruff Hardware & Manufacturing Company against Paul Elder. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Reversed.

Ray & Ray, for plaintiff in error. G. A. Johns, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. [1] The Woodruff Hardware & Manufacturing Company sold a buggy and harness to one Maddox, who in turn sold it to Elder, who in turn resold it to another. The original seller had taken from Maddox a note for the purchase money, in which title was vested in the seller until the amount of the note was paid. This note was duly witnessed and recorded. It appears that Maddox was a minor at the time when he gave the note. The Woodruff Company brought trover against Elder. There was a conflict in the evidence as to the value of the property at the time Elder bought it, but the court directed a verdict in the plaintiff's favor for the full amount of the purchase price, as represented by the note given by Maddox to the plaintiff. The plaintiff had such title as to authorize him to maintain trover against Elder. Ezzard v. Frick, 76 Ga. 512. The fact that the maker of the note by which the plaintiff reserved title was a minor makes no difference. "The exemption of the infant is a personal privilege, * * * nor can third persons avail themselves of it as a defense." Civil Code 1910, § 4234. Even if the infant had been the defendant in the present case, he could not have pleaded his infancy as against the recovery of the property, for the action of trover sounds in tort, and infancy is usually no defense to an action in tort, where the infant has arrived at the age of discretion. Civil Code 1910, § 4501; Malone v. Robinson, 77 Ga. 719. So that, under the particular facts of the case, the court ought to have instructed the jury that they should find in favor of the plaintiff.

[2] 2. The error into which the court fell was that he directed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount of the purchase price of the buggy as fixed in the contract between the plaintiff and Maddox, the original purchaser, although there was evidence that at the time of the defendant's conversion of the property it was worth much less than that sum. It is well settled by a number of cases that where a seller has retained title as security for his purchase money, or where one otherwise holds title to personal property as security, and he brings trover, the amount of the indebtedness remaining due at the time of the trial fixes the maximum of his recovery. Clark v. Bell, 61 Ga. 147; Bell v. Ober, 96 Ga. 214, 23 S. E. 7; Bradley v. Burkett, 82 Ga. 255, 11 S. E. 492. However, where the seller, who has retained title as security for his purchase money, brings trover, even against the original purchaser, his act in bringing the suit operates as a rescission of the sale; and if he elects to take a money verdict, he cannot recover more than the value of the property at the time of the conversion, with interest or hire, or the highest proven value between the conversion and the trial, accordingly as he may elect, notwithstanding the balance due on his debt may be a larger amount. Moultrie Repair Co. v. Hill, 120 Ga. 730, 48 S. E. 143; Hodges v. Cummings, 115 Ga. 1000, 42 S. E. 394. As between the original seller and the original purchaser, the agreed price as stated in the contract of sale is prima facie, but not conclusive, evidence of the actual value of the property. But as between the seller and third persons the amount stated in the contract of purchase is of no such evidentiary value. In this case the proof as to the value of the property at the time of the defendant's conversion and subsequently was in decided conflict, and therefore presented a jury question.

Counsel for the defendant in error ingeniously argue that the amount of the sale price, evidenced by the title-retaining note, and the highest proven value of the property are in this case identical, and that there cannot be hurt to the plaintiff in error because the judge took the amount of the sale price to fix the sum for which he directed the verdict. He bases this contention on the fact that the highest estimate of value given by any witness tallied in amount with the sale price stated in the note. There is often a very great difference between the highest estimate of value and the highest proved value of an article. Witnesses may vary in their estimates as to what the highest value of the property was between certain dates. Of course, the measure of damages which allows the plaintiff to take advantage of the highest proved value has reference to property which has changed in value between the dates in question, and allows the plaintiff to take the advantage of recovering for the value of the property at that point during the period at which the property was worth the most, whether it be at the beginning of the period, at the end of the period, or at some intermediate time, but does not give him the right to recover the highest amount that any witness is willing to swear the property was worth, unless the jury believe that that witness has correctly estimated the value.

[3] 3. The judgment is reversed, because the court did not submit to the jury the question as to the amount of the plaintiff's recovery.

Judgment reversed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EXECUTION (§ 51*)—PROPERTY SUBJECT—LAND PURCHASED IN PART BY WIFE.

Where a husband, having in his possession certain money belonging to his wife, purchased a parcel of land, paying therefor partly with this money of his wife and partly with money which he borrowed in his own name, and with his wife's consent took the title to the land in himself, with the understanding, evidenced in parol only, that when the sum so borrowed by him was repaid by her to him he would convey the land to her, the legal title to the land was in the husband, and the wife acquired neither legal title nor a perfect equity thereto, even upon payment to the husband of the sum so borrowed, until the husband executed the deed. Likewise the title to crops severed from the land before the deed from the husband to the wife was executed was in the husband, and was subject to a common-law judgment rendered against him in behalf of one of his creditors.

2. EXECUTION (§ 194*)—CLAIM BY THIRD PERSON—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where a levy is made upon property found in the possession of the defendant in fi. fa. and a claim is filed thereto, the burden of proof rests upon the claimant. Where property levied upon and found in the possession of the defendant in fi. fa. was a bale of cotton, and there was evidence from which the jury could find that the title to a part of the cotton in the bale was in the defendant in fi. fa. and a part in the claimant, but the bale of cotton at the time of the levy was in the possession of the defendant in fi. fa., it was not error for the court to charge the jury that the burden was upon the claimant to show what part was subject and what part was not subject, and that upon his failure to do so it would be the duty of the jury to find all of the cotton subject.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence authorized the verdict.

2. NEGLIGENCE (§ 97*)—COMPARATIVE NEGLIGENCE—APPLICATION OF DOCTRINE.

There was no error in the court's instructing the jury substantially to the effect that, though the plaintiff would be prima facie entitled to recover if the runaway in which he was injured was occasioned by the alleged acts of negligence on the part of the defendant, yet that if, after the acts of the defendant's negligence were in progress, the plaintiff could have avoided the consequences by ordinary care and diligence, he could not recover. The charge was not subject to the exception on the ground that it deprived the jury of the right to diminish the damages in accordance with the comparative negligence of the respective parties. The doctrine of comparative negligence is not applicable to cases where the plaintiff failed to observe ordinary care and diligence to avoid the injury, after the negligence of the opposite party was existing and apparent. Atlanta, Knoxville & Northern v. Gardner, 122 Ga. 82, 49 S. E. 818.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1052*)—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE—REVERSAL—TRIVIAL ERROR.

STATE v. PARRIS.

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 114*)—ALLEGATION OF CONVICTION OF PRIOR OFFENSE—NECESSITY.

An indictment need not allege that the offense charged is a subsequent offense for the purpose of increasing the punishment on a conviction and an allegation of a prior conviction should be stricken out on motion of accused.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1202*)—PUNISHMENT—PRIOR OFFENSES—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

To justify the imposition of the increased punishment authorized by Acts 1909 (26 St. at Large, p. 60), prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquor, and declaring, in section 11, that the punishment for the second or any subsequent offense shall be by imprisonment, there must be a prior conviction of a violation of the act, and a former conviction of a violation of a municipal ordinance relative to intoxicating liquors is insufficient.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 762*)—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—CHARGE ON THE FACTS.

Where, on a trial for keeping intoxicating liquors for unlawful sale, there was evidence that accused had concealed on his person intoxicating liquor, and that intoxicating liquor had been found in his house partially concealed, a charge that the jury must determine from the circumstances whether accused had liquor in his possession for an unlawful purpose, and that if a practicing physician had liquor in his possession, the jury would naturally infer that he was going to use the same for medicine, while if a notorious blind tiger traveled around with liquor they would naturally suppose he was plying the trade, was objectionable as a charge on the facts.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court/ of Spartanburg County; Robt Aldrich, Judge.
"To be officially reported."

J. B. Parris was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Reversed.

J. B. Atkinson, for appellant. J. C. Otts, Sol., for the State.

HYDRICK, A. J. Appellant was convicted on an indictment which contained two counts. The first count charged him with "keeping a place where alcoholic liquors are kept for unlawful use, and where people are permitted to come and traffic in liquors"; and the second count charged him with "having in his possession alcoholic liquors for unlawful use, and storing and keeping the same." After the formal parts, the indictment contained the following charge: "And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths, do further present that J. R. Parris has been heretofore duly convicted for violating statutes relating to the sale of liquors and beverages containing alcohol, by a court of competent jurisdiction."

[1] Upon the call of the case for trial, defendant's attorneys moved to strike from the indictment the allegation, above quoted, of a previous conviction, on the ground that it was evidentiary matter or surplusage. The motion was refused, the court holding that, as the statute increased the punishment for a second or any subsequent offense, the allegation that the offense charged in the indictment was of that character was necessary. This view of the law is in harmony with the greater number of decided cases in other jurisdictions. See 22 Cyc. 356, and cases cited. But the contrary rule was established in this state in Smith's Case, 8 Rich. 460, where the court held that the indictment need not state whether it is for the first or second offense, though the second offense, in that case, was punishable with death, while the first offense was punishable only with whipping. To the same effect is the case of State v. Allen, 8 Rich. 448. We think, therefore, the motion should have been granted.

[2] Section 11 of the act of 1909 reads: "Any person who violates any of the provisions of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, be fined in a sum not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five hundred dollars, or imprisoned at hard labor for a period of not less than three months, nor for more than one year; and for the second or any subsequent offense, upon conviction thereof, shall be imprisoned at hard labor for not less than one year nor more than five years." Under the allegation in the indictment of a former conviction, evidence was admitted that appellant had been convicted and sentenced for violating some ordinance of the city of Spartanburg relative to intoxicating liquors. The record is very indefinite, and falls to disclose the exact charge upon which he was convicted in the city court, but whatever it may have been, his conviction in that court was not sufficient to warrant an increase of punishment under the section above quoted upon his subsequent conviction in the circuit court for a violation of the act of 1909; for "the second or any subsequent offense" referred to in section 11 above quoted means a second or any subsequent offense committed in violation of any of the provisions of that act. Therefore, the increased punishment can be imposed only upon proof of a former conviction for violation of the provisions of the act of 1909, and the conviction in the city court could not have been such, for that court has no jurisdiction of violations of that act. The imposition of any increased punishment in this case, as for a second offense, was therefore erroneous.

[3] There was testimony that on one occasion defendant was arrested by a police officer of the city of Spartanburg, and that he had concealed on his person—in his pockets—seven pint bottles full of whisky and one pint bottle about half full. On another occasion, he was arrested and two bottles of whisky were found on his person which he had been seen to get from under a house back of a hotel. On still another occasion, his house was searched and a keg, containing 4½ gallons, was found under the table in his dining room, partially concealed by the table cloth; and in the drawers of a dresser and in a trunk in his house were found eight pints and a quart bottle about half full. This indictment was based upon the finding of liquors in his house. The court charged the jury in part as follows: "Now, how are you going to determine whether a man has liquor in his possession for a lawful purpose or for an unlawful purpose? Just as you determine any other practical question; from the circumstances. If you see a practising physician going along in his buggy with a bottle of liquor in his possession, you would naturally infer that he is going to see a sick man, and that he is going to use that liquor for medicine; if you saw a notorious blind tiger traveling around with numbers of bottles of liquor stored about all over his person, you would naturally suppose that he was plying his trade—you judge of those things from the circumstances." Appellant alleges that this was a charge upon the facts. The exceptions raising this point are sustained. When used in connection with the testimony in this case, the language above quoted from the charge gave the jury a very clear intimation of the opinion of the judge as to the weight which should be given to the circumstances mentioned and the inference which should be drawn from them. State v. Johnson, 85 S. C. 265, 67 S. E. 453, and cases cited.

There was some testimony tending to support the verdict. There was therefore no error in refusing the motion for a new trial on the ground of an entire absence of evidence to sustain the verdict.

Reversed.

Woods, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Berkeley County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Proceeding by William A. Jeffers, executor of William Jeffers, against Mary E. Jeffers and others to probate the will of plaintiff's decedent. From an order of the circuit court, pending an appeal from the probate court, refusing a motion for a new trial in probate court, plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Mitchell & Smith, John A. Hiers, E. J. Dennis, and Octavus Cohen, for appellant. Legaré & Holman, Mordecai & Gadsden, and Rutledge & Hagood, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. This is an appeal from an order of the circuit court refusing a motion for a new trial in the probate court on the ground that the probate judge at the time of filing the decree herein rendered by him was related to one of the parties to the action within the sixth degree. The proceedings were instituted in the probate court on the 8th of February, 1909, at which time an order was made requiring William A. Jeffers, executor of the will of William Jeffers, deceased, to take such steps as were necessary to have said will probated in solemn form of law. On the 3d of August, 1910, the probate judge, before whom the case was tried, filed a decree in which he ruled that the will propounded for probate was not the last will and testament of William Jeffers, deceased. The executor appealed from said decree, and while the appeal was pending made the motion for a new trial hereinbefore mentioned in the circuit court, which was refused. The motion for a new trial was based upon the following facts alleged in the affidavit made by the executor: "That he was not informed before or at the time the above-entitled cause was tried before the probate judge, nor did he have any notice whatsoever, nor could he have discovered prior to said trial by the exercise of any reasonable diligence that the probate judge who tried the cause was related within the sixth degree, or was second cousin to one of the parties to the cause, to wit, Mrs. Mary E. Singletary, formerly Mrs. Mary E. Jeffers, the widow of the testator, the late William Jeffers; that it is only since the trial and the decision of the probate court in this case that this matter accidentally came to the knowledge of this proponent and his attorneys, who have only now been able to verify and obtain satisfactory proof of the facts above set forth, and the motion for a new trial could not have been made sooner." The reasons assigned by his honor, the circuit judge, for refusing said motion, are thus stated in the following order made by him on the 8th of March, 1911: "This cause having come on, on a motion to remit the case to the probate court for a new trial, on the ground that the probate judge who heard the cause was within the prohibited degree of relationship; now, on hearing the motion and affidavits on both sides, and counsel on both sides being heard, it is ordered that, although it appears from the weight of the testimony that the probate judge of Berkeley county, who heard the case below, was related to Mary E. Jeffers, one of the defendants herein, within the sixth degree, yet it does not sufficiently appear that the petitioner could not by due diligence have ascertained that fact before or during the trial or before the decision in the probate court; and therefore, in the opinion of the court, the motion for a new trial should be and is hereby refused." When this case was called for hearing in the Supreme Court, the respondents' attorneys raised the following preliminary question of jurisdiction, upon which they gave notice they would rely, as an additional reason, for sustaining the judgment of the circuit court: That the court of common pleas has no jurisdiction to entertain a motion for a new trial in the probate court on notice and affidavit, but that such motion should have been made before the judge of probate in the court of original jurisdiction."

[1] In the first place, we do not regard the question as jurisdictional in its nature. The case of Jenkins v. Railway, 84 S. C. 343, 66 S. E. 409, shows conclusively that the court of common pleas has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and that, even if that court did not have jurisdiction of the person in the first instance, it acquired such jurisdiction, when the party now interposing the objection contested the case upon the merits. See, also, Ex parte Hilton, 64 S. C. 201, 41 S. E. 978, 92 Am. St. Rep. 800. We proceed to the consideration of the question whether there was error on the part of his honor, the circuit judge, in ruling that the motion for a new trial could not be sustained, as it did not sufficiently appear that the petitioner could not by due diligence have ascertained the relationship before the rendition of the decision in the probate court.

[2] At common law a judge was not disqualified from presiding by reason of his relationship to a party to the action, but had the privilege of declining to sit in such cases. It is now, however, generally provided by constitutional or statutory law that relationship by affinity or consanguinity between him and a party litigant within certain degrees will disqualify him. 23 Cyc. 583.

[3] In the absence of statute changing the common law, a judgment rendered by a disqualified judge was held to be merely voidable, and not void. The judge's action was regarded as an error or irregularity, and, as such, a ground to set aside the judgment on error or appeal, except in inferior courts or proceedings, where no writ of error or appeal would lie.

[4] In proceedings under the common law objection to a disqualified judge might be waived by a party so as to preclude him from afterwards taking advantage of it. 17 Enc. of Law, 742. See, also, note to the case of Carr v. Duhme, 10 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 987. Section 6, art. 5, of the Constitution, provides that "no judge shall preside, at the trial of any cause, in the event of which he may be interested, or when either of the parties shall be connected with him, by affinity or consanguinity, within such degrees as may be prescribed by law." Section 2820 of the Code of Laws is as follows: "No judge or other judicial officer, shall preside on the trial of any cause, where he may be connected with either of the parties by consanguinity or affinity, within the sixth degree."

[5] A judgment rendered by a disqualified judge in this state is merely voidable. Ex parte Hilton, 64 S. C. 201, 41 S. E. 978, 92 Am. St. Rep. 800. In the note on page 995, 24 Enc. of Law (1st Ed.), the principle is thus stated: "After a trial has been commenced, no attempt to recuse a judge will be listened to, unless it be shown affirmatively that the party was not aware of the objection, and was in no fault, for not knowing it." (Italics ours.) This language is quoted with approval in Ex parte Hilton, 64 S. C. 201, 41 S. E. 978, 92 Am. St. Rep. 800. In the case of Town of Clinton v. Leake, 71 S. C. 22, 50 S. E. 541, it was held that the objection that members of the town council were related to the defendant would not be considered, where the record failed to show that such objection was urged at the trial. In the note to Johnson v. State (Ark.) 15 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 531, appears the following quotation from Roberts v. Roberts, 115 Ga. 259, 41 S. E. 616, 90 Am. St. Rep. 108: "The reasons at the foundation of the rule which forbid a juror from sitting in a case, where he is related to some one pecuniarily interested in the result of the suit, would also apply in the case of a judge who was in a similar situation."

Turning to the case of State v. Robertson, 54 S. C. 147, 31 S. E. 868, we find that the rule is thus stated, in regard to the disqualification of a juror: "While it is true that in the cases of Kennedy v. Williams [2 Nott & McC. 79] and Garrett v. Weinberg [54 S. C. 127, 31 S. E. 341, 34 S. E. 70] supra, some stress is laid, and in a proper case properly laid, on the fact that the disqualification of the juror was not known to the party or his counsel, until after the trial, yet we think this should be qualified by the proviso that such ignorance is not due to the want of diligence; for, where the disqualification relied on might have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary diligence, it affords no excuse for failing to make the objection in due season; for, as was said in State v. Fisher [2 Nott & McC. 261], supra, a party 'should not be permitted to take advantage of his own negligence.' This language is quoted with approval in State v. Rafe, 56 S. E. 379, 34 S. E. 660, in which the court also says: "It was necessary for the appellant to show, not only that he did not know of the juror's disqualification until after the trial, but that by the use of due diligence he could not have discovered the same." (Italics ours.)

[6] If the appellant in addition to showing the disqualification of the probate judge, and that he (the appellant) did not have knowledge of such fact, before the decree was rendered, had also shown that the probate judge knew at that time of his relationship to one of the parties to the action, then it might with good reason be contended that there should be a new trial.

[7] But no such fact appears in the record, and the presumption is that the probate judge was not aware of the relationship, as otherwise he would have been guilty of a willful violation of the law, which is never presumed. In the absence of testimony, showing that the probate judge had knowledge of said relationship, it has not been made to appear that there was prejudicial error in refusing the motion for a new trial.

Appeal dismissed.

JONES, C. J., concurs. HYDRICK, J., did not sit in this case.

WOODS, J. (dissenting). I dissent because I am unable to accept the doctrine that the provision of the Constitution prohibiting a judge related within the sixth degree to either party from hearing a cause is waived by the failure to inquire into the relationship before trial.

All the requirements of the Constitution of this state are mandatory, and it is therein provided by article 5, § 6, that "no judge shall preside at the trial of any cause in the event of which he may be interested, or when either of the parties shall be connected with him by affinity or consanguinity, within such degrees as may be prescribed by law." The statute law has fixed the sixth degree of relationship, and the probate judge in this case was a second cousin. In some of the states the courts have held that such a mandatory provision cannot be waived. Oakley v. Aspinwall, 3 N. Y. 547; Gulf, etc., Ry. Co. v. Looney, 42 Tex. Civ. App. 234, 95 S. W. 691. Other courts, including the Supreme Court of this state, have held that a party will be held to have waived the objection if he knew of the relationship before the trial. Ex parte Hilton, 64 S. C. 201, 41 S. E. 978, 92 Am. St. Rep. 800. Other authorities on the subject are collated in 23 Cyc. 596, and the note to Moses v. Julian, 84 Am. Dec. 130. In several of the states the decisions will be found to depend on the special terms of the Constitution or statute law.

It concerns not only the parties to the suit, but all the people, that there should be confidence in the impartiality of judges. The prohibition of the Constitution is directed to the judges themselves, forbidding them to preside at a trial when related to a party within the degree fixed by law. The law is intended, not only to give security to the parties and to promote confidence in the courts, but to safeguard judicial officers against criticism. There may be, it is true, special circumstances requiring a party to make inquiry as to the relationship or interests of the judge. But the judge himself may well be presumed to know his own relationship within the sixth degree, and as a general rule the parties may well rely on this presumption, and on the further presumption that the judge will be mindful of the law on the subject and will obey it.

It would be unseemly that parties should have placed upon them the burden of inquiring at their peril into disqualifying interests and relationships of judicial officers. Jurors and judges in this respect stand on a very different footing. Jurors are drawn from the body of the people for a temporary public service. Judicial officers are set apart because of their supposed special fitness for continuous public service. The presumption that judges know the law bearing upon their own qualifications and official duties is very strong. Such presumption as to jurors is comparatively weak. Hence the law allows to parties the opportunity to examine jurors upon their voir dire, and places upon parties the burden of making reasonable efforts before trial to ascertain and make known facts tending to disqualify them. In view of this distinction, it seems clear that the case of State v. Robertson, 54 S. C. 147, 31 S. E. 868, and other similar cases relating to jurors, do not control this case. The facts in the case of Clinton v. Leake, 71 S. C. 22, 50 S. E. 541, cited in the opinion of Mr. Justice GARY, were so different that it seems to me that case is obviously inapplicable.

The point was made in this court for the first time that the circuit court had no jurisdiction to hear the motion to remand the case to the court of probate for a new trial by a duly qualified judge of that court. I am unable to find any mode of procedure in such case laid down by statute, or by rule of court, or by judicial decision in this state. but it seems to me evident that when any appellate court finds on its docket a case in which the fact is made clearly to appear that the judgment appealed from was not rendered by a court constituted according to the Constitution and laws of the state, and the parties have not waived their right to such a tribunal, it should refuse to hear the appeal and remand the case to be tried by a properly constituted court.

For these reasons, I think the judgment of the circuit court should be reversed.

TRAYNHAM v. CHARLESTON & W. C. RY. CO.

1. COMMERCE (§ 33*)—INTERSTATE COMMERCE—WHAT IS.

A shipment from one point in the state to another point in the same state is nevertheless interstate commerce where the route of the railroad between those two points lies partly within the boundaries of another state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. §§ 26, 81; Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

2. COMMERCE (§ 61*)—INTERSTATE COMMERCE—STATE REGULATION—DELAYS WITHIN THE STATE.

The statute subjecting railroads to penalties for delay in shipment of freight within the state is not a burden on interstate commerce, though railroads are liable for those delays in interstate shipments which occur wholly within the state, as the statute instead of creating a burden, aids such commerce by seeking to compel performance by the carrier of its duty to deliver freight with reasonable diligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. §§ 81-84, 89; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

Gary, A. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Laurens County.

Action by Z. R. Traynham against the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Simpson, Cooper & Babb, for appellant. Richey & Richey, for respondent.

JONES, C. J. We do not think the statute as applied to a delay wholly within the state is obnoxious to the interstate commerce clause of the federal Constitution. In Hunter v. Railway, 81 S. C. 173, 62 S. E. 13, construing this statute the court said: "The statute cannot have operation beyond the territory of the state and should not be so construed as to interfere substantially with transportation in its interstate features. Possibly in case of a transportation beginning and ending in this state, but the necessary route going partly in another state, it would not materially interfere with interstate transportation or commerce to penalize for delay occurring wholly within this state, but such is not the case at bar and we reserve opinion on that point." The present case squarely presents the point reserved in that case.

[1, 2] It is conceded that the transportation in this case is interstate because partly in another state, under the authority of Hanley v. Kansas City Ry., 187 U. S. 617, 23 Sup. Ct. 214, 47 L. Ed. 333, and that state legislation cannot be allowed to operate so as to materially affect or burden such transportation. The real question then is whether the legislation in question construed with reference to a delay wholly within the state is any substantial burden on interstate commerce. The Hanley Case, supra, related to the right of a railroad commission to fix a rate of transportation on a shipment between two points in a state where a large part of the route was outside the state. The crux of the case was the fixing of a rate of transportation which of necessity directly operated upon such portion of the transportation as was outside of the state, and this distinguished the case from Lehigh Valley Ry. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 145 U. S. 192, 12 Sup. Ct. 806, 36 L. Ed. 672, where a state tax upon gross receipts for the proportion of transportation within the state was held not to interfere with interstate commerce as applied to a railroad doing interstate business.

That the statute is within the valid exercise of the police power of the state and not a burden on interstate commerce as applied to the penalizing of a delay occurring wholly within this state is shown by the principle declared in Western Union Tel. Co. v. James, 162 U. S. 850, 16 Sup. Ct. 934, 40 L. Ed. 1105; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Commercial Mill Co., 218 U. S. 406, 31 Sup. Ct. 59, 54 L. Ed. 1088; Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Co. v. Mazursky, 216 U. S. 122, 30 Sup. Ct. 378, 54 L. Ed. 411; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Crovo, 220 U. S. 364, 31 Sup. Ct. 400, 55 L. Ed. —. The last-mentioned case, which was decided in April, 1911, held that a statute of Virginia which imposed a penalty upon telegraph companies for failure to transmit within the state as promptly as practicable a message received in the state for transmission to a person in another state is a valid exercise of police power, in the absence of legislation by Congress on the subject.

The statute in question operates wholly within the state, makes no attempt to interfere with interstate commerce, creates no burden upon such commerce, but aids it, in seeking to compel performance by the carrier within this state of its duty to the public to deliver freight with reasonable diligence.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

WOODS and HYDRICK, JJ., concur.

GARY, A. J. (dissenting). This is an action for the recovery of a statutory penalty, and for damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff, in consequence of an unreasonable delay on the part of the defendant, in transporting certain articles of merchandise. The allegations of the complaint, material to the consideration of the questions involved, are as follows:

"That heretofore, to wit, on the 4th day of March, 1907, the Ashpoo Fertilizer Company, delivered to the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, at Charleston, S. C., 10 tons of guano, consigned to Z. R. Traynham, at Barksdale in Laurens county, and state aforesaid. That at Yemassee in the state aforesaid, on March 5, 1907, the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, delivered the car containing said guano, to the defendant the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company, for transportation to the plaintiff at Barksdale, S. C. That the distance between Yemassee and Barksdale, both of which are in the state of South Carolina, is not over 200 miles, by the nearest railroad route. That although the said car of guano was received by the defendant on March 5, 1907, and the defendant was requested to make prompt shipment thereof, the said car of guano was not delivered to the plaintiff until the 6th day of April, 1907. That by and under the statute law of South Carolina all common carriers doing business in this state are required to transport to its destination all freight received by them for transportation, not exceeding the following limit, * * * and for failure to comply with the said statute, such common carrier so failing, shall be subject to a penalty of five dollars per day, for every day of delay, in excess of the time hereinabove limited."

The defendant denied that the delivery of the guano at its destination was unreasonably delayed, and alleged that the delay was caused by an unusually heavy movement of freight, at that time, over the line of the defendant, which caused its yards and tracks to be blocked at the transfer points, and made it impossible to reach the car and move it at an earlier day. The defendant also alleged that the shipment was subject to the laws relating to interstate commerce, and not to state legislation, by reason of the fact, that the defendant's line of railway, over which the guano was being transported, lies partly in the state of South Carolina, and partly in the state of Georgia. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $60, and the defendant appealed.

The testimony shows that the shipment began and terminated at its destination in this state; that a part of defendant's line, over which it was necessary for it to transport the goods, lies within the state of Georgia.

The first question that will be considered is whether it was an interstate or an intrastate shipment. The cases of Sternberger v. Railway, 29 S. C. 510, 7 S. E. 836, 2 L. R. A. 105, State v. Holleyman, 55 S. C. 207, 31 S. E. 362, 33 S. E. 366, 45 L. R. A. 567, Frasier & Co. v. Ry., 81 S. C. 162, 62 S. E. 14, Hunter v. Ry., 81 S. C. 169, 62 S. E. 13, and Hanley v. Kansas City Ry., 187 U. S. 617, 23 Sup. Ct. 214, 47 L. Ed. 323, determine, beyond question, that it was an interstate shipment. In the case of Hunter v. Ry., 81 S. C. 169, 62 S. E. 13, the same railroad company was involved and the facts, in every respect, were similar to those now under consideration, except in that case, the delay occurred in the state of Georgia.

The title of the act (24 St. at Large, p. 671) then and now before us for interpretation is: "An act to prevent delays, in the transportation of freight, by railroads in this state." The first section provides: "That from and after May 1, 1904, all railroad companies, doing business in this state, shall transport to its destination, all freight received by them for transportation, within the state. * * *" In that case the court used this language: "Construing the words 'transportation within the state,' according to their exact and natural meaning, they do not embrace interstate transportation. (Citing authorities.) The statute, therefore, cannot have operation beyond the territory of the state and should not be so construed, as to interfere substantially with transportation in its interstate feature. * * * Transportation is a part of commerce, and it must be held that the transportation in this instance was not wholly within the state, but was in part within the state of Georgia, and was, therefore, interstate transportation." If no other language had been used by the court in that case, it would be unnecessary to cite authorities to show that the statute of this state is inapplicable. But the court left open the question, whether a case is embraced within the terms of the statute, when the delay takes place wholly in this state. In Hanley v. Kansas City Ry., 187 U. S. 617, 23 Sup. Ct. 214, 47 L. Ed. 333, the court quotes with approval the following language from Pacific Coast S. S. Co. v. R. R. Commissioners (C. C.) 9 Sawy. 253, 18 Fed. 10: "To bring the transportation within the control of the state, as part of its domestic commerce, the subject transported must be within the entire voyage under the exclusive jurisdiction of the state."

An interstate transportation is continuous in its nature, and if a state statute could have the effect of breaking the continuity of transportation, it would necessarily interfere with interstate commerce. State v. Holleyman, 55 S. C. 207, 31 S. E. 362, 33 S. E. 366, 45 L. R. A. 567. As an interstate transportation must be regarded as an entirety, it is difficult to conceive how a delay may take place within a state, without being affected by causes operating at some other place on the line of railroad, even in another state. It would certainly be an onerous burden on interstate commerce, to hold that a shipment during its actual transportation, could be subjected to state legislation at any point on the line whatever before it reached its destination.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed.

(96 S. C. 398)

HARMON v. HARMON et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 7, 1911.)

1. WITNESSES (§ 150*)—COMPETENCY—TESTIMONY OF PERSONS INTERESTED AGAINST REPRESENTATIVE OF PERSON DECEASED.

Under Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 400, which provides that parties may be witnesses in their own behalf, except as to transactions with decedents, in actions by heirs, etc., the testimony of a defendant in partition as to an agreement between himself and his deceased father is competent, where the plaintiffs claim as heirs of defendant's deceased brother.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Dec. Dig. § 150.*]

2. TRUSTS (§ 110*)—CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS—EVIDENCE TO ESTABLISH—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence in a partition suit held sufficient to establish a constructive trust in favor of a party defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Dec. Dig. § 110.*]

3. TRUSTS (§ 95*)—"CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS."

A constructive trust arises whenever another's property has been wrongfully appropriated and converted into a different form, as if one person having money belonging to another wrongfully uses it for the purchase of land, and takes the title in his own name, in which case equity impresses a constructive trust upon the land not only while in the hands of the original wrongdoer, but as long as it can be followed and identified, except in the hands of a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 145-147; Dec. Dig. § 95.*]

4. ESTOPPEL (§ 58*)—GROUNDS—INCONSISTENCY OF CONDUCT—CLAIM.

Estoppel by conduct rests upon the principle that the conduct of the party estopped has misled another to his prejudice, and, where the money of a party defendant in a partition suit had been used by his father in the purchase of land, the title to which was put in a brother's name, defendant's acceptance of a deed of the dower rights of his brother's widow does not estop him from claiming against his brother's heirs, since their rights were not adversely affected by his acceptance of the deed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. §§ 144, 145; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

5. TRUSTS (§ 108*)—CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where defendant in a partition suit claimed as constructive trustee land to which his brother had held record title, the fact that he accepted a deed of dower rights in his brother's estate is competent as evidence of an implied admission that the beneficial title was in the brother.

6. ESTOPPEL (§ 90*)—GROUNDS—ACQUISITION—PREJUDICE.

Where money of defendant was used by his father in the purchase of land, title to which was put in the name of defendant's minor brother with an intent to delay the father's creditors, and to prevent defendant's interference with the possession of the land, defendant was not estopped from asserting a constructive trust by acquiescence in the transfer, since such creditors would not have been entitled to subject the land to the payment of their claims in any event.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. §§ 242-256; Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Berkeley County; G. W. Gage, Judge.

Action for partition by D'Orrielle Harmon against Duncan Harmon and others. Complaint dismissed, and plaintiff and defendants, except Duncan Harmon, appeal. Affirmed.

Octavus Cohen, for appellants. Lewis G. Fultz, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. This is an action for partition. The complaint alleges that William H. Harmon died intestate seised in fee of the land therein described, the same having been conveyed to him by James W. Brownlee by deeds dated June 14, 1855, and May 25, 1861; that his widow, Margaret, and his children, the plaintiff and the defendants Angel and Marie, are his only heirs; that his widow conveyed her dower in said land to the defendant Duncan A. Harmon, who is therefore made a party. The defendant Duncan admits the allegations of the complaint, except that William was seised of the land in his own right, and claims to be the sole owner thereof, alleging that Enoch, the father of himself and William, purchased the land from Brownlee and paid for it with funds belonging to him, but had the titles made in the name of William, then an infant about 11 years old; that thereby a trust arose in his favor; that he has paid the taxes thereon and all expenses connected therewith, and has been in exclusive possession thereof for more than 20 years, claiming the same as owner thereof; that during the life of William the land was forfeited to the state for nonpayment of taxes, and it had not been redeemed up to the time of his death, but, after the death of William, desiring to redeem the land, he was required by the commissioners of the sinking fund to produce some written evidence of being the owner of an interest therein, and for that reason he obtained a conveyance from Margaret of her dower therein; and thereupon he was allowed to and did redeem it.

The master found the facts to be substantially as alleged by Duncan, and, further, that, when Duncan redeemed the land in 1889, he returned it for taxes in his own name, and has ever since paid taxes on it; that he has been in possession of it for about 50 years, ever since it was purchased from Brownlee. It appears from the testimony that Enoch and his two sons lived on the land until the death of Enoch, and that after the death of Enoch the two sons lived on the land until a few years after William's marriage, when he moved off to educate his children, leaving Duncan in possession. The master held that, by accepting the deed from Margaret conveying to him her dower therein, Duncan thereby acknowledged that the land belonged to William in his own right, and he was therefore estopped from claiming that William held the title merely as trustee for him; for, in that case, his widow would have had no dower in the land. The master further found that Enoch had the title put in the name of William, then an infant 11 years of age, to shield the land from his creditors, and to prevent Duncan from interfering with his possession thereof; and held that Duncan, having acquiesced in the fraud perpetrated on his father's creditors for more than 50 years, is now estopped from setting up any claim to the land. Upon exceptions to the master's report, the circuit court sustained all his findings of fact, but reversed his conclusion that Duncan was estopped from claiming the land by his acceptance of the deed of Margaret to her dower therein and by acquiescing in the alleged fraud upon his father's creditors, and dismissed the complaint, holding that, the trust having been established, Duncan was the sole owner of the land.

The exceptions assign error (1) in not holding that the testimony of Duncan Harmon as to transactions and communications between himself and his father, Enoch Harmon, then deceased, was obnoxious to section 400 of the Code of Procedure, and should, therefore, have been excluded; (2) in holding that the evidence established a trust in favor of Duncan; (3) in not holding that Duncan was estopped from claiming the land by accepting the deed of William's widow to her dower right therein, thereby admitting the beneficial title to have been in William and also by his long acquiescence in the alleged fraud on his father's creditors.

[1] The testimony of Duncan as to the transactions between himself and his father was not obnoxious to section 400 of the Code, because it was not against a party prosecuting or defending the action in any character mentioned in that section. The plaintiff and other children of William claimed the land as his heirs, and not as heirs of Enoch. If they had been prosecuting the action as heirs of Enoch, then the testimony of Duncan as to any transactions between himself and Enoch would have been obnoxious to that section. Norris v. Clinkscales, 47 S. C. 488, 25 S. E. 797.

[2, 3] We agree with the circuit judge in holding that the evidence was sufficient to establish a constructive trust in favor of Duncan. "A constructive trust arises whenever another's property has been wrongfully appropriated and converted into a different form. If one person, having money or any kind of property belonging to another in his hands, wrongfully uses it for the purchase of lands, taking the title in his own name; or if a trustee or other fiduciary person wrongfully converts the trust fund into a different species of property, taking to himself the title; or if an agent or bailee wrongfully disposes of his principal's securities, and with the proceeds purchases other securities in his own name, in these and all similar cases equity impresses a constructive trust upon the new form or species of property, not only while it is in the hands of the original wrongdoer, but as long as it can be followed and identified in whosoever hands it may come, except into those of a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice, and the court will enforce the constructive trust for the benefit of the beneficial owner or original cestui que trust who has thus been defrauded. * * * It is not essential for the application of this doctrine that an actual trust or fiduciary relation should exist between the original wrongdoer and the beneficial owner. Wherever one person has wrongfully taken the property of another, and converted it into a new form, or transferred it, the trust arises and follows the property or its proceeds." 8 Pom. Eq. Jur. (3d Ed.) § 1051. See, also, section 1049, where it is said the doctrine applies to the cases of persons "purchasing property with money belonging to the separate estate of their wives, parents, and children, and all persons who stand in fiduciary relations towards each other."

[4, 5] The doctrine of estoppel has no application to this case, as it does not appear that the rights of William or of those claiming under him have been adversely affected by the conduct of Duncan in accepting the deed from Margaret for her dower in the land. Estoppel by conduct rests upon the principle that the conduct of the party estopped has misled another to his prejudice. The fact that he accepted the deed was competent as evidence of an implied admission on his part that the beneficial title was in William, but he satisfactorily explained his reasons for accepting the deed, and thereby removed the force of the admission.

[6] As to his acquiescence in the alleged fraud perpetrated by his father upon his creditors, we agree with the circuit judge. In the first place, there was no fraud upon Enoch's creditors. They had no right to nor interest in money in Enoch's hands which belonged to Duncan, who owed them no legal duty. They could not have reached the land, if the title had been put in Enoch's instead of William's name, because it was impressed, in equity, with a trust in favor of Duncan, whose money paid for it, and whose equity, so far as the evidence shows, was superior to theirs. The acquiescence of Duncan in allowing the title to remain in William after his father had had it so made was natural under the circumstances, and is explained by the relations of the parties.

Affirmed.

BRUCE v. CITY COUNCIL OF GREENVILLE.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 911*)—BONDS—"IMPROVEMENT"—BRIDGES.

Under an amendment to the Constitution ratified by Act Feb. 20, 1905 (24 St. at Large, p. 955), providing that a city might increase its bonded indebtedness for the improvement of streets, the construction of a bridge in place of a previous bridge, which spanned a river, dividing a city street, is an "improvement" of the street, and bonded indebtedness may be incurred to pay for such improvement.

Original petition by J. B. Bruce against the City Council of Greenville to enjoin the issuance of certain municipal bonds. Petition dismissed.

Haynsworth & Haynsworth, for petitioner. Oscar Hodges, for respondent.

WOODS, J. In this proceeding instituted to enjoin the city council of Greenville from issuing certain municipal bonds, the following are the admitted facts:

The city of Greenville is incorporated under the General Statutes of this state (Code 1902, vol. 1, § 1972), having surrendered its old charter and received a new one February 14, 1911. By an amendment to the Constitution proposed by joint resolution February 19, 1904 (24 St. at Large, p. 676), and ratified by an act of February 20, 1905 (24 St. at Large, p. 955), it was provided that the city of Greenville might increase its bonded indebtedness to an amount not exceeding 15 per cent. of the value of its taxable property, where the proceeds of the bonds are applied to the payment "of past indebtedness, to expenses and any liabilities incurred or to be incurred in the improvement of streets and sidewalks, and for providing sewerage for said city, or any part thereof, for purchasing, owning or operating waterworks or electric light plants." In the early part of the year 1910, a petition from the freeholders of the city of Greenville was presented to the city council, asking for an election upon the question as to whether the city of Greenville should issue bonds in the sum of $200,000, "to be used solely for the improvement or paving of its streets and sidewalks and building Main Street bridge." In this petition it was stated that $20,000 should be used for building a bridge, and $180,000 for street improvements. The election was duly held, and a large majority voted in favor of the issue of the bonds. Street improvement bonds to the amount of $100,000 have already been issued and sold, and out of the proceeds $20,000, provided for in the petition, has been expended on Main Street bridge. The city has now negotiated the sale of the remaining $100,000 worth of bonds, the proceeds of this second sale to be used in paying for street paving, a large part of which work has already been done. The sale of these bonds has, however, been held up, because the objection was raised that, if the city had no authority to issue bonds for the building of Main Street bridge, this would enter into and affect the validity of the entire issue, and not merely the validity of the $20,000 worth of bonds, the proceeds of which were actually used in paying for this bridge.

The only question concerning the validity of the bond issue is whether "the building" of Main Street bridge is "an improvement of streets and sidewalks," within the meaning of the amendment to the Constitution above referred to. The bridge in question spans Reedy river where it is crossed by Main street. For many years there has been a bridge at this point, and before the first bridge was built there was a ford. The new bridge is at the same place, but slightly larger than the old bridge. The walls and arches are of reinforced concrete, filled in with dirt. On the bridge will be laid asphalt sidewalks and vitrified brick paving, corresponding in all particulars with the other portions of Main street. Unless the bridge can be said to be a part of the street, so that the building of it would come within the provision for paving streets and sidewalks, the city has no authority to issue bonds for that purpose. If the proceeds of the bond issue had been used or were to be used for the construction of a river bridge costing $20,000, where there had been no bridge before, the question might be a serious one. In a very large sense, the construction of such a bridge might be considered improvement of a street; but it might be argued that such construction should be regarded a distinct municipal enterprise, not intended by the Constitution to fall under the head of a mere street improvement. Schneider v. Detroit, 72 Mich. 240, 40 N. W. 329, 2 L. R. A. 54. On this question we express no opinion. But where, as in this case, there is already a bridge over the river constituting a part of the street, it seems to be clear that the improvement of the river crossing by repair or reconstruction of the bridge must be held to be an improvement of the street. 2 Dillon on Mun. Corp. § 729; Berlin Iron Bridge Co. v. San Antonio (Tex. Civ. App.) 50 S. W. 408; Huggans v. Riley, 125 N. Y. 88, 25 N. E. 993; Sandpoint v. Doyle, 14 Idaho, 749, 95 Pac. 945, 17 L. R. A. (N. It is the judgment of this court that the petition be dismissed.

WARREN et al. v. WILSON.

1. TRESPASS TO TRY TITLE (§ 1*)—NATURE OF REMEDY—"TRESPASS QUARE CLAUSUM FREGIT."

The purpose of the action of trespass to try title being to establish the plaintiff's title to land, the plaintiff must show title in himself and recover upon the strength of his own, and not the weakness of his adversary's title, while in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit the object is to recover damages for the trespass, and mere possession will support the action; and hence a complaint which seeks to recover damages for trespass upon stating title in plaintiff and ouster by defendant, and praying damages for the ouster and the possession of the land alleged to be wrongfully withheld, states a cause of action of trespass to try title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trespass to Try Title, Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 8, pp. 7093, 7094.]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 215*)—ADMISSIBILITY.

Plaintiffs in trespass to try title claimed as devisees of a testator who died in 1906, in possession of the land by defendant as tenant. Defendant denied all the allegations of the complaint except his possession, and alleged that he had been in possession for over 25 years as exclusive owner. Held, that it was error to exclude an unexecuted deed in the handwriting of defendant, dated in 1904, purporting to be made by testator, as grantor, to the plaintiff of the lands involved; it being in the nature of an admission by defendant against his claim of ownership.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 754-759; Dec. Dig. § 215.*]

3. TRESPASS TO TRY TITLE (§ 45*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO ISSUES.

In trespass to try title, the complaint alleged that plaintiffs were entitled to the land as devisees of a decedent, and that defendant had entered upon the land as tenant of the decedent, and that testatrix being so seised during her lifetime by defendant as her tenant, defendant, after her death, took and held possession in his own right and ousted plaintiff. The court charged the jury that they must find for the defendant, unless they "find that defendant's possession is that of a tenant of the decedent." Held, that this charge was erroneous, being too restrictive of the issues, and authorizing a verdict for defendant if he were not a tenant of the decedent, regardless of the superiority of plaintiff's title.

4. TRIAL (§ 243*)—CONFLICTING INSTRUCTIONS.

It is error to give contradictory instructions on a material issue.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Colleton County; R. C. Watts, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by G. L. Warren and others against P. J. Wilson. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

See, also, 71 S. E. 513.

Warren & Warren and Perurifoy Bros., for appellants. Padgett, Lemacks & Mooror and Howell & Gruber, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action to recover the possession of certain lands and damages. As there is a question as to the nature of the action, we reproduce the complaint, which is as follows: "That heretofore, to wit, on the ——— day of December, 1906, one Georglaetta H. Warren departed this life leaving a last will and testament, whereby she devised to the plaintiffs above named all of her property, both real and personal. That during her lifetime, and at the time of her death, she was seised and possessed of all that tract of land situate, lying, and being in the county of Colleton, state of South Carolina. * * * That, being so seised and possessed of the aforesaid tract of land during her lifetime by her tenant, the defendant aforesaid, the defendant upon her death took and held possession in his own right, and ousted the plaintiffs herein, and now holds and occupies the same unlawfully, to plaintiffs' damage $300. Wherefore plaintiffs demand judgment against defendant: (1) For the possession of the above-described tract of land. (2) For $300 damages sustained by them, by the unlawful ouster of them by said defendant." The defendant denied each and every allegation of the complaint, except "that he is in possession of the said premises, and has been in actual possession thereof for more than 25 years last as the exclusive owner thereof." The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiffs appealed.

[1] The first question that will be considered is whether the complaint sets forth what would formerly have been denominated an action quare clausum fregit. Mr. Chief Justice McIver in the case of Connor v. Johnson, 59 S. C. 115, 37 S. E. 240, thus points out the difference between an action quare clausum fregit and an action of trespass to try title: "There is this fundamental difference between these two actions, viz.: That in the former, the object being to recover damages for trespass, upon the possession of the land, it is not necessary for the plaintiff to show title himself, but possession merely; while in the latter the plaintiff, in order to recover, must show title in himself, and must recover upon the strength of his own title, and not upon the weakness of his adversary's title. Accordingly, in an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, when the plaintiff proves that he is in possession of a given tract of land, and that defendant has trespassed upon it, he is entitled to recover, unless the defendant shows that he has title to the land himself—not that the title is in some third person, as would be sufficient to protect him, if the action were an action of trespass to try titles, or that he entered upon the land and did the acts complained of as trespasses, by the permission or under a license, from the true owner of the land." The present action does not merely seek to recover damages for alleged trespasses on the land, but also possession of the land. It cannot therefore be properly denominated an action quare clausum fregit.

[2] The next assignment of error, which will be considered, is as follows: "Because his honor, the presiding judge, erred in not allowing the plaintiffs to introduce in evidence a written title deed, not signed, to the premises, the subject of the action from G. H. Warren to G. L. Warren, dated the 22d day of November, 1904, alleged to have been written by the defendant and proved to have been written by him by the undisputed testimony in the case." The following statement appears in the record: "That during the progress of the said trial, and during the cross-examination of the defendant in the case, plaintiffs' attorney offered in evidence a deed written by P. J. Wilson in his own handwriting from G. H. Warren to G. L. Warren which deed was never executed fully or delivered, purporting to convey from said G. H. Warren to G. L. Warren the lands which are the subject-matter of this action, and that the presiding judge refused to allow the introduction of said deed in evidence." It thus appears that the defendant P. J. Wilson actively participated in a transaction which was inconsistent with the theory that he was the owner of the land, and which, if it had been consummated, would have estopped him from asserting title to the land as against G. L. Warren and G. H. Warren. Chambers v. Bookman, 67 S. C. 432, 46 S. E. 39. It was in the nature of an admission against his interest, while he was in the possession of the land, and his honor, the presiding judge, erred in refusing to allow it to be introduced in evidence.

[3,4] The next question for consideration is raised by the following exception: "His honor, the presiding judge, was in error in charging the defendant's second request to charge, as follows: 'That the jury must find for the defendant, unless they find that the defendant's possession is that of tenant of Miss Warren'—the error being that the jury were thus limited to the consideration of only one question, that of tenancy, whereas the issue of title should have been submitted to them, as to whether the plaintiffs or the defendant had the better title, this request being, in effect, a direction of a verdict for the defendant on all issues in the case except, that of tenancy." By reference to the complaint, it will be seen that it does not allege that the defendant is now in possession of the land as a tenant, but it does allege, in effect, that having entered as such during the lifetime of Miss G. H. Warren he forfeited his rights as a tenant, when "upon her death he took and held possession in his own right, and ousted the plaintiffs herein, and now holds and occupies the same unlawfully." As the complaint did not allege that the defendant was at this time in possession as a tenant, it will readily be seen that the charge was prejudicial to the rights of the appellants.

Furthermore, his honor, the circuit judge, charged the jury, as follows: "The case, according to my views, resolves itself as to whether or not Wilson went in as a tenant. If he went in as a tenant of Miss Warren, and paid her rent and acknowledged her as his landlord, either put in there by herself or any one acting for her, and he continued in possession of that land, exercising supervision over it until she died, then plaintiffs are entitled to recover, if he went in, not as her tenant, and occupied the land for 20 years or more openly, notoriously, continuously, and adversely, then your verdict would be for him. If he went in not as a tenant of Miss Warren, and occupied the land for 10 years openly, notoriously, continuously, and adversely, then your verdict would be for him. If he went in as her tenant and subsequently vacated the land, and terminated his tenancy and moved off somewhere else, and then went in under a paper title from some one else, didn't go in as her tenant, and occupied the land for 10 years openly, notoriously, adversely, and continuously claiming it as his own against her and all the world, then your verdict would be for him." The charge "that the jury must find for the defendant, unless they find that the defendant's possession is that of tenant of Miss Warren," rendered unnecessary that the jury should pass upon these facts, which the presiding judge instructed them would defeat the plaintiff's right to recover possession of the land in case they found that the defendant was not in possession of the land as tenant. The charge was erroneous, as it was too restrictive of the issues.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and that the case be remanded for a new trial.

ATLANTIC COAST LUMBER CORPORATION v. E. P. BURTON LUMBER CO.

1. INJUNCTION (§ 132*) — PRELIMINARY INJUNCTIONS—SCOPE OF REMEDY.

Where plaintiff was not in possession, a preliminary injunction restraining defendant from cutting or removing timber should not have prohibited defendant from entering the land, and it was proper to modify the injunction, so as to allow defendant to saw timber already cut, thereby preventing its loss, as an interlocutory injunction is to preserve the existing status during the litigation, and will not be allowed to have the effect to transfer property from one in possession to another who claims it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 302; Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

2. INJUNCTION (§ 136*) — PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION—GROUNDS.

Where plaintiff, a lumber company, seeking an injunction against another company which it alleges is trespassing on its property, does not allege that plaintiff is in possession, or that defendant is insolvent, or that the injury to plaintiff is irreparable, the court may refuse a preliminary injunction and leave plaintiff to its remedy at law.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Berkeley County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by the Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation against the E. P. Burton Lumber Company. From an order modifying a preliminary injunction, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Willcox & Willcox and Octavus Cohen, for appellant. Nathans & Sinkler, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. Plaintiff brought this action for damages and injunction, alleging that it is the owner in fee of the land described in the complaint, and that defendant had trespassed thereon, and had threatened to continue trespassing thereon, by cutting and removing the timber therefrom. Upon the verified complaint, Judge Wilson granted an order restraining defendant from cutting or removing timber from the land in dispute, or from entering thereon. Plaintiff was required to give an injunction bond, as provided by statute, in the sum of $5,000. The defendant answered, admitting that it had been and was cutting and removing the timber, but denied plaintiff's title to the land.

Upon the answer, which was verified, and the affidavit of E. H. Burton, president of the defendant company, from which it appeared that defendant was and had been in actual possession of the land in dispute, and that before the restraining order was issued a large quantity of timber had been cut, which was then lying on the ground and would be ruined, unless it was sawed into lumber before the litigation could be ended, and that defendant alone had the necessary logging equipment to handle it, the circuit judge, on motion of defendant, modified his preliminary order, so as to allow defendant to remove the timber which had already been cut, upon its giving bond for plaintiff's protection in the sum of $5,000, the amount of damages alleged in the complaint. From this order plaintiff appealed, contending that, in effect, it operates to compel the sale of its property to defendant, and is, therefore, a taking of private property for private use without consent of the owner, in violation of the inhibition of the Constitution.

[1] It is clear that such contention is unsound. Ordinarily the purpose of an interlocutory injunction is merely to preserve the existing status during the litigation, and as a general rule, subject to some exceptions, which need not be mentioned here, it will not be allowed to have the effect of transferring the possession of property from a litigant in possession to another who claims the right to possession. Pelzer v. Hughes, 27 S. C. 408, 3 S. E. 781; Northwestern R. Co. v. Colclough, 84 S. C. 37, 65 S. E. 950. In this case the plaintiff does not even allege that it was in the actual possession of the land or the timber which had been cut. On the other hand, it appeared that defendant was in possession thereof, and it did not appear that its possession was tortiously obtained. Therefore the preliminary restraining order should have been modified, so that it would not have the effect of depriving defendant of its possession of the land, though it was proper, on the showing made, to enjoin any further cutting of timber during the litigation.

[2] But as to the timber which had already been cut the order appealed from was more favorable to plaintiff than it was entitled to as a matter of right, because that timber, having been cut before the order was issued, had become personal property, and as there was no allegation of insolvency of defendant, or of irreparable injury to plaintiff growing out of the use thereof by defendant, the court might well have set aside the preliminary restraining order and left the plaintiff to its remedy at law, which, for aught that appears, was plain and adequate.

STATE v. BRIGHT.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 7, 1911.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 187*)—SELF-DEFENSE—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Acts of decedent done immediately before the homicide to show his mental attitude are admissible on the issue of self-defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 187.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 336*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS REMARKS OF TRIAL JUDGE.

Where sufficient evidence was admitted of the acts of decedent immediately before the homicide to give the jury information on the subject of the mental attitude of decedent toward accused, who relied on self-defense, the expression of opinion by the circuit judge against the admission of evidence of overt acts of decedent to show his vicious humor was not prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 336.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 656*)—MISCONDUCT OF TRIAL JUDGE—COMMENT ON MATTERS OF FACT.

Where accused, charged with the murder of his father, relied on self-defense, and the evidence showed that decedent had struck his wife and accused, that on the day of the homicide decedent's wife because of his conduct fled from him, and went to accused's house, the remarks of the trial judge expressing a positive opinion that the evidence offered in support of the plea of self-defense tended to prove that the killing was committed with malice were in violation of the Constitution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1524-1533; Dec. Dig. § 656.*]

4. HOMICIDE (§ 336*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS REMARKS OF TRIAL JUDGE.

The error of the court in expressing its opinion on the evidence that it proved the malice of accused was not available to accused where he was found guilty only of manslaughter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 707; Dec. Dig. § 336.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 762*)—INSTRUCTIONS—MATTERS OF FACT.

A charge in a homicide case that the blood of a fellow citizen cries out from the ground, and that civilized society is demanding protection at the hands of the jury, and that the jury should not forget that there are other lives which may be taken and which will probably be taken, or spared according as the jury discharge its duties, is objectionable, as leading the jury to believe that a verdict of conviction is essential to protect society, and is violative of the Constitution prohibiting the trial court from charging as to matters of fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 762.*]

6. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—SELF-DEFENSE—INSTRUCTIONS.

A charge on self-defense which correctly declares that where one takes the life of another to save his own life, or to save himself from serious bodily injury, and he is without fault in bringing on the difficulty, and he has no other reasonable means to escape but to kill his assailant, he acts in self-defense, and that self-defense is based on necessity, is defective for failing to state, as requested, that one who kills another makes out his plea of self-defense where he proves by a preponderance of the evidence that when the fatal shot was fired accused believed that he was in danger of death or serious bodily harm, and that it was necessary to shoot to save himself, and that the circumstances induced that belief in the mind of a person of ordinary reason.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Cherokee County; Robt. Aldrich, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Travis Bright was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

Butler & Hall, H. K. Osborne, and R. A. Dobson, for appellant. Solicitor J. C. Otts, for the State.

WOODS, J. In March, 1910, the defendant, Travis Bright, shot and killed his father, Hose Bright. On his trial in the court of general sessions for Cherokee county he set up the plea of self-defense, and was convicted of manslaughter.

The case is singular, in that there is little, if any, material difference in the testimony of the witnesses for the state and for the defense. Hose Bright was a quiet and amiable man when sober, but aggressive and violent when drinking. For a day or two before his death he had been on a spree, and had threatened and struck his wife and the defendant. On the day of the homicide his wife, after being struck by him, fled from him, and in her flight went to the house of N. P. Smart, where the defendant was lying in bed somewhat unwell. Mrs. Bright did not stop in the room where defendant was, but as she passed through cried out: "O Lordy, don't let him get to me. He is going to kill me." The defendant testified that he then got out of bed, took a pistol from a bureau drawer, and sat down in a chair, holding the pistol in his lap. The following account by the defendant of the killing is in agreement with that of the other witnesses: "Q. Did you hear any noise from your father out there? A. No, sir. I didn't know he was out there, and he says—when he came in he commenced cursing me, and he says to me, 'I want what you owe me.' I says, 'All right, Pa, I will give it to you this morning,' and I says, 'Pa, I want what you owe me.' He says, 'Owe you—you God—I don't owe you anything.' And he struck at me and I threw up my hand and knocked the lick off, and the next time he struck at me right along there [indicating] and knocked me over in the chair. And, as I rose, I shot him and he threw his hands so, and says, he staggered and says, 'Lordy, Trate, you have killed me'; and I says to him, 'Pa, I had it to do.'" The defendant further testified that his father threatened to kill him, but struck with his hand only, and he saw no weapon at that time, though he had seen a knife in his father's hand on the same evening at defendant's own house. We think consideration of the exceptions in detail not necessary to the decision of the appeal.

[1] The exceptions assigning error in the exclusion of testimony as to the hostile attitude and unreasonable and general threats of the deceased are not well founded. Such testimony as to acts done immediately before the homicide tending to show the mental attitude of the deceased is clearly admissible where the plea is self-defense. State v. Smith, 12 Rich. 430; State v. Thrallkill, 71 S. C. 140, 50 S. E. 551; State v. Miller, 73 S. C. 279, 53 S. E. 426, 114 Am. St. Rep. 82; State v. Springfield, 86 S. C. 318, 68 S. E. 563.

[2] It is true the circuit judge did express his opinion against the admission of testimony as to overt acts of the deceased tending to show his vicious humor, but the record shows that enough evidence on this subject was admitted to give the jury ample information on the question.

[3] In expressing his opinion as to the competency of evidence of threats and violence of the deceased towards his wife before the homicide, the circuit judge said with respect to an objection by the solicitor: "I don't see why you object to that, because he is going straight on proving malice on the part of that boy." Again, on the same subject, he said to defendant's counsel at different times: "There is no use in your asking me that question. You are perfectly familiar with the rules. You know you are getting on unfortunate ground when you try to set up what took place between the deceased and his wife, out of the presence of the defendant, because, if you are allowed to show that, you would show malice on his part. * * * I want counsel to understand the trend that this examination has been taking all along will make it necessary for me to charge that jury, when I come to charge them, that, if the defendant in shooting his father that night was influenced by any ill treatment of his mother previous to the time of the shooting, that that is malice. So far from being any cause of justification, it goes to make out the crime of murder. * * * It can serve no possible good purpose whatever under the charge I am going to make to that jury. I mean just what I am telling you. His duty was to have gone to a peace officer and have him bound over if he was going to injure his mother, not to kill him for it; and I hate to see a man prejudiced in the way he is being done in the view of the law that I entertain and shall present to that jury." Taken together, these remarks expressed a positive opinion of the circuit judge that the evidence which was offered by the defendant in support of his plea of self-defense and much of which was admitted tended to prove that the homicide was committed with malice. The question whether the killing was malicious being a vital one in the case, the remarks of the judge were in violation of the Constitution under the rule laid down in Willis v. Telegraph Co., 73 S. C. 379, 53 S. E. 639, State v. Arnold, 80 S. C. 383, 61 S. E. 891, and Latimer v. General Electric Co., 81 S. C. 374, 62 S. E. 438.

[4] It is to be observed, however, that the expression of the opinion of the judge related to the element of malice, and the jury by the verdict of manslaughter found for the defendant on the issue of malice. For this reason, the error is not available to the defendant as a ground of reversal. State v. Robertson, 54 S. C. 147, 31 S. E. 888.

There are numerous exceptions to the charge, but we think all of them except two have been eliminated by the verdict for manslaughter, instead of murder, or are based on too great refinement of criticism. The conclusion is unavoidable, however, that there must be a new trial for two errors committed in the charge.

[5] The following instruction was given to the jury: "There is nothing in the whole range of human experience that is more solemn, more sacred, or more important than the trial upon which we are now engaged. The issue involved in this proceeding is the life or the death of a fellow man, a power, except in the single instance of a case like this, which should reside only in the hands of God. On the other hand, the blood of a fellow man cries out from the ground. A civilized society is demanding protection at our hands to-day. Every consideration should be extended to the accused, but at the same time it should not be forgotten that there are other lives which may be taken and which probably will be taken or spared, according as we discharge our duties here to-day, and we can only perform the sacred responsibilities resting upon us by approaching the performance of our duties soberly, discreetly, and in the fear of God." The portion of this instruction which we have italicized could not fail to convey to the jury the impression that the presiding judge was of the opinion that the duty of the jury required them to find such a verdict as would prevent other lives being taken, that a verdict in favor of defendant would probably result in the taking of other lives, and that civilized society demanded protection against such an act as the defendant had committed. The right of the defendant was to have the jury determine primarily whether he killed his father feloniously or in self-defense, without respect to the effect of their determination in producing or preventing other crimes, or the effect of their verdict on society in any other respect. It is perfectly proper for a circuit judge to state to a jury their duty to society to bring in a verdict of guilty if they are convinced of the guilt of the accused, but an exhortation to protect society should always be predicated on the jury's conviction of guilt. We are unable to escape the conclusion that the charge on this point was in violation of the section of the Constitution which prohibits a circuit judge from charging in respect to matters of fact.

[§] The court correctly charged: "Where one takes the life of another to save his own life or to save himself from serious bodily harm, he being without fault in bringing on the difficulty, and having no other reasonable means of escape but to take the life of his assailant, that is justifiable self-defense." The jury were also correctly charged that self-defense is based on necessity. But the fatal defect in the charge on this point was the failure to instruct the jury in the general charge or in response to the request of defendant's counsel that one who kills another makes out the plea of self-defense if he proves by the preponderance of the evidence that, when the fatal shot was fired, the defendant believed that he was in danger of death or serious bodily harm from his assailant, and that it was necessary for him to shoot as he did to save himself from death or serious bodily harm, and that the circumstances were such as to induce that belief and lead to that action by a person of ordinary reason and firmness.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the cause be remanded to that court for a new trial.

STATE v. HUNTER.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 8, 1911.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 236*)—OFFENSES—EVIDENCE.

Where separate indictments charged accused with selling intoxicating liquors on designated dates to persons named in violation of the dispensary law, and the evidence showed a sale between designated dates, but the sales were not confined to the date specified in either indictment, a conviction on the two indictments could not be sustained, but a conviction on either was justified.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1167*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS RULING ON INDICTMENTS.

Where the court, in sentencing accused found guilty of selling intoxicating liquor in violation of the dispensary law, sustained accused's contention that the evidence showed only one offense, and that a conviction on the two separate indictments charging separate offenses could not be sustained, the ruling that the indictments charged separate offenses and that he could be convicted on both was immaterial.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 739*)—SEPARATE OFFENSES—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether the offense charged in each of several indictments is the same offense is for the jury, unless a jury trial is waived.

4. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 228*)—VIOLATION OF DISPENSARY LAW—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where, on a trial for violating the dispensary law, there was evidence that a third person was accused's agent, or that he acted in concert with accused and sold liquor from accused's house with his knowledge, the testimony of witnesses that they bought liquor from the third person at or near accused's house was admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 228; Dec. Dig. § 228.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Where witnesses testified that they obtained whisky at accused's house, the error in permitting a witness to give hearsay testimony to the same effect was harmless.

6. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 239*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

A charge that if accused or any other person sold liquor it was a violation of the dispensary law, and the jury could find accused guilty, was not misleading, as permitting the jury to convict accused on proof that a third person with whom he had no connection had violated the law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 239.*]

7. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 242*)—OFFENSES—PUNISHMENT.

Where one was convicted of violating two provisions of a statute imposing a fine of not more than $500 for each offense, a fine of $600 was not excessive, but was within the discretionary power of the court.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Laurens County; J. H. Marion, Special Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Green Hunter was convicted of violating the dispensary law, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Richey & Richey, for appellant. R. A. Cooper, Sol., for the State.

HYDRICK, J. At the September, 1910, term of court of general sessions for Laurens county two indictments for violation of the dispensary law were found against the defendant Green F. Hunter, in each of which there were three counts—one for selling, one for storing and keeping in possession, and one for handling and delivering in the nighttime. One charged the defendant with selling to B. B. Hill, C. E. Roland, Sam Sloan, and Nat Wallace on December 11, 1909. The other charged him with selling to the same persons on December 15, 1909. The defendant took the position that he was charged in both indictments with the same offense. The presiding judge ruled that the offenses alleged on several days were separate and distinct, and that the defendant could be convicted on both indictments. At the close of the testimony for the state, the solicitor entered a nolle prosequi on the count in each indictment charging the defendant with handling liquor in the nighttime. Counsel for the defendant then moved the court to direct a verdict of not guilty, upon the ground that there was no testimony that the defendant had sold any liquor, or that he had stored and kept any liquor. The motion was overruled. The jury convicted defendant on both indictments, whereupon he moved for a new trial upon the same ground upon which he had moved for the direction of the verdict, which motion was overruled. When the defendant was called for sentence, his counsel took the position that he could not be sentenced on both indictments, as he had been convicted twice for the same offense. The presiding judge sentenced him to six months' imprisonment at hard labor or pay a fine of $600, $100 being suspended during good behavior. This sentence was written on the indictment which charged the violation of the dispensary law on December 15, 1909. The defendant was not sentenced on the other indictment.

The record does not disclose any distinct ruling of the court in response to defendant's objection to being sentenced on both indictments on the ground that he had been convicted twice for the same offense. But, as the court ruled at the beginning of the trial that the indictments charged separate and distinct offenses, and, after hearing the evidence, in response to defendant's objection and contention above stated, imposed sentence only on one of the indictments, we construe the action of the court as sustaining the defendant's contention that the evidence showed only one offense and that both convictions could not be sustained.

[1] In this there was no error, because the testimony was sufficient to sustain a conviction on either indictment, but not on both. The evidence as to the sales was not confined to the date specified in either indictment. In fact, there was no evidence of a sale on either date, but there was evidence of sales between the 1st and 15th of December, 1909, which was sufficient to sustain a conviction on either indictment; for sales on other days than that alleged in the indictment may be proved. State v. Anderson, 3 Rich. 172; State v. Prater, 59 S. C. 271, 37 S. E. 933; State v. Green, 61 S. C. 12, 39 S. E. 185. But upon such evidence the conviction on both indictments could not have been sustained. State v. Van Buren, 86 S. C. 297, 68 S. E. 568.

[2] Therefore the exception which questions the first ruling of the court becomes immaterial, and it will not be necessary to discuss the question involved in that ruling. But see State v. Cassety, 1 Rich. 90; State v. Anderson, 3 Rich. 172; State v. Steedman, 8 Rich. 312; State v. Van Buren, 86 S. C. 297, 68 S. E. 568.

[3] The question whether the offense charged in each of several indictments is the same is one of fact to be tried by a jury, unless that mode of trial is waived. State v. Dewees, 76 S. C. 72, 56 S. E. 674.

[4] There was no error in admitting the testimony of witnesses that they had bought whisky from Fate Blakely at or near defendant's house, and that they had seen others buy from him, because there was testimony from which it was reasonably inferable that Blakely was defendant's agent, or that he was acting in concert with him and selling liquor from his house with his knowledge and sanction. State v. Prater, 59 S. C. 271, 37 S. E. 933; State v. Marchbanks, 61 S. C. 17, 39 S. E. 187.

The third exception charges error in the refusal to strike out the testimony of the witness Hill that Eugene Roland and Sam Sloan got whisky at defendant's house, when it appeared from cross-examination of the witness that he did not know the fact, but was testifying from what they had told him. This exception must have been taken through inadvertence, because the record plainly shows that, on motion of defendant's attorney, so much of Hill's testimony as involved what Roland and Sloan had told him was stricken out.

[5] Moreover, it would have been harmless error, if the ruling had been as alleged, because the record shows that Roland and Sloan both testified that they got whisky at defendant's house.

There was abundant testimony to sustain a conviction on one of the indictments, and there was therefore no error in refusing defendant's motion to direct a verdict of not guilty on both indictments.

[6] There is no merit in the exception which imputes error to the trial judge in charging the jury, "if the defendant or any person sells liquor, * * * it is a violation of the law, and you would be entitled to find this defendant guilty." We are sub-ified that there was no one of the jury so lacking in intelligence as to suppose for a moment that the court meant to instruct the jury that defendant could be convicted upon proof that another person, with whom he had no connection, had violated the law.

[7] The last exception charges error in imposing a greater fine than the maximum amount prescribed in the statute. Each count in the indictment charges a substantive offense, the violation of a separate and distinct provision of the statute, which provides (26 Stat. 60, § 11) that for the violation of any of its provisions a fine of not more than $500 may be imposed. As defendant was convicted of violating two of its provisions, the court may have imposed an aggregate fine of $1,000. Within the limits of the statute the amount of fine imposed is discretionary with the trial court. State v. Sheppard, 54 S. C. 178, 32 S. E. 146.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Aiken County; Robt. Aldrich, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Allie Pennington and others against J. A. Pennington. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Davis, Gunter & Gyles, for appellant, J. B. Salley, for respondents.

HYDRICK, J. [1] This action was brought by plaintiffs, as heirs at law of A. M. Pennington, to compel the specific performance of a parol contract between their intestate and the defendant for the conveyance of land. It was referred to the master to take and report the testimony to the court. He was not required to and did not report his findings and conclusions, which should have been done in a case like this, where the issues involved the statement of accounts between the parties.

[2] The circuit court found that the contract was made, as alleged, and that plaintiffs' intestate had been put in possession of the land, and had made valuable improvements thereon, under the contract, which took the case out of the statute of frauds. The evidence was such that it could not have been satisfactorily determined whether the purchase money for the land had been fully paid, without a statement of the accounts between the parties. There was evidence tending to show that some payments were made on the contract by A. M. Pennington during his lifetime. As to some of them, the evidence was not only vague and indefinite, but conflicting. After his death, his widow and children, the plaintiffs herein, remained upon the land, and the crops of cotton raised by them, including that of the year 1903, but not that of 1907, were turned over to the defendant, who furnished the necessities for the support of the family and making the crops. The circuit judge made no attempt to state the accounts, but said at the foot of his decree: "I have made no attempt to state the accounts between the parties. They have been so irregularly kept, and in some instances not kept at all, and the evidence is so vague and uncertain that I could reach no satisfactory solution of them. The parties themselves for a considerable time seemed to regard the mutual indebtedness in the light of a stand-off, and I think equity will be done by leaving them in that condition." There is nothing in the record to sustain the finding that the parties regarded their mutual indebtedness in the light of a stand-off. The only thing that appears as to that is that they did not have a settlement; but the plaintiff, Allie Pennington, testified that she asked defendant several times how much she still owed him, which would seem to indicate that she thought there might be something due him.

[3] The burden was upon plaintiffs to prove payment of the purchase money in full, before they could ask that defendant be required to convey. When they proved that the crops of the several years mentioned had been turned over to defendant, the burden was then upon him to discharge himself, according to the rules of evidence, for the value thereof.

[4] This court is satisfied with and confirm the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, except in the particulars herein indicated. But this court will not undertake to state the accounts. The correct procedure in such matters is stated in Talbert v. Hamlin, 86 S. C. 526, 68 S. E. 765, where the court said: "Many of the exceptions to the report of the master and the circuit decree assign error in the accounting without specifying the particular item or items debited or credited to which objection is made, so that, to determine whether there was error in respect to the matters complained of, a detailed examination of the whole account would be necessary. The purpose of referring matters of account to the master is to save the court the time and labor that would be necessary to do the work of an accountant. When the account has been stated, according to correct methods, the exceptions must specify the item or items of debit or credit to which objection is made. The court will not, in response to a general exception alleging error in an account, enter upon a detailed examination of the whole account."

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and the case remanded for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the views herein expressed.

Reversed.

1. COUNTIES (§ 97*)—COUNTY TREASURER—ACTION ON BOND—ACCOUNTING.

The failure of public officials to make annual settlements with the county treasurer as required by Civ. Code 1902, § 431 et seq., is no defense to sureties on the treasurer's official bond; the duty to make such settlements being one which the officers owe to the public, and not to the sureties.

2. COUNTIES (§ 101*)—COUNTY TREASURER—BOND—DEFAULT—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where a county treasurer had held office for two or more successive terms, and suit was brought on the last bond, it would be presumed that the default occurred during his last term, unless the sureties proved that the defalcation in fact occurred prior to the giving of the bond sued on.

3. TAXATION (§ 570*)—COUNTY TREASURER—ACTION ON BOND—EVIDENCE.

Civ. Code 1902, § 451, provides that, after the county treasurer has receipted to the auditor for his duplicate, he shall be charged with the taxes, penalties, and assessments charged thereon except such as may be put on the delinquent list, and that he shall be credited for taxes not collected only on a sheriff's return of nulla bona, or that property was found, but for want of bidders was sold and conveyed to the sinking fund commission by the sheriff, that execution issued and is in the hands of the sheriff, or that taxes, assessments, and penalties had been enjoined by a competent court. Held, that in an action on the county treasurer's bond, he having signed a receipt to the auditor for his tax duplicate reciting that he had compared the treasurer's duplicate with the auditor's duplicate, page by page, that the two books were properly added and proved, and that the tax and assessment were entered on both books, evidence of alleged errors, discrepancies, and mistakes therein was inadmissible.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Berkeley County; Geo. W. Gage, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by the State against John O. Edwards and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Legare & Holman, Mordecai & Gadsden, and Rutledge & Hagood, for appellants.

HYDRICK, J. The complaint alleges that John O. Edwards was appointed treasurer of Berkeley county, and on February 27, 1907, gave bond, as required by law, with the other defendants as sureties, and was thereafter commissioned and assumed the duties of the office; that he was removed from office in January, 1908, and failed to turn over to his successor $5,596.23 of the funds in his hands as treasurer. Judgment was demanded, as for a breach of the bond, for the penalty thereof. The allegations of the complaint were admitted, except those as to the breach of the condition of the bond, which were denied. The sureties set up the further defense that Edwards had been treasurer for several terms, before that upon which he entered when the bond sued on was given, and had given other bonds for the faithful performance of the duties of the office during said terms; that they were discharged from liability on the bond sued on, because the plaintiff, through its officers, failed to discharge the duty imposed by law of making annual settlements with Edwards as treasurer, and of having the same witnessed and his accounts checked and verified by the Comptroller General, the county auditor, and the foreman of the grand jury, as required by statute, which, if it had been done, would have prevented any breach of the bond sued on, or of any of those previously given. The court sustained a demurrer to this defense on the ground that the duty of making annual settlements with the county treasurer and of having same witnessed and his accounts checked and verified by the officers named was imposed by law for the protection of the public, and was therefore a duty to the public, and not to the sureties on his official bond, who could take no advantage of the failure to perform it. The grounds of appeal—four—teen in number—allege only three errors, to wit: (1) In sustaining the demurrer to the special defense interposed by the sureties; (2) in refusing to charge that the state was bound to prove that the shortage occurred during Edwards' last term of office—that is, the term upon which he was entering when the bond sued on was given; (3) in refusing to allow Edwards to examine the abstracts of the tax duplicates furnished him by the county auditor and point out alleged errors, discrepancies, and mistakes therein, notwithstanding he had signed a receipt to the auditor for them in which he stated that he had "compared the treasurer's duplicate with the county auditor's duplicate, page by page, that the two books are properly added and proved, and that the tax and assessment are entered on both books."

[1] The failure of the public officials to make the annual settlements in the manner prescribed by the statute (1 Code 1902, § 431 et seq.) cannot avail the defendant sureties. The principle is clearly and tersely stated in Board of Supervisors v. Otis, 62 N. Y. 95, where the court said: "There is no good reason why the public, having exacted surety from one official for the faithful discharge of his duties, should be held by implication to have guaranteed to those sureties the faithful discharge, by other public agents and officials, of other duties having an incidental or collateral relation to the duties of the principal." See, also, Minturn v. United States, 106 U. S. 437, 1 Sup. Ct. 402, 27 L. Ed. 208; Railroad Co. v. Kasey, 30 Grat. (Va.) 218.

[2] The court correctly charged: "When an officer has held his office for two or more successive terms, and suit is brought on the last bond, it will be presumed that the default occurred during the last term, unless the sureties can prove that, as a matter of fact, the principal had been guilty of a defalcation prior to the execution of the bond sued on." The presumption is that, when the new bond was given and the new term of office entered upon, the officer had in his hands all the money which he ought to have had at the beginning of the term covered by the new bond. In Murfree on Official Bonds, § 219, the rule is thus stated: "When an officer is reappointed and gives a new bond, he is presumed to have on hand all money which his accounts show to be due to the government. Consequently his sureties on his new bond become immediately liable for the amount, and, if they allege that no such amount was then on hand, it is incumbent on them to show that the funds with which their principal then stood charged had been converted by him during the currency of his first bond. They are not, of course, liable for the default of their principal, committed before the execution of their bond, but the onus is upon them to show that it was so committed for every officer is presumed to have done his duty until the contrary is proved; and, as it is the duty of an officer to have on hand balances charged to him in his official accounts, he is presumed to have such funds in hand." See, also, Sumter v. Lewis, 10 Rich. 171; State v. Moses, 18 S. O. 372; State v. Sandifer, 68 S. C. 210, 46 S. E. 1006; 29 Cyc. 1458, 1469, and cases cited.

[3] As to the last ground, we think the statute (1 Code 1902, § 431) is conclusive. It provides that, after the treasurer has receipted the auditor for his duplicate, he shall be charged with the taxes, assessments, and penalties charged thereon, except such as may be put on the delinquent list, and that only the following causes shall be assigned by the treasurer on the delinquent list for not collecting any tax, assessment, or penalty: (1) Sheriff's return of nulla bona; (2) that property was found, but, for want of bidders, was sold and conveyed to the sinking fund commission by the sheriff, pursuant to law; (3) execution issued and in the hands of the sheriff; (4) that such taxes, assessments, and penalties were enjoined by a competent court. No attempt was made to show failure to collect any item with which the treasurer was charged in his duplicate for any of said causes. There is no denial of the testimony of the expert accountants, Wilson and Wise, that Edwards got credit in the accounting for all such items. On the contrary, the record states that "the entries on all settlement sheets were checked up before the jury and found to be correct and to correspond with the books."

John R. Hart and W. W. Lewis, for appellant. J. K. Henry and Thos. F. McDow, for the State.

JONES, C. J. The defendant was tried, convicted, and sentenced upon an indictment charging that he on November 15, 1908, at Yorkville, S. C., "after being intrusted with certain notes for collection, and having collected the sum of five hundred and seventy-three dollars and two cents on said notes for the Planters' Fertilizer & Phosphate Company, a corporation under the laws of said state, in bills and notes and silver, lawful money of the United States, denominations and numbers to the jurors unknown, of the value of five hundred and seventy-three dollars and two cents, of the proper goods and chattels of the said Planters' Fertilizer & Phosphate Company, then and there being found, feloniously did steal, take, and carry away and fraudulently appropriate to his own use against the form of the statute," etc.

On a motion to quash the indictment, which was refused, defendant contended that the indictment violated Article 1, § 18, of the Constitution, in that it does not fully inform defendant of the nature of the accusation against him; the specific objection being that the indictment, while stating that defendant was intrusted with certain notes for collection, failed to state what notes or to describe such notes. We think the indictment sufficient. It fully informs defendant of the nature and cause of the accusation as required by the Constitution and section 58 of the Criminal Code of 1902. The offense charged is not a breach of trust in collecting or disposing of notes, but a fraudulent appropriation of certain money described in the usual way. It was not necessary to describe the notes particularly, as they were not the subjects of the misappropriation, and the money, which was the subject of the misappropriation, was fully described.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

W. F. Clayton and Willcox & Willcox, for appellants. Walter H. Wells, Sol., for the State.

WOODS, J. Elihu Moye was brutally murdered in his own home near Ebenezer, in Florence county, on the night of the 28th of October, 1910. Very soon thereafter, the defendants, Alexander Weldon and William Burroughs, were tried for the crime at a special term of the court of general sessions held for the purpose of the trial. They have appealed from the judgment of conviction and sentence of death.

The case has given this court the utmost concern, not only because the lives of the defendants are involved, but because the record discloses that the trial took place at a time of great public excitement, because the material evidence against the defendants came almost entirely from one Clarence Ham, who claimed to be an accomplice, and who was impeached as a witness by testimony that he had confessed that his accusation against the defendants was false, and because the allegation is made that the excited crowd so took possession of the courthouse and made such threats of violence that the defendants were not given a fair trial.

[1] There is no merit in the exceptions to the charge. Instructions to the jury on the subject of self-defense and manslaughter had no application to the case. The evidence admitted of no other inference than that Elihu Moye had been assassinated in his own house, and the sole issue before the jury was whether the defendants had participated in the murder. State v. Du Rant, 87 S. C. 532, 70 S. E. 306.

[2] For the same reason, the defendants cannot complain of a failure to elaborate the meaning of the word "malice," for there could be no doubt of the malice of the malefactor who committed the homicide.

The instruction as to the testimony of an accomplice was in accord with the law, as stated in State v. Sowell, 85 S. C. 278, 67 S. E. 316.

[3] The following language used by the court evidently could not have been understood by the jury to mean that they were not to consider the turpitude of an accomplice in considering the weight to be given his testimony. "The law in this state for a long number of years was declared by our Supreme Court to be that it was unsafe to convict upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. But our Supreme Court has recently changed that doctrine, and it is not the law now. The law in regard to the testimony of an accomplice is just like it is as to the testimony of any other witness in a case. That is to say, that you are the sole judges of the weight you should give to such testimony."

The exceptions alleging unfairness in the conduct of the trial are as follows: "His honor erred in allowing a crowd, some of whom were bent upon killing the prisoners, to take possession of the courthouse, and hold the same during the trial, occupying every available space, including the bar reserved for the lawyers, to such an extent that the jurors were entirely cut off from the view of counsel, and counsel had to request his honor on several occasions to cause the sheriff to clear away the crowd that counsel might see the witness he was examining, thus; in effect, overawing the jury, and, as such, the accused did not have that fair trial awarded them under the Constitution and laws of the state. That defendants have not had a fair and impartial trial, and have been convicted upon the testimony of Ham, an accomplice, alone, whose testimony is from the many contradictory statements unworthy of belief. That defendants' counsel, hearing the reports upon the streets of lynching as he went to the courthouse at the solicitation of the special judge, and seeing the unusual crowd in the courthouse, did not dare to ask for the three days allowed by law for fear of the murder of his clients. That from this fear he was unable to get up any testimony in behalf of his clients, and went into the trial without knowledge of his defense. That since the trial defendants' counsel has obtained the affidavit of Sallie Weldon, the wife of Alex Weldon, which is incorporated in the case, tending to show an alibi for both of the defendants. That defendants' counsel knew nothing of this evidence, nor could have known of the same unless he had insisted upon this three days, in which event counsel fully believes that he would have endangered the lives of his clients if he had demanded his three days, and by reason thereof defendants have not had a fair trial."

After argument of the appeal, this court made the following order with respect to these exceptions: "As a basis for exceptions charging that the proceedings resulting in a verdict of conviction were so improper or irregular that they should be held not to constitute a fair and legal trial, the defendant should set out in the proposed case the facts relied upon; and, if the case as so made up be not agreed to, it should be submitted to the circuit judge for settlement. In this case the defendants' counsel has submitted to this court in support of his exceptions affidavits which have not been passed upon by the circuit judge by motion for a new trial or otherwise. As the lives of the defendants are involved, the court will overlook all irregularities, and of its own motion refer the entire record to the circuit judge so that he may report fully upon all the matters alleged in the affidavits and exceptions. It is therefore ordered that the clerk of this court do transmit to the Hon. Geo. W. Brown, the special judge who presided at the trial, a copy of the entire record, together with a copy of this order, to the end that he may forthwith certify to this court a statement of all the conditions surrounding the trial and the facts connected with the trial so far as they are germane to the exceptions above quoted and the matters alleged in the affidavits appearing in the record." In response to this order, the following certificate as to the conduct of the trial was submitted by Hon. Geo. W. Brown, the special judge who presided at the trial: "The entire appeal record having been referred to me as the trial judge in the above-stated case by an order of the Supreme Court for a full report upon 'all the matters alleged in the affidavits and exceptions,' to the end that I certify to said court a 'statement of all the conditions surrounding the trial so far as they are germane to the exceptions quoted' in said order 'and the matters alleged in the affidavits appearing in the record,' I beg leave to 'report' and 'certify' that I went from Darlington to Florence on the day of the trial of the case by morning train, arriving on or about schedule time 8:30 or 9 o'clock a. m. and court convened at 10 o'clock a. m. There was a large crowd in Florence during the day, and, when this is stated, all is stated which I know which could excite even casual interest, except that an atrocious assassination of a worthy citizen had been committed, and that the parties charged with the crime were there and then to be tried, and the presence of the crowd was supposedly due to these facts. The presence of such a crowd under these circumstances was natural and proper, and was no surprise to me. I saw very many there personally known to me to be of the best citizenship of the county and of its most law-abiding and patriotic personnel. Why that crowd is denominated a mob I do not know. It certainly manifested no mob spirit to my eye or within my hearing. It was just simply a crowd and quite a crowd for Florence courtroom, and that is all that can be said about it, except 'that it was the best behaved crowd I ever saw,' and I am here quoting in effect my own words when defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled. It did crowd within the bar, of which fact I was not unobservant, but to say that it was in possession of the courthouse and held the same during the trial is a gross misconception of the conditions as I saw them. I had a right to assume, and did assume, that the presence of that crowd was for a lawful purpose not only consistent with the best citizenship, but composed, as it was, in support of law and order. It was certainly wholly lacking in any element of a riotous assemblage, and in no respect was it disorderly; and in this regard, as I am expected to make 'a full report,' it is proper that I should particularize by saying that I saw no evidence of drunkenness (or even evidence of drinking) in the crowd, and it was in all respects quiet and well behaved. An individual instance of bolsterousness or bad conduct did not come within my observation during the term. In every instance when I observed that it was becoming too much crowded within the bar, or my attention was called to such conditions, my admonitions received the most respectful consideration and obedience, and there was never any crowding within the bar that in any way interfered with the orderly dispatch of the business of the court or with the rights of counsel or the accused. If the jury was overawed, intimidated, or put in fear, I am at a loss to know what did it. No member of the jury made any complaint before, during, or since the trial to me. The sheriff was there, and he likewise made no complaint. I went to and from the courthouse unattended, and I have yet to see or hear of any threats or overawing conditions. There was no military in attendance and none suggested, though there is an excellent company in Florence, one in Darlington, and another in Timmonsville, each only 10 miles distant. Counsel for defense did not request the three days and copy of the indictment to which he was entitled on demand, and such demand would most certainly have been granted without any apprehension of danger to counsel or defendants. If there was anything improper or irregular in this trial, I do not know it, and, as long as the statute stands for the speedy trial of criminal offenses at special terms, I doubt if there will ever be in this state a more quiet and less sensational trial. Defendants were ably defended, and the result of the trial is due to the weight which the jury gave to the testimony, which is their exclusive province."

The certificate of the circuit judge cannot of itself have the effect of an adjudication, and it fails to show that the questions made by the affidavits as to the threats made against the defendants and their counsel, the conduct of the trial, and the alleged newly discovered evidence have at any time been passed upon by the circuit court.

[4] After much consideration, there seems to be no escape from the conclusion that this court cannot now consider the grounds for a new trial set out in the exceptions and affidavits, for the reason that it does not appear in the record that they have ever been passed upon by the circuit court.

[5] Questions of fact of the gravest character are involved which should be determined by the circuit court after a full opportunity has been given to the state as well as the defendants to be heard.

The appeal must therefore be dismissed without prejudice to any right the defendants may have to move before the circuit court for a new trial.

STATE v. SMITH.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 5, 1911.)

INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 137*) — QUASHING—RELATIONSHIP OF CLERK TO PROSECUTOR.

It was not an abuse of discretion to quash an indictment because the clerk of the court and ex officio one of the jury commissioners was prosecutor's wife's uncle.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Lee County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge.

Lena Smith was indicted for assault and battery with intent to kill, and the State appeals from an order quashing the indictment. Affirmed.

Philip H. Stoll, for the State. M. L. Smith and Thos. H. Tatum, for respondent.

WOODS, J. This appeal is from an order of Judge Prince quashing an indictment for assault and battery with intent to kill, on the ground that L. A. Moore, clerk of the court of common pleas and general sessions for Lee county, and ex officio one of the jury commissioners who had drawn the grand jury presenting the indictment, was an uncle of the wife of the prosecutor. The circuit judge thus clearly expressed that it was in the exercise of his discretion that he quashed the indictment because of the relationship of the clerk to the prosecutor. "I have held in this case what I meant to hold in the case of the State v. Perry [73 S. C. 199, 53 S. E. 169] and the State v. Henderson [73 S. C. 201, 53 S. E. 170]. It seems that I did not make myself clear in those cases. I thought in the exercise of my discretion that a man within the sixth degree was too close to participate in the drawing of the jury. That is what I intended to hold, and I am still of the opinion, and I am certain that a man within the third degree is too close kin. I think that we must not only deal fairly with alleged criminals before the courts, but we must appear to deal fairly with them, so that the public will not get an erroneous idea that there was any unfairness committed towards the parties."

After a review of the cases, Mr. Justice Gary for the court thus states the rule in State v. Perry, 73 S. C. 199, 53 S. E. 169. "The correct rule is that the consanguinity or affinity must be such as would reasonably lead to the presumption that the jury commissioner would thereby be affected in such manner as to impair the proper discharge of his duties, and this fact must be determined by the presiding judge in the exercise of a sound discretion. It would tend to retard the trial of cases very much to adopt any other rule." It may be well to remark that the trial judge in exercising his discretion is not restricted to the consideration of the degree of relationship only. The court may inquire whether the case had arisen, and whether the officer knew of its pendency when the jury was drawn. These and other pertinent inquiries in addition to the fact of relationship may well enter into the exercise of the discretion of the court. The trial judge in this instance having exercised a reasonable discretion in quashing the indictment, this court cannot interfere.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

FERGUSON v. HENDERSON et al.
PALMETTO BANK OF LAURENS v. SAME.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 5, 1911.)

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 45*)—EXISTENCE OF RELATION—EVIDENCE—WEIGHT.

Evidence in an action on a mortgage note held to show that defendants were principals, and not sureties as claimed by them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. § 22; Dec. Dig. § 45.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Laurens County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Consolidated actions by John W. Ferguson against Lou Henderson and others and by the Palmetto Bank of Laurens against T. B. Henderson and others. From the judgment, defendants Lou Henderson and others appeal. Affirmed.

Simpson, Cooper & Babb, F. P. McGowan, and Richey & Richey, for certain creditors. Dial & Todd, for appellants. Ferguson & Featherstone, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. The question presented by this appeal arose out of the foreclosure of two mortgages of real estate. On the 29th of December 1906, the defendants T. B. Henderson, Lou Henderson, Sue Henderson, Belle Henderson, W. M. Henderson, T. H. Henderson, and J. R. Henderson, made and delivered to the plaintiff John W. Ferguson their promissory note for $1,880, and, in order to secure the payment thereof, executed a mortgage on the tracts of land described in the complaint. On the 18th of January, 1908, the defendants T. B. Henderson, T. H. Henderson, and W. M. Henderson made their note whereby they promised to pay to the order of Palmetto Bank of Laurens $1,614, and executed a mortgage on certain lands to secure the payment thereof. John W. Ferguson commenced an action on the 10th of June, 1909, to foreclose his mortgage, and made the Hendersons hereinbefore mentioned, and all subsequent creditors who had recovered judgment against the Henderson brothers, or who held mortgages executed by them on the lands described in the complaint, parties defendant. About the same time, the Palmetto Bank commenced an action to foreclose its mortgage, and made all the above-named persons parties defendant, except the Henderson sisters. These two actions were afterwards consolidated.

The Henderson sisters in their answer to the complaint of John W. Ferguson, set up the following defense: "That they signed said note, merely as surety for their brothers, the above-named T. B. Henderson, W. M. Henderson, T. H. Henderson, and J. R. Henderson, and they ask that the interest of said brothers in said property be exhausted and applied to the payment and liquidation of said debt before their interest."

The special master in his report says: "The defense of Sue Henderson, Lou Henderson, and Belle Henderson, that they are mere sureties on said indebtedness is not sufficiently made out by the greater weight of the testimony, and the other judgment creditors of the Hendersons had no notice that they claimed to be sureties, and not principal debtors." His honor the circuit judge, concurred in these findings of fact. From the order confirming said report, the Henderson sisters have appealed to this court.

The first question that will be considered is whether there was error in the finding that the appellants were principals, and not sureties. The uncontradicted testimony shows that the note delivered to John W. Ferguson was made for the purpose of raising money, to satisfy a previous note and mortgage executed by all the Hendersons, in favor of M. W. Cooley, and that the money was so expended. As the money was borrowed for the purpose of satisfying the Cooley indebtedness, for which not only the brothers but the sisters were liable, it was not solely nor absolutely the property of the brothers, to expend as they saw fit, but was a trust fund; and, from the executions of the trust, not only the brothers but the sisters derived a financial benefit. It cannot therefore be successfully contended that the appellants were mere sureties.

Having reached this conclusion, the other questions involved become merely speculative.

Judgment affirmed.

STATE v. WILLIAMS.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 5, 1911.)

WITNESSES (§ 405*)—CONTRADICTION—COLLATERAL MATTERS—COMMISSION OF ANOTHER OFFENSE.

In an arson trial, it was reversible error to permit the state to contradict accused on a collateral matter by showing that on another occasion she was arrested, dressed in man's clothes, with a basket of splinters and a bottle of kerosene on her arm; the time and place being too remote to show any connection between the transaction in evidence and the one covered by the indictment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1273, 1275; Dec. Dig. § 405.*]

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Richland County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Henrietta Williams was convicted of arson, and she appeals. Reversed and remanded.

De Pass & De Pass, for appellant. Solicitor Cobb, for the State.

WOODS, J. The defendant was convicted of arson at the summer term of the court of general sessions for Richland county. The sole question made by the appeal is whether there was reversible error on the trial in allowing the defendant to be contradicted on a collateral matter. On the cross-examination of the defendant the solicitor asked this question: "Weren't you arrested in Spartanburg with a basket of splinters and a bottle of kerosene oil on your arm, and dressed in man's clothes, and when you were confronted you said you were a man, and denied you were a woman until you were arrested and carried before the police authorities, and they threatened to strip you?" and the defendant answered, "It was not me." In contradiction of the defendant on this point the solicitor was allowed, over the objection of defendant's counsel, to elicit from the housekeeper of the police station at Spartanburg the following testimony as to defendant's appearance at the police station in that city. "She was dressed in men's clothes, had on a man's hat, had a basket—one of these market baskets—had a bundle of pine splinters that size tied up with a string, and a quart bottle about two-thirds of kerosene, and a box of matches half full, covered up with a skirt or waist over them, and several little things in the bundle of roots."

That the issue thus made was collateral is evident. The reasons for excluding contradictions of a defendant on such an issue are thus stated by Mr. Justice McIver in State v. Wyse, 33 S. C. 582, 12 S. E. 556. "This well-settled rule is founded upon two reasons: First, that while a witness is supposed to be always ready to support his general character, he cannot be expected to be always ready to defend or explain all of his past acts; and hence the rule that in impeaching the character of a witness, the testimony must be confined to evidence of his general character, and it is not competent to prove particular facts affecting his character; second, because the admission of such testimony would tend to multiply the issues and thus confuse the jury."

The contradiction on this collateral matter was highly prejudicial to the defendant, standing her trial on the charge of arson. It amounted to evidence that at an entirely different time and place she was found in disguise with splinters, matches, and oil concealed in a basket. The time and place were too distant to indicate that the preparation attributed to the defendant was for the burning charged in the indictment or was connected with it. Such evidence could not fail to have weight with the jury as indicative of the character of the defendant. She had no notice that she would be required to disprove or explain the disguise and other preparation to which the contradiction related, and it was therefore contrary to the rules of evidence that such an issue should be brought into the trial.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the cause be remanded to that court for a new trial.

STATE v. MILAM.

ADULTERY (§ 14*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held to sustain a conviction of adultery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adultery, Cent. Dig. §§ 27, 31-33; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Laurens County.

"To be officially reported."

J. F. Milam was convicted of adultery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Richey & Richey, for appellant. R. A. Cooper, Sol., for the State.

WOODS, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of adultery, the specification of the indictment being that he was a married man and habitually had carnal intercourse with one Anna Mack. The error assigned in the appeal is the refusal of the circuit judge to direct a verdict of acquittal or to order a new trial on the ground that no evidence was adduced tending to prove the charge.

The appeal must fail, for there was strong evidence of the guilt of the defendant. A number of witnesses testified that Anna Mack lived for about 10 years in a house on defendant's premises a short distance from his own dwelling. Dorroh Jeems and Walter Gilliam, two colored men who had worked for Milam and lived in his yard in the other end of the house occupied by Anna Mack, saw him in bed with her three times in two years. It does not clearly appear that the defendant was married at the time of the occurrences, some years before the trial, Milam's first wife having died some time before. But Mr. W. W. Adair, one of his white neighbors, testified that in the summer of 1908 the defendant introduced a woman to him as his wife saying that they had been married in Clinton; and that she lived with him for three or four weeks thereafter and then left him. In the fall of the same year, according to Adair's testimony, Milam came to him and asked his advice as to reform in his mode of life, and upon Adair's remonstrating with him, he promised to put the Mack woman out into the field after Christmas. Alma Irby, a colored woman, testified that at some time previous to the trial Milam had solicited her, and upon her replying by an accusation that he already had one negro wife, defendant said, "He had Anna and he wanted me." John D. Owings, sheriff of Laurens county, also testified that in the spring of 1909 he had gone to Milam's place at the solicitation of a negro man who wished to marry the Mack woman, and that defendant objected to the woman's leaving his premises, but at last consented when the sheriff told him that he had no right to refuse. It is thus clear that there was evidence tending to show that the illicit relations between the parties continued after the defendant had married a second time.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

ROWE v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1212*)—FORMER APPEAL—DETERMINATION—EFFECT.

On a former trial, the court withdrew plaintiff's cause of action for wantonness from the jury, and accepted a verdict for defendant on a count alleging simple negligence, from which plaintiff appealed. The Supreme Court rendered a decision that the "judgment of the circuit court be reversed and the case remanded for a new trial." Held, that the judgment of the Supreme Court entitled plaintiff to a new trial on both issues of negligence and wantonness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4713; Dec. Dig. § 1212.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 236*)—CITY ORDINANCE—SPEED OF TRAIN.

A city ordinance limiting the rate of speed of trains within the city to 10 miles an hour is valid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 749; Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by C. E. Rowe against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The defendant's exceptions referred to in the opinion were as follows:

"(1) Error in refusing to charge defendant's seventh request, to wit: Seventh request. 'I charge and instruct you that any ordinance of the city of Spartanburg limiting the rate of speed to 10 miles per hour is unreasonable as applied to a particular place, if the evidence shows that at such particular place it was impossible for the railway company to run its train at the speed limited in such ordinance, because if it is impossible to obey an ordinance it is unconstitutional.' The error being, as it is respectfully submitted, that this was a sound proposition of law, applicable to the pleadings and evidence, and should have been submitted to the jury, as requested by the defendant. It further being respectfully submitted that his honor in refusing this request erred in saying to the jury that he had already charged it in another form. It being respectfully submitted that when his honor instructed the jury that an ordinance passed by a city would be valid, unless it was 'so unreasonable as to amount to spoliation of property of the defendant,' he erred, in that an ordinance may be void for unreasonableness, without actually depriving the defendant of its property.

"(2) In charging and instructing the jury in reference to the ordinance limiting the speed of the train as follows: 'Now the defendant says it is unconstitutional, and has asked me to charge you that 10 miles an hour is. I cannot charge you about what is reasonable, and what is unreasonable; I charge you that cities have a right to pass reasonable ordinances on that subject. If you come to the conclusion that the ordinance is so unreasonable as to amount to deprivation, depriving the defendant of its property, or rendering it useless under the circumstances, why it would be unreasonable under the circumstances, but I could not undertake to tell you how many miles; that is a question for you. Ordinarily a person cannot resist a city ordinance on account of mere unreasonableness; but if he can show, if he has satisfied you by the greater weight of the testimony, that the ordinance is so unreasonable as to amount to spoliation of the property of the defendant, depriving it of its property, why then it would be unreasonable, and it would be warranted in disregarding the ordinance.' The error being, as it is respectfully submitted, that by this charge his honor instructed the jury that, unless the ordinance deprived the defendant of its property, or was a spoliation of its property, it would be a reasonable, legal, and valid ordinance. Whereas, it is respectfully submitted that, if it is impossible to obey an ordinance, then it would be unreasonable, even though it did not amount to a spoliation or deprivation of the property of a defendant, and his honor should have so instructed the jury.

"(3) Because his honor erred in submitting to the jury the cause of action as to the negligence of the defendant, and in submitting to them the question whether the defendant was negligent or not, and in instructing the jury that they could find a verdict against the defendant under this cause of action. The error being, as it is respectfully submitted, that this issue having been determined in favor of the defendant when the case was tried before Special Judge C. O. Featherstone, and there being no appeal from the verdict and judgment on this issue, it is res adjudicata.

"(4) Because, when this case was tried before Special Judge C. C. Featherstone, the issue under the cause of action as to the alleged negligence of the defendant having been submitted to the jury, and the verdict of the jury being in favor of the defendant, and there being no appeal from this verdict, it was error for his honor to have submitted this issue to the jury.

"(5) Because his honor having instructed the jury as follows: 'Now, Mr. Foreman, if you come to the conclusion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this case, if you come to the conclusion that he is entitled to recover on his allegations of negligence, either under the statute or common law, he is entitled to recover his actual damages. In a case like this the measure of damages would be the value of the property destroyed at the time it was destroyed, together with legal interest on that amount from the time—when was this suit brought? Mr. Wilson: September 2d was the date of the accident. Court: I don't know whether the measure of damages would be from the time of the accident or from the time that the suit was brought. Mr. Wilson: From the accident, your honor; that is when the damage was done. Court: Then if you find that he is entitled to that, you conclude what the value of the property was at the time of the accident, and add to that interest at the legal rate of interest. he sues, not only for actual damages, but for punitive damages also. If you come to the conclusion that the defendant company was willful, why then you would add such amount of money as you thought would be sufficient or proper to put as punishment upon the defendant for the willful acts, if you find such, because punitive damages are given, not for the purpose of compensating the plaintiff in the case, but are given for the purpose of punishing the defendant and to act as a warning to others to avoid similar acts, as well as for the purpose of vindicating the rights of the plaintiff. So if you come to the conclusion that he is entitled to any damages, you can add such amount to the actual damages as you see proper, but not exceeding the sum claimed in the complaint, which is $500. Now, gentlemen, I think that is about all.' And the verdict of the jury showing that they did not conclude that the defendant was guilty of willfulness or wantonness, his honor erred in not granting a new trial on the ground that the verdict of the jury, being only for the actual value of the property and the interest thereon, showed that they rendered this verdict against the defendant under the cause of action for negligence, and that as such issue had been previously determined in the case when tried before Special Judge C. C. Featherstone, it was res adjudicata, and should not have been passed upon by the jury.

"(6) Because his honor, in refusing the motion for a new trial on the first ground upon which it was made, erred in holding that under the judgment of the Supreme Court on the appeal from the verdict and judgment heretofore rendered the plaintiff was entitled to a trial de novo upon both the issues of negligence and wantonness raised by the pleadings; whereas, it is respectfully submitted, his honor should have held that in granting the new trial this court only passed upon the issues raised by the exceptions then before it, and, as such exceptions only raised the question of error in not submitting to the jury the issues under the cause of action for willfulness and wantonness, that this court in granting the new trial only granted a new trial as to such issues.

"(7) Because, when it appeared to his honor that there was no exception from the verdict of the jury and judgment of the court when the case was tried before Special Judge C. C. Featherstone, as to the cause of action alleging negligence, his honor should have held that in granting the new trial the Supreme Court only granted it as to the cause of action alleging willfulness and wantonness."

Sanders & De Pass, for appellant. Stan-yarne Wilson, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff through the wrongful acts of the defendant. There was a former appeal herein. 85 S. C. 23, 66 S. E. 1056.

The complaint contains two causes of action, one based on negligence, and the other on wantonness. On the former trial, his honor, the Presiding Judge, ruled, that there was no testimony tending to show wantonness on the part of the defendant, and withdrew that cause of action from the consideration of the jury. The jury then rendered a verdict in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed to this court, whose judgment was as follows: "It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial." On the second trial of the case in the circuit court, the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $357.60, and the defendant appealed upon exceptions which will be reported.

The first question that will be considered is whether there was error on the part of his honor, the Presiding Judge, in construing the judgment of the Supreme Court. The record contains the following statement: "This is a motion for a new trial made by the defendant upon the following grounds: 'Because, it is respectfully submitted, no issue should have been submitted to the jury, except the issue as to the liability of the defendant, under the alleged cause of action, for willfulness and wantonness.' * * * When this motion was made, my attention was called to the fact that Special Judge Featherstone had withdrawn the cause of action as to the willfulness and wantonness of the defendant from the jury, and had only submitted to them the issue as to negligence of the defendant, and that the appeal only questioned the correctness of the rulings of his honor in withdrawing the cause of action alleging willfulness and wantonness on the part of the defendant. The record of the former trial in this case is not before me, but I have the opinion of the Supreme Court granting a new trial. The language of that opinion is as follows: 'It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.' It will be seen that there is no limitation or restriction upon this order directing a new trial; and the plaintiff was entitled, under the decision of the Supreme Court, to a trial de novo upon both the issues of negligence and wantonness raised by the pleadings. I therefore refuse the motion, so far as this ground is concerned."

[1] The former appeal was from the judgment entered upon the verdict, and not merely from the ruling of his honor, the Presiding Judge, in withdrawing from the jury the cause of action for punitive damages. The motion for a new trial on this ground was therefore properly overruled, as the judgment was reversed.

[2] The next question is whether the Presiding Judge erred in charging the jury that the ordinance of the city of Spartanburg, relative to the speed of trains within its limits, would be a valid ordinance, unless it amounted to a spoliation of defendant's property. We deem it only necessary to state that the authorities cited by the respondent's attorney clearly show that the exceptions raising this question cannot be sustained.

Affirmed.

WOODS and HYDRICK, JJ., concur.

WOODS, J. I concur, but think something should be said as to the refusal of the following request to charge: "I charge and instruct you that any ordinance of the city of Spartanburg limiting the rate of speed to 10 miles an hour is unreasonable as applied to a particular place, if the evidence shows that at such particular place it was impossible for the railway company to run its train at the speed limited in such ordinance, because if it is impossible to obey an ordinance it is unconstitutional." This request was earnestly pressed in argument, and it is not without appearance of fairness; but it is unsound, in that it leaves out of consideration the question whether by the exercise of due care and skill, the defendant railroad company could not have so constructed its track as to enable it to comply with the speed ordinance.

RUSSELL v. TILLMAN et al.

EVIDENCE (§ 432*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—VARYING PROMISSORY NOTES.

Where a note only expresses a general consideration by the words "for value received," parol evidence is admissible to show a failure of consideration arising out of the nonperformance of the payee of his part of an agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1981-1989; Dec. Dig. § 432.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lancaster County; Ernest Moore, Special Judge.

Action by S. S. Russell against J. A. Tillman and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

R. E. Wylie, for appellants. J. Harry Foster, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action on a promissory note, of which the following is a copy: "$97.24. Lancaster, S. C., March 20, 1909. On or before the first of November next (1909), we promise to pay to S. S. Russell, at Columbia, S. C., ninety-seven and 24/100 dollars, for value received. [Signed] J. A. Tillman, D. C. Barnes."

The answer of the defendants was as follows:

"(1) That they deny each and every allegation contained in the complaint, excepting those allegations hereinafter admitted.

"(2) That they admit that, on or about the 20th day of March, 1909, at Lancaster, S. C., they executed a certain promissory note for $97.24, made payable to the plaintiff on November 1, 1909, and delivered same to one C. G. Garrett, colored, the agent of the plaintiff, but these defendants aver that no consideration whatever has moved from the plaintiff to these defendants, and they therefore plead a failure of consideration of said note, for the reasons set forth in the succeeding paragraphs of this answer.

"(3) That plaintiff, through his said agent, C. G. Garrett, colored, on or about March 20, 1909, sold to these defendants the exclusive right to sell in the said county of Lancaster certain quilters, known as the 'Favorite Quilter,' the county right being, as said agent claimed, the sum of $121.24. That the said agent represented that there was good money in the sale of his quilters, and promised to ship immediately to defendants a number of the quilters, at and for the price of $1.95 each, which defendants were to sell for $4.45 each, and from the sales defendants were to remit to plaintiff $1.95 for each quilter sold. That the defendants, relying upon the good faith and representations of the agent of the plaintiff, at the earnest request of said agent, paid to the said agent the sum of $24 in part of said county right, and executed their joint note for $97.24, the balance of said county right, and delivered said note to the said agent of plaintiff. That defendants at the same time paid to the said agent the sum of $2.50 for a model or sample of the said 'Favorite Quilters,' which is absolutely worthless.

"(4) That the plaintiff has wholly failed to carry out his part of the contract, and has never sent, as he promised by his said agent, any of the said quilters.

"(5) That these defendants have been deceived, defrauded, and damaged by plaintiff, through his said agent, and therefore set up, by way of counterclaim to plaintiff's action, the sum of $26.50 paid, as above set forth, by these defendants, to the said agent of plaintiff."

We have not reproduced the answer in full, for the reason that his honor, the presiding judge, ruled that it interposed only two defenses, to wit, fraud and a counterclaim.

The instrument of writing assigning to the defendants the exclusive right to sell the quilters in Lancaster county recites that the consideration was the sum of $121.24, paid in hand to the plaintiff, the receipt of which was therein acknowledged. There was testimony tending to show failure of consideration arising out of the nonperformance by the plaintiff of his part of the contract. The record shows that his honor, the presiding judge, made the following ruling: "Mr. Foster: I move to strike out all evidence which, in any way, seeks to vary or change the terms of this note. The Court: Yes, sir. He can't vary the terms of the note by parol evidence. Anything that varies the note or contract I will have to strike out." At the close of the testimony, the plaintiff's attorney made a motion for the presiding judge to direct a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, for the amount of the note, less the counterclaim of $26.50, which was granted, on the ground that there was no testimony tending to show fraud, and that the only other defense upon which the defendants could rely was the counterclaim for $26.50.

The practical question presented by the exceptions is whether there was error on the part of the presiding judge in striking out the testimony hereinbefore mentioned, on the ground that it tended to vary the terms of the note and the said instrument of writing, assigning the right to sell the quilters in Lancaster county.

By reference to the answer of the defendants, it will be seen that it interposes three defenses, failure of consideration, fraud, and a counterclaim. "When the note expresses no consideration, or a merely formal or general consideration, as by the usual words 'value received,' or by similar general or formal expressions, it is evident that, if the true consideration rests in an agreement, written or oral, between the parties, the proof of such agreement does not necessarily tend to change the terms of the note, although by showing the true consideration upon which it is given it may control the recovery upon the note." McGrath & Byrum v. Barnes, 13 S. C. 328, 36 Am. Rep. 687.

In the case of Groesbeck v. Marshall, 44 S. C. 538, 22 S. E. 743, the action was on a promissory note, executed by J. Q. Marshall in favor of John W. Stokes, as payee, who indorsed the note, after maturity, to the plaintiff, Groesbeck. The defendant, Marshall, contemporaneously with the execution of the note, took from Stokes a receipt, and after maturity of the note the said J. Q. Marshall delivered a certificate to J. Foster Marshall, which instruments of writing were introduced in evidence, for the purpose, among other things, of showing failure of consideration of the note. The ruling of the court in that case was as follows: "We will next consider whether parol evidence was admissible to show the * * * failure of consideration of the note. The note recites simply that it was for value received. In a case of this kind, the case of McGrath & Byrum v. Barnes, 13 S. C. 328 [36 Am. Rep. 687], shows that parol evidence is admissible to show the true consideration. * * * The receipt and certificate were introduced in evidence by the plaintiff for the purpose of showing the consideration. Defendant's testimony was introduced for the purpose of showing the consideration of the note, and not for the purpose of varying the terms of the receipt and certificate. The receipt and the certificate were to be considered by the jury in coming to a conclusion as to what was the real consideration of the note, but their introduction in evidence did not prevent the defendant from showing the real consideration thereof." These authorities show that the presiding judge erred in striking out said testimony.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

COOKE v. YOUNG.

USURY (§ 23*)—NOTES—INTEREST TO MATURITY.

Under Civ. Code 1902, § 1662, which makes 7 per cent. the maximum legal rate of interest, and section 1663, which provides that any person receiving more than the legal rate of interest shall forfeit all interest, and recover the original debt without interest or costs, it is not usurious for the holder of notes bearing a legal rate of interest upon discounting the notes at the maker's request to calculate interest to maturity, since it is only the performance of a lawful contract tendered and accepted in advance of the stipulated time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases. see Usury, Cent. Dig. §§ 42-50; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; W. B. Gruber, Special Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by A. B. Cooke against W. F. Young, as administrator of S. T. Poiner, deceased. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Johnson & Nash, for appellant. Sanders & De Pass, for respondent.

JONES, C. J. This action was to recover forfeiture for alleged usury. Jury trial was waived, and the case, upon an agreed statement of the facts, was submitted to Hon. W. B. Gruber, presiding as special judge, who dismissed the complaint. On November 7, 1908, Arthur B. Cooke, the plaintiff, gave Samuel T. Poiner, defendant's intestate, two notes for $600 each, one due on January 1, 1910, and the other on July 1, 1910, with interest from date at 7 per cent. per annum, secured by a mortgage of real estate in the city of Spartanburg, S. C. Plaintiff afterwards moved to California, and on July 21, 1909, inquired by letter of the administrator what he would take in cash payment of the notes by September 1st, to which the administrator replied that he was advised that he had no authority other than to collect the notes according to their tenor, and could not discount them, but would receive the whole amount, if he desired to pay. On August 4, 1909, J. T. Willard, a real estate agent representing plaintiff, having sold the mortgaged property, paid to defendant's attorneys the amount due upon the notes and mortgage, with interest calculated to the maturity of the notes, the interest amounting to $117.60. The plaintiff brought action to recover double this sum, claiming that it was usurious to receive interest in excess of the amount of interest accrued up to the date of payment.

The action is sought to be maintained under the provisions of sections 1662 and 1663 of the Code, as follows:

"No greater interest than seven (7) per cent. per annum shall be charged, taken, agreed upon or allowed upon any contract arising in this state for the hiring, lending or use of money or other commodity, either by way of straight interest, discount or otherwise, except upon written contracts, wherein by express agreement, a rate of interest not exceeding eight per cent. may be charged.

"Any person or corporation who shall receive or contract to receive as interest any greater amount than is provided for in the preceding section shall forfeit all interest, and the costs of the action and such portion of the original debt as shall be due shall be recovered without interest or costs, and where any amount so charged or contracted for has been actually received by such person or corporation, he or she, or they shall also forfeit double the total amount received in respect of interest, to be collected by a separate action or allowed as a counterclaim in any action brought to recover the principal sum."

It is conceded that there is no usury in the term of the contract. It cannot therefore be usury to receive payment according to such terms. The fact that the debtor for his own convenience voluntarily chooses to pay before maturity the amount of principal and interest due at maturity cannot operate to taint the transaction with usury, as that is nothing more than performance of a lawful contract, although tendered and accepted in advance of the stipulated time. The statute has no reference to the receipt of the principal debt. The receipt of the interest in advance of the time of stipulated payment could not be within the statute, which has been construed not to forbid the taking of lawful interest annually in advance. Newton v. Woodley, 55 S. C. 132, 32 S. E. 531, 33 S. E. 1; Heyward v. Williams, 63 S. C. 470, 41 S. E. 550.

STATE v. BARWICK.

1. WITNESSES (§ 301*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION—ACCUSED PERSONS.

In the trial of a police officer for homicide, wherein he claimed that decedent was shot by a man pursued by the officer, it was proper to ask accused on cross-examination if he did not give certain testimony before the mayor's court showing that the pursued man could not have hit decedent, the evidence not being improper, as in effect compelling accused to testify against himself in violation of Const. art. 1, § 17.

2. WITNESSES (§ 305*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION—ACCUSED PERSONS.

Under Cr. Code 1902, § 64, permitting accused to testify if he desires to do so, and under section 65, providing that no person shall be required to answer any question tending to incriminate himself, when an accused voluntarily elects to testify, he assumes the position of an ordinary witness, and is subject to cross-examination to test his accuracy, veracity, and credibility, subject to the control of the trial court, and subject to his right to decline to answer any question tending to incriminate him.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 448*)—EVIDENCE—OPINIONS.

In a homicide case, a witness may state the direction of a shot, judging from his hearing its sound, the testimony not being inadmissible as stating a conclusion.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 858*)—TAKING PAPERS TO JURY ROOM—JUDICIAL DISCRETION.

In a homicide case, it was not an abuse of discretion to permit the jury, in retiring, to take with them a diagram of the locality of the shooting which had been introduced in evidence, any incorrectness of the diagram being in evidence.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 812*)—INSTRUCTIONS—RACIAL PREJUDICE.

Where, in the trial of a police officer for homicide while pursuing a third person, one of accused's witnesses admitted that he may have said in a joking way that "the country was going to the devil if they could convict a white man for killing a negro," it was proper to instruct that the law is applicable the same to every man, and knows no pets nor difference between an Indian, Japanese, citizen of the state, African, or Caucasian, etc.

6. HOMICIDE (§ 341*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

Where, in a homicide case, the state's evidence was both direct and circumstantial, it was not reversible error to omit to instruct that when proof rests upon circumstantial evidence the circumstances must have admitted of no other reasonable hypothesis than guilt, where no special instruction was requested, and the general law applicable to the case was charged.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Sumter County; Thos. S. Sease, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Robert M. Barwick was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

H. C. Haynsworth, for appellant. P. H. Stoll, Sol., for the State.

JONES, C. J. [1] The defendant in October, 1908, was policeman of the town of Pine-wood in Clarendon county, and on arrival of the Saturday night train from Sumter was opening a way through the crowd for some lady passengers, when Thomas Singleton, according to defendant's version, declared he would stand back for no damn man, whereupon defendant seized Singleton to arrest him for cursing and refusing to open the way. Singleton broke loose and ran, and the defendant pursued, firing his pistol towards him several times. The deceased, Sam Bracy, was standing in line of the firing and was struck by a bullet, which gave him a mortal wound, of which he died some days later in a hospital in Sumter, S. C. The defendant was indicted for the murder of Bracy, and was convicted of manslaughter with recommendation of mercy.

The testimony for the state was to the effect that deceased was struck by a bullet from the pistol of defendant, but the defendant testified to the effect that Singleton while running away, or some one in the direction he was running, shot at defendant, that defendant did not shoot until after this firing, and the suggestion was that deceased may have been shot by Singleton. On cross-examination of defendant, who had testified in his own behalf, the solicitor was allowed to interrogate defendant as to his statements under oath before the mayor's court. Defendant was asked if he did not state before the mayor: "I did not see Singleton with a pistol, but he shot back at this place, also he shot before he got to the man that was shot." "If Singleton shot at all he shot before he got to the man that was shot." The effect of this statement, if true, would be to show that if Singleton shot in such a situation he could not have hit deceased. The defendant denied that he made such statement, and no effort was made to contradict by any written statement or otherwise.

The first, second, and third exceptions allege that it was error to admit this testimony, which in effect was compelling defendant to give testimony against himself in violation of article 1, § 17, of the Constitution, which provides that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself. Appellant relies upon State v. Senn, 32 S. C. 396, 11 S. E. 292, to sustain these exceptions, but we do not think the case is controlling. The question in that case was whether the coroner could testify as to statements made at the inquest by one then examined as a witness, who was afterwards indicted and was on trial. Justice McIver was of the opinion that parol evidence of such statement was not admissible when the statement was in writing, and, further, that such admissions were not free and voluntary when made by a witness under summons to testify. Justice McGowan held the testimony admissible. While Chief Justice Simpson appears to have concurred generally in the opinion of Justice McIver, he nevertheless indorsed on the opinion of Justice McGowan his reasons for not concurring therein, and these reasons contained no objection to the view of Justice McGowan on this point. The question at bar is different. Section 64 of the Criminal Code of 1902, provides: [2] "In the trial of all criminal cases the defendant shall be allowed to testify (if he desires to do so, and not otherwise) as to the facts and circumstances of the case;" and section 65 provides that no person shall be required to answer any question tending to criminate himself. When a defendant voluntarily elects to be a witness in his own behalf he thereby assumes the position of any ordinary witness, and is therefore subject to cross-examination to test his accuracy, veracity, or credibility, subject to the control of the trial court, and subject to his right to decline to answer any question tending to criminate him. State v. Williamson, 65 S. C. 245, 43 S. E. 671; State v. Andrews, 73 S. C. 280, 53 S. E. 423; State v. Stukes, 73 S. C. 391, 53 S. E. 643; State v. Rowell, 75 S. C. 508, 56 S. E. 23; State v. Hunter, 82 S. C. 157, 63 S. E. 685.

[3] The witness Toomer, over objection that the testimony was matter of opinion, was allowed to state the direction of the first shot he heard, judging from the sound of it. The exception to this ruling cannot be sustained. A conclusion as to the direction of sound is an instantaneous deduction or impression from the sense of hearing and does not fall within the class of opinion evidence, but is a matter of fact or knowledge, within the rules of the law. McKelvey on Ev. para. 123-124.

[4] When the jury was about to retire they asked whether they might take with them a diagram of the locality of the shooting which had been introduced in evidence without objection. Counsel for defendant called attention to the fact that the diagram was incorrect, and by this objected to the jury having the diagram. The court permitted the jury to take the diagram with them and this action is the basis of an exception. "Allowing papers introduced in evidence to be taken by the jury to their room rests in the discretion of the presiding judge, which will not be disturbed except in case of abuse." Church v. Elliott, 65 S. C. 258, 43 S. E. 674. We find no abuse of discretion here. Whatever evidence there was to show wherein the diagram was incorrect was before the jury.

[5] One of the witnesses for the defense admitted that he may have said in a joking way, without meaning it, that the country was going to the devil if they would convict a white man for killing a negro. The court charged the jury: "The law is applicable the same to every man. The law knows no pets. The law knows no difference between an Indian, Japanese, a citizen of the state, an African or a Caucasian. I could not charge you different law according to the parties interested, much less could you try the facts differently, the parties being of a different race, either Japanese, Chinese, African, or Caucasian. There is no color line in the law, and there shall be none under your oath in the jury box." The appellant excepts to this charge as upon a matter not in issue, and as tending to divert the jury from the true consideration of his defense. We think the charge was not only sound, but was proper in the circumstances, and could not possibly have prejudiced any right of defendant.

The thirteenth exception is based upon a misapprehension of the charge as it clearly appears therein that the jury were instructed that to convict defendant they must find him guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

[6] The fourteenth exception assigns error in failing to instruct the jury that when the proof of the state rests upon circumstantial evidence, the circumstances must admit of no other reasonable hypothesis than that the defendant did the killing. The state's evidence was both direct and circumstantial. There was no request by defendant for special instruction as to the rule governing conviction on circumstantial evidence alone, and in the absence of such a request a mere failure to charge in this respect is not reversible error. The general law applicable to the case was charged and the defendant given the benefit of any reasonable doubt of his guilt.

The remaining exceptions were not discussed or relied on in argument of appellant, and we deem it only necessary to say that they afford no good ground for reversal.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

LEE v. NORTH WESTERN R. CO.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1064*)—“GROSS NEGLIGENCE”—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS INSTRUCTIONS.

The error in a charge, in an action for injuries in a collision at a crossing, which defines “gross negligence,” within Civ. Code 1902, § 2139, relieving a railroad company from liability if the person injured was guilty of gross negligence, as the want of any degree of care for his own safety is not prejudicial, since the difference between want of slight care and the want of any care is too shadowy to affect the verdict of a jury of ordinary intelligence.

2. RAILROADS (§§ 320, 350*)—CROSSINGS—OBLIGATION OF TRAINMEN.

Where trainmen approaching a crossing discover that a team is rapidly approaching the crossing, and is beyond the control of the driver, they must exercise reasonable care to prevent a collision, but it is not their duty, as a matter of law, to stop the train.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1014, 1165; Dec. Dig. §§ 320, 350.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1064*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action for injuries at a crossing, the undisputed evidence showed that the trainmen, on seeing the traveler approach the crossing, applied the emergency brakes and did all they could to stop the train and prevent the collision, the error in a charge that trainmen who see that the team of a traveler on a highway, approaching the crossing, is beyond his control must do all they can to stop the train, to prevent injury, was not prejudicial.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Kershaw County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge.
“To be officially reported.”

Action by Stephney Lee against the North Western Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. O. Purdy and Clark & Van Treskow, for appellant. De Pass & De Pass, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. Plaintiff recovered judgment for personal injuries received by him in a collision with defendant's cars at a highway crossing. For a former appeal in this case, see 84 S. C. 125, 65 S. E. 1031.

When neglect to give the signals required by statute at highway crossings contributes to the injury of persons or property at such crossings by collision with the engine or cars of a railroad corporation, the law imposes upon the corporation liability for damages caused thereby, “unless it is shown that, in addition to a mere want of ordinary care, the person injured, or the person having charge of his person or property, was, at the time of the collision, guilty of gross or willful negligence, or was acting in violation of the law; and that such gross or willful negligence or unlawful act contributed to the injury.” 1 Code 1902, § 2139.

[1] There are only two grounds of appeal. The first assigns error in defining gross negligence in the charge to be “the want of any degree of care for his own safety”; and the second, in charging that, when those in charge of a railroad train approaching a crossing see that the team of a traveler on the highway, also approaching the crossing, is beyond his control, it is their duty to do all they can to stop the train to prevent injury. The Presiding Judge erred as pointed out in each of these exceptions. Nevertheless the judgment should be affirmed, because the errors were not prejudicial. The difference between the want of slight care and the want of any care is more technical and metaphysical than practical and substantial, and too shadowy to affect the verdict of jurors of ordinary intelligence and common sense.

[2] It will not do to say, as matter of law, and under all circumstances, that, when those in charge of a train approaching a crossing see a team, also rapidly approaching it, and beyond the control of the driver, it is their duty to stop the train to prevent collision; for what should be done to prevent collision is ordinarily a question of fact to be decided from all the circumstances. These may indicate to those in charge of the train that a collision would more certainly be prevented by increasing the speed of the train, so that it would cross the highway before the team could reach the crossing. The duty, under such circumstances, is merely to exercise due and reasonable care to prevent a collision, and what that would be would depend upon all the circumstances. Gue v. Wilson, 87 S. C. 144, 69 S. E. 99.

[3] But the uncontradicted testimony shows that, as soon as those in charge of defendant's train saw the plaintiff approaching the crossing, they applied the emergency brakes, and did all they could to stop the train and prevent the collision. No other reasonable inference can be drawn from the testimony than that what they said they did were the proper and only things that could have been done at that time, and under those circumstances, to prevent the collision. As they unquestionably did what the court told the jury they should have done, the error could not have affected the result.

Affirmed.

3. CARRIERS (§ 306*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—LIABILITY OF LESSOR.

A railway company leasing its road is jointly liable with the lessee for negligent injury to a passenger of the lessee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1249; Dec. Dig. § 306.* Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 812.]

4. CARRIERS (§ 413*)—PASSENGERS—OBLIGATION OF SLEEPING CAR COMPANIES.

A sleeping car company must take proper care to keep watch over its passengers asleep in their berths, even before it has notice of any danger or of facts sufficient to cause it to anticipate danger to any particular passenger, and robbery is a danger which it must guard against.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1583-1588; Dec. Dig. § 413.*]

5. CARRIERS (§ 416*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

The failure of the servants of a sleeping car company to keep watch while a passenger was asleep in her berth is a reckless disregard of her safety, and where the passenger was assaulted and robbed the company is liable for punitive and compensatory damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1598; Dec. Dig. § 416.*]

6. CARRIERS (§ 416*)—ROBBERY OF PASSENGER—PUNITIVE DAMAGES—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction authorizing the jury to award punitive damages against a sleeping car company for injuries to a passenger assaulted and robbed while asleep in her berth, if the jury believed that there was a conscious disregard by the company's servants to observe due care, and that a willful invasion of the passenger's rights was not essential to justify such damages, properly submitted the issue of punitive damages.

7. DAMAGES (§ 216*)—MENTAL SUFFERING—INSTRUCTIONS—"ASSAULT."

In an action against a sleeping car company for injuries to a passenger assaulted and robbed while asleep in her berth, a charge that the law does not allow a recovery of damages for mental suffering, in the absence of bodily injury, that the passenger could recover such damages as she actually sustained by reason of the assault, that it was not necessary to touch a person to constitute an assault, which was an attempt to apply even the least actual force causing apprehension of immediate peril, and that the amount of damages for mental suffering depended on the circumstances, was not objectionable as making a well-founded apprehension of immediate peril elements of damage, irrespective of whether they were caused by physical injury, or the result of "assault," as technically defined.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, pp. 532-538; vol. 8, p. 7582.]

8. DAMAGES (§ 181*)—PUNITIVE DAMAGES—WEALTH OF DEFENDANT—ADMISSIBILITY.

Evidence of the wealth and pecuniary ability of defendant is admissible, where punitive damages are recoverable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 474; Dec. Dig. § 181.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; R. C. Watts, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by D. B. Calder against the Southern Railway Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff against defendant Pullman Company, it appeals. Affirmed.

The following are defendant's exceptions:

"(1) In taking jurisdiction of this case and in refusing the application for an order accepting the petition and bond for removal; it is submitted that the court was without jurisdiction to try this case for the reasons stated in the petition for removal and that the cause was removed into the Circuit Court of the United States by the filing of said petition and bond for removal.

"(2) In refusing to accept said petition and bond for removal, when the petition alleged that the joinder of the resident defendant was fraudulent, for the purpose of defeating jurisdiction of the United States court, and when the allegations of the complaint itself show separate and distinct causes of action against each defendant, a separate controversy, and a removable case.

"(3) In refusing to accept said petition and bond for removal and in taking jurisdiction of said case, because the liability of the lessor railroad company, if any, is not a joint liability with the lessee railroad company, but is contractual, and is based upon the lease or statute; further because the facts alleged show the wrongs complained of were not the joint and concurrent acts of both defendants, and because there was no community in the alleged wrongdoing.

"(4) In refusing to accept the petition and bond for removal, when the complaint alleged two causes of action, viz., assault by a third person, and loss of property. As to the assault no cause of action is stated because there is no allegation of knowledge of danger or reason to apprehend danger. As to the loss of property, it is submitted a railroad company is not responsible for the loss of hand baggage of a passenger in a sleeping car, lost by the alleged negligence of the employes of the sleeping car company in not keeping watch. Certainly the imputed liability, if any, would be limited to the lessee company, and not to the lessor. The controversy as to the Pullman Company is separable, because its liability is direct, while the liability of the railroad company is in one case (if any) imputed, and in the other depends upon contract (the lease), and no joint tort is alleged, no community in wrongdoing.

"(5) In overruling the demurrer, it is submitted the demurrer to the cause of action alleging the assault upon plaintiff by a third person should have been sustained, because as to that cause of action the complaint fails to state a cause of action, in that there is no allegation in said complaint that defendants had any knowledge of the existence of the danger of such unexpected assault, or of circumstances from which such danger may have reasonably been anticipated.

"(6) In overruling the motion for nonsuit; it is submitted the nonsuit should have been granted because: There was no evidence to sustain the material allegations of the complaint. There was no evidence to sustain the allegation that the defendant, either through negligence or willfulness, caused any loss or injury to plaintiff. The evidence was that whatever loss or injury occurred to plaintiff was due to the wholly unauthorized and unlawful act of a third person, coming secretly and suddenly and unexpectedly into the car, for which the defendant is in no way responsible, and could not have reasonably foreseen or prevented. In any event, the nonsuit as to the cause of action for vindictive damages should have been granted, upon the ground that there was no testimony to sustain the allegations of willfulness or wantonness on the part of the defendant, its servants, or agents.

"(7) We submit the Presiding Judge erred in charging the jury that punitive damages could be awarded in this case; there being no evidence to support such cause of action.

"(8) We submit the Presiding Judge erred in charging the jury that punitive damages are not only recoverable for a wanton, high-handed, or willful invasion of plaintiff's rights, but that the jury were authorized to find punitive damages, if they believe there was a conscious disregard on the part of the defendant, its agents, and servants, to do their duty, a conscious failure to observe due care, which was the proximate cause of the injury. We submit every act of simple negligence is in a sense conscious, and negligence never warrants punitive damages. The only conscious failure to exercise due care which warrants punitive damages must be such a conscious failure as has in contemplation the injurious consequences reasonably to be expected to result from the act.

"(9) We submit the Presiding Judge erred in charging the fifteenth request of plaintiff, as follows: 'The jury are instructed that, where the acts of the servant of a corporation are not only negligent, but wanton and willful—that is, in plain disregard of a known duty, or in a conscious failure to observe due care in such case—the jury may award in addition to compensatory damages other damages, known as punitive, exemplary, or vindictive damages. Such damages are for the purpose of deterring a defendant, or other persons in like conditions, from committing the same wrongs and injuries.' By this request wantonness and willfulness are defined as disregard of a known duty, or a conscious failure to observe due care. We submit this is not the law. Before conscious failure to exercise due care will warrant punitive damages, it must have in contemplation the injurious consequences to be expected from the act; it must in effect amount to willfulness or intentional injury.

"(10) It is submitted the circuit judge erred in first charging the jury that plaintiff could recover 'such damages as you think she has actually sustained by reason of any assault committed on her,' and then charging plaintiff's fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth requests, defining technical assault and charging that it was not necessary to touch the person to constitute an assault; that an assault was an attempt to apply even the least actual force, causing apprehension of immediate peril; and then charging plaintiff's twelfth request, as follows: 'The jury are further instructed that the amount of the damages for mental anguish suffered by the plaintiff, such as terror and horror of mind, depends upon the circumstances of the case as found by the jury from the evidence, and is to be awarded in their sound discretion.' It is submitted that the jury were in effect erroneously charged that fright, or 'a well-founded apprehension of immediate peril,' terror, or horror of mind, were elements of damage, irrespective of whether the same were caused by applicable physical injury, or were the result of assault, as technically defined.

"(11) We submit that apprehension or fear caused by assault without battery is not an element of damage. The charge of the circuit judge was misleading, at least confusing, for though the jury was charged that damages for mental anguish in the absence of bodily injury could not be awarded, yet the jury may well have understood from the charge that horror and terror, caused by assault without battery, were a basis for damages, while other mental anguish was not, unless coupled with the bodily injury.

"(12) We submit the circuit judge erred in refusing the eleventh request of defendant as follows: 'I charge you that you cannot hold the defendant liable in this case for the wrongful acts of third persons causing loss or damage to plaintiff, unless the defendants, their servants, or agents, had knowledge of the danger, or of facts or circumstances from which that danger might reasonably be inferred.' We submit that the request contained a sound proposition of law applicable to the case, and the defendant had the right to have the same charged. The error was emphasized by the Presiding Judge saying: 'I refuse to charge you that. Whenever a sudden riot breaks out on a train and any one is injured, and the railroad authorities had no reason to apprehend any danger of that sort, they are not responsible; however, I will meet the issue fair and square,' etc., thereby limiting and restricting the general principle of law to cases of sudden 'riot,' and making the protection apply to 'railroad authorities' alone, although the cases had already been nonsuited as to the railroad companies (defendants).

"(13) In refusing the twelfth request of defendant, as follows: 'I charge you in this case you cannot find any damages for the alleged assault, but your verdict must be confined to the allegations and proof relating to the loss of property.' We submit there was no evidence upon which to hold the defendant liable in damages for the alleged assault.

"(14) In refusing the thirteenth request of defendant, as follows: 'I charge you that in this case you cannot find any punitive damages against the Pullman Company; there being no evidence to sustain that cause of action.' We submit there was no evidence to sustain a cause of action for punitive damages, and the charge should have been given.

"(15) We submit the Presiding Judge erred in refusing the motion for new trial because: There was no evidence to support the verdict. Because the verdict was contrary to the charge of the Presiding Judge. Because the damages are excessive. Because there was no evidence in this case to support a verdict for vindictive damages. Because of error in refusing to charge the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth requests to charge submitted by defendant. Because of error in refusing to grant the nonsuit.

"(16) We submit the verdict is so excessive in this case as to show, or authorize the inference, that it is the result of prejudice or caprice."

W. Huger Fitzsimons, for appellant. Legare, Holman & Baker, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff through the wrongful acts of the defendants.

The following statement appears in the record: "This action was commenced on the 15th day of May, 1909, by the service of the summons and complaint. Within due time counsel for the defendant the Pullman Company filed a petition and bond for the removal of the case into the United States Circuit Court. Plaintiff moved upon a transcript of the record, in the United States Circuit Court, for an order remanding the case into the state court. The case was remanded by an order of Judge Brawley, U. S. judge, made on the 16th day of July, 1909. On October 13, 1910, upon the call of the case for trial in the state court, counsel for the defendant the Pullman Company presented the petition and bond for removal, and asked for an order of removal, pursuant to notice given. After argument the Presiding Judge refused the motion. The case then came on for trial before the Honorable R. C. Watts, Presiding Judge, and a jury on October 13, 1910. After the complaint was read, defendants then read and argued the demurrer thereto, dated and served on the 7th day of April, 1910. The demurrer was overruled. At the close of plaintiff's testimony, motions for nonsuit were made by the defendants. After argument an order of nonsuit was passed as to the defendants Southern Railway and Southern Railway, Carolina Division, but the court refused the motion for nonsuit as to the defendant the Pullman Company. The case went to the jury upon the charge of the judge, and the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $7,500, on the 15th day of October, 1910. A motion for a new trial was duly made and refused." The defendant appealed upon exceptions, which will be reported.

The allegations of the complaint material to the questions involved are as follows: "That heretofore, on the 6th day of July, A. D. 1908, the plaintiff above named procured transportation from Charleston, S. C., to Marietta, Ga., over the line of defendant's road and connecting carriers; that she purchased from the Pullman Company, in addition to her railroad transportation, a ticket which entitled her to a berth on one of the sleeping cars of the Pullman Company from Charleston, S. C., to Atlanta, Ga., scheduled to leave Charleston, S. C., at 11 o'clock p. m.; that the plaintiff above named boarded a Pullman car attached to one of the trains of the defendants, and upon entering said Pullman car retired for the night to her berth; that plaintiff alleges that when said train reached a point on the line of the defendant's road at or near Dorchester, a station situated in the county of Dorchester, in said state, on the line of the South Carolina & Georgia Railroad Company, one of the constituent roads above mentioned, she was assaulted by a man in her berth; that he rudely put his hands upon her arms and body; and that he forcibly took her satchel, which she had with her in her berth, together with the contents thereof; and that the same has never been recovered by the plaintiff; that at the time said assault was made upon the plaintiff in her berth she was asleep; and was awakened by such assault; that she called loudly for help, but that no response came to her calls from the officers or agents of the defendants in charge of said sleeping car, and that the person so assaulting her escaped with her satchel; that the defendants above named were jointly and concurrently negligent in not keeping a watch over the sleeping passengers in said sleeping car, in that the conductor and porter of said sleeping car retired for the night and went to sleep, and were in no condition or position to discover any person attempting to commit robbery in said car, and that the defendants were jointly and concurrently negligent in allowing the doors of said car to remain open, so that persons from the outside might have access and entrance thereto; and that the defendants, by and through its servants and agents, and by and through their joint and concurrent acts, negligently, willfully, and wantonly failed to keep a watch, so as to prevent persons from entering said car from the outside, and to prevent persons within said car from molesting the plaintiff and depriving her of her property, and committing an assault and insult upon her person; that plaintiff alleges and charges that it was the duty of the defendants to keep a reasonable watch over the sleeping passengers in said car; and plaintiff further alleges and charges that the defendants failed in their duty in this respect in the manner as above set forth." The Pullman company denied all except the formal allegations of the complaint. We proceed to the consideration of the exceptions, though not in their regular order.

[1] Second Exception:

It was the duty of the railroad company, when it accepted the plaintiff as a passenger, to exercise the utmost care and precaution for her safety, until she arrived at her destination. The fact that she also became a passenger on the Pullman car, and was asleep in her berth at the time of the alleged robbery, and technical assault and battery upon her incident to the robbery, did not relieve the railroad company of its responsibility in this respect. The rule is thus stated in Pennsylvania Co. v. Roy, 102 U. S. 451, 26 L. Ed. 141: "The law will conclusively presume that the conductor and porter assigned by the Pullman Palace Car Company to the control of the interior arrangements of the sleeping car in which Roy was riding when injured exercised such control, with the assent of the railroad company, for the purposes of the contract under which the railroad company undertook to carry Roy over its line, and in view of its obligation to use only cars that were adequate for safe conveyance, the sleeping car company, its conductor, and porter, were by law the servants and employees of the railroad company. Their negligence, or the negligence of either of them, as to any matters involving the safety or security of passengers while being conveyed, was the negligence of the railroad company. The law will not permit a railroad company, engaged in the business of carrying persons for hire, through any device or arrangement with a sleeping car company, whose cars are used by and constitute a part of the train of the railroad company, to throw off the duty of providing proper means for the safe conveyance of those whom it has agreed to convey." This principle is recognized in the case of Taber v. Railway, 81 S. C. 317, 62 S. E. 311, wherein the court uses this language: "The delict, if any, was a breach of duty by the Pullman Company, since it appertained peculiarly to the contract of that company to furnish berth accommodations, as distinguished from the defendant's contract of safe and comfortable transportation."

[2] Not only the assault and battery, but likewise the robbery (which is an offense against the person, as well as against property), endangered the safety of the plaintiff, and rendered both the railroad company and the sleeping car company liable for such damages as she may have sustained by the alleged failure of the Pullman Company to discharge its duty in properly protecting her person from such dangers during her hours of slumber. Therefore it cannot be successfully contended that the joint liability alleged in the complaint was sham and pretensive.

[3] Third Exception:

It is only necessary to cite the case of Reed v. Railway, 75 S. C. 162, 55 S. E. 218, to show that this exception cannot be sustained. In that case it was held that the Southern Railway Company, Carolina Division, was liable, even to an employee of the Southern Railway Company, its lessee, for negligence and wantonness on the part of the Southern Railway Company, causing injury to such employee.

Fourth Exception:

Conceding the proposition to be sound that "a railroad company is not responsible for the loss of hand baggage of a passenger in a sleeping car, lost by the alleged negligence of the employees of the sleeping car company in not keeping watch," nevertheless this exception cannot be sustained, if the allegations of the complaint are sufficient to constitute a cause of action, based upon the alleged assault and battery; and whether they are sufficient for that purpose will be determined when we come to the consideration of the next exception.

[4] Fifth Exception:

The duty imposed upon the sleeping car company (which likewise rests upon the railroad company, in so far as the safety of the passenger may be involved) is thus defined in the case of Carpenter v. Railway, 124 N. Y. 57, 26 N. E. 277, 11 L. R. A. 762 (21 Am. St. Rep. 644): "A corporation engaged in running sleeping coaches, with sections separated from the aisle only by curtains, is bound to have an employé, charged with the duty of carefully and continually watching the interior of the car, while berths are occupied by sleepers. Pullman Car Co. v. Gardner, 3 Penny. (Pa.) 78. These cars are used by both sexes, of all ages, by the experienced and the inexperienced, by the honest and the dishonest, which is understood by the carriers; and, though such companies are not insurers, they must exercise vigilance to protect their sleeping customers from robbery. A traveler who pays for a berth is invited and has the right to sleep, and both parties to the contract know that he is to become powerless to defend his property from thieves, or his person from insult, and the company is bound to use a degree of care commensurate with the danger to which passengers are exposed. Considering the compensation received for such services, and the hazards to which unguarded and sleeping travelers are exposed, the rule of diligence above declared is not too onerous."

The appellant relies upon the doctrine thus stated in 1 Petter on Carriers of Passengers: "Carriers of passengers are not insurers of the entire immunity of their passengers from the misconduct of fellow passengers, or of strangers, any more than they are insurers of the absolute safety of passengers in other respects. Nor can the carrier be held liable for such misconduct on the principle of respondeat superior, as in the case of the misconduct of his servants. But, although the doctrine is of comparatively recent growth, it is now firmly established that a carrier of passengers must exercise the same high degree of care to protect them from the wrongful acts of their fellow passengers, or of strangers, that is required for the prevention of casualties, in the management and operation of its train, namely, the utmost care, vigilance, and precaution consistent with the mode of conveyance, and with its practical operation. While not required to furnish a police force sufficient to overcome all force when unexpectedly and suddenly offered, it is the carrier's duty to provide help sufficient to protect the passenger against assaults from every quarter, which might reasonably be expected to occur, under the circumstances of the case and the condition of the parties; and, having furnished such force the carrier is chargeable with their neglect, in failing to protect a passenger from assaults by strangers. This strict rule of duty must, however, be applied in view of the relation which the carrier sustains to all the passengers, and the circumstances of each particular case calling for its exercise. Knowledge of the existence of the danger or of facts and circumstances from which the danger may be reasonably anticipated, is necessary to fix a liability upon the carrier for damages sustained in consequence of failure to guard against it."

This language is quoted with approval in Franklin v. Railway, 74 S. C. 332, 54 S. E. 578, and the principle is recognized in the subsequent cases of Anderson v. Railway, 77 S. C. 434, 58 S. E. 149, 122 Am. St. Rep. 591; Taylor v. Railway, 78 S. C. 552, 59 S. E. 641; and Norris v. Railway, 84 S. C. 15, 65 S. E. 936. The defendant also relies upon the case of Connell's Ex'rs v. Railway, 93 Va. 44, 24 S. E. 467, 32 L. R. A. 792, 57 Am. St. Rep. 786. In that case the court uses this language: "Robbery is of frequent occurrence, and larceny more so, and to invite a passenger to enter a sleeping car with his property, and to go to sleep in the confidence that his person and property will be shielded and protected by those who have undertaken that duty, imposes a very high degree of care and watchfulness upon the sleeping car company. Passengers are invited to enter and to sleep. They are thereby disarmed and incapacitated for self-protection. Carriers are paid to preserve, watch, and ward over their sleeping guests, and they are rightfully held to a due and faithful discharge of the obligations thus assumed. Experience teaches us that when property is exposed to theft, it is apt to be stolen; but murder is of infrequent occurrence. When, therefore, a sleeping car company receives a passenger, and he retires to rest, it may well be assumed to anticipate and be required to protect him against a crime which is likely to occur whenever the temptation and the opportunity are presented. It cannot be deemed to have anticipated, nor be expected to guard and protect him against, a crime so horrid, and happily so rare, as that of murder."

The rule that the duty of the carrier to a passenger, from the wrongful acts of a fellow passenger or stranger, only applies when the carrier has knowledge of the existence of the danger, or of facts and circumstances from which the danger may be reasonably anticipated, is not applicable to passengers asleep in their berths. The principle announced in Franklin v. Railway, 74 S. C. 332, 54 S. E. 578, and the subsequent cases, was applied where the facts were quite different from those in the present case, and in none of them were the rights of a sleeping passenger involved. In the case of passengers, other than those in sleeping cars, it may reasonably be expected that they will be able to give notice of the necessity for protection, but knowledge of the fact that a passenger is asleep in his berth is, in itself, notice of the necessity for taking proper precautions to safeguard him, as at that time he may be presumed to be powerless to give notice of threatened danger.

In the present case the testimony shows that the Pullman Company recognized the necessity for guarding the safety of the passengers, even before receiving notice of danger, or of facts from which danger might reasonably be anticipated, by requiring either the conductor or the porter to be on duty during the entire time the passengers are asleep, for the purpose of giving them protection generally, without reference to any particular danger to a passenger. Therefore it is evidence of negligence for the sleeping car company to fail to keep a proper watch, even before it has other notice of the danger, or of such facts as are sufficient to cause it to anticipate danger, to a particular passenger.

In regard to the case of Connell's Ex'rs v. Railway, 93 Va. 44, 24 S. E. 467, 32 L. R. A. 792, 57 Am. St. Rep. 786, we would say that, in so far as it announces the principle that robbery is a danger to the safety of the passenger, which a sleeping car company should guard against, it states the principle correctly. But if it is to be construed as ruling that a sleeping car company cannot be held liable for damages, when a passenger is murdered by a stranger, although both the conductor and porter went to sleep, leaving the passengers unprotected, on the ground that murder was a danger not reasonably to be anticipated, then such a rule is not to be followed. We, however, do not think the court intended to go to that extent, as it did not appear in that case that the sleeping car company had failed to keep a general watch over the passengers. Therefore that case cannot be regarded as authority for the proposition that it is not the duty of a sleeping car company to take proper care to keep a watch over its passengers, even before it has notice of danger, or of circumstances sufficient to put it on inquiry, which, if pursued with due diligence, would lead to knowledge of the danger.

[5] Sixth Exception:

There was testimony tending to sustain the allegations of the complaint as to the failure of the servants of the Pullman Company to keep a watch while the plaintiff was asleep in her berth, and the said allegations show a reckless disregard of the plaintiff's safety, and that there was a conscious failure on the part of the Pullman Company's servants to discharge their duty. It cannot therefore be successfully contended that the testimony did not show that the plaintiff was entitled to compensatory, as well as punitive, damages.

[6] Seventh and Eighth Exceptions:

These exceptions cannot be sustained for the reason that the charge conformed to the rule announced in the cases of Pickens v. Railway, 54 S. C. 498, 32 S. E. 567, Myers v. Railway, 64 S. C. 514, 42 S. E. 598, and Sullivan v. Railway, 74 S. C. 377, 54 S. E. 586.

[7] Tenth Exception:

His honor, the Presiding Judge, charged the following request, which was presented by the appellant's attorneys: "The law in this state does not allow recovery of damages for mental suffering in the absence of bodily injury, in a case of this kind, and I charge you that, if you believe from a preponderance of the testimony that plaintiff received no bodily injury, then no damages for mental suffering are allowed." There are other portions of the charge to the same effect. This clearly shows that the exception cannot be sustained.

[8] Sixteenth Exception:

C. C. Freat, a witness for the appellant, thus testified, on cross-examination: "Q. As you say you are superintendent of this district? A. Charleston district and the territory adjacent to Charleston. Q. How many districts had the Pullman Company in the United States? A. I am not sure, offhand; I suppose 25 or 30. Q. It takes in the whole territory of the United States? A. Yes, sir; practically so. Q. They run Pullman cars throughout the whole United States? A. Yes, sir." The reasonable inference from this testimony is that the Pullman Company is an exceedingly wealthy corporation. "In cases involving the doctrine of punitive damages, it is very generally held that evidence of the defendant's wealth and pecuniary ability, is admissible. The reason of the rule admitting evidence of the defendant's wealth and pecuniary ability rests in the consideration that a pecuniary mulct which would operate as a sufficient punishment to a man of small means would, be inadequate in the case of a person of great wealth, and what would be a proper penalty in the latter case would be excessive and immoderate in the former. The rule admitting such evidence is indeed, it has been said, a fair corollary of the rule of exemplary damages." 12 Enc. of Law, 47; Rowe v. Moses, 9 Rich. 423, 67 Am. Dec. 560; Burckhalter v. Coward, 16 S. C. 435; Harris v. Marco, 16 S. C. 575; Duckett v. Pool, 34 S. C. 311, 13 S. E. 542. The appellant has failed to satisfy this court that the verdict was the result of prejudice or caprice. This exception cannot therefore be sustained.

The exceptions which have not been considered specifically have either been disposed of by what was said in considering the other exceptions, or are too general.

Judgment affirmed.

JONES, C. J., and WOODS and HYDRICK, JJ., concur.

(89 S. C. 134)

STATE v. DURHAM.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 1, 1911.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 401*)—BEST EVIDENCE—WARRANT OF ARREST.

Two witnesses for the state in a prosecution for homicide testified that deceased had no pistol, and did not shoot at defendant. They were asked on cross-examination if they had not been arrested for stealing the pistol which deceased had on that occasion. One of them said he had. The other denied it, but said that he had been arrested on some other charge connected with the homicide. Held that, since the charge against the witnesses was irrelevant and immaterial, the warrant on which they were arrested involved only a collateral matter as to which parol evidence of the magistrate who issued the warrant that they were not charged with stealing decedent's pistol, but with being accessories to the murder, was not objectionable on the ground that the warrant was the best evidence of its contents.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 884; Dec. Dig. § 401.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*)—EVIDENCE—RULINGS.

Admission of irrelevant or incompetent evidence is not reversible error, unless prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 8137; Dec. Dig. § 1169.*]

3. HOMICIDE (§ 347*)—SENTENCE—APPEAL.

Where accused was convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to hard labor in the penitentiary for 10 years, it was not reversible error to fail to sentence him to hard labor on the public works of the county, and, in the alternative, to imprisonment at hard labor, as required by Act Feb. 23, 1903 (24 St. at Large, p. 110), but the sentence will be set aside and case remanded for new sentence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 725; Dec. Dig. § 347.*]

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Greenville County; D. S. Henderson, Special Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Dave Durham was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Sentence set aside.

J. M. Daniel and Cothran, Dean & Cothran, for appellant. P. A. Bonham, Sol., for the State.

HYDRICK, J. Defendant was convicted of manslaughter, and sentenced to hard labor in the state penitentiary for 10 years. The state examined only two witnesses to the fatal encounter, both of whom testified that deceased had no pistol, and did not shoot at defendant. Defendant's attorney asked them on cross-examination if they had not been arrested and put in jail on the charge of stealing the pistol which deceased had on that occasion. One of them said that he had. The other denied it; but said that he had been arrested and put in jail on some charge connected with the homicide in question, but that he did not know what the charge was. It appears that both were ignorant negro boys, and that they were released from custody after a few days confinement. The state then proved by the magistrate who issued the warrant for their arrest that they were not charged with stealing deceased's pistol, but with being accessories to the murder.

[1] The first exception assigns error in admitting the magistrate's testimony as to the charge contained in the warrant on the ground that the warrant was the best evidence of the charge therein contained. The charge against the witnesses was irrelevant and immaterial. State v. Wyse, 33 S. C. 591, 12 S. E. 556; Kirkland v. Railway, 79 S. C. 273, 60 S. E. 668, 123 Am. St. Rep. 848. Therefore the warrant involved only collateral matter as to which parol evidence was admissible. Charles v. Railroad Co., 78 S. C. 39, 58 S. E. 927, 125 Am. St. Rep. 762.

[2] Moreover, the rule is well settled that the admission of irrelevant evidence or of incompetent evidence on an immaterial issue is not reversible error, unless it is made to appear that it was prejudicial, which has not been done in this case.

[3] The second exception complains that the sentence was not in the alternative as prescribed by the statute, which reads: "All able-bodied male convicts, whose sentences shall not be for a longer period than ten years, * * * shall be sentenced to hard labor upon the public works of the county in which convict shall have been convicted, and in the alternative to imprisonment in the county jail or state penitentiary at hard labor." 24 Stat. p. 110. The failure to impose the alternative sentence required by the statute was no doubt due to an oversight of the presiding judge. As the error relates only to the sentence, the verdict will not be disturbed, but the sentence imposed will be set aside and the case remanded to the circuit court, with instructions to impose sentence in the alternative, as required by the statute. Judgment accordingly.

STATE v. GREEN.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 1, 1911.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 139*)—"KEEP IN POSSESSION"—CONSTRUCTION—"STORE."

The words "store and keep in possession," as used in 26 St. at Large, p. 60, prohibiting the unlawful accepting, receiving, storing, and keeping in possession alcoholic liquors contrary to law, involve the idea of continuity or habit, and have no different construction or meaning in counties where the sale of liquor is prohibited from that which they have in counties where liquors are lawfully sold through dispensaries.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 149; Dec. Dig. § 139.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 4, pp. 3914-3923; vol. 8, p. 7699; vol. 7, pp. 6672-6675; vol. 8, p. 7805.]

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 139*)—KEEPING IN POSSESSION—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a prosecution under 26 St. at Large, p. 60, relating to the unlawful keeping, storing or receiving of alcoholic liquors, the court erred in charging that it was unlawful for one to have liquor in his possession in a prohibition county without reference to the quantity or purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 149; Dec. Dig. § 139.*]

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Sumter County; R. W. Memminger, Judge. "To be officially reported."

Lloyd Green was convicted of unlawfully receiving, storing, and keeping in possession alcoholic liquors contrary to the statutes, and he appeals. Reversed.

C. Capers Smith, for appellant. P. H. Stoll, Sol., for the State.

HYDRICK, J. The appellant was convicted on an indictment charging that he "did unlawfully accept, receive, store, and keep in possession" alcoholic liquors, contrary to the statute. He admitted having liquor in his possession, but claimed that he had it only for his own personal use. He requested the court to charge the jury that the term "storing and keeping in possession," used in the statute, involves the idea of continuity or habit. The court charged that that was correct under the old dispensary law, when the state engaged in the sale of liquors, and that it would be correct as applied to the law in any county in the state in which there is now a dispensary, but that in a county which has no dispensary (such as Sumter, where the indictment is laid), the mere having liquor in possession, no matter for what purpose, nor how small a quantity it may be, is illegal.

[1] We think his honor erred in holding that the words "store and keep in possession" have a different meaning and construction in counties where the sale of liquor is prohibited from that which they have in counties where liquors are lawfully sold through dispensaries. We find no warrant in reason or authority for such variable construction of a statute. In Easley v. Pegg, 63 S. C. 102, 41 S. E. 18, it was held that "the offense of storing and keeping in possession contraband liquors involves the idea of continuity or habit." The same construction and meaning must be given the same words used in the act of 1909 (26 St. at Large, p. 60) as was given them in the act of 1897 (22 St. at Large, p. 535).

[2] The court also erred in charging that it was unlawful for one to have liquor in his possession in a prohibition county, no matter what quantity or for what purpose. State v. Rookard, 87 S. C. 442, 69 S. E. 1076.

FLAGLER v. ATLANTIC COAST LUMBER CORPORATION.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 13, 1911.)

1. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—TIMBER DEED—CONSTRUCTION.

Complainant, on June 10, 1899, executed a timber deed to defendant's assignor, reciting that complainant had bargained, sold, released and delivered unto the grantee, his heirs, etc., all the timber of 12-inch stump diameter and upwards, on the ground at the time of cutting, then standing on the tract described, to have and to hold the timber unto the grantee, his heirs, etc., with the right of entry, and to cut roads, etc., complainant agreeing to warrant and defend the title to the timber to the grantees, etc., against all persons claiming the same or any part thereof, it being agreed that the time limit of the conveyance was 10 years from the time the grantees began cutting and removing the timber, but that complainant agreed that the time might be extended from year to year on payment of interest on the purchase price. Held, that such deed did not constitute a conveyance of the timber in fee with the right of the grantee to a sufficient interest in the land to support the growth of the trees so long as they should live, but that the grantee and his assignee was bound to commence the removal of the timber within a reasonable time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. §§ 6-12; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 172*)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS NOT RAISED AT TRIAL.

Where a grantee in a timber deed was required to commence removing the timber within a reasonable time, the Supreme Court on appeal would not determine what would be a reasonable time, where that question had not been considered by the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 172.*]

3. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—ILLEGAL PROVISION OF DEED—EFFECT.

That a timber deed contained a provision requiring the grantor to pay the taxes on the timber in violation of the statute imposing that burden on the grantee, did not invalidate the deed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Williamsburg County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Suit by A. W. Flagler against the Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation. Decree for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

W. F. Clayton and Henry Buck, for appellant. Willcox & Willcox, for respondent.

BUCKER, A. A. J. On the 10th day of June, 1899, the plaintiff appellant entered into an agreement with one R. L. Montague by the terms of which he, for a valuable consideration, conveyed to the said R. L. Montague the timber then growing upon two tracts of land amounting to 230 acres, the exact language as to the timber being "all the timber of every kind and description of twelve (12) inches stump diameter and upwards, twelve inches from the ground at the time of the cutting, now standing and being" upon the land then more accurately described. Subsequently to the execution of this instrument, but prior to the commencement of this action, the grantee conveyed his interest to the Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation, the defendant herein. September 22, 1910, the plaintiff appellant served his complaint herein, and motions to strike out certain portions thereof were made, as well as like motions to strike out certain paragraphs of the answer, and thereupon such orders were taken, unnecessarily to set out here, as resulted in the following amended complaint:

"Amended Complaint.

"The plaintiff complaining of the defendant alleges:

"(1) That defendant is a corporation chartered under the law of the state of South Carolina.

"(2) That the plaintiff was, at the times, hereinafter mentioned, and is now the owner in fee of that certain plantation in Williamsburg county, state of South Carolina, containing two hundred and thirty acres, more or less, and bounded as follows, On the north by lands of the estate of James Coker, on the east by lands of Louis Yarborough, on the south by lands of Louis Yarborough and J. F. Brockington, and on the west by the Northeastern Railroad and lands conveyed by R. T. Flagler.

"(3) That on June 10, 1899, the plaintiff entered into a contract with one R. L. Montague, whereby plaintiff conveyed to R. L. Montague all of the timber, excepting oak and hickory, then standing on the above-described tract of twelve inches and above in diameter twelve inches from the ground, and that said contract was assigned by R. L. Montague to the defendant herein, which is the present owner thereof.

"(4) That inter alia, the said contract reads as follows: 'It is agreed that the time limit of this conveyance, as above set forth, shall be ten years from the time the second party begins cutting and removing the said timber from the lands above described; but the first party agrees that the said time limit may be extended from year to year thereafter, upon payment by the said second party, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, to the first party, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, of interest on the original purchase price above mentioned at the rate of six per cent. per annum.'

"(5) That more than eleven years have elapsed, and the defendant has made no action or effort to cut and remove the timber, nor is there any prospect that defendant will in the near future, or at any time, cut and remove said timber; and, by reason of defendant's long delay, plaintiff alleges that said contract cannot be equitably enforced as between plaintiff and defendant, as many trees not twelve inches in diameter twelve inches from the ground at date of this contract in the long lapse of time from June 10, 1899, have by reason of eleven years' growth become twelve inches and more in diameter, and it will be impossible to separate them in cutting said timber.

"(6) That plaintiff, after waiting more than ten years, is informed and believes that said plaintiff has in good faith tendered the defendant the money paid by Montague to plaintiff and demanded that his deed be canceled and delivered to him, and defendant has declined to do so.

"Wherefore plaintiff demands judgment against the defendant that defendant be required to deliver to the clerk of this court the contract or deed aforementioned, and that said clerk cancel the same of record, and for such further relief as to the court may seem just, and for the cost of this action. W. F. Clayton, Plaintiff's Attorney."

And amended answer:

"Answer to Amended Complaint.

"The defendant, by way of answer to the amended complaint served under the order of the court striking out certain matter from the original complaint, alleges:

"(1) That it admits the allegations of the first, second, and fourth paragraphs of said complaint.

"(2) That it admits that plaintiff on June 10, 1899, executed to R. L. Montague a deed and contract conveying to him certain timber, and that defendant has succeeded to the rights of said Montague under said deed and contract as alleged in the third paragraph of said complaint, but it denies that said deed and contract conveyed only the timber then standing on the land twelve inches and above in diameter twelve inches from the ground, and on the contrary alleges that it conveyed the timber then standing that should be twelve inches in diameter twelve inches from the ground at the time of cutting.

"(3) That it admits that as alleged in the eighth paragraph of said complaint more than eleven years have elapsed, and it has not attempted to cut and remove said timber, but it denies each and every other allegation in said complaint contained. Willcox & Willcox, Henry E. Davis, Defendant's Attorneys."

The contract was as follows:

"Title to Timber.

"State of South Carolina, County of Williamsburg.

"A. W. Flagler to R. L. Montague.

"This deed and contract made the 10th day of June, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and ninety-nine (1899) by and between A. W. Flagler, of the county of Williamsburg and state of South Carolina, of the first part, herein called the first party, and R. L. Montague of the city of Norfolk, of Norfolk county and state of Virginia, of the second part, herein called the second party:

"Witnesseth, that the first party for and in consideration of the premises and the sum of seventy-five dollars cash in hand paid by the second party at and before the sealing and delivery of these presents, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, has granted, bargained, sold, released and delivered unto the said second party, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, all the timber of every kind and description of twelve (12) inches stump diameter and upwards, twelve inches from the ground at the time of cutting, now standing and being upon that certain tract, piece or parcel of land known as the 'Home Tract' lands and upon which A. W. Flagler now lives, exception being made to the following described timber which is not conveyed under this contract, all the oak and hickory timber. The said lands are bounded and described as follows, to wit, all that certain piece, parcel or tract bounded on the north by lands of the estate of James Coker, on the east by lands of Louis Yarborough, on the south by lands of J. E. Brockington and Louis Yarborough, and on the west by the Northeastern Railroad and lands conveyed to me by R. T. Flagler, this tract being composed of two tracts of land conveyed to me, one by J. F. Brockington by deed dated April, 1881, containing two hundred and thirty-eight acres, seventy-four acres of which being conveyed to my son, R. T. Flagler, leaving one hundred and sixty-four acres, and the other by E. J. C. Matthews by deed dated the 15th July, 1878, containing sixty-six acres, making in total a tract containing two hundred and thirty (230) acres, situate in the township of Ridge, county of Williamsburg and state of South Carolina. To have and to hold the said timber on the land described above unto the said second party, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, together with the exclusive right and privilege to the second party, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, to enter freely upon the said described land, to cut roads through the same or other contiguous land of the said first party, to lay out, make and construct all necessary or convenient railroads, tramways, cartways, stables and other fixtures upon the said land and contiguous lands of the said first party, and to have and enjoy all such right of way upon and over the same and to do and perform all such work as may in the opinion and discretion of the said second party, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns be necessary for the cutting, handling, hauling and removing of the said timber, and to have and use a permanent right of way eighty (80) feet wide upon and across the land above described, to be selected and located by the said second party, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, for a permanent railroad or tramway or for any permanent branch railroad or tramway.

"It is further agreed that the said second party shall have the privilege and be entitled to use free of charge such small timber as may in the judgment of the said second party, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, be required to build, construct and maintain railroads, cartways, roadways and other fixtures during the continuance of this contract for the removal of the timber herein conveyed. And the said first party agrees to pay all further taxes on the said land and timber. The first party reserves the right to use any timber for ordinary plantation purposes on said land. The first party hereby agrees to warrant and forever defend the title of the said timber unto the said second party, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns against all others lawfully or otherwise claiming or to claim the same or any part thereof. It is agreed that the time limit of this conveyance as above set forth shall be ten (10) years from the time the second party begins cutting and removing the said timber from the lands above described; but the first party agrees that the said time limit may be extended from year to year thereafter upon the payment by the said second party, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, to the first party, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns of interest on the original purchase price above mentioned at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. The second party, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns shall pay any damage that may accrue to the first party, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, by reason of any negligence on the part of the agents or employes of the second party, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, and for damage done to growing crops, by virtue of right of way hereinbefore provided for, said damage shall be ascertained and assessed by two disinterested persons, one to be chosen by each of the parties to this contract, and in case they disagree the two so chosen to select a third, and the report of said appraisers made in writing shall be final and binding. All the covenants, stipulations and agreements herein assumed or undertaken shall be binding upon their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns.

"Witness our hands and seals this 10th day of June in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and ninety-nine and in the one hundred and twenty-third year of the sovereignty and independence of the United States of America. A. W. Flagler. [L. S.] R. L. Montague. [L. S.] Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of: S. McB. Scott, H. G. Askins, as to A. W. Flagler. L. N. Overton, H. K. Weaver, as to R. L. Montague. [Int. Rev. Stamp, Can. $1.00.]"

To which there was attached in usual form the renunciation of dower of Mrs. Ella S. Flagler.

Upon the issues thus joined Judge Prince, before whom the case was finally heard, dismissed the complaint in the following decree:

"Decree.

"This suit was brought for the purpose of having the court decree a certain conveyance of timber to be void. The conveyance was executed by the defendant to one R. L. Montague, and bore date June 10, 1899. Defendant is at present entitled to the property and rights acquired by Montague from plaintiff.

"The conveyance above mentioned contained the following covenant or agreement, which appears below the granting, habendum, and warranty clauses of said conveyance, to wit: 'It is agreed that the time limit of this conveyance, as above set forth, shall be ten years from the time the second party begins cutting and removing the said timber from the lands above described; but the first party agrees that the said time limit may be extended from year to year thereafter, upon the payment by the said second party, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, to the first party, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, of interest on the original purchase price above mentioned at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum.'

"By the terms of this conveyance, plaintiff 'granted, bargained, sold, released and delivered' to Montague, 'his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns,' all the timber therein described, 'to have and to hold all and singular the said timber unto the said' R. L. Montague, 'his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns.' This conveyance contains the following covenant of warranty, to wit: 'The said first party (A. W. Flagler) hereby agrees to warrant and forever defend the title to the said timber unto the second party (R. L. Montague), his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns against himself and all others lawfully or otherwise claiming or to claim the same or any part thereof.' Immediately after the covenant of warranty appears the agreement by reason of which, it is charged by plaintiff that this conveyance should be declared void. The plaintiff takes the further position in his complaint that more than 11 years has elapsed since the date of said conveyance, and that no motion has been made by plaintiff to cut the timber. By reason of this alleged long delay, he contends that the contract cannot be equitably enforced because of the fact that on account of 11 years' growth a large number of trees have reached the contract size since the date of the contract. At the trial, this last position was abandoned, plaintiff's counsel stating that this charge was made on account of a mistake in his reading of the conveyance. The case really turns upon the construction of the conveyance in question.

"My construction of this paper is that it conveys to R. L. Montague the timber therein described in fee simple, and that by this conveyance he became entitled to the timber in fee simple together with a sufficient interest in the soil to sustain the trees. Montague had the right to enter at any time upon the land and cut the timber. This being true, a subsequent covenant or agreement tending to limit the time Montague should have for cutting and removing the timber after he should once commence such cutting and removal, could not have the effect of defeating or limiting the purchaser's title to the timber in question, or to the interest in the soil necessary to support same.

"My conclusion, to the effect that the deed in question conveys the timber to the grantee named therein in fee simple with a sufficient interest in the soil to sustain the trees, is based on the cases of Knotts v. Hydrick, 12 Rich. 314, and Wilson Lumber Company v. D. W. Alderman & Sons Company, 80 S. C. 106 [61 S. E. 217, 128 Am. St. Rep. 865].

"My conclusion, to the effect that the estate created by the granting clauses of the deed is not affected by the covenant as to removal, is based on the case of Crawford v. Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation, 79 S. C. 166 [60 S. E. 445], and authorities therein cited.

"It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that the relief prayed for be refused and the complaint be dismissed, with costs. Geo. Prince, Presiding Judge."

From which action the plaintiff duly served notice of intention to appeal, and now comes to this court with the following exceptions:

"Exceptions.

"Plaintiff excepts to the rulings of the presiding judge and to the construction placed on the conveyance herein, on the following grounds:

"First. Because his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in holding that under the terms of the conveyance herein R. L. Montague was granted all of the timber therein described in fee simple, and by this conveyance he became entitled to the timber in fee simple, together with sufficient interest in the soil to sustain the trees. And that the said Montague and respondent, his grantee, have the right at any time to enter upon the land and cut the timber, whereas, it is respectfully submitted that, in construing this deed, effect should be given to each clause therein, and by the proper construction, the said R. L. Montague was conveyed to only so much timber as was removed within the time limit.

"Second. Because his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in holding that the clause limiting the time in which the timber was to be removed is a subsequent covenant or agreement and should not have the effect of defeating or limiting Montague's title to the timber in question, or the interest in the soil necessary to support same, it being respectfully submitted that under the terms of this conveyance the said Montague took a determinable fee, and to him was conveyed only so much timber in fee as was removed within the time specified; that the time limit was not a covenant or agreement, but was in the nature of a condition, and should be given effect as such; that such construction should be given to the deed as will give effect to each clause, and, by proper construction of the deed, only such timber as was removed, within the time specified, was conveyed to the said Montague in fee simple, and that the said Montague, under the terms of the conveyance was bound to commence to cut the timber within a reasonable time; that more than eleven years having elapsed and the said Montague and the respondent herein, his grantee, not having command to cut and remove said timber, all their rights thereunder are lost; that such construction is necessary, in order to give effect to the intention of the parties, as legally expressed.

"Third. Because his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in holding that under the terms of the said conveyance the said Montague was conveyed the timber therein described in fee simple, with the right to enter upon the said land and cut and remove the timber at any time, in that such construction is against public policy, in that the plaintiff herein is permanently deprived of the right to the use of the soil and its cultivation, which could not have been the intention of parties taken from the whole instrument, and which would prevent the development and improvement of the natural resources of the commonwealth.

"Fourth. Because his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in not holding that the conveyance was void by reason of the provision therein that plaintiff should pay the taxes on the timber, when the laws of the state place that burden upon the owner thereof, and such provision is contrary to law and void as against public policy.

"Fifth. Because his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in not holding that the conveyance herein is void for uncertainty. W. F. Clayton, Henry Buck, Appellant's Attorneys."

The questions then presented to this court, as raised by the appellant for consideration, are: First. That the grant to the defendant respondent was for a limited time only, and that the court in construing the contract should determine that this time was a reasonable time from the making of the contract. Second. That as 11 years have elapsed since the making of the contract, that more than a reasonable time has expired and that the rights of the defendant respondent have terminated. Third. That in view of the agreement in the contract that the plaintiff should pay the taxes on the timber during the continuance of the contract is in violation of the law, and that the contract is therefore void.

In behalf of the defendant respondent it is claimed: First. That under the language of the contract that the defendant took a fee-simple title to the timber and such interest in the land as was necessary to support the timber, and that this question was stare decisis in this state, and for this position relied upon the authority of Knotts v. Hydrick, 12 Rich. 314, and Wilson Lumber Company v. Alderman & Sons Company, 80 S. C. 106, 61 S. E. 217, 128 Am. St. Rep. 865. And, under the case of Crawford v. Atlantic Coast Lumber Company, that the limitations, if any, of this contract could not affect the fee-simple character of the grant.

[1] In the discussion of the case before the court, the question that certain phases of the contract were presented to this court on appeal, when not directly raised by the pleading, was waived by counsel for the respondent, and they joined in the request that the contract in question be fully construed by this court. For the purpose of convenience we will first consider the question of the correctness of the position taken by respondent's counsel, that the main question at issue is already settled in this state under the authority of Knotts v. Hydrick, 12 Rich. 314, and Wilson Lumber Company v. Alderman & Sons Company, 80 S. C. 106, 61 S. E. 217, 128 Am. St. Rep. 865. If this be true, it follows that all of the questions raised by the appellant must be decided adverse to him without further reason, except the question raised by the fourth exception. It is therefore necessary to examine into the cases cited to see if they do establish that which is claimed for them by the defendant and fix its claim to the timber under the terms of the present contract.

The case of Knotts v. Hydrick, supra, was decided on the following facts: There the grant was not of timber, but of land, with an express reservation to the grantor of "all timber growing on said land suitable to be sawed into lumber." The grantee gave notice to the grantor of the deed to remove the timber, which the grantor did not do, and the grantee then girdled the trees, and the action arose by reason of the grantor suing the grantee for the value of the trees rendered unfit for lumber. Under these circumstances, this court held that the grantor had not only an estate in the trees, but also such an interest in the soil as was necessary to sustain them, and, further, that such an estate cannot be terminated by the grantee by giving the grantor notice and a reasonable time to remove the timber. It is well to be observed that in this case there were no words used in the contract or deed which undertook to limit the time within which the timber was to be removed.

In Wilson Lumber Company v. Alderman & Sons Company, one McElveen conveyed to Wilson all the timber upon a certain tract, with habendum to Thomas Wilson and his heirs and assigns forever with the usual general warranty. Within a year Wilson built a tramway to the land, cut and sawed some of the timber, and then removed the tramway and milling machinery. Subsequently he conveyed his interest to Wilson Lumber Company, and the heirs of McElveen, the grantor of Wilson, conveyed the timber to Alderman & Sons Company for a term of years, and some time thereafterwards the latter company went upon the land and cut some of the timber, and the action was commenced by the Wilson Lumber Company for an injunction to restrain the defendant from cutting the timber. At the trial it was agreed after the construction placed by the presiding judge (Judge Prince) upon the deed from McElveen to Wilson that there was nothing for the jury to pass upon, he holding that the deed being in form a fee-simple deed without conditions or limitations it conveyed the timber with such interest in the land as was necessary to sustain the trees. And upon appeal his construction of the deed was sustained by this court in an opinion rendered by Chief Justice Jones.

Under these cases, then, and our attention has been invited to no others, is the main question presented by the appeal in the present case decided adversely to the appellant's position? It will be noted that neither in the case of Knotts v. Hydrick nor in Wilson Lumber Company v. Alderman & Sons Company was there an attempt made in the deeds to limit the right of the owner of the timber to any given period of removal. In the first case there was simply a retention of title to the timber in the deed by the grantor, and in the latter case a grant thereof without limitations or conditions, and all this court held was that in the absence of such limitations upon the right of removal that such right of removal continued to exist in the owner of the timber. In other words, the deeds under construction failed to show by anything on their face any intention on the part of the parties thereto of limiting the right to remove.

In the case now presented, an attempt has been made to limit the time in which removal can be had: "It is agreed that the time limit of this conveyance as above set forth shall be ten (10) years from the time the second party begins cutting and removing the said timber from the land above described. * * *

And in reference to the right of the grantee to build and maintain tramways, roadways, etc., "during the continuance of this contract for the removal of the timber herein conveyed," there is evidently an attempt to limit the time of removal by the grantee of the timber. And without at this time passing upon the question of the sufficiency of such an attempt to carry out the intent, it is enough to say that the words used in the contract were absent in Knotts v. Hydrick and Wilson Lumber Company v. Alderman & Sons Company, nor were any provisions of similar import found in either of these cases; we are therefore of opinion that they do not control the case now under consideration.

The question presented then by this case not having heretofore been passed upon by this court, it becomes necessary to examine the authorities to ascertain what the law is. Before doing so, though, let us first turn to the contract itself, and see what light it gives as to the intention of the parties, for in the last analysis their intent is the controlling factor in the construction of the deed, provided the instrument furnishes the evidence of the intent, and here it is to be borne in mind that whilst the deed in the words used is at first such words as ordinarily convey a fee-simple title that the deed is signed by both the grantor and the grantee, and the reason for this lies in the fact that the parties intended to bind each other to certain obligations; upon the grantor, the passing of the title to the grantee, and upon the grantee, not only the right to remove, but, in a qualified sense, the duty also of so doing. A time limit of some kind was evidently in contemplation, the exact wording of it was: "It is agreed that the time limit of this conveyance as above set forth shall be ten (10) years from the time the second party begins cutting and removing the said timber from the lands above described. * * *" It is contended by the respondent that this language is plain, simple, and unambiguous, that it simply means that when the owner of the timber commenced cutting he must finish within 10 years. But the obstacle in the way of the adoption of this view is that it presupposes that the grant was for practically an indefinite period, as there is nothing within the grant which shows when the cutting and removing of the timber is to begin. The grant in terms was "all the timber of every kind and description of twelve (12) inches stump diameter and upwards, twelve inches from the ground at the time of cutting, now standing and being upon that certain tract of land." So it would follow that there would be nothing to prevent the grantee from indefinitely holding the land in its original condition: For whilst it is admitted that the work of cutting and removing must be done within the period of 10 years from the date of the commencing, it is maintained that it lies solely within the discretion of the grantee to determine when he will commence, limited only by the provision in the agreement that the timber sold must have been in existence upon the tract at the time when the contract was made. As long as such a tree existed the right to commence cutting would remain with the grantee. How long do trees live? Certainly it is not unreasonable to suppose that many of them live for a hundred or more years, and if the respondent is right, then on June 9, 1909, the respondent or its assigns could commence to cut this timber, and in the meantime the land would remain incumbered and unfit for cultivation. And during this long period the grantee was to pay taxes, not only on the land, but on the timber as well. Was this contemplated by the parties? We think not. Some lesser period of time must have been in the minds of the grantor and grantee. What this lesser period was the agreement fails to show. What rule does the law supply in such a case? In the case of Hall v. Eastman, 89 Miss. 588, 43 South. 2, 119 Am. St. Rep. 709, the time limit was as follows: "This deed is to continue and remain in force until said Eastman, Gardiner & Co., their successors and assigns, commence to cut and lumber the same and for one year thereafter and then to become void and of no effect." In construing this clause for all essential purposes the same as that under consideration, the court held that the grantee must commence the work within a reasonable time.

McRae v. Stillwell, Millen & Co., 111 Ga. 65, 36 S. E. 604, 55 L. R. A. 513, is also directly in point. There the grant was to "all the pine timber suitable for sawmill purposes" on 11 described lots of land, each containing 202½ acres. The paper also contained the following clause: "I acknowledge the receipt of the sum of $550 in cash, and note dollars this day paid me by party of second part; and do agree that amounts left unpaid this day shall be paid as follows: When each lot is entered to cut said timber, the balance due on each lot is $100, which will be due as above stated; and I also for the above-stated consideration, give, bargain, sell, alien, and convey to said party of the second part, their heirs and assigns, the full right of way to railroads, tramroads, and wagonroads in and through this said land for the purposes above stated, said right of way to continue as long as said mill operation may require." In construing this contract, the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Cobb, with reference to the last portion of the above quotation, held that the use of this language indicated an intention upon the part of the party to limit the time of the building of such railroads, tramroads, etc., and therefore of the right to cut and remove the timber, the court saying "that it was the intention of the parties to this instrument that the grantees should become the owners of the timber suitable for sawmill purposes growing on the land at the date of the execution of the deed, and that such timber was to be removed from the premises at a reasonable time after execution of the conveyance." And the court further animadverted to our case of Knotts v. Hydrick, and in effect drew the same distinction from it that we have hereinbefore set out. In this connection it is well to note that in the case of Hall v. Eastman, supra, which was the first case of this kind arising in the state of Mississippi, and in which the doctrine that where no time was fixed for the commencement of the removal of the timber, but some time was evidently in the contemplation of the party, that the courts would imply a reasonable time. That thereafter the question was presented to that court, similar to the facts of Knotts v. Hydrick, and Wilson Lumber Company v. Alderman & Sons Company; that is to say, a case in which from the contract no time limit was fixed directly, nor by implication, that the court came to the same conclusion that this court did in those cases. This was the result in the case of Butterfield Lumber Company v. Guy, 92 Miss. 361, 46 South. 78, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1123, 131 Am. St. Rep. 540. In the state of North Carolina, while we are not prepared at this time to adopt the entire reasoning of the courts, it is sufficient to say that the doctrine of a reasonable time to commence under a contract, such as that in this case, has been adopted. Bunch v. Elizabeth City Lumber Company, 134 N. C. 116, 46 S. E. 24.

It is not necessary to discuss the large number of citations of counsel in their arguments. Suffice it to say that we are of opinion that, both by the inherent reason of the thing, as well as by authority, that the true rule is that wherever it is apparent in a contract that the parties had in view some time for the commencement of the removal of the timber, which intent was not embodied in the terms of the contract, that the law will presume, and will enforce that such commencement of the removal of the timber shall be within a reasonable time from the date of the contract.

[2] As to what constitutes a reasonable time, we will not undertake to decide as that matter has not been considered by the trial court.

Upon the doctrine laid down in Crawford v. Atlantic Coast Lumber Company, 79 S. C. 166, 60 S. E. 445, suffice it to say that under the construction we have given this deed, that case is not applicable because it is conceded by all the authorities that if the intent of the parties can be gathered from the instrument, that such intent must be given effect, and in this case we have found from the contract what that intent was, and in addition to this it may be stated that there was prior to the warranty clause in this case a distinct reference to such limitation of time to the apparently otherwise fee-simple grant made, for the contract in speaking of the granting of rights for railroads and cart roads, etc., says "during the continuance of this contract for the removal of the timber herein conveyed."

[3] As the fourth exception, that the conveyance was void because it provided that the plaintiff should pay the taxes on this timber when the law required this burden to be borne by the defendant, we cannot sustain, because we can see no reason why the violation of the law should carry with it any other penalty than that affixed by the law, and this exception is therefore overruled. This disposes of all of the questions raised by the appeal.

It follows from what has herein been set out that the presiding judge was in error in dismissing the complaint, and the case is remanded for the purpose of taking testimony and determining as to what would be a reasonable time within which to commence removing the timber from the land in dispute, under all the facts and circumstances surrounding the parties at the time of the making of the contract; and it is so ordered.

WESLEY v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 17, 1911.)

CARRIERS (§ 382*)—EJECTION OF PASSENGER—PLEADING—DAMAGES—"GROSS NEGLIGENCE."

An allegation in the complaint against a carrier that the action of the defendant in ejecting plaintiff "was not only a gross violation of the obligation which it had assumed to carry the plaintiff, but was a willful, wanton, and malicious violation of the plaintiff's rights as a passenger," did not limit plaintiff to recovery of punitive, but permitted recovery of actual, damages; the words "gross negligence" do not ordinarily import recklessness or wantonness, but only when the context shows they were so intended.

Action by Hagar Wesley, by her guardian ad litem, against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

McDonald & McDonald and B. L. Abney, for appellant. Ragsdale & Dixon, for respondent.

JONES, C. J. On September 14, 1909, the plaintiff, a young, ignorant negro woman, who could not read or write, boarded defendant's train as a passenger from Dawkins to Shelton, a distance of 10 miles, having requested and purchased of the agent at Dawkins a full-fare ticket for 25 cents. There was one other passenger from Dawkins that day, Mag Black, a young negro woman, who purchased a half-fare ticket from Dawkins to Cedar Springs, a distance of 55 miles, for 65 cents. These two women were sitting, either on a seat together, or on adjoining seats. Before reaching the next station, Strothers, which was three miles from Dawkins, the ticket collector came along and took up the tickets of these passengers about the same time. The collector testified positively that Mag Black gave him the full-fare ticket to Shelton, and that plaintiff gave him a half-fare ticket to Cedar Springs; that he informed plaintiff that she could not ride on a half ticket; that he demanded 83 cents additional fare, and upon her statement that she did not have the money he told her to get off the train at Strothers, and that plaintiff requested to be carried to Blairs, because she had some people there to stay with. Blairs was a station five miles from Dawkins. The collector testified that plaintiff did not state to him that her destination was Shelton; that he did not inquire, but assumed that her destination was Cedar Springs, from the ticket she presented; that he passed her to Blairs, because she had the half-fare ticket; and that if he had known her station was Shelton he would have passed her to that point on her ticket.

The plaintiff testified that she purchased a full-fare ticket to Shelton. This testimony was most positively corroborated by Jesse Morgan, who saw her purchase and pay for a ticket to Shelton, and saw it in her hand just before she boarded the train, and by S. T. Goodlet, defendant's agent at Dawkins, who declared that he sold and delivered to plaintiff a full-fare ticket to Shelton, for which he received 25 cents, and this was after he had sold to Mag Black the half-fare ticket to Cedar Springs.

Plaintiff testified that she gave to the ticket collector the same ticket that was given her by the defendant's agent at Dawkins; that when the collector told her that he could not carry her on a half-fare ticket she informed him that she could not read or write; that Mr. Goodlet gave her the ticket and told her it would take her to Shelton. The plaintiff got off the train at Blairs, because she had been ordered to do so by the ticket collector. The other passenger, Mag Black, went on to Cedar Springs, and was saved from ejection by the charity of fellow passengers, who made up the additional fare claimed.

I concur in the conclusion reached by Mr. Justice GARY upon all the exceptions, except the seventh and eighth. The charge complained of in these exceptions is as follows: "If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff purchased a full-fare ticket, as alleged, from Dawkins to Shelton, and if you find that plaintiff boarded the train, as alleged, as a passenger from Dawkins to Shelton, and delivered such ticket, or a paper supposed by her to be such ticket, to the agent, or ticket auditor, or conductor, or other officer demanding it on the train, and if you find that thereafter, before the arrival of the train to Shelton, the defendant's conductor or other officer on the train required the plaintiff to leave the train, or ejected plaintiff from the train, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover the damages actually and proximately resulting from the putting off of plaintiff, so far as such actual damages might have been reasonably expected so to result. Now, I charge you the proposition stated as to the delivery of the ticket delivered by the plaintiff, and supposed or believed by the plaintiff to be the ticket bought by her—I charge you the proposition with reference to that, for the reason that no contributory negligence is pleaded in this case; and therefore, if you conclude that the plaintiff had paid full fare for a ticket from Dawkins to Shelton, and had received such ticket from the agent of the defendant, no negligence by the plaintiff in failing to tender the right ticket can operate to defeat her right to recover damages for a wrongful ejection from the train, because it had not been pleaded, and it cannot be submitted to you where not pleaded."

It is contended that the charge made the defendant liable for ejection for failure to present a ticket entitling her to ride as a passenger, if she presented "a paper supposed by her to be such ticket." The charge should not be considered as an abstract proposition, to be generally applied, but as applicable to the concrete case, as made by the facts. It will be noticed that the charge is conditional on the jury finding that plaintiff purchased and received from defendant's agent a full-fare ticket to Shelton, and boarded defendant's train as a passenger for Shelton. It will be further noticed that plaintiff did not tender just any kind of a paper which she supposed was a proper ticket, but that she tendered, either a full-fare ticket, costing 25 cents, or a half-fare ticket, costing 65 cents. It will still further be remembered that the ticket collector treated the half-fare ticket as sufficient to pass plaintiff to Blairs, and that he would have treated it as sufficient to pass her to Shelton, if he had only known that was her station; and there was no testimony in the case tending to show a different rule of the company. The pivotal issue arising from the testimony of defendant was whether the ticket collector knew or ought to have known that plaintiff's station was Shelton; for, if plaintiff presented a half-fare ticket to Cedar Springs, and he had information that her destination was Shelton, an expulsion for failure to pay 83 cents additional would be unlawful, even if plaintiff had no right whatever under the half-fare ticket, since full fare to Shelton was only 25 cents.

In view of the foregoing circumstances, I cannot think there was any prejudicial error in the charge.

The judgment is affirmed.

HYDRICK, J., concurs.

GARY, A. J. (dissenting). This is an action for damages, alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff, through the wrongful acts of the defendant, in ejecting her while she was a passenger on its train of cars.

The allegations of the complaint, material to the questions involved, are as follows:

"That on the 14th day of September, 1909, the plaintiff went to Dawkins, a station on the defendant's railroad, and purchased from the defendant's agent at that place a passenger ticket for Shelton, another station on the defendant's said road, paying the full price therefor, which was demanded by the defendant's said station agent, and she thereby became a full first-class passenger on defendant's said road, and upon the arrival of the defendant's train for Shelton the plaintiff boarded same.

"That when the said train had gone a short distance towards Shelton the defendant's ticket auditor came to plaintiff, and took up her ticket, and after leaving plaintiff for a short time returned to her and accused her of having given him a half ticket, which she had not done; and when the said train had been stopped at the next station the defendant's said ticket auditor, and other agents and servants of the defendant, wrongfully, unlawfully, wilfully, and wantonly, and forcibly ejected the plaintiff from the said train. * * *

"That action of the defendant, its agents, and servants, in ejecting her from the said car, as aforesaid, was not only a gross violation of the obligation which they had, for value received, assumed, to carry the plaintiff, but was a willful, wanton, and malicious violation of the plaintiff's rights as a passenger, to her damage in the sum of two thousand dollars."

The defendant's answer to the complaint was a general denial.

His honor, the presiding judge, thus summarized the plaintiff's testimony: "The plaintiff's testimony impressed me as being truthful, and a correct statement of what took place. As already stated, she testified that she bought from S. T. Goodlet, a ticket agent of the defendant at Dawkins, a full-fare ticket from Dawkins to Shelton; that she boarded the train here in question, and tendered to the ticket collector the ticket so received from the agent at Dawkins; that the ticket collector, called by her 'conductor,' either at the time or shortly after receiving the ticket, claimed that it was a half-fare ticket to a point of destination at Cedar Springs, some 60 miles farther than Shelton; that he thereupon ordered her to get off at Strothers, a station short of her destination at Shelton; that she then commenced crying, and begged him to put her off at Blairs, and told him that the agent at Dawkins had sold her the ticket, and had told her that it was a full-fare ticket to Shelton, but that the ticket collector, refusing to credit her story, forced her to leave the train at Blairs, without investigating, so far as appears, the truth of her claims. As already stated, the ticket agent at Dawkins, Mr. S. T. Goodlet, corroborated her story, in so far as the purchase of the ticket from Dawkins to Shelton by her on that day is concerned."

There was also testimony to the effect that, about the time the agent at Dawkins sold the plaintiff a ticket, he also sold a half-fare ticket to another woman, who was accompanied by a little girl, on the representation that it was for the girl who was going to Cedar Springs, which was about five times the distance to Shelton. That the two women boarded the train, but the girl was left behind. That when the auditor came to collect the tickets the two women were sitting near each other. That the plaintiff handed to the auditor a half-fare ticket, in the usual form, dated September 14, 1909, good for passage from Dawkins to Cedar Springs. That the auditor then and there returned this ticket to the plaintiff, with this indorsement: "Off at Blairs, Acct, grown person on this ticket and no funds. Party got off on own account. No. 13. 9-14-1909. G. B. Forbes, G. C." That the plaintiff was ejected at Blairs.

At the close of the plaintiff's testimony, the defendant made a motion for a nonsuit as to punitive damages, which was refused, and at the close of all the testimony renewed such motion, but it was again refused.

The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $500, and the defendant appealed upon exceptions, which will be reported. The first exception was abandoned.

Second and Third Exceptions:

The defendant made a motion for a new trial, and one of the grounds was that there was error in the refusal to sustain the motions for nonsuit. His honor, the Presiding Judge, in the order refusing the new trial, stated the reasons why the motions for nonsuit could not be sustained, and they are satisfactory to this court.

Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Exceptions:

The allegations of the complaint that the action of the defendant in ejecting the plaintiff "was not only a gross violation of the obligation which it had assumed, to carry the plaintiff, but was a willful, wanton, and malicious violation of the plaintiff's rights as a passenger," do not confine the plaintiff to a recovery of punitive damages, as a gross violation of duty does not necessarily involve willful misconduct. The words "gross negligence" do not ordinarily import recklessness or wantonness, and it is only when the context shows that they were thus intended can they be so construed. Boyd v. Railway, 65 S. C. 326, 43 S. E. 817. In the present case, the context shows that the words "gross violation" and "willful, wanton, and malicious violation" were not used in the same sense; that the first had reference to negligence, and the second to intentional wrong. The complaint, therefore, states two causes of action—one for negligence, and the other for wantonness or willfulness—and the plaintiff was entitled to recover both actual and punitive damages.

Seventh and Eighth Exceptions:

The charge set out in the seventh exception immediately precedes the charge in the eighth exception, and the two parts must be considered together, as they are dependent upon each other, for a proper construction. The allegation of the complaint is that the plaintiff, after boarding the train, delivered to the defendant's auditor the ticket which she had purchased from the agent at Dawkins, for which she had paid full price, and which entitled her to ride as a first-class passenger to Shelton, another station on defendant's line of road. The defendant's answer denied that she handed a ticket of that description to its auditor. His honor, in effect, charged that, even if the plaintiff did not deliver to the auditor such a ticket as is described in the complaint, but a paper supposed by her to be such ticket, and even though she may have been negligent in so supposing, nevertheless the defendant was liable for such damages as she may have sustained on account of being ejected from the train. The reason assigned by the Presiding Judge for this ruling was because the defense of contributory negligence was not interposed. It is true the defendant was not entitled to the benefit of the defense of contributory negligence, but it had the right to rely upon the issues made by the pleadings. Under the charge it was not necessary for the plaintiff to prove, as alleged, that she delivered to the auditor the ticket described in the complaint; and the instruction to the jury that damages were recoverable, if the ticket purchased was not presented, but a paper which she supposed was the ticket sold to her, materially changed the issue, and was unquestionably prejudicial to the rights of the appellant. These exceptions are therefore sustained.

Ninth and Tenth Exceptions:

What has already been said disposes of these exceptions.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Marlboro County; J. W. De Vere, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Thomas McKay appeals from a conviction. Reversed.

Townsend & Rogers, for appellant. J. Munroe Spears, for the State.

HYDRICK, J. At the trial below, the state put up Knox Purvis, a witness who had been examined before the committing magistrate. He said that he knew nothing about the case; that the prosecutrix and her sisters had persuaded him to tell what he had told at the preliminary investigation, and that what he had there sworn was false. The prosecuting attorney then stated to the court that he had been taken by surprise, and asked to be allowed to examine the witness by leading questions, on the ground that he was hostile. This was allowed, against defendant's objection. Against objection of defendant's attorney, the court also allowed the state to use the testimony of the witness which had been taken down by the magistrate for the purpose of contradicting him; the court ruling as follows: "It is alleged that this witness has made statements previous to this time that were contrary to the statements he makes here in open court. I do not think the rule allows a man to put up a witness and contradict him; but it does, if he is taken by surprise, and says he has made a different statement from that in court. That is how I rule this testimony is."

[1] The rule is that the court may, in its discretion, allow a party to propound leading questions to his own witness for the reason, among others, that the witness is hostile to him.

[2] While a party is not concluded by the testimony given by his own witness, but may prove the facts to be other than as testified to by such witness, he is not permitted to impeach the credibility of his own witness either by testimony as to his general character, or by contradicting him; that is, by proving that, on some other occasion, he made inconsistent statements. State v. Johnson, 43 S. C. 126, 20 S. E. 988; Bauskett v. Keltt, 22 S. C. 199, and cases cited.

[3] When the witness Purvis came off the stand, the solicitor ordered the sheriff, in open court, to arrest him and take him to jail to answer an indictment for perjury. This was done against defendant's protest. It is alleged that this was prejudicial to defendant, because it was calculated to intimidate any other witness from varying the testimony which he had given at the preliminary investigation. There is nothing in the record tending to show any such prejudice. It is purely conjectural and barely possible, but highly improbable. Therefore it affords no ground for reversal. On the contrary, we are inclined to commend prompt action by those charged with the administration of the law, when it has been flagrantly violated; and we are of the opinion that if perjurers were more invariably and promptly and vigorously prosecuted and punished, there would be fewer miscarriages of justice in our courts.

The court erred in allowing the witness Hucksbee to testify that he employed counsel to assist the solicitor in prosecuting the case. It was clearly irrelevant. Standing alone, it might not be sufficient to call for a reversal, but, when taken in connection with the other errors which appear in the record, we are impelled to the conclusion that there should be a new trial.

Reversed.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 11, 1911.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 282*)—DEATH OF SERVANT—RAILROADS—RECKLESS OPERATION—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

Where there was evidence that the train that killed a bridge watchman ran past a block signal set against it, and onto the bridge, before it had been signaled to proceed, as required by the railroad company's rules, the evidence showed a reckless disregard of decedent's rights, authorizing the submission of plaintiff's right to recover punitive damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 998; Dec. Dig. § 282*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 359*)—PHOTOGRAPHS—SUBORDINATING CONDITIONS—PRESUMPTION.

Photographs of the location of an accident, though taken long after it occurred, were not objectionable because there was no proof that the conditions were the same when they were taken as at the time of the accident; the presumption being that the conditions remained the same, in the absence of proof by defendant of any material change.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1511; Dec. Dig. § 359.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 359*)—PHOTOGRAPHS—EXPLANATORY MARKS.

It was no objection to the admission of photographs showing the scene of an accident that they bore explanatory marks, as, "Looking towards Cayce, 75 yards from river trestle;" each mark or notation on the photographs in any way material to the case having been verified by witnesses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1509-1512; Dec. Dig. § 359.*]

4. WITNESSES (§ 405*)—CONTRADICTION—EVIDENCE.

In an action for death of a bridge watchman by being struck by a train which ran past a block signal set up against it, plaintiff proved that the agent in charge of the block ran out of his office as the train was passing, and signaled it to stop, but that defendant's trainmaster, who was on the rear platform, directed it to proceed. When the trainmaster was on the stand, he was asked if, in the presence of T., the agent at the semaphore station had not said to him that decedent would never have been killed if the trainmaster had not taken the train into the block. Held, that the trainmaster having denied the agent's statement, evidence of T. that the agent made such statement to the trainmaster was not objectionable because the agent had not testified, or because the railroad company would not be bound by any statement of the trainmaster.

5. RELEASE (§ 56*)—BY ALLEGED WIDOW—EVIDENCE—INVALIDITY OF MARRIAGE.

Where, in an action for death, defendant railroad pleaded a release from decedent's alleged widow, plaintiff could prove that defendant knew when the release was taken that she had been married to another before her marriage to decedent, and that her marriage to decedent was void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Release, Dec. Dig. § 56.*]

6. EVIDENCE (§ 265*)—EFFECT OF RELEASE—CONSCIOUSNESS OF LIABILITY.

While the taking of a release is not an admission of legal liability as a matter of law, consciousness of liability may be legally inferred therefrom; and hence the court properly charged that counsel were entitled to draw such inference from the release, and that the jury might accept or reject the same, as they might be convinced.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1029-1050; Dec. Dig. § 265.*]

7. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTION—FACT.

In an action for death, the court, having explained negligence and contributory negligence and mentioned the specifications of negligence alleged in the complaint, charged that if a failure to do one of the things mentioned in the complaint which plaintiff alleged defendant should have done for decedent's protection was made out, and the jury found that in the exercise of due care they should have done some one or all of such things, then a case of negligence was made out against defendant, and the jury should consider the defense raised in the answer, was not objectionable as a charge on the facts.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; G. W. Gage, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by J. P. Wade, as administrator of the estate of Theodore P. Wade, against the Southern Railway Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. M. Thomson, for appellants. W. Boyd Evans, E. J. Best, Geo. R. Rembert, and L. D. Melton, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. Plaintiff recovered judgment against defendant for $3,500 for the death of his intestate, caused by the wrongful acts of defendant.

Theodore P. Wade was employed by defendant as watchman on the Congaree river bridge. The complaint alleges that, on March 26, 1904, he was struck by a passing train, thrown from the bridge, and killed, and that his death was caused by the negligent, reckless, and wanton conduct of defendant's servants who were in charge of the train, in failing to keep a proper lookout for Wade, or to give him any warning of the approach of the train, and in running it over the bridge at a reckless speed, in violation of the orders and bulletins issued by the defendant.

The defendant set up the following defenses: (1) A general denial; (2) assumption of risk; (3) contributory negligence; (4) a release from Lottie Wade, who, it alleges, is the widow of plaintiff's intestate, and the only person for whose benefit the action could have been brought.

The defendant's contention in evidence and argument, as to the manner of Wade's death, was that he attempted to get aboard a passenger coach which was attached to the end of an accommodation freight train, while the train was passing him on the bridge, between 5:30 and 6 o'clock in the afternoon of the day he was killed, and, while making that attempt, he either missed his footing and fell, or was thrown from the bridge to the ground, 40 feet below, and was killed. The reason assigned for his attempt to board this train, under the circumstances was that it passed within a few minutes of the time for him to go off duty, and by getting aboard he would have saved himself a long walk to his home in Columbia. There was some testimony tending to support this theory.

[1] On the other hand, plaintiff's testimony tended to show that at the time of the accident, the bridge was undergoing repairs, and a slow order or bulletin had been issued by defendant, limiting the speed of trains over it to six miles an hour; that according to the rules, before any train could go upon the bridge, it must be brought to a full stop, and the engineer must give a signal to the bridge watchman of four short blasts of the whistle, and remain stationary until he received a signal from the watchman to proceed, whereupon he gave two short blasts of the whistle to let the watchman know that he had received his signal to go forward; that between Cayce, a station several hundred yards south of the river, and Columbia, north of it, the road was operated under the block system; that no train was allowed to enter the block without receiving orders, and that it was against the rules for a train to enter the block while the semaphore at Cayce was up. Plaintiff's testimony tended to show that the train by which Wade was killed violated each of these rules and orders. There was, therefore, testimony tending to show a reckless disregard of Wade's rights, and there was no error in refusing defendant's motion for nonsuit on the issue for punitive damages.

[2, 3] Photographs of the bridge and approaching trestle and surroundings were introduced, over defendant's objection that they were taken long after the accident, and there was no evidence that the conditions were the same, when they were taken, as at the time of the accident; and also because certain distances were indicated upon them, and certain remarks, explanatory of them, such as, "Looking towards Cayce, 75 yards from river trestle." As to the first ground of objection, the presumption is that the condition of the bridge and trestle and surroundings at the time of the accident continued. If there had been any material change, defendant could easily have proved it. As to the other ground of objection, the record shows that one or more witnesses verified every mark or notation on the photographs which was in any way material to the case.

[4] There was testimony that the train which killed Wade ran past Cayce while the semaphore was down, without stopping and without getting the block; that Mr. Frinck, the agent at Cayce, ran out as it was passing, and signaled it to stop; that Mr. Maxwell, defendant's trainmaster, who had authority to direct the movement of trains on that part of the road, was on the rear platform of the train and saw Frinck's effort to stop it, but "high-balled" it ahead. When Mr. Maxwell was on the stand, he was asked by plaintiff's attorney, if, on Tuesday after the accident, at Cayce, in the presence of Mr. Robert Thornton, he had not had some words with Mr. Frinck about the accident, and if Mr. Frinck had not then and there said to him: "Wade would never have been killed if you had not taken that train in there." He denied it. In reply, plaintiff was allowed to contradict him by Mr. Thornton. Defendant excepts to this ruling, on the ground that no foundation was laid for the contradiction; and on the further ground that Mr. Frinck had not himself been on the stand and testified as to that matter; and on the further ground that, if true, it was not shown that Mr. Maxwell could bind defendant by such statement.

In so far as it charges that the foundation for the contradiction was not laid, the exception was evidently taken without examining the record, which shows very clearly that the foundation was properly laid. We fail to see the force of the second ground of the objection—that the contradiction was improper.

er, because Mr. Frinck had not testified about the matter. If it was competent to contradict the witness at all as to what Mr. Frinck had said to him (as to which we make no ruling, because the exception does not raise that question), it was clearly immaterial whether Mr. Frinck had testified about the matter or not. The last ground of the exception is also without force, because no statement of Mr. Maxwell was given in evidence. The statement or declaration given in evidence was that of Mr. Frinck to Mr. Maxwell.

[5] The next exception imputes error to the circuit court in allowing the plaintiff to prove, in reply, that Lottie Wade had testified at a former trial of the case that she had been married to John Hunt. The error assigned is that it was incompetent, because Lottie Wade had not testified at this trial, and therefore could not be contradicted, or her testimony at the former trial be gotten before the jury in that way. The testimony was not offered to contradict Lottie Wade, for there was no evidence that she had ever denied so testifying. On the contrary, plaintiff was trying to prove that the fact was as she had testified, and had been proved, without objection, by similar declarations made by her to numerous persons on different occasions. Hence, in so far as the testimony in question tended to prove the mere fact of Lottie's marriage to Hunt, it could not have been prejudicial. But it was competent for this reason: Defendant had taken a release from her, as widow of plaintiff's intestate, and set it up in bar of plaintiff's action alleging that it was taken after plaintiff had admitted on the record in open court, at the former trial, that she had been married to plaintiff's intestate and in reliance upon that admission. It was therefore competent for plaintiff to show, in reply to that defense, that defendant knew, when the release was taken, that she had been married to Hunt before her marriage to Wade, and therefore her marriage to Wade was null and void, as it had not been shown that Hunt was dead or had been absent and not heard of for seven years.

[6] The record states that one of plaintiff's attorneys argued to the jury that, by taking the release, defendant had admitted liability. Upon that point, both sides preferred requests to charge, and in his general charge the judge said: "You cannot take it as plaintiff has requested me to charge you that the defendant has admitted liability for the killing of this man—liability therefor by taking the release set out in the answer. The answer may contain many inconsistent defenses. You have to take them and separate them, and as separate as though the other did not exist. As here you have the first defense of general denial, denial of all these alleged acts of negligence; so the plaintiff has to prove all this. For instance, as, if a man sued on a note, it was alleged he owed another one a certain amount of money on a promissory note, he could come in and defend, and in his answer first claim he never executed any such note, and, secondly, claim the note had been paid; failing on one, he may fall back upon the other. You cannot take the pleadings and say because one defense seemed to involve the admission of liability, that apparent inference of liability may be argued from it; that that is a point-blank legal admission of liability. Those are matters counsel have the right to draw their inferences from, and argue them to the jury, and the jury may accept them or reject them, as they may be convinced." Appellant contends that taking the release was no admission of liability, and that the jury should have been so instructed. The charge upon that point was correct.

While it cannot be said, as matter of law, that taking a release is an admission of legal liability, neither can it be said, as matter of law, that consciousness of liability may not be reasonably inferred from doing so. Whether such inference should or should not be drawn depends upon all the circumstances, and is a question of fact which should ordinarily be left to the jury, as was properly done in this case. The case of Rookard v. Railway, 84 S. C. 192, 65 S. E. 1047, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 435, 137 Am. St. Rep. 839, cited and relied upon by appellant, does not sustain its contention upon this point. If defendant had not set up the release, that case would have been authority for the exclusion of evidence to prove that defendant had settled with Lottie Wade, or any other person, for any injury growing out of the same transaction. But the defendant itself brought the release into the case by pleading it in bar of the action. Being properly in the case, it was properly left to the jury to say whether it was taken by defendant merely for the purpose of buying its peace, without intending to admit liability, or whether it was obtained because of a consciousness of liability.

[7] Having defined and explained negligence and contributory negligence, and mentioned the specifications of negligence alleged in the complaint, the court continued: "If a failure to do one (that is, one of the things mentioned in the complaint which plaintiff alleged defendant should have done for Wade's protection) is made out, and you find that, in the exercise of due care, they should have done some one or all of these things, then the case of negligence is made out against the railroad, and you would have to consider then the question of the defense raised in the answer." Appellant alleges that the judge charged on the facts in the language quoted, in that he therein told the jury what facts would constitute negligence. We think not. Appellant has evidently overlooked the following sentence in that portion of the charge, "And (if) you find that, in the exercise of due care, they should have done some one or all of these things," which shows clearly that it was left to the jury to say whether the failure to do any of the things specified was negligence.

2. ANIMALS (§ 100*)—RUNNING AT LARGE—DUTIES OF OWNERS—STATUTES.

Civ. Code 1902, § 1497, provides that it shall be unlawful to permit cattle to run at large, and section 1498 provides that, when stock or animals shall be found upon the lands of any other person, the owner of the same shall be liable for the damages sustained, and that the stock shall be held liable for such damages in preference to all other liens. Held, that the first section imposed certain duties upon the owners and managers of stock, and that the law operating independently of the statute would hold them liable for failure to observe these duties, and that the second section, while giving certain specific remedies, did not limit the first section, under which relief could be obtained by an action for damages.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by John B. Kirby against Jerry Mathis. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Dismissed.

Simpson & Bomar, for appellant. Johnson & Nash, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages, in which the complaint alleges that during the years of 1906 and 1907 the defendant controlled a pasture in which he kept a number of cows and other animals; that during the spring of those years the defendant carelessly and negligently allowed the animals in his pasture constantly to break out and trespass upon the plaintiff's field of oats, which they destroyed to the extent therein mentioned. The plaintiff also alleged a second cause of action, for damages to the land, but this was withdrawn. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, for $140, and the defendant appealed upon exceptions, the first of which is as follows:

[1] "Because, it is respectfully submitted, his honor the presiding judge committed error of law in not sustaining the motion for nonsuit, and the subsequent motion for a new trial, based upon the ground that plaintiff cannot maintain this action in his individual capacity, since the evidence shows that the land and the crops thereon alleged to have been damaged do not belong to plaintiff, but are the property of his imbecile sister."

The plaintiff testified as follows: "Q. Whose crop was that? A. That was my crop. Q. Anybody have any interest in that crop but you? A. Nobody but me. Q. How about the crop the year before? A. That was mine, too. Q. Anybody have any interest in that but you? A. Nobody."

Testimony was also elicited on cross-examination of the plaintiff by the defendant's attorney, tending to show that the plaintiff was the owner of the crops. If testimony is received without objection, which would otherwise be incompetent, it becomes competent, and cannot be disregarded upon a motion for nonsuit, but its sufficiency must be left to the jury. Latimer v. Trowbridge, 52 S. C. 193, 29 S. E. 634, 68 Am. St. Rep. 893; Ashe v. Ry., 65 S. C. 134, 43 S. E. 393. "His honor allowed the defendants to introduce testimony to that effect. He did not change his ruling, or strike out such testimony. Therefore, in determining whether there was error in directing a verdict, the testimony which he ruled to be competent must be taken into consideration." Holliday v. Pegram, 71 S. E. 367. This exception is overruled.

The second exception is as follows:

[2] "Because, it is respectfully submitted, his honor erred further in not granting the motion for nonsuit and the subsequent motion for new trial, based upon the ground that plaintiff cannot recover, because his action is not brought under the statute law of this state, which changed the common law and prescribed a remedy which, it is respectfully submitted, is the exclusive remedy for damages caused by trespassing cattle."

Section 1497 of the Code of Laws contains this provision: "It shall not be lawful for the owner or manager of any cattle * * * or any other person, to permit the said animals * * * to run at large, beyond the limits of his own land, or the lands leased, occupied, or controlled by him."

Section 1498 is as follows: "Whenever any of said stock or animals shall be found upon the lands of any other person than the owner or manager of the same, the owner of such trespassing stock shall be liable for all damages sustained, and for the expenses of the seizure and maintenance; the said damages and expenses to be recovered, when necessary, by action in any court of competent jurisdiction; and the said trespassing stock shall be held liable for the same, in preference of all other liens, claims or incumbrances upon it." There are several other sections, but we do not deem it necessary to set them out.

We will first construe section 1497 of the

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Code of Laws. When the statute was enacted, providing that it should be unlawful for the owner or manager of any cattle to run at large beyond the limits of his own land, or the lands leased, occupied, or controlled by him, it thereby imposed upon the owner or manager the duty of using due care to prevent the cattle owned or managed by them from running at large. And when another person sustains damages, as the direct and proximate result of failure on the part of the owner or manager to discharge such duty, the law, operating independently of the statute, when it fails to provide an adequate remedy for the injured party, renders the owner or manager liable in damages. We thus see that, on the one hand, the statute imposes a duty on the owner or manager, and that correspondingly, when the statute fails to make proper provision for the party injured, the law, in order that they may not escape the consequences of their wrongful acts to others, renders them responsible for injuries inflicted by them.

We proceed to the consideration of section 1498. Unless there is some provision in this section which exempts the owner or manager from the liability, which is fixed upon them by law for failure to discharge the statutory duty imposed upon them by section 1497, then the ruling of his honor the presiding judge in this respect was free from error.

Section 1498 was not intended to conflict with the provisions of section 1497, but to state more specifically the rights and liabilities of the owner, when the stock is found trespassing upon the lands of another person.

Section 1498 contains no provision which, by necessary implication, can be construed as being in conflict with section 1497.

Appeal dismissed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; R. C. Watts, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Dicey Fisher against Warren A. Fisher for dower. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Townes & Watson, for appellant. Julius H. Heyward, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. This was an action for dower. The seisin of defendant's husband during coverture and his death in 1905, were admitted. In 1887, demandant joined her husband in the execution of a deed, conveying to defendant's grantor the land in which she now claims dower. That deed contained the following covenant: "And the said parties of the first part, for the consideration aforesaid, do hereby covenant and agree to warrant and defend the premises aforesaid to the party of the second part, her heirs, executors, administrators and assigns against the claim and entry of all persons whatsoever, and they do further covenant that they are seised of the premises in fee simple, and have power to make and convey such estate by this deed, and have done the same by these presents, to the said Mary L. Caruth, party of the second part." Appended to that deed was the following certificate: "State of South Carolina, _____ County. Be it known, that on the 27th day of April, A. D. 1888, personally came before me Dicey B. Fisher, the signer and sealer of the foregoing deed, and acknowledged the same to be her own free act and deed, and Dicey B. Fisher, wife of the said Francis M. Fisher, upon examination by me, separate and apart from her husband, acknowledged that she executed the same freely and of her own accord for the purpose and intent therein expressed, and without any fear or compulsion from any one. Therefore, let this deed, with this certificate be recorded. J. M. Whitmire, T. J. G. C." "T. J. G. C." is understood to denote the official title of the officer signing the certificate, and to mean "Trial Justice for Greenville County."

and, though the certificate need not be in the exact form, if it is "to the same purport" as that prescribed by the statute (Vinson v. Nicholas, 28 S. C. 198, 5 S. E. 357), its sufficiency is to be determined solely by what appears upon the certificate, and not by what the parties intended. Brown v. Spand, 2 Mill, Const. 12; Mayo v. Feaster, 2 McCord Eq. 187; Williams v. Cudd, 26 S. C. 213, 2 S. E. 14, 4 Am. St. Rep. 714; Brown v. Pechman, 53 S. C. 1, 30 S. E. 586. Moreover, the statute requires the certificate to be "under the hand of the woman and the hand and seal of the officer." The certificate here relied upon is not under the "hand of the woman," nor is it under the seal of the officer, either of which defects would be fatal to its validity as a renunciation of dower. Vinson v. Nicholas, 28 S. C. 198, 5 S. E. 357; Bratton v. Burris, 51 S. C. 45, 28 S. E. 13.

The contention of appellant that the failure of the trial justice to affix his seal is cured by section 664, 1 Code 1902, cannot be sustained, because that section, by its express terms, refers only to the absence of a seal from instruments issued by a notary public.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by R. A. Lancaster against the Southern Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The complaint and demurrer thereto read as follows, respectively:

"Complaint.

"(1) Upon information and belief that at the times hereafter mentioned and at the present time the defendant was and is a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of North Carolina, engaged in the business of writing and selling life insurance.

"(2) That the plaintiff at the times hereafter mentioned and at the present time was and is a resident of Richland county, state of South Carolina.

"(3) That during the summer of 1907 the plaintiff entered into the following contract with an agent of the defendant to purchase certain shares of the capital stock of the defendant company, to wit, the defendant company by its agent agreed to sell to the plaintiff capital stock in the defendant company of the par value of $1,000 for $1,250, the $250 above the par value to be a premium upon the stock, for which amount the plaintiff was to give his promissory note to the defendant (which note he was to actually pay), the note to mature on January 1, 1908, and the plaintiff to give his five negotiable promissory notes of $200 each, payable to the order of the defendant, in payment of the $1,000, par value of said stock, the said notes to mature, one each year from the date of said contract. And it was agreed by the defendant's agent who made said contract that the plaintiff should not be called upon to pay either the principal of the said five notes or the interest thereon, but that the plaintiff would be credited upon the principal and interest of the said five notes with all profits and dividends arising from the operation of the company prorated to the said $1,000 par value worth of stock. And that, if these profits and dividends did not amount to enough to pay the principal and interest of the said notes as they matured, then the notes would be renewed from time to time until both the principal and interest were paid in full by the profits and dividends, prorated as aforesaid. And the defendant by its agent agreed to issue said stock to the plaintiff upon the execution and delivery of the note for $250 to mature on January 1, 1908 (which note was to be actually paid by the plaintiff), and upon the execution and delivery by the plaintiff of his five negotiable and promissory notes, payable to the order of defendant for $200 each, as aforesaid, and to hold said stock so issued as security for the payment of the said five notes by the profits and dividends prorated as aforesaid.

"(4) That plaintiff did execute and deliver to the defendant his negotiable promissory note, payable on January 1, 1908, to the order of the defendant, for $250, and promptly paid the same upon the maturity thereof, and the plaintiff also duly executed and delivered to the defendant his five negotiable promissory notes payable to the order of the defendant, as aforesaid.

"(5) That defendant has absolutely refused to issue this capital stock of the par value of $1,000 to the plaintiff, and has absolutely refused and failed to do any act on its part in pursuance of said agreement.

"(6) And plaintiff alleges upon information and belief that under the statutory and common law of the state of North Carolina it was and is illegal for the defendant to issue or to agree to issue this capital stock before the same was paid for in cash or its equivalent, and that it was and is illegal under said law for the defendant to agree to credit on said notes, given in payment for said stock, the profits and dividends prorated to this amount of stock arising from the operation of the company before the same had been paid for, and that this was equivalent to an agreement to issue said stock before the same had been paid for. And plaintiff further alleges, upon information and belief, that the said agreement would operate as a legal fraud upon the other stockholders of the defendant company who have paid for their stock, in that it would operate to deprive them of the profits arising from the operation of the company, and to which they were justly entitled.

"(7) That the plaintiff is a layman, and has no knowledge of law, and at the time of making of said contract had no idea that the same was in violation of law or that it would operate as legal fraud upon the other stockholders, as defendant well knew. And that the information upon which the allegations in the sixth paragraph are made is derived from his attorneys, given him a long time subsequent to the making of said agreement.

"(8) Upon information and belief that the said agent who made said contract for defendant company had no authority to make such an agreement, and was acting without the scope of his authority in making same. And the defendant has failed and refused to ratify said contract or to carry out the same according to its promise as made by the said agent, although the defendant accepted and received the $250 paid by plaintiff, as alleged in paragraph 4, well knowing the agreement made with plaintiff by its agent, as aforesaid.

"Wherefore plaintiff demands judgment against the defendant for $250 with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the date of which the said amount was paid to defendant, and that the said five notes be delivered up by defendant to the plaintiff and canceled, and for such other and further relief as may be just and equitable in the premises."

"Demurrer.

"To Messrs. Lyles & Lyles, Plaintiff's Attorneys: Please take notice that upon the call of this case defendant intends to demur to your complaint and your reply to the answer in this case, and to move for judgment on the pleadings for the amount set up in the affirmative defense in the answer of the defendant upon the following grounds, to wit: (1) Because it appears upon the face of the complaint and upon the face of the reply to the answer that sufficient facts are not alleged to constitute a cause of action, in that: (a) It appears that the contract alleged to have been made between plaintiff and defendant entitles defendant to judgment, unless certain agreements alleged to have been made by defendant's agent constitute a cause for rescinding said contract, and because the alleged agreements were made by said agent without authority from his principal. (b) Because it appears upon the face of the papers that the stock which plaintiff undertook to purchase was, in accordance with the terms of the agreement, not to be actually delivered to plaintiff until his notes should be paid, and it further appears that these notes have not been paid. (c) Because it appears upon the face of the papers that the defendant company is still in existence, and that there is no legal objection to the issuance of said stock immediately upon the payment of said notes. (d) Because it has not been alleged that any dividends or profits have been earned for which credit has not been allowed plaintiff. (e) Because want of knowledge of the laws of North Carolina, by reason of which plaintiff seeks to avoid the effect of his contract, is no legal cause or excuse for avoiding same. (f) Because it appears upon the face of the papers that the defendant company is about to go into liquidation, and the granting of the relief prayed for by plaintiff would amount to a fraud upon other stockholders and creditors of the defendant company. (2) Because it appears on the face of the complaint and of the reply (a) that the acts, conduct, and alleged agreements of the agent of defendant, upon the strength of which plaintiff seeks a rescission of his contract as alleged and indorsed by his notes, were not acts, conduct, or agreements in reference to existing facts, but they amounted to nothing more than promises or opinions as to future anticipated results, and therefore cannot be made the basis of a charge of fraud; (b) that the alleged acts, conduct, and agreements upon the strength of which a rescission of plaintiff's contract is sought were unauthorized by the defendant company."

Willcox & Willcox and Henry E. Davis, for appellant. Lyles & Lyles, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action in which the plaintiff seeks a recovery of judgment against the defendant for $250 and the cancellation of certain notes. There was a demurrer to the complaint, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, which was overruled. His honor, the presiding judge, after hearing the testimony, granted the relief for which the plaintiff prayed, and the defendant appealed.

The first question that will be considered is whether the circuit judge erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint. In determining this question, it will be necessary to refer to the complaint and the grounds of the demurrer, which will be reported. There are allegations in the complaint appropriate to an action for damages arising out of the alleged breach of the contract by reason of the defendant's failure to perform its part thereof, although its agent may have exceeded his authority when he entered into the agreement with the plaintiff. The court in the case of Vought v. Eastern B. & L. Ass'n, 172 N. Y. 508, 65 N. E. 496, 92 Am. St. Rep. 761, thus states the rule in such cases: "We deem it unnecessary at this time to determine whether the defendant was authorized by that statute to enter into such contracts, for, if we assume that the making of them was in excess of the express power conferred upon the corporation by that statute, still, as the contracts involved no moral turpitude, and did not offend any express statute, they were not illegal in a sense that would prevent the maintenance of an action thereon. It is now well settled that a corporation cannot avail itself of the defense of ultra vires when the contract has been in good faith fully performed by the other party, and the corporation has had the benefit of the performance and of the contract. As has been said, corporations, like natural persons, have power and capacity to do wrong. They may in their contracts and dealings break over the restraints imposed upon them by their charters; and, when they do so, their exemption from liability cannot be claimed on the mere ground that they have no attributes or facilities, which render it possible for them to thus act. While they have no right to violate their charters, yet they have capacity to do so, and are bound by their acts, where a repudiation of them would result in manifest wrong to innocent parties, and especially where the offender alleges its own wrong, to avoid a just responsibility. It may be that, while a contract remains unexecuted upon both sides, a corporation is not estopped to say in its defense that it had not the power to make the contract sought to be enforced; yet, when it becomes executed by the other party, it is estopped from asserting its own wrong, and cannot be excused from payment upon the plea, that the contract was beyond its power." This language is quoted with approval in Eastern B. & L. Ass'n v. Williamson, 189 U. S. 122, 23 Sup. Ct. 527, 47 L. Ed. 735, and Drewery v. Columbia Amusement Co., 87 S. C. 445, 69 S. E. 879, 1004, and is in harmony with the principle announced in Williamson v. Eastern B. & L. Ass'n, 54 S. C. 582, 32 S. E. 765, 71 Am. St. Rep. 822. In the case of B. B. Ry. Co. v. McDonald, 17 Ind. App. 492, 46 N. E. 1022, 60 Am. St. Rep. 172, it is correctly said by the court: "The general rule is that where a private corporation has entered into a contract, not immoral in itself, and not forbidden by any statute, and it has been in good faith performed by the other party, the corporation will not be heard on a plea of ultra vires." The principle is thus stated in the case of Washington Gaslight Co. v. Landsden, 172 U. S. 544, 19 Sup. Ct. 300 (43 L. Ed. 543): "The corporation can be held responsible for acts which are not strictly within the corporate powers, but which were assumed to be performed for the corporation, and by the corporate agents, who were competent to employ the corporate powers, actually exercised."

[1, 2] But, as was said by the court in the case of Williamson v. Association, 54 S. C. 582, 32 S. E. 765, 71 Am. St. Rep. 822: "If the agreement was ultra vires, and the association entered into it, knowing it could not perform its part thereof, and thereby induced the plaintiff to part with his money in the purchase of stock, then it was a tort, and the defendant would be liable therefor. Furthermore, even if the agreement was ultra vires, and the defendant could interpose this plea, it would not be allowed to retain the benefits, which it derived therefrom, and this would give the plaintiff a cause of action"—citing North Hudson B. & L. Ass'n v. Bank, 79 Wis. 31, 47 N. W. 300, 11 L. R. A. 845. There are also allegations appropriate to an action for rescission of the alleged agreement on the ground that the defendant's agent was not authorized to enter into the agreement, and that the defendant refused to ratify his acts. The allegations of the complaint are therefore appropriate to an action, both on the law and the equity side of the court.

[3] A complaint is not subject to demurrer, if it contains allegations entitling the plaintiff to relief, either on the law or the equity side of the court. Bank v. Dowling, 45 S. C. 677, 23 S. E. 982; Latham v. Harby, 50 S. C. 428, 27 S. E. 862; Simon v. Sabb, 56 S. C. 38, 33 S. E. 799. The plaintiff's cause of action for rescission is based upon the theory that the agreement into which he entered with the defendant's agent was invalid in toto, and that there never was a binding contract between the parties. On the other hand, the grounds of demurrer upon which the defendant relied rest upon the proposition that there was a binding contract between the parties, although certain parts thereof were without force and effect, by reason of the fact that the agent exceeded his authority, and that the defendant refused to ratify his acts to that extent. Conceding that there are allegations in the complaint giving rise to both theories, the court could not sustain the proposition for which the defendant contends without assuming that there was a binding contract between the parties, which, of course, it cannot do.

[4] As the allegations of the complaint are sufficient to show that the plaintiff has complied with the terms of the contract, but that the defendant has refused to perform its part thereof, also that the agreement was not only without force and effect in part, but in toto, the demurrer was properly overruled. The defendant appealed upon other exceptions, besides those assigning error in overruling the demurrer. It will not be necessary to consider them serialim, as several of the questions presented by them become merely speculative in the light of our conclusions upon the pivotal issues in the case. The defendant's answer to the complaint contained a denial of certain allegations; and by way of defense a counterclaim for $1,000, based upon the five notes, each for $200, described in the complaint. No other defenses were interposed. We have not undertaken to state in detail our review of the testimony, for the reason that both the plaintiff and the defendant concede that the agent exceeded his authority when he entered into the contract, and that the defendant refused to ratify his acts to that extent. If the plaintiff had seen fit, he might have proceeded against the defendant for refusing to comply with the terms of the contract, on the ground that he was induced by the defendant's agent to become a stockholder, and that the defendant was estopped from pleading that the acts of the agent were ultra vires.

But he also had the right to bring an action for rescission of the contract. And, as it is conceded by both parties that the agent was without authority, and that the defendant refused to ratify the transaction, the plaintiff was entitled to the relief granted in the decree.

LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. v. ARP.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 22, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 344*)—CROSSING ACCIDENT—COMPLAINT—CONSTRUCTION.

In an action against a railroad company for an injury alleged to have been negligently inflicted upon a child of four years while on the railroad track at a place intersected by a private crossing maintained by the defendant, an allegation that the servants of the railroad company in charge of the train which inflicted the injury saw, or in the exercise of ordinary diligence could have seen, the child in time to have stopped the train and averted collision with the child by the use of proper care, is to be construed, not as charging a wanton act in deliberately running down the child, but as a negligent act in omitting proper precaution to avert striking the child in case such servants saw, or in the exercise of ordinary care could have seen, the child.

2. RAILROADS (§ 350*)—CROSSING ACCIDENT—PROBABILITY OF PERSONS ON CROSSING—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where a private way crosses the track of a railroad company, and the crossing is maintained by the company, and such private way for more than 10 years has been in the constant and uninterrupted use by the people of the neighborhood, it is a question for the jury to say whether in the exercise of ordinary care the servants in charge of the train should anticipate that persons may be on the track at this point and take such precautions to prevent injury to such persons as would meet the requirement of ordinary care and diligence. Applying this rule to the petition, a cause of action was set out.

3. TRIAL (§ 193*)—RAILROADS (§ 351*)—CROSSING ACCIDENT—INSTRUCTIONS—OPINION OF JUDGE AS TO FACTS.

The charge excepted to was erroneous as an expression of opinion that certain facts constituted negligence and authorized a recovery by the plaintiff.

Error from Superior Court, Fannin County; N. A. Morris, Judge.

Action by Tasker Arp, by next friend, against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed, and new trial granted.

D. W. Blair and Wm. Butt, for plaintiff in error. Gober & Griffin, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. This was a suit by Tasker Arp, by his next friend, against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, to recover damages for a personal injury. In the petition it was alleged that a private way from a public road, which passed by the house of petitioner's father, intersected the track of the defendant company; that this private way had been in constant and uninterrupted use by the people in the neighborhood as a private road for more than 10 years; that it had been so recognized by the railroad company, which maintained the crossing at the point of intersection; that there was an unobstructed view of the crossing for more than half a mile up the track; that on August 8, 1907, the petitioner, a child of near four years of age, in attempting to cross the railroad track while proceeding upon this private way, was struck by a passenger train and seriously injured. It was alleged: That the agents in charge of the train had an unobstructed view of petitioner for half a mile, and either saw or in the exercise of ordinary care could have seen him, yet evinced "reckless disregard for the safety of your petitioner by wantonly, willfully, and negligently failing and refusing to give an alarm and check the train, although they saw or could have seen your petitioner in ample time by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence to have avoided the collision with your petitioner and the injury to him as aforesaid, by reversing their engine, using the air brake, and by stopping the train before it reached your petitioner." That it was the duty of the agents of the defendant to have kept a lookout and to have anticipated the presence of persons on the crossing, which they did not do. The character of the injuries were specifically described. The defendant demurred both generally and specially. The demurrers were overruled, and the case proceeded to trial, terminating in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. The court refused to set the verdict aside on motion.

[1] 1. The demurrer was general and special. The special grounds of demurrer, because of indefiniteness, were cured by appropriate amendments. It was also urged that the allegations made as the basis of the defendant's liability, that the defendant's servants in charge of the train saw, or in the exercise of ordinary care could have seen, the petitioner, and yet omitted precautions to avoid striking him, were lacking in certainty and left the defendant in doubt as to whether the plaintiff was seeking recovery upon the theory that the defendant's servants saw plaintiff's peril and willfully and wantonly ran their train against him, or whether they were negligent in not seeing him. We do not think the allegations of the petition show any purpose on the part of the pleader to charge that the defendant's servants wantonly ran their train against the child. The liability of the defendant is alleged to consist in certain acts of omission. The allegation that the servants saw, or in the exercise of ordinary care could have seen, the child in time to prevent striking him, were intended to simply state the measure of the defendant's duty both in case they actually saw the child or could have seen him in the exercise of proper diligence. The violation of that duty was alleged to consist in the failure to exercise proper care in discovering the plaintiff's presence on the track and in stopping the train.

[2] 2. The petition set out a cause of action. It alleged circumstances authorizing an inference of a duty on the part of the servants of the railroad company to anticipate the presence of a person on the track where crossed by the private way, which was in constant and uninterrupted use by the people of the neighborhood with the knowledge and consent of the railroad company, and the failure of the servants in charge of the defendant's train to observe that duty in detecting a person on the crossing and in stopping the train.

[3] 3. The court charged: "If the plaintiff was on the track, and the engineer discovered him for some distance [before] he got to him, it was his duty to stop the train whenever the plaintiff was seen; and if he failed to do this, and the plaintiff was injured on account of such failure, the defendant would be liable." The error assigned is that this excerpt amounted to an expression by the court that the engineer was negligent; and that the charge was misleading, because of the indefiniteness of the time and place when and where the duty was upon the engineer to stop the train. The instruction in defining the duty of the engineer did not take into account the time when he discovered the child upon the track or his ability to stop the train when discovery was made; but the jury were told that if he discovered the child upon the track and failed to stop his train, and the plaintiff was injured on account of such failure, the defendant would be liable. It may be that, at the time the child's presence upon the track was discovered by the engineer, in the exercise of ordinary and proper care it would have been impossible for him to stop the train soon enough to avoid the injury. Indeed, according to the evidence submitted by the defendant, several children, one of whom was the plaintiff, were playing near the railroad track, and the plaintiff ran within a few feet of the track and stopped, and, just as the engine reached a point near where the plaintiff was standing, he suddenly ran on the track and was struck by the pilot beam of the engine. A judge is forbidden to instruct a jury that certain enumerated facts constitute negligence, when the law does not declare such to be negligence. Because of this erroneous instruction, a new trial must be granted.

SMITH v. SMITH.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 23, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 279*)—SEPARATION—SUPPORT OF MINOR CHILDREN—ACTION BY WIFE.

The court below did not err in granting a nonsuit in this case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Dec. Dig. § 279.*]

Error from Superior Court, Hall County; J. J. Kimsey, Judge.

Action by M. L. Smith against H. H. Smith. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Mrs. M. L. Smith brought her petition against her husband, H. H. Smith, for permanent alimony for the support of herself and her four minor children. It was alleged that the petitioner and her husband were living in a bona fide state of separation, and that she had been abandoned by her husband against her will and without any fault on her part. No action for divorce was pending, but her husband had filed an action against her for divorce, and a verdict in her favor was rendered by the jury upon the trial of the case thus instituted. She prayed for the issuance of the writ of ne exeat, injunctive relief, a receiver, and that she recover of defendant a reasonable sum of money for her support and for the support of her four minor children. Attached to the petition was the following exhibit: "Georgia, Jackson County: This agreement, between H. H. Smith and Mrs. M. L. Smith: Mrs. M. L. Smith is to have her children, and two-thirds household and kitchen furniture, one cow, one hog, one buggy. The said contract relieves the said H. H. Smith from all claims of Mrs. M. L. Smith against him or his property now and forever. This 4th day of April, 1908." (Signed by the parties.) Subsequently the plaintiff amended her petition by adding "a bill of particulars," embracing such articles as shoes, clothes, and other articles of necessity which it is alleged she had furnished their minor children, who were living with her, and the value of the board of three of the minor children; the account amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $465. She alleged that she had furnished the articles and the board set forth in the bill of particulars, and other goods which are not charged; and she alleges, further, that "for the above and foregoing account and amount the defendant is justly indebted to petitioner up to the time of filing suit, for which sums plaintiff prays a judgment in her favor against the defendant."

Upon the trial the plaintiff testified that she was the wife of the defendant, that the account sued on was correct, that the items constituting the account were necessities furnished by her to the children, that she and her children worked together on a certain farm, and that "it was on the land that Smith made to me in settlement. My daughters worked on the land. I have had the labor of my daughters since the separation. * * * The money that paid for those things set out in the bill came from the cotton raised on the land. * * * My husband made a deed to me for 23½ acres of land and one small house. * * * I signed the agreement set out in the pleadings." There was other evidence, not material to be set out here, as to labor performed by the children and their attendance upon school. A certified copy of the record of the divorce proceedings instituted by H. H. Smith against plaintiff is also attached as an exhibit, as well as a deed from H. H. Smith to plaintiff; the same being a deed of gift, no consideration being named.

Johnson & Johnson, for plaintiff in error.
H. H. Dean, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. This case, which in its inception was a suit for alimony, was converted by the amendment filed at the trial term into a complaint upon account. No objection to the filing of the amendment, on the ground that it was a new cause of action, seems to have been interposed. Under the testimony of the plaintiff and the written agreement signed by Mrs. Smith, which was attached to her declaration, it must have become apparent that the suit could not be maintained for the allowance of alimony for herself. She had expressly, before the institution of this suit, relinquished, for a consideration, all claims of herself "against him [her husband] or his property now and forever"; but she contends that she should be allowed to recover on the account sued on for necessities furnished the minor children whom she took, and who were to remain with her under the agreement above referred to. We are of the opinion that when the amendment to the petition is considered in the light of the writing by which Mrs. Smith relinquished all claims against her husband and his property, and which is attached as an exhibit to the declaration in this case, the court rightly concluded that the suit as it stood after the amendment was that of a wife against her husband for the board and maintenance of their minor children, and for articles of necessity furnished them by his wife; and, that being the case, she was not entitled to recover under the pleadings and evidence in this case. A wife cannot separate from her husband, or live in a state of separation from him, take charge of the minor children, and maintain a suit against the husband for necessities furnished them. If the husband had made no adequate provision for the support and maintenance of the children, and a stranger had furnished them the necessities of life, he could maintain a suit against the delinquent father for the cost and value of the necessities furnished; or a divorced wife, after dissolution of the bond of marriage between herself and her husband, where no provision has been made for the support of her minor children, might, just as a stranger (for after divorce she would be a stranger), maintain an action against her former husband for necessary expenses incurred in maintaining and nourishing their minor children. Brown v. Brown, 132 Ga. 712, 64 S. E. 1092, 131 Am. St. Rep. 229. But she cannot, while still a wife, though her husband be delinquent in the matter of furnishing his minor children with the means of sustenance, voluntarily undertake their care and nurture, and then from time to time sue the husband for the amount of money expended in that behalf. We think the provision made in our laws for alimony, temporary and permanent, affords a comprehensive scheme by which the liabilities of the husband for the support of the wife from whom he has separated, and their minor children, may be fixed, and that relatively to the wife this scheme of the law is an exclusive one, whatever might still be the rights of the children to compel the father to furnish means of support, or the rights of a stranger who has furnished to the minor children the necessities of life.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

BURTON et al. v. MEINERT & MILLER.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 15, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 271*)—ENFORCEMENT—PLEADING.

Certain materialmen brought suit to foreclose a lien on the premises on which was erected a house for which they furnished certain material, and for general judgment for the amount of the account for the material furnished, against the owner of the premises on which the house was erected and the contractor who built the same for the owner. The petition alleged that the plaintiffs agreed to furnish the material to the defendants to build the house, and "the material was contracted for by the contractor for the owner, with the consent and by the direction of the latter, who authorized 'said builder to buy as his agent the said material.'" Held, the allegations of the petition showing that the material furnished was sold by the plaintiffs to the contractor as the agent of the owner of the premises, and there being no allegation that credit was extended to the contractor, or that he agreed to pay for the material furnished, the petition should have been dismissed as to the contractor on general demurrer thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 494-513; Dec. Dig. § 271.*]

2. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 281*)—EVIDENCE (§§ 158, 165*)—ENFORCEMENT OF LIEN—BEST AND SECONDARY EVIDENCE.

Proof by the plaintiffs that they furnished material to a contractor to be used in erecting a building on the premises of another, and that the contractor stated that it was so used, is insufficient to show, as against the owner of the premises, that such material was actually thus used; and the court erred in directing a verdict fixing a lien on such premises.

(a) Testimony that the contractor furnished the lumber with which to build the house, and testimony as to the amount which the owner paid the contractor for building the same, was not inadmissible on the ground that the contract between the owner and the contractor for the erection of the house by the latter was in writing.

(b) The contract between the owner and the contractor being in writing, it was error to admit testimony as to the stipulations in the contract as to the price to be paid for the erection of the building.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 565-572; Dec. Dig. § 281;* Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 471-526, 548-555; Dec. Dig. §§ 158, 165.*]

Error from Superior Court, Cobb County; W. A. Morris, Judge.

Action by Meinert & Miller against S. R. Burton and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants bring error. Reversed.

Gober & Griffin and W. R. Power, for plaintiffs in error. R. N. Holland and D. W. Blair, for defendants in error.

HOLDEN, J. Meinert & Miller (hereinafter called the plaintiffs), alleging themselves to be "mechanics, contractors, and materialmen," brought suit against S. R. Burton and I. A. Reed, making in their petition substantially the following allegations: The plaintiffs agreed to furnish lumber and other material to the defendants to build a house upon certain described premises belonging to Reed. "Said material was contracted for by said S. R. Burton, the carpenter and contractor working for said Reed, and with the consent of the said Reed and by his direction. Said I. A. Reed fully knew that plaintiffs were furnishing material necessary for said buildings, and authorized and directed said Burton, his said builder, to buy as his agent the said material." The plaintiffs complied with their contract on the 20th of November, 1908, and claim a lien upon the premises for the amount of the account for material furnished, an itemized statement of which was attached to the petition. Within 60 days from November 20, 1908, their claim of lien was duly recorded, and within 30 days from November 20, 1908, they served written notice of the amount due them and an itemized statement of the account upon Reed. The suit was brought within 12 months from the time the claim became due, and plaintiffs prayed "a general judgment against defendants and each of them for the amount of their said debt aforesaid, and a special judgment against said real estate," and for process. At the conclusion of the evidence, the court directed a verdict against Burton for the amount of the account, and "a special lien against the property of defendant I. A. Reed as alleged in plaintiffs' petition for said sum." The defendants filed exceptions, complaining that the court erred in so directing a verdict, and in other rulings made upon the trial of the case.

[1] 1. The general demurrer to the petition should have been sustained as to Burton. The allegations of the petition show the contract under which the plaintiffs furnished the material, and that this contract was made by Burton while acting as the agent of Reed. No individual contract with Burton is alleged, and no liability for the payment of the material furnished exists against Burton under the allegations of the petition. It appearing from the allegations of the petition that Burton, in contracting for the material, was acting as the agent of Reed, and the suit being against both Burton and Reed, in the absence of an allegation that the plaintiffs extended credit to Burton, the agent, and that the latter agreed individually to pay for the material furnished, the petition should have been dismissed as to Burton on general demurrer. As Burton should have been dismissed from the case as a party thereto, the question as to whether Burton's special plea of set-off should have been stricken becomes an immaterial one, and it is unnecessary for this question to be decided. See, in this connection, Jellico v. Baillie, 130 Ga. 447, 60 S. E. 998. There was no merit in the general demurrer by Reed, nor in any of the grounds of special demurrer, and the court committed no error in overruling them.

[2] 2. One of the plaintiffs testified that they furnished the material referred to in their petition to Burton, to be used in building a house on the premises of Reed, and that Burton stated that the material thus bought was to be used for this purpose. In testifying with reference to some of the material, he said that he did not know that it was used in the house on which a lien was claimed. We think a proper construction of his testimony is that he did not know that any of the material was used in constructing the house. Proof that the material was furnished by the plaintiffs to Burton to be thus used, and proof that Burton stated that it was so used, would not be sufficient to bind Reed on the question as to whether the material was actually used in the building on his premises. Hearsay testimony is without probative value. Miller v. McKenzie, 126 Ga. 746, 55 S. E. 952. The evidence was not sufficient to authorize the court to direct a verdict fixing a lien on the property of Reed. The general verdict against Burton for the amount of the account will also have to be set aside because of the error of the court in not dismissing the petition as to him on general demurrer thereto. The error in overruling Burton's general demurrer rendered nugatory everything occurring thereafter in the case as to him. General Supply, etc., Co. v. Lawton, 131 Ga. 375, 62 S. E. 293. It appearing that the contract between Burton and Reed for the construction of the house was in writing, it was error to admit oral testimony as to the stipulations therein concerning the price at which Burton was to build the house. It was not error to admit testimony as to what Reed actually paid Burton for building the house, and testimony of the defendant Reed that Burton furnished the lumber with which he built the house, on the ground that the contract between Burton and Reed, for the building of the house was in writing. Regardless of the stipulations of the contract, testimony was admissible to show what was actually paid by Reed to Burton for building the house, and that Burton actually furnished the material which went into the house.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

BAKER v. WHITE et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 97*)—EXTENT OF POSSESSION—COLOR OF TITLE.

"In order to acquire a prescriptive title by virtue of possession alone for 20 years, such possession must be actual, and the prescription will not extend beyond the possessio pedis. If one seeks to prescribe by virtue of actual possession alone, without color of title, he should show the extent of such possession." Tillman v. Bomar, 134 Ga. 660 (5), 68 S. E. 504.

(a) Tested by the rule of law above quoted, the evidence was insufficient to authorize the jury to find that the defendants in error, by actual adverse possession for 20 years in good faith, acquired a good prescriptive title to that portion of the land in dispute on which there was growing timber; and it was erroneous for the court to give to the jury the charges of which complaint is made, authorizing the jury to so find.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 537-541; Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 1*)—PRESUMPTION OF GRANT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

It was error to charge: "The law on this subject is that when it appears from the evidence that a claimant of land has for a long period of time exercised proprietary rights thereover, which might have had a lawful origin from another, the exercise of which proprietary rights or acts of ownership might and naturally would have been prevented by the person or persons interested, if there had been no such grant, then a presumption may arise that such proprietary rights had a lawful origin, and that it was created by a proper instrument, which has been lost." It was also error to charge: "This defense stands upon a somewhat different basis from the defense of title by prescription, in this: That the defense of title by prescription must be established by proof of actual adverse possession of the land in dispute by the defendant for a period of 20 years, regardless of the proof of other facts or circumstances other than that of actual adverse possession for such period of time; on the other hand, the defense of title by presumption of a grant may be established partly by possession of the land by defendant for a long period of time, and partly by proof of other facts and circumstances cogently tending to establish the fact that there must have been a grant of title to the party in possession of those who would otherwise be adversely interested in the land, and who, with knowledge for a long period of time of the assertion of title to the land by the party in possession, have asserted no contrary interest or title, or who may have actually admitted the title to be in the party in possession." The other portions of the charge excepted to on the subject of the presumption of a grant, taken in connection with the context, were also erroneous.

(a) A grant of land from the true owner to another, not his child, cannot be presumed, where such other person has not been in actual adverse possession of the land under a claim of right in good faith for 20 years; and the evidence did not authorize a charge on the subject of the presumption of a grant to the land in dispute, on which there was growing timber.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 27*)—EXTENT OF POSSESSION—COLOR OF TITLE—EVIDENCE.

The plaintiff in error held a deed from the heirs at law of Nancy Smith to a tract of land including the land in dispute, and introduced evidence tending to show that he had in good faith for seven years been in actual adverse possession of a part of the tract of land conveyed by this deed, and it was error to exclude evidence that Nancy Smith sold and cut timber from the land, and that he, after the deed to him was executed and delivered, and while he was in actual adverse possession of a part of the tract, cut timber on said land. The fact that those portions of the tract from which timber was thus sold and cut constituted no part of the land in dispute between the plaintiff and the defendant would not render the testimony inadmissible.

TIDWELL v. DUNBAR.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 17, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 167*)—RECOVERY OF POSSESSION BY LANDLORD—SUMMARY REMEDY—DISMISSAL OF ACTION.

A warrant was issued under Civil Code 1895, § 4513 et seq. (Civil Code 1910, § 5385 et seq.), to evict one as a tenant holding over. The defendant filed with the officer charged with the duty of executing the warrant a counter-affidavit and bond to prevent eviction. Thereafter, to wit, on August 20th, the officer delivered all the papers connected with the proceedings to the justice of the peace who issued the warrant. The papers were so delivered before the beginning of the September term of the superior court, which convened on September 20th, to which term the proceedings were by statute returnable. The justice of the peace, without fault upon the part of the plaintiff or his counsel, did not deliver the papers to the clerk of the superior court until September 30th, during the September term, at which time the clerk entered the case upon the docket to the November term. The record does not disclose that the plaintiff instituted proceedings in court to collect rent. Held, that it was not error at the next January term to overrule a motion of the defendant to dismiss the proceedings on the ground that the plaintiff withheld the papers and failed to return them to the "next term of the court, as required by law," but brought other and additional proceedings for rent for the premises against defendant, thereby evincing a disposition to abandon the dispossession-warrant proceeding, or upon the ground that the September term had passed without the warrant having been returned as required by law, but that it was returned to the November term "in violation of defendant's legal rights."

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 161*)—DOCKETING CAUSE.

At the trial, during the January term, it was not error to enter an order directing the clerk to docket the case nunc pro tunc to the September term above mentioned.

HAWKINS v. DAVIE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 12, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. REPLEVIN (§ 70)—TRIAL (§ 234*)—BURDEN OF PROOF—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where an action was brought to recover possession of personal property to which the plaintiff claimed title, and the defendant denied that it belonged to the plaintiff, but filed no affirmative plea, on the general case the plaintiff carried the burden of showing that he was entitled to recover; and there was no error in so charging.

(a) In such a case, it was not error that the presiding judge did not take up the particular points of contest made by the testimony, and charge in regard to the shifting of the burden of evidence as to such points. If such a charge on a particular point as to which evidence was introduced would have been appropriate, a request therefor should have been duly made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Replevin, Cent. Dig. §§ 280-284; Dec. Dig. § 70;* Trial, Cent. Dig. § 537; Dec. Dig. § 234.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1064*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where one question in a case was whether, if a gift of personalty was made, the donor had sufficient capacity to make it, and the judge charged fully as favorably to the excepting party as such party could have asked, in regard to the measure of capacity necessary in such a case, the fact that he illustrated the subject of mental capacity by reading certain sections of the Civil Code touching testamentary capacity, also informing the jury that no will was involved, and that this portion of his charge was simply illustrative of the general subject, and did not furnish the standard applicable to the case in hand, furnishes no ground for a reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1064.*]

3. GIFTS (§ 51*)—GIFT TO CHILD—INSTRUCTION.

There was no error in charging Civ. Code, 1910, § 4150, which declares that "the delivery of personal property by a parent into the exclusive possession of a child living separate from the parent shall create a presumption of a gift to the child."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Gifts, Cent. Dig. § 102; Dec. Dig. § 51.*]

4. REVIEW.

None of the other assignments of error furnish any ground for reversal.

Error from Superior Court, Oglethorpe County; D. W. Meadow, Judge.

Action by T. H. Hawkins against R. W. Davie. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Sibley & McWhorter, for plaintiff in error.
J. J. Strickland, Paul Brown, and Geo. O. Thomas, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. This was an action to recover possession of a promissory note. The plaintiff was the administrator of the payee of the note. The issue made by the pleadings was under an allegation on the part of the plaintiff that the title to the note was in him, and a denial of such allegation by the defendant. In the evidence it appeared that the defendant was the son of the payee of the note, and that he claimed that it had been indorsed by his mother and given to him during her lifetime. There was conflicting evidence both as to whether the indorsement appearing on the note was genuine, and as to whether the note had been given to the defendant or whether he had obtained possession of it improperly.

[1] The presiding judge charged, in substance, that the plaintiff brought the case and carried the burden of showing that he was entitled to recover. To this exception was taken on the ground that as it was conceded that the note originally belonged to the mother of the defendant, and so recognized in the charge, the burden was upon him to show a gift. The use of the expression "burden of proof" in a dual sense, sometimes as indicating the burden of establishing the case as a whole, and sometimes as indicating the burden of the evidence during the progress of the trial, or that certain evidence will make out a prima facie case or will serve prima facie to establish a given fact, if not rebutted, has created no little confusion. Generally the burden of proof in the sense first mentioned rests where the pleadings originally placed it. Thus, if the plaintiff alleges a right to recover, and the defendant denies his allegations without more, the plaintiff upon the case as a whole carries the burden of proof; that is, the burden of showing, by a preponderance of the evidence, that he is entitled to recover. If the defendant does not file a denial of the plaintiff's allegations, but admits in his pleadings a prima facie case in favor of the plaintiff, and sets up an affirmative plea, such as a plea of confession and avoidance, he assumes the burden. Civ. Code 1910, § 5746. During the progress of the case, the burden of introducing evidence as to particular facts or issues may be shifted one or more times. One party may introduce evidence touching a particular fact which would be sufficient prima facie to establish such fact, if not rebutted. In this sense the burden may shift from one party to the other in the progress of the trial; and it is this shifting to which reference is made in Civ. Code 1910, § 5747, which declares that "what amount of evidence will change the onus or burden of proof is a question to be decided in each case by the sound discretion of the court." It certainly did not intend to lay down the rule that whether under an affirmation and denial in pleadings upon the entire case one party or the other carried the burden of establishing his allegation was a matter of discretion in every case. Claim cases or other similar issues need not be discussed.

[2] Where the presiding judge in an ordinary action at law correctly charges the jury in regard to the general burden of proof, he is not required as an essential part of his charge to discuss the shifting of the burden of introducing evidence on special points which may arise during the progress of the case; and it will not be held error that he omits to do so. Martin v. Nichols, 127 Ga. 705, 709, 56 S. E. 995. If a charge on such a subject would be appropriate in any particular case, it should be duly requested.

[3] 2. The plaintiff sought to show that, if his intestate made a gift of a note to her son, she did not have mental capacity to do so. The court charged the jury on this subject that they should inquire whether she had sufficient mental capacity to know that the instrument was a note, the amount for which it called, and its value, and to know that she was parting with its value and passing the title to it to her son, and to realize the fact that so much property was going from her to him, and to have a desire and purpose as to the nature of the transaction, and its real importance, and what she was doing. There was certainly no error against the plaintiff in this charge touching the mental capacity necessary in order to make a gift. In illustrating the meaning of mental capacity and its various shades, the judge read to the jury certain sections of the Civil Code defining testamentary capacity. He informed them that no will was involved in the present case, and that such portions of the charge were simply illustrative, and that the question was not whether the intestate had sufficient capacity to make a will, but to make a gift. There was no error harmful to the plaintiff in so charging.

3. The judge gave in charge to the jury Civ. Code 1910, § 4150, as follows: "The delivery of personal property by a parent into the exclusive possession of a child living separate from the parent shall create a presumption of a gift to the child. This presumption can be rebutted by evidence of an actual contract of lending, or from circumstances from which such a contract may be inferred." A promissory note is personal property, and this section is sufficient to cover it. Harrell v. Nicholson, 119 Ga. 458, 46 S. E. 623. It will be noticed that it is not every mere possession of the property of a parent by a child, or every delivery alone of such property, which will raise the presumption declared. These facts will always have evidential value on the subject of whether there was a gift; but, in order to raise the presumption of a gift of personal property by a parent to a child under that section of the Code, there must be a delivery of such property by the parent into the exclusive possession of a child living separate from such parent. Under the evidence, there was no error in giving this section in charge to the jury.

The decision in Hill v. Shelby, 64 Ga. 529, was cited by counsel for the plaintiff in error. That case did not involve a claim of a gift of personalty by a parent to a child, which alone is dealt with in the section above quoted. Moreover, the testimony of the alleged donee was that a certain paper in the form of a receipt for money to be invested was given to him by his son, the alleged donor, "to collect the money on." He further testified: "I can't say whether my son gave it to me for my own use, or not, as he gave it without saying anything; but I think it was his intention to give it to me for my own use." In the light of these facts, there is no conflict between the ruling now made and the statement in the headnote of that decision that "delivery of a negotiable written instrument, without more, is not sufficient to prove a gift."

4. None of the other grounds of the motion for a new trial require either discussion or a reversal.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

JOHNSON v. DE LAPERRIERE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 12, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 327*)—SALES UNDER ORDER OF COURT—EFFECT OF PROVISIONS OF WILL.

A testator directed that his debts should be paid out of his personal property, "as my executors can best spare, and if he [they] cannot spare a sufficiency of said property, then from the yearly income arising from the proceeds of my land," and, after giving specific legacies to two of his daughters, directed that all of his property should be kept together until his youngest child should become of age, "and, in case of my daughters, until they marry and my wife should die, and that my family be supported out of the proceeds of the same, and if there is any balance left after their support, that it be equally divided between my children." Held, that such testamentary disposition did not deprive the court of ordinary of jurisdiction to pass an order authorizing a sale of certain of the testator's real estate, after due citation, upon application of the executors, alleging that it was necessary to sell such real estate for the purpose of paying debts and defraying the expenses of administration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1844; Dec. Dig. § 327.*]

2. ORDER FOR EXECUTOR'S SALE—FRAUD.

If there was fraud on the part of the executors in the procurement of the order, it was not apparent on the face of the proceeding.

3. ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—NECESSITY FOR REVERSAL.

When considered in the light of the notes of the presiding judge appended to the motion for a new trial, and in the light of the other evidence, there was no error requiring a reversal because of the admission of certain evidence.

4. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—DIRECTION OF VERDICT.

The evidence required a verdict in favor of the defendant, and there was no error in so directing. Roberts v. Martin, 70 Ga. 196; Bullard v. Wynn, 184 Ga. 636, 68 S. E. 439 (5).

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 772, 824*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—STATEMENT OF ACCUSED.

The trial court is not required, in the absence of a request, to charge a theory dependent alone upon the statement of the accused, made to the jury. Gray v. State, 6 Ga. App. 428, 65 S. E. 191. In this case, however, the trial judge did substantially present to the jury the issue made alone by the statement of the accused as to the intent with which he took the property alleged to have been stolen, in that he instructed the jury that the intent with which the property was taken by the accused must be determined by them from the evidence and from his statement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1812-1817, 1996-2004; Dec. Dig. §§ 772, 824.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 824*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE—REQUESTS.

On the trial of an accusation for larceny from the house, the corpus delicti was clearly proved, and recently thereafter the property alleged to have been stolen was found in the possession of the accused, who admitted that he took the property from the house, but denied that he did so with intent to steal it. Held, in the absence of a request, it was not error for the trial judge to instruct the jury as to the law of circumstantial evidence as laid down in section 1010 of the Penal Code of 1910. McElroy v. State, 125 Ga. 37, 53 S. E. 759; Smith v. State, 125 Ga. 296, 54 S. E. 127.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1996-2004; Dec. Dig. § 824.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1159*)—REVIEW—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Whether an explanation which the accused makes of his possession of property recently stolen is consistent with his innocence is exclusively a question of fact for the determination of the jury, and this court has no right to interfere with that determination, unless it is wholly unsupported by the evidence, or by any reasonable theory deducible therefrom. Under the facts of the present case, the jury were fully authorized to disregard the explanation of his possession made by the accused in his statement.

It is not error for the court to charge the jury that, "when a witness has been attacked for the purpose of impeachment, you are to determine, under certain rules of law governing such cases, whether the witness has been impeached, and what credit you will give to the witness." This instruction does not tend to intimate that an unsuccessful effort has been made to impeach, nor does it authorize the jury to exclude from their consideration the necessity

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 955*)—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE—TIME OF FILING.

Where a motion for a new trial is made, the normal practice requires that the brief of the evidence should be filed either simultaneously with the filing of the motion, or at least at the same term of the court. If the motion is not heard during the term, the judge may allow additional time within which the movant may file the brief of the evidence; but the movant obtains such an extension as a matter of judicial grace, and not as a matter of legal right, and, if the privilege of filing the brief after the expiration of the term is granted conditionally or upon a limitation, the movant must comply with the condition or limitation set in the order, else the judge may legally refuse to approve the brief of the evidence when tendered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2370; Dec. Dig. § 955.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 955*)—NEW TRIAL—PRESENTATION OF BRIEF—EXTENSION OF TIME.

"When, by an order passed in term, a motion for new trial is set to be heard on a particular day, and the same order requires the movant to present a brief of evidence to the judge for approval in vacation on another named day prior to that set for the hearing, the judge is without jurisdiction, on the day fixed for the presentation of the brief, to lawfully extend the time for such presentation." Blackburn v. Alabama Midland Railway Company, 116 Ga. 936, 43 S. E. 866.

Error from Superior Court, Talbot County; S. P. Gilbert, Judge.

Lucius Blount was convicted of crime, and brings error. Affirmed.

Bull & Smith, for plaintiff in error. Geo. C. Palmer, Sol. Gen., for the State.

POWELL, J. It will not be necessary to elaborate the propositions stated in the syllabus. They are well settled by statute and numerous decisions. However, it is deemed expedient to set forth the order of the judge in refusing to approve the brief of the evidence as it recites the facts. It is as follows: "Motion for new trial in the above-stated case was filed during the March term, 1911, of Talbot superior court, and provided that the same was to be heard in vacation, on the 8th day of April, 1911, and that the defendant's counsel have until the 1st day of April, 1911, to prepare and perfect a brief of evidence had on the trial of said case, subject to the approval of the court. By subsequent orders the hearing was postponed until May 6th, at which time the solicitor general moved, in writing, to dismiss said case on the ground that no brief of evidence had been filed and approved in the manner required by law, nor in that pointed out by the order granted to movant. It will be noted from the motion that the same was to be heard in a county other than Talbot, and it necessarily follows that the hearing was in vacation. It also appears that the date allowed for the preparing and perfecting of the brief of evidence was on a different and earlier day than that set for the hearing of the motion. Movant's counsel have submitted affidavits to the effect that they were not aware that a different and earlier date was set for the preparation of the brief of evidence, and this affidavit has been considered. It is no excuse, however, for failing to file the brief as required under the order, that counsel failed to read the same. There having been no brief of evidence filed, as required under the law and by the order allowing further time for same, and the time allowed being an earlier and different date than that set for the trial itself, the motion to dismiss is sustained, and it is therefore considered, ordered and adjudged that said motion for new trial be and the same is hereby dismissed. See Blackburn v. A. M. Railway Company, 116 Ga. 936 [43 S. E. 366]; also, Eady v. A. C. L. R. Co., 129 Ga. 363 [58 S. E. 895]. The rulings in Napier v. Heilker, 115 Ga. 168 [41 S. E. 689], and Mutual Life Insurance Company v. Hamilton, 119 Ga. 340 [46 S. E. 434], and Broadway National Bank v. Kendricks, 124 Ga. 1053 [53 S. E. 576], have all been thoroughly considered, and it appears that the three last-named were all based upon different orders, it appearing that they apply to cases where the date allowed in the order for the presentation and approval of the brief of evidence was not on a different and earlier date than that set for the hearing itself, and in vacation. If the dates named in these orders were in term time, the situation would be entirely different, and there would be a discretion resting in the court to accept and approve a brief of evidence. But in the case at bar all of the dates named for the hearing and for the presentation of brief of evidence were in vacation."

Additionally it may be stated that the attorneys for the movant made affidavits and presented them to the judge, stating that the practice as they had known it, had been to allow the movant until the time of the hearing in which to file the brief of the evidence; and that the attorneys in this case so prepared the order taken at the time the motion was originally continued, and did not notice that the judge had changed the order by the insertion of another date, until after the motion to dismiss was filed.

Judgment affirmed.

Action by Jordan Livingston against S. M. Stanley. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Jas. M. Johnson, for plaintiff in error. Patterson & Copeland, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Livingston sued Stanley for the value of certain cross-ties which he alleged the latter had cut from a land lot of which he alleged he was the owner. It is plain from the record that the only issue of fact which the jury had to determine was what was the true boundary line between lots of land Nos. 194 and 195 in the Eleventh land district of Lowndes county. It was admitted in the pleadings that the plaintiff was the owner of the lot which he claimed, and it is not denied that the defendant cut some cross-ties. The only question, therefore, was whether the cross-ties which Stanley cut were north of the original land line between the two lots. The evidence upon this point was sufficient to authorize the jury to find that Stanley cut his cross-ties from Livingston's land, however innocent may have been his intentions, or no matter how strongly he may have previously been convinced that the land from which they were cut was his own.

A contrary finding upon this point, it is true, would also have been authorized by the evidence, but the prerogative of the jury to find the facts in cases of dispute cannot be questioned. The verdict in favor of the plaintiff was one for the proven value of the ties, so that it is plain that the jury did not add anything on account of the element of willfulness. There are several exceptions to the charge of the court, and also an assignment of error based upon the fact that the court asked C. I. Shelton, one of the witnesses, what was the stumpage value of the ties in question. The question the court asked was a very natural one. The stumpage value of a tree is understood to be merely the value of a tree of standing timber, and if the jury only allowed the plaintiff the stumpage value of trees cut from the plaintiff's own land, certainly there could be no cause for complaint.

As to the exceptions to the instructions of the court to the jury, they are without merit unless it be that the evidence does not authorize the charge in regard to the establishment of the line between adjoining landholders by acquiescence and agreement for the period of seven years. We are not certain that the testimony does not so authorize the inference of acquiescence and agreement in a boundary line as to have authorized the charge, but even if it did not, the charge in question was not unfavorable to the defendant in the light of all the facts.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 188*)—PENALTIES—ACTION—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Proof merely that a person had "beer" in his possession for illegal sale is not sufficient to convict him of having intoxicating or malt liquor in his possession for illegal sale.

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; John W. Maddox, Judge.

Action by the City of Rome against Will Martin for having in possession intoxicating or malt liquor for illegal sale. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Denny & Wright and Eubanks & Mebane, for plaintiff in error. Max Meyerhardt and Maddox & Doyal, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Only one reason appears for reversing the judgment. There is no proof that the beer which the defendant sold was either malt or intoxicating. It is proved that he sold "beer"; but as to what kind of beer it was the record is silent. From the eagerness with which the beer was sought by the crowds which hung around the place where it was sold, we strongly suspect that it was lager beer, which is both malt and intoxicating; but suspicion, even strong suspicion, does not and should not satisfy legal standards in any criminal case. The proposition that, when the alleged violation of a prohibition law consists in a sale of beer, the prosecution must prove directly or circumstantial-ly that it was a malt or an intoxicating beer is too well settled to admit of any doubt. Lumpkin v. Atlanta, 9 Ga. App. —, 71 S. E. 755; Cripe v. State, 4 Ga. App. 832, 62 S. E. 567; Du Vall v. Augusta, 115 Ga. 813, 42 S. E. 265. It is true that among those who were found in the crowd near the place when the beer was being sold was a drunken man; but we deem this insufficient to prove that the beer was intoxicating, as there was no showing that this man had drunk any of the beer, or that he was not drunk when he came to the public place where the crowd had gathered.

1. JURY (§ 118*)—CHALLENGE TO ARRAY.

The statement of counsel for the accused, in the trial of a criminal case, that the accused demanded all of his legal rights, and would not waive anything, except a copy of the indictment and a list of the witnesses, was not sufficient to constitute a challenge to the array.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 631*)—TRIAL—LIST OF JURORS—WAIVER.

of the court to that fact, and failure to call the attention of the court to the omission of the clerk must be construed as a waiver of the right to be supplied with a list of the jury.

Error from City Court of Sandersville; E. W. Jordan, Judge.

Bill Schumpert was convicted of a criminal sale of liquor, and brings error. Affirmed.

W. M. Goodwin, for plaintiff in error. J. E. Hyman, for the State.

RUSSELL, J. [3] In regard to the general grounds of the motion for new trial, which were overruled, it is only necessary to say that according to the testimony for the state a witness testified that he gave the defendant $1.25 and told him to go and get him some whisky. The witness went off and staid about 30 minutes, and when he came back the defendant had the liquor for him. There was an effort to impeach this witness, but evidently the jury believed him; and that is an end of the matter, where the verdict is approved by the trial judge.

The motion for new trial as amended, contains the following additional grounds:

"1st. Because the array of jurors in court, as movant contends, was not regularly and legally put upon the defendant; the following language, nor its equivalent, having been used in arraigning the defendant, nor after the arraignment of the defendant: 'These men, good and true, have been called to pass upon the question of your guilt or innocence in this case. If you have any objections to the array, make them now.' Movant had demanded at the beginning of the case and upon announcing ready for trial all his legal rights, and stated to the court that he would not waive anything, except a copy of the indictment and a list of the witnesses. Movant contends that the failure upon the part of the solicitor to use this language, or its equivalent in meaning, was a denial of his legal right to enter a challenge to the array of jurors in court.

"2d. Because counsel for the defendant, nor the defendant himself, were furnished with a list of jurors from which to strike a jury. Although the court ordered the list furnished, the fact that it was not furnished was a denial to the defendant of one of his legal rights, and of a trial by due process of law.

"3d. Because the defendant and his counsel, being without a list, were unable to strike a jury, as is the plain intent of the law that he should have opportunity to strike in the most intelligent manner, and with an intelligence of those who were on the entire panel of jurors. When a single juror was called and passed upon separately, the defendant could not know just who would be called later, and in this way had no opportunity of estimating just what jurors he should strike with best advantage to himself, or of estimating the comparative value of the juror under consideration, without knowing the personnel of the entire panel. Under such circumstances, counsel for defendant could only say in response to what defendant did with the juror, 'We do not pass on this juror one way or another.'

[1] The presiding judge qualifies his approval of these grounds by the following statement: "Upon the call of the case for trial, counsel for the defendant stated to the court that he would waive nothing, save a copy of the accusation and a list of the witnesses. Thereupon the court ordered the defendant arraigned. In the arraignment of the defendant, the language, or its equivalent, the omission of which is complained of in the first ground of the amended motion, was not used. The court ordered the clerk to furnish counsel for the defendant with a list of the jury. The court then ordered that counsel strike the jury. Counsel stated that he did not wish to be placed in the attitude of either waiving any of his legal rights, or of acquiescing in the proceedings by striking the jury; whereupon the court ordered the jurors put upon their voir dire, and each juror put upon the defendant separately; counsel for defendant stating to the court that they would not pass upon the jurors so put upon him one way or the other. In this manner the jury was impaneled and sworn." As appears from the note of the court, each juror was put upon his voir dire, and this was all that the court was required to have done. The statement by counsel that he waived nothing was not specific enough to amount to a challenge to the array.

[2] The further statement in the judge's note that, "If counsel did not have a list of the jury, it was because he failed to call the attention of the court to the omission of the clerk to furnish the list," is self-explanatory. It was the duty of counsel to call the attention of the court to this omission, and the plaintiff in error can gain nothing by the fact that the court was not advised of the condition to which attention is called in the amended motion. The mere statement that the defendant waived nothing would not require the court to see that his order that a list of the jury should be furnished had been actually complied with, for he would have a right to presume that it had been obeyed. Judgment affirmed.

4. REOPENING CASE.

Under the facts of this case, the court erred in refusing to allow the plaintiff to reopen the case, after the evidence for the plaintiff was closed, and to introduce the defendant as a witness in order to prove by him facts which would have prevented a nonsuit.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

Action by Marie Wickham against Arthur Torley. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Marie Wickham brought an action against Arthur Torley, the substance of the petition now material being as follows: Plaintiff in the early part of June, 1908, was living with S. S. Sollee. Shortly thereafter the defendant, her brother, entered with Sollee into the business of raising pigeons for market, and has continued in such business since that time. Soon after the defendant engaged in such business he requested the plaintiff to lend him $1,000, stating at the time that it was to be used for the purpose of increasing and improving the business in which he had engaged with Sollee. Plaintiff thereupon loaned the defendant $1,000, upon his agreement to repay such sum in April, 1909. Defendant expended a large portion of such borrowed money in improving and increasing the pigeon business in which he was engaged with Sollee, and the defendant failed and refused to repay the loan upon demand after its maturity. The defendant pleaded that he never borrowed the $1,000 from the plaintiff, but he had received that sum from her as a gift; and he further pleaded, if it was not a gift but a loan, that he was a minor at the time he received the money, and was therefore not liable for its payment.

Upon the trial the plaintiff testified, in substance, as follows: "I loaned my brother, the defendant, $1,000 in June, 1908. He was 20 years old at that time. Our father and mother were both dead, and neither of us has ever had a guardian." He "wanted to go into the pigeon business with Mr. Sollee, and asked me to loan him $1,000. He then said that he would pay it back to me when he became 21 years old, on the 12th of April of the next year. This conversation took place in June of 1908, and I consented then to let him have the money. Mr. Sollee had my money, and he as well as my brother suggested that I make the loan, but my brother himself made the application for the loan. The latter subsequently informed me that Mr. Sollee had furnished him with the $1,000, my money. No writing was given me by my brother for the loan. After the loan was due, I made a demand on him for the money, but he has never paid me any of it. After this money had been loaned to my brother, there were pigeons and a pigeon business at the residence of Sollee. He bought pigeons. They appeared to be making a lot of improvements around the place and building a new pigeon loft. This business of making improvements and building the pigeon house continued while I remained there, which was until August 1908. Mr. Sollee and my brother were in business together, and that's why my brother asked me to lend him the money. He wanted to go in business with Sollee. * * * I saw certain improvements going on around the place, and I understood from the way he asked me to lend him the money, I thought probably that was what it was for. He told me he wanted to go in business with Mr. Sollee, and I presumed that these improvements were made with that money. * * * After my brother came out to Mr. Sollee's, both Sollee and my brother told me that they were going into the business of raising pigeons. They said this before I loaned the money; and afterwards my brother said that he wanted to borrow the money to go into that business. I believe at one time while I was out there they had young pigeons. Before I loaned the money to my brother, he was working with the Seaboard Railway Company, learning to be a blacksmith, and was receiving $15 a month for his services."

Helmy testified in behalf of the plaintiff that he worked on Butner's farm near Sollee's place, and was there frequently. He said: "I recall an occasion when pigeon roosts were hauled through Mr. Butner's place, but I don't remember the day. I saw them haul a wagonload of boxes, * * * some kind of crates. I understand they were pigeon nests. A darkey was doing the hauling, and he drove up through Mr. Butner's cow lane, leading out through the road. I objected to his going through there, when Mr. Torley came up and asked me to let the wagon cut through the lane up to the house, stating that it would ruin these boxes to get wet. Upon the request of Mr. Torley, I allowed the boxes to go through. * * * All that I have heard Torley say was that he was raising pigeons, and raising some to sell. He then told me he had made away with some of the pigeons, and only saved a few for his own use. This conversation occurred last fall or summer. [The trial was in April, 1910.] He did not say they were for the business, only for pigeon nests. * * * Mr. Torley did not tell me what his interest, if any, was, or whose pigeons they were. When he spoke about anything, it was about his doing so and so, and generally said 'we' did so and so. I don't know who 'we' was. I could not say who he had been talking about. Sometimes I would say, 'How are you getting along about the pigeon business?' and then he would say, 'We are doing nicely.' I could not pretend to say how long ago that was. I do not remember."

Upon the conclusion of the evidence for the plaintiff, the defendant moved for a nonsuit. "Before the judgment of the court was rendered upon said motion, plaintiff moved the court that she be permitted to introduce, for the purpose of avoiding the nonsuit, her brother, the said defendant, and then offered to show by said defendant the following facts: (1) That said defendant was now the owner of the property for which a large portion of said $1,000 had been paid. (2) That he was now in the possession of that property. (3) That he was also in possession of a large portion of the money that had been loaned to him by plaintiff. (4) That he at the time the money was loaned was sui juris. The court, after argument, entered its judgment awarding a nonsuit, and then and there upon objection of defendant refused to allow plaintiff to introduce said defendant Torley for the purposes aforesaid." Plaintiff excepted to the judgment of nonsuit, on the ground that the evidence submitted in her behalf established a prima facie case against the defendant, and assigned error upon the refusal of the court to permit plaintiff to introduce the defendant as her witness for the purpose of proving by him the facts as above stated.

D. H. Clark, for plaintiff in error. C. V. Hohenstein and S. N. Gazan, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. "The contracts of a minor under twenty-one years of age are void, except for necessities. If, however, the minor receives property, or other valuable consideration, and, after arrival at age, retains possession of such property, or enjoys the proceeds of such valuable consideration, such a ratification of the contract shall bind him." Civ. Code 1910, § 4233. "If a minor, by permission of his parent or guardian, or by permission of law, practices any profession or trade, or engages in any business as an adult, he shall be bound by all contracts connected with such trade, profession, or business." Ib. § 4235.

[1] One of the contentions of counsel for the plaintiff is that as the defendant at the time he made the contract sued on had neither parent nor guardian, he was free to make the contract, and that it was therefore binding upon him, notwithstanding his infancy. This contention, however, will not hold. Until majority the child remains under the control of the father, who is entitled to his services and the proceeds of his labor. This parental power may be lost in several ways, and is prescribed in Civ. Code 1910, § 3021. But even emancipation of the minor from parental control only gives him a right to his own earnings and releases him from his parents' control from that time, but it does not remove his disability and clothe him with the power to contract. 2 Page on Contracts, § 852; Clark on Contracts, 150. It must follow that, if an infant after the loss of parental control has no capacity to make a binding contract, the mere fact that he had neither parent nor guardian would not operate to confer upon him the power to contract.

[2] Nor would the mere fact that the defendant, having neither parent nor guardian, was working for himself and receiving his own wages, prior to the time the contract sued on was entered into, render him capable of making such contract, which was entirely disconnected with the work for which he was receiving his earnings. Another contention of counsel for the plaintiff is that the evidence submitted in behalf of the plaintiff authorized the finding that the defendant at the time he borrowed the money was engaged as an adult in the business of raising pigeons for sale, and that the contract sued on was connected with such business. We cannot agree to this. According to the testimony of the plaintiff herself, the defendant was not engaged in such business at the time she loaned him the money, but he borrowed it for the purpose of embarking in such business, and there was no sufficient evidence to show that any of the money he borrowed was ever invested in such business. Our conclusion is that the plaintiff failed to make out a prima facie case.

2. Did the court err in refusing to permit the plaintiff, in order to save a nonsuit, to introduce the defendant and to prove by him that he was then in the possession of and owned the property in which a large portion of the money he had borrowed from the plaintiff had been invested, and that he was also then in possession of a large portion of the borrowed money? The rulings of this court relating to this question have been collated by Justice Lumpkin in Penn v. Georgia Southern & Florida Railway Co.,

129 Ga. 856, 60 S. E. 172, and, as was there said, "among those decisions there is no conflict, but, construed together, they are in harmony and make up a complete rule. It is common practice for the presiding judge, where counsel for the plaintiff in error has omitted evidence by accident, inadvertence, or even because of a mistake as to the necessity for offering a particular witness or particular evidence, to allow the case to be reopened and additional evidence introduced in order to prevent a nonsuit. But this is not a matter of arbitrary right on the part of the plaintiff or his counsel. The judge has a considerable discretion in the matter. It may be that counsel for a defendant has dismissed witnesses or changed his position, relying on a judge's announcement, so that it would be unjust to allow a reopening of the case. Or the judge may be of the opinion that counsel are needlessly consuming time and experimenting in the case rather than developing it; or other reasons may influence him, in the exercise of a sound discretion, in refusing a motion to reopen the case and allow additional testimony." In the present case it appears that counsel for the plaintiff might have well contended in good faith that the evidence for the plaintiff made out a prima facie case. In the present case there appears no reason why it would have been unjust to the defendant to have allowed the plaintiff to reopen the case. The plaintiff offered the defendant himself to prove additional facts to make out a case. Nothing appears to authorize the conclusion that counsel was needlessly consuming time and experimenting in the case rather than developing it. Certainly the plaintiff could not be expected to introduce the defendant as a witness in order to make out a case except in dire necessity. In the present case we think the plaintiff might well have rested the case on the evidence submitted on behalf of the plaintiff until the judge had intimated his intention to grant a nonsuit. On such intimation, then the necessity arose for the plaintiff to introduce her adversary as a witness. We are of opinion that the court erred in not allowing her to do so. This rule is not in conflict with the decisions in Cushman v. Coleman, 92 Ga. 772, 19 S. E. 46, Freyermuth v. South Bend R. Co., 107 Ga. 31, 32 S. E. 668, Davis v. Chaplin, 110 Ga. 322, 35 S. E. 312, and Brooke v. Lowe, 122 Ga. 358, 50 S. E. 146, when the facts of those cases are construed in connection with the rulings made.

[3] The plaintiff offered to show by the defendant that he was, even at the time of the trial, in possession of and the owner of the property in which a large portion of the borrowed money had been invested, and that he was in possession of a large part of the borrowed money. If this had been shown, then without more it would have authorized a recovery under Civ. Code 1910, § 4233, which provides "if * * * the minor receives property, or other valuable consideration, and after arriving at age retains possession of such property or enjoys the proceeds of such valuable consideration, such a ratification of the contract shall bind him." White v. Sikes, 129 Ga. 508, 59 S. E. 228, 121 Am. St. Rep. 228.

[4] The court erred in refusing to allow the plaintiff to introduce the additional evidence offered in order to avert a nonsuit.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

OXFORD et al. v. OXFORD.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. WILLS (§§ 53, 164*)—PROBATE—CAVEAT—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

Where children by a former marriage caveat at the probate of the will of their father, wherein the larger part of his estate is devised to his widow, on the ground of want of mental capacity and undue influence, it is proper to allow proof of the pecuniary condition of the caveators.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 129, 403, 405; Dec. Dig. §§ 53, 164.*]

2. WILLS (§§ 288, 321*)—PROBATE—BURDEN OF PROOF—RIGHT TO OPEN AND CLOSE.

Upon the trial of an issue arising upon the propounding of a will and a caveat thereto, the burden, in the first instance, is upon the propounder of the alleged will to make out a prima facie case, by showing the factum of the will, and that at the time of its execution the testator apparently had sufficient mental capacity to make it, and, in making it, acted freely and voluntarily. When this is done, the burden of proof shifts to the caveator.

(a) On a trial of the issue of devisavit vel non, where the caveator introduces proof, the propounder is entitled to open and conclude the argument.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 651, 652, 662, 664, 761; Dec. Dig. §§ 288, 321.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 192*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMPTIONS AS TO FACTS.

Where no issue is made as to the formal execution of the paper propounded as a will, and the evidence is undisputed that such paper was executed as required by law for wills, and the attesting witnesses were competent, it is not error for the court to assume such in his instructions to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 432-434; Dec. Dig. § 192.*]

4. NO ERROR—EVIDENCE SUFFICIENT.

No substantial error of law occurred on the trial, and the evidence supports the verdict.

Error from Superior Court, Whitfield County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Mrs. Kate Oxford filed a petition to probate in solemn form the will of her deceased husband, and J. M. Oxford and others enter a caveat thereto. From a judgment in favor of the propounder, the caveators bring error. Affirmed.

W. C. Martin and W. E. Mann, for plaintiffs in error. Maddox, McCamy & Shumate, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. Mrs. Kate Oxford filed a petition to probate in solemn form the will of her deceased husband. By the terms of the will the larger portion of the property was devised to the propounder, who was the second wife of the decedent. The testator's children by a former marriage filed a caveat to the probate of the will, on the ground that the testator at the time of making the alleged will was of unsound mind, and that the will was executed by him because of the undue influence and false representations of the propounder. On appeal in the superior court a verdict was rendered in favor of the propounder, which the court refused to set aside on motion for new trial.

[1] 1. The first two grounds of the amended motion complain of the admission by the court of evidence showing the financial condition of the caveators. This testimony was admissible as illustrative of the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the testamentary scheme as bearing on the issue of undue influence alleged to have been exercised by the propounder. Indeed, the jury should be permitted to hear testimony of this character, that they might know of the facts and circumstances surrounding the testator at the time he executed the will, to better determine the state of his mind, whether he had made a rational disposition of his property, and whether or not undue influence was exercised over him at the time of its execution. Rasdale v. Brush (Ky.) 104 S. W. 749; Henning v. Stevenson, 118 Ky. 318, 80 S. W. 1185; Johnson v. Armstrong, 97 Ala. 731, 12 South. 72.

[2] 2. The charge on the burden of proof on the issue of devisavit vel non was in substantial accord with the rule laid down in Slaughter v. Heath, 127 Ga. 760, 57 S. E. 69, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1, and not in conflict with Mobley v. Lyon, 134 Ga. 125, 67 S. E. 668, 187 Am. St. Rep. 213. Both sides introduced evidence, and the court properly allowed the propounder the right to open and conclude the argument.

[3] 3. The court charged the jury: "Some question was raised as to the execution of the instrument, or the alleged will, as to the competency of the witness, Judge Bogle, the ordinary. [The will was attested by that official.] I charge you that so far as the formal execution is concerned and the competency of the witnesses, the court holds that that they have been sufficiently established, and the court sustains the execution of the will and holds that Judge Bogle is a competent witness to the will." The criticism of this charge is that it was contrary to law, and is an expression of opinion on the evidence by the court. It is especially insisted that the words, "the court holds that they have been sufficiently established," was an expression of opinion on the evidence to the effect that such evidence made out a prima facie case authorizing the probate of the will. The evidence was undisputed that the will was executed in legal form, in the presence of competent attesting witnesses. This excerpt, when considered in connection with its context, was but the statement of facts about which there was no issue, and was not harmful to the plaintiffs in error.

[4] 4. There is no merit in any of the other grounds of the motion. The charge substantially stated all the contentions of the parties, and the verdict was warranted by the evidence.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. v. SOUTHERN FLOUR & GRAIN CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 174*)—BILL OF LADING—CONSTRUCTION.

Where a carrier accepts a shipment of freight to a place on its own line of railroad, and stipulates in its bill of lading that "the company agrees to carry said property to destination if on its road," and enters on the bill of lading, after the designation of the property, "C/O W. & A.," which characters when indorsed on the bill of lading are proved to mean "in care of the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company," such bill of lading will be construed to mean that the receiving carrier obligates to transport the shipment over its own road to destination and there to deliver it to the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company for the benefit of the consignee, and not to mean a delivery of the shipment at a junction point outside of the place of destination to the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company to be transported to destination by the latter company.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 174.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 457*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—ABBREVIATIONS—EXPLANATIONS.

Abbreviations and technical terms in written instruments create such an ambiguity that they may be explained by parol testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2104, 2107, 2108; Dec. Dig. § 457.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 188*)—TROVER BY CONSIGNEE—REFUSAL TO PAY CHARGES.

A carrier who promptly transports goods according to his contract is entitled to his reasonable carriage charges, and the consignee is not entitled to recover the goods in an action of trover, where he refuses to pay such charges.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 853-858; Dec. Dig. § 188.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by the Southern Flour & Grain Company against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Tye, Peeples & Jordan, for plaintiff in error. Walter McElreath, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. The Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company operates a continuous line of railway between Lexington, Ky., and Atlanta, Ga. On January 1, 1909, W. Z. Thompson turned over to the railway company at Lexington a car load of hay, and the railway company issued a bill of lading for the shipment. By the terms of the bill of lading the shipment was consigned to the shipper's order, with direction to notify Southern Flour & Grain Company, Atlanta, Ga. After the designation of the articles shipped in the bill of lading appears the following: "c/o W. & A." The bill of lading issued to the consignor contained the following covenant: "The company agrees to carry said property to destination, if on its road; if said destination is not on its road and the company guarantees a through rate to destination, then it agrees to deliver said property to such other carrier on the route to destination as the company may select, but it does not agree to carry to any point beyond its own line, or be responsible beyond its own line in any manner under any circumstances." The hay was duly transported by the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, and the Southern Flour & Grain Company was notified on its arrival at Atlanta, Ga. The Southern Flour & Grain Company refused to pay the freight charges, because the shipment did not arrive in Atlanta over the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company, and demanded possession of the hay. The Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company offered to turn the shipment over to the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company. The Southern Flour & Grain Company refused to accept delivery in this way, and brought an action in trover to recover the hay. Under the stipulations made on the trial of the case, the only issue between the parties was whether there had been a conversion of the hay by the railway company because of an alleged diversion in the routing of the shipment. The plaintiff contended that, according to the bill of lading, the defendant contracted to deliver the shipment to the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company at a point outside of Atlanta, and in support of this contention offered the testimony of its president as follows: "'C/O W. & A.' on the bill of lading, I know what they stand for. In the trade of shipping business of shipping over railroads, in making out bills of lading, I would say that the term would mean that the shipment should arrive by the 'W. & A. Railroad.' I know in railroad parlance, as such words are used on bills of lading, what the words 'C/O' mean. They mean 'care of' and 'via.' 'Via' means in railroad parlance 'by way of.' 'By way of' indicates, as to the routing of the shipment, that the routing shall be designated after the character and shall arrive over the road mentioned after the character. There is a railroad coming into Atlanta known as the 'Western & Atlantic Railroad.' The words 'W. & A.' on bills of lading mean Western & Atlantic Railroad. It is usually abbreviated just like that." On cross-examination he testified: "I should say from experience that 'C/O' meant care of." No witness, other than the president of the plaintiff company, testified concerning the meaning of the symbols "C/O W. & A." The contract of shipment provided that the carrier should deliver the hay at destination if on its road; and this stipulation must govern the contract, unless it is modified by the indorsement of these characters on it. The theory upon which parol testimony is allowed in such cases is that symbols of trade having a definite meaning may be interpreted, and the interpretation becomes a part of the writing. The interpretation given to these characters by the plaintiff is that they mean "in care of." It is true that he also indicates that they may sometimes be employed in a different sense. Ordinarily a plaintiff's testimony in his own favor, where the same is of uncertain intentment, should be taken most strongly against him. And this rule should not be relaxed where the purpose of the testimony is to define certain trade symbols in their bearing and effect on the written contract which contains them, and the definition is so dubious and ambiguous as to deprive the characters of any certain and definite effect.

[1] We therefore construe the testimony of the plaintiff in harmony with, rather than repugnant to, the provisions of the contract respecting delivery at destination, and that the characters mean "in care of the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company," and a delivery at Atlanta to the Western & Atlantic Railroad for the benefit of the consignee would have been a good delivery. If the testimony of other witnesses had been introduced as to the meaning of these trade symbols, and there had been a conflict as to their meaning, then it would have been for the jury to determine their proper signification. We are all the more disposed to construe the plaintiff's testimony as we have, in view of the failure of the record to affirmatively disclose that the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company connects with the initial carrier. This case is altogether unlike the case of Bird v. Georgia Railroad Company, 72 Ga. 655. In that case the line of railroad of the initial and receiving carrier did not extend to the place to which the shipment was destined. The shipper routed the shipment over a certain line of railroad, and it was so stipulated in the bill of lading. The receiving carrier, instead of delivering it to the connecting carrier designated in the bill of lading, delivered it to another carrier, who transported it to its destination; and the court held that the latter carrier, when it received the shipment with a knowledge that it was routed over a different road, was guilty of a conversion, and was not entitled to charge for transportation over its own line, and that the owner could maintain a trover action to recover his goods without tendering or paying the transportation charges claimed by it.

[2] 2. Error is assigned upon the admission of parol evidence to interpret the character "C/O W. & A." on the bill of lading. Parol evidence is admissible to explain the meaning of abbreviations and technical expressions in written instruments. Daniel v. Maddox-Rucker Banking Co., 124 Ga. 1063, 53 S. E. 573; 1 Enc. 82.

[3] 3. The evidence showing no conversion on the part of the carrier, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover possession of the freight without paying or tendering the freight charges.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

WILLIAMS v. PERRY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 19, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EJECTMENT (§ 64*)—PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY.

It is essential to the maintenance of an action for the recovery of land that the premises sued for be described with such certainty as that, in the event of a recovery by the plaintiff, a writ of possession issued upon the judgment, and describing the premises as laid in the petition, shall so identify the premises sued for as that the sheriff in the execution of the writ can deliver the possession in accordance with its mandate. Harwell v. Foster, 97 Ga. 264, 22 S. E. 994; Hollywood Cemetery Corporation v. Hudson, 133 Ga. 271, 65 S. E. 777.

(a) Although the petition was amended relatively to the description of the premises sued for, as amended it failed to furnish such a description of the premises as to bring it within the rule above announced.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. §§ 158-164; Dec. Dig. § 64.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 170*)—DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§ 58*)—APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1203*)—TAKING QUESTIONS FROM JURY—DIRECTION OF VERDICT—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE.

The defendant did not introduce evidence, and accordingly a verdict should not have been directed for her. Zipperer v. Savannah, 128 Ga. 135, 57 S. E. 311; Equitable Mfg. Co. v. Davis, 130 Ga. 67, 60 S. E. 262.

(a) Inasmuch as the petition, under the rule announced in the first headnote, was insufficient to form the basis of a recovery, a nonsuit, under the authority of Harwell v. Foster, supra, and Barnes v. Carter, 120 Ga. 895, 48 S. E. 387, and Zipperer v. Savannah, supra, should have been granted.

(b) Accordingly the judgment will be affirmed, with direction that, when the remittitur is offered to be made the judgment of the court below, if the plaintiff in the action so desires, the verdict may on his motion be vacated, and a judgment of nonsuit be entered.

IVEY v. PAYNE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 23, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. COURTS (§ 480*)—COSTS (§ 212*)—RESTRAINING OTHER ACTION—ERRONEOUS TAXATION OF COSTS.

An owner of realty sold the same, took from the purchaser notes for the purchase money, and gave the latter bond to make titles upon payment of the notes. The vendor brought suit on the notes to the July term, 1910, of the city court, and had issued against the purchaser a dispossessionary warrant. Upon the petition of the purchaser for an injunction against the prosecution of the suit on the notes and the execution of the dispossessionary warrant, against the vendor and the constable charged with the duty of executing the warrant, being presented to the presiding judge, a restraining order was granted on July 22, 1910, enjoining the execution of the warrant; but no restraining order was granted enjoining the prosecution of the suit on the notes. The petition and restraining order which were filed on July 23, 1910, were served on the constable on July 23, 1910, and on the vendor on September 15, 1910. The dispossessionary warrant proceedings were dismissed. No defense was filed to the suit on the notes, and on September 6, 1910, a verdict therein was rendered and judgment entered thereon. A motion for a new trial, filed by the purchaser on September 13, 1910, was overruled September 24, 1910. To the order overruling the motion a bill of exceptions, certified October 13, 1910, was filed by the purchaser. No steps were taken to cause the filing of the bill of exceptions to operate as a supersedeas. On September 6, 1910, an execution was issued for the amount of the judgment, $1,135 principal, $279.80 interest, and $141 attorney's fees. This execution was levied upon the land on September 9, 1910, which was sold thereunder on the first Tuesday in October, 1910, and deeded by the sheriff to the vendor, who was the purchaser at the sheriff's sale. The original vendee amended her petition, and prayed for an injunction against her being evicted by the sheriff by reason of the sale by the latter to her vendor. Held, the verdict and judgment rendered in the city court were not void, and the sale under a levy of the execution issued upon the judgment was not invalid, because the verdict and judgment were rendered pending the application for an injunction to restrain the prosecution of the suit in which the verdict and judgment were rendered.

(a) This is true, though the plaintiff in that suit may have known of the pendency of the application for injunction at the time the verdict and judgment were rendered.

(b) Even if the fact that the plaintiff was a member of the firm in whose behalf attorney's fees were recovered and embraced in the judgment would affect the right to a recovery of such fees (see Vanduzer v. McMillan, 37 Ga. 299, note 3), this would not render the judgment and sale thereunder invalid. Jones v. Findley, 84 Ga. 52, 10 S. E. 541.

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 12*)—APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 480*)—PROCEEDINGS TO PROCURE—SUPERSEDEAS—EFFECT.

The provision, in the rule nisi issued upon the motion for a new trial, that "this order act as a supersedeas until the further order of the court," did not have effect as a supersedeas after the order of the court overruling the motion. Parker-Hensel Engineering Co. v. Schuler, 133 Ga. 696, 66 S. E. 800.

(a) Where an execution was issued and levied before the motion for a new trial was made and supersedeas granted pending its determination, the sale under such levy, made after the motion for a new trial was overruled, was not void because the publication of some of the advertisements thereof were made while the supersedeas was in force.

(b) The filing of a bill of exceptions to the order overruling the motion for a new trial did not serve to render the sale void, or furnish grounds upon which an injunction should have been granted restraining the sheriff from placing the purchaser at the sheriff's sale in possession of the property sold.

SEABOARD AIR LINE RY. v. RANDOLPH.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 11, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. REVIEW ON APPEAL.

In the present case, there was sufficient evidence to authorize a finding by the jury of liability for the homicide of plaintiff's husband.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 854*)—REVIEW—REFUSAL OF NEW TRIAL.

Although the trial judge was of the opinion, as shown by his order, that he was without discretion to grant a new trial, after two concurrent verdicts in favor of the plaintiff, where there was any evidence to support the second verdict, yet, where his order showed that the second verdict failed to receive his approval only because of the amount of the finding, and there was ample evidence to support the jury's finding in regard to the amount the judgment refusing a new trial will not be disturbed by this court; there being, as ruled above, sufficient evidence to authorize the jury's finding against the defendant upon the question of liability.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3403, 3404, 3408-3430; Dec. Dig. § 854.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 730*)—REVIEW—ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR.

An exception to a correct charge, because of failure to give, in the same connection, some other pertinent legal proposition, is not a good assignment of error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3013-3016; Dec. Dig. § 730.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 237*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

Failure of the court to instruct the jury as to the meaning of the expression, "a preponderance of the evidence," furnishes no ground for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 542, 548-551; Dec. Dig. § 237.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 730*)—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—INDEFINITENESS.

An assignment of error, complaining that the charge delivered by the court did not correctly state the contentions of the parties, nor the "issues arising under the law thereupon," without specifying what contentions of the parties were omitted, or upon what issues the court failed to charge the jury, is too general to permit of consideration. Tarver v. Deppen, 132 Ga. 798, 65 S. E. 177, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1161.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3013-3016; Dec. Dig. § 730.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 339*)—VERDICT—CORRECTION.

The jury returned a verdict in the following form: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff $6,200, with interest at 7 per cent. to date." Upon the reading of that verdict in open court, the judge instructed the jury to retire and put the verdict in shape, and "either say from what date the interest is, or you can calculate the interest and compute it in a lump sum." One of the jurors then said to the court that there was a difference of opinion among the jurors about that, whereupon the judge said to the jury, "You can just find that verdict for a lump sum." After retiring as directed by the judge, the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $9,826.31. Held, that the judge did not err in directing the jury to retire to their room and state the amount which they should find for the plaintiff "in a lump sum," nor in receiving the verdict after the jury had retired and put their verdict in shape.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 791-794; Dec. Dig. § 339.*]

Fish, C. J., and Holden, J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Glynn County; C. B. Conyers, Judge.

Action by H. B. Randolph against the Seaboard Air Line Railway. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

See, also, 134 Ga. 352, 67 S. E. 933.

Mrs. H. B. Randolph brought suit against the Seaboard Air Line Railway and the Brunswick & Birmingham Railroad Company, alleging that the defendants had damaged petitioner in a certain sum, by reason of the negligent running of an engine and train of cars, which, in consequence of being operated negligently as set forth in the petition, on the 3d day of February, 1902, struck and killed her husband; that this was in consequence of the defendant's negligence, and the deceased could not have avoided the consequence of such negligence by the exercise of ordinary care; that he was crossing the tracks at a place where he had a right to be, and where the public had a right to be, and the defendants were charged with knowledge of the fact that some one might be upon the track at any time; that after the defendants became aware of the deceased's presence upon the track they negligently failed to stop their engine; that the deceased was killed near a public crossing, and the defendants failed to check and continue to check, and failed to blow and continue to blow on approaching the crossing. The defendant answered, denying all the allegations material to a recovery. Upon the trial the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $9,826.31 against the Seaboard Air Line Railway, and the defendant made a motion for a new trial.

Upon the hearing of the motion, the trial judge passed the following order: "Upon hearing and considering the within and foregoing motion it appears to the court that the amount of the verdict is excessive, although there is evidence upon which the amount as found might be based; for this reason the court does not approve the verdict; one new trial having been had in the case, however, and, this being a second verdict, the court understands that he has not the discretion to grant a new trial upon the facts, where there is sufficient evidence to support the verdict; and it is thereupon ordered and adjudged that the motion be denied and a new trial refused." The defendant excepted to the order denying a new trial.

Crovatt & Whitfield, for plaintiff in error.
Burton Smith and D. W. Krauss, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. [1] 1. This is the fifth appearance of this case here, and it is reported in 120 Ga. 969, 48 S. E. 396; 126 Ga. 238, 55 S. E. 47; 129 Ga. 796, 59 S. E. 1110; and 134 Ga. 353, 67 S. E. 933. By the decision in 129 Ga. 796, 59 S. E. 1110, the judgment of the trial court was reversed, on the ground that the court erred in directing a verdict for the defendant, and it was held that the question of the liability of the defendant was one for determination by the jury; and we do not think that the additional evidence adduced on the last trial was such as to remove the question of liability from the province of the jury, which must settle all questions of fact, even in cases where the trial court and the reviewing court might reach an entirely different conclusion from that reached by the jury as to the party in whose favor there was a preponderance of evidence.

[2] 2. Upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial, the judge below passed the order set forth in the statement of facts. We cannot approve of the practice of passing orders of this character; that is, of rendering a judgment denying the defendant's right to a new trial, and at the same time disapproving of a part of the jury's finding in the case. It will be observed that the court below, in the order referred to, does not expressly or impliedly disapprove of the finding of the jury upon the question of the defendant's liability, but does not approve the verdict, on the ground that it appeared that the amount found for the plaintiff was too great. If it had appeared from the order of the court that it refused its approval of the verdict generally, but denied the motion for a new trial on the ground that the court had no discretion, upon a second finding for the same party, where there was sufficient evidence to support it, we might feel constrained in this case to set aside this verdict, although it is a second finding in favor of the plaintiff, and for an amount substantially the same as the amount awarded in the first verdict, allowing interest on that amount to date of last verdict, because a trial court is not without discretion relative to the grant of a new trial after a second verdict in favor of the same party. In dealing with the second verdict, his discretion may not be as ample as is that of a court hearing a motion for a first new trial. But certainly, under the decisions of this court, the first grant of a new trial does not exhaust the discretion of the court relatively to the grant or denial of another trial.

It is said, in the case of Dethrage v. City of Rome, 125 Ga. 802, 54 S. E. 654, that, "after the first grant of a new trial, if the matter in controversy be one of fact for the jury, and for a second time in passing upon the same facts the verdict upon the question at issue be concurrent with the first, the mere discretion of the court can play but little part in the second motion for a new trial. It is true that it may sometimes be exercised, but only in cases where it is palpably apparent, from the entire evidence, that the verdict was strongly and decidedly against the weight of the evidence and manifestly wrong." But even here there is no holding that the trial court is entirely divested of his discretion in the matter of granting a second new trial, and the language which we have just quoted should be considered in connection with the cases cited to support the proposition laid down. One of these is Taylor v. Central Railroad Co., 79 Ga. 330, 340, 5 S. E. 114, 119. There it was said:

"From all that has been said and shown, we conclude that the power of the superior courts to grant new trials, being expressly conferred by statute, as well as arising from common-law principles (vide Code, §§ 3711-3718), is not limited by any absolute and invariable rule as to the number of times of its allowable exercise, but that the presumption of the legality of such grant, generally speaking, weakens upon each additional concurrent verdict; and that a third, or even a second, grant of a rehearing, on the ground of the evidence being decidedly and strongly against the verdict, will be carefully reviewed to see that the discretion to grant it has been justly, wisely, and prudently exercised, letting each case stand as to this question upon its peculiar issues and facts, and allowing due weight to the general considerations of the fitness of juries to find the facts, and of the necessity that there shall be some end to litigation."

Another of the cases cited in the Dethrage Case is that of Davis v. Chaplin, 102 Ga. 587, 27 S. E. 726, where it was said: "This court will not reverse a judgment granting a second new trial on the ground that the verdict is contrary to evidence, when it appears from the record that the evidence in support of the verdict was at best weak and unsatisfactory, and the decided preponderance of the testimony was on the side of the losing party." See, also, the case of Daniels v. Leonard, 105 Ga. 841, 32 S. E. 122, cited in the Dethrage Case.

But in the case at bar the court below refused the new trial, there having been two concurrent verdicts for the plaintiff; and in one respect only did the judge fail to approve the finding of the jury, and that was in regard to the amount recovered by the plaintiff, which appeared to the court below to be excessive. But, after examination of the evidence contained in the record, we are of the opinion that there was ample evidence to authorize the jury to find the amount which they determined she was entitled to recover. That being true, there is no ground for disturbing the judgment refusing a new trial; for, touching the matter of the amount of the verdict, it cannot be said that it was supported by "weak and unsatisfactory" evidence, or that it was contrary to the weight of the evidence.

3, 4. It is complained that the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "Among other things that you will consider is the place where the accident or killing occurred, with reference to its use or nonuse by the public, and in explanation of the rights of the plaintiff's husband to be where he was at the time he was, and the duty of the railroad company to expect him to be there or not to be there. In that connection you will not consider any of the evidence as to its being a public road, with reference to any duty upon the part of the railroad company to enforce the law as to public road crossings—that is, with reference to the blowing of the whistle and ringing of the bell and checking and keep checking of its speed; but you may consider all the facts and circumstances as to the relative rights of the parties and as to what may be negligence under the particular circumstances of this case."

[3] This charge is excepted to, not as being an incorrect statement of the law relatively to the question dealt with therein, but because it failed to instruct the jury "as to the law applicable to the place at which the killing is alleged to have occurred, the use or non-use of the locality by the public, and the respective rights with respect thereto of the deceased and the defendant." As has been ruled more than once by this court, failure to charge some other rule or principle of law is not a valid ground of criticism upon a portion of the charge complete and sound in itself. See 1 Michie's Dig. 639.

What we have said above is applicable to one of the exceptions to the charge complained of in the sixteenth ground of the motion for a new trial, which is in the following language: "In this case, gentlemen, it is undisputed in the evidence that the railroad company killed the plaintiff's husband. That being true, the law raises the presumption that the railroad company is liable, and you will find a verdict for the plaintiff, unless it appears to your satisfaction by a preponderance of the evidence that the railroad company was not liable."

[4] The other exception to the charge last quoted is upon the ground that the court failed to state to the jury "what is meant by preponderance of the evidence," and this latter exception is without merit; no apt and correct request to charge as to the meaning of the expression "preponderance of evidence" having been made to the court.

5, 6. The rulings made in headnotes 5 and 6 require no elaboration. There were other criticisms upon the charge of the court not specifically noticed in what we have said above; but, after a careful consideration of the portions of the charge criticised and the complaints made, we are satisfied that no errors of sufficient materiality to require the grant of a new trial are pointed out in the assignments of error.

Judgment affirmed.

FISH, C. J., and HOLDEN, J., dissent. ATKINSON, J., disqualified. The other Justices concur.

HOLDEN, J. I cannot concur with the majority of the members of the court in the ruling made in the second headnote. The order of the judge shows that he has not exercised any discretion in passing on the motion for a new trial. He states in the order that, while there is sufficient evidence to support the verdict, he has no discretion to set aside a second verdict in favor of the plaintiff. Though there is evidence to support a second verdict, the court is not for this reason deprived of the right to set the same aside. The evidence in this case would have authorized the court to set the verdict aside. It does not appear that the court has approved the verdict, but the recitals in his order show that the verdict is not approved by him as to the amount thereof.

I am authorized by the Chief Justice to state that he concurs with me in the views above expressed.

GEORGIA STEEL CO. et al. v. WHITE.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 22, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 378*)—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—AUTHENTICATION.

T. C. White brought a suit to recover of the Georgia Steel Company and the Southern Steel Company on an account for the price of lumber delivered to the Southern Steel Company, and for the foreclosure of a lien on the real estate of the Georgia Steel Company in the improvement of which the lumber was used by the Southern Steel Company (a claim of such lien having been recorded within three months from the time the lumber was so furnished), and for other purposes. It was claimed by White, who was the owner of a sawmill, that a contract was made by him with the Georgia Steel Company to saw lumber from its timber, and that certain lumber was sawed thereunder and delivered to this company, all of which was paid for, and that the lumber thereafter sawed was delivered by him to the Southern Steel Company, who used the same in the improvement of the real estate of the Georgia Steel Company, on the property of which the lien was claimed. The only witness introduced upon the trial of the case was White, who testified that under a letter to him (introduced in evidence), written on the letterhead of the Georgia Iron & Coal Company and signed by "J. Farmer, Supt.," ordering the plaintiff to cut lumber, he sawed from timber on the lands of the Georgia Steel Company 17,000 feet of lumber and delivered it to Farmer, who said he was the superintendent of this company, and afterwards delivered the lumber for the price of which the suit is brought to the Southern Steel Company. He testified that he understood the Southern Steel Company "bought out" the Georgia Steel Company. There was no legal testimony to show any connection between the two companies, and there was no testimony sufficient to require a finding that the Georgia Steel Company authorized a delivery of the lumber to the other company, or ratified such delivery. Held, the following letter: "Georgia Iron & Coal Company. Cole City, Georgia, Sept. 5, 1906. Mr. T. C. White, Pisgah, Ala.—Dear Sir: In line with our conversation regarding sawmill and bill of lumber, I am pleased to advise you that I am in position to offer you a bill of lumber of 100,000 feet to begin on. We will no doubt need more lumber than above amount, but the 100,000 feet will justify you putting your mill up here. As a matter of fact, and in line with our agreement, we will expect you to cut and deliver on our railroad this bill, and all other bills, for $9 per 1,000 feet. Also expect you to begin cutting this bill 15 days from date of this letter. Please acknowledge receipt of this letter, and advise whether or not you will be able to do this. Yours very truly, J. Farmer, Supt."—was inadmissible in behalf of the plaintiff to bind the Georgia Steel Company to pay for any lumber cut in pursuance of such letter; it not appearing that Farmer, whose name was signed thereto, was the superintendent or other agent or officer of the Georgia Steel Company, or that the latter authorized any one to write such letter, or afterwards ratified the same.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1651; Dec. Dig. § 378.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 378*)—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—AUTHENTICATION.

It was error to admit in evidence the following letter: "Gadsden, Ala. 3/17/1908. T. C. White, Esq., Trenton, Georgia—Dear Sir: Yours 5th received while I was away from home. I would advise you to hold on to your lumber, ready to sell it to the new company. I don't think it will be long before you will be called on for it. Respy, E. T. Shuler"—it not appearing by any legal evidence that the one whose name was signed thereto was authorized to write such letter by either of the companies, or that he was an agent or officer of either of such companies.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1651; Dec. Dig. § 378.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 471*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

It was error to admit, over objection of the defendants, evidence of White "that I supposed J. Farmer was the superintendent of the Georgia Steel Company, or the Southern Steel Company." Such evidence merely expressed the opinion of the witness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2149-2185; Dec. Dig. § 471.*]

4. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 22*)—EVIDENCE OF AGENCY—AGENT'S DECLARATION.

It was error to admit, over objection of the defendants, testimony of White that J. Farmer had stated to him that he was superintendent of and represented the Georgia Steel Company. Agency cannot be proved by the declarations of the agent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. § 40; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078*)—REVIEW—WAIVER OF ERROR IN APPELLATE COURT.

Error was assigned on the order of the court overruling the demurrer of the defendants to the petition of the plaintiff; but no reference to this point was made in the brief of counsel for the plaintiffs in error, and it will be considered as abandoned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4256-4261; Dec. Dig. § 1078.*]

6. CONTRACTS (§ 352*)—QUESTION FOR JURY—PARTIES—PRIVITY.

Regardless of whether there was a contract between White and the Georgia Steel Company, as claimed by the former, the evidence was not such as to require a finding that the Georgia Steel Company was liable to pay for the lumber delivered by White to the Southern Steel Company, there being no legal testimony showing what, if any, connection this company had with the other company, nor any testimony requiring a finding that the Georgia Steel Company originally authorized a delivery of the lumber to the other company, or ratified such delivery, and the accounts being made out against the Southern Steel Company by White, who testified that he supposed that it was the company which owed him the account. The court erred in directing a verdict against the Georgia Steel Company for the price of the lumber so delivered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 352.*]

7. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 45*)—SERVICES AND MATERIALS FURNISHED.

Where the owner of a mill saws lumber from timber of another under contract with the latter to be paid therefor a named sum per 1,000 feet, and he delivers the lumber to the owner of the land or his agent, and the latter uses it in the improvement of the owner's real estate, the owner of the mill does not occupy the position of a materialman furnishing material for the improvement of real estate, and cannot, as such, assert a lien for the amount contracted to be paid for the sawing of the lumber against such property in the improvement of which the lumber is used.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Dec. Dig. § 45.*]

8. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 132*)—PROCEEDINGS TO PERFECT—FILING CLAIM.

If the proprietor of a sawmill, under Civil Code 1910, § 3356, seeks to assert a lien under section 3354, after surrender of the lumber sawed, he must record his lien within 10 days, as required by the latter section.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 190-207; Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

9. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 281*)—ENFORCEMENT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Where facts exist under which the proprietor of a sawmill can have a materialman's lien on real estate for lumber sawed for the owner from timber belonging to the latter and furnished to improve his real estate, no such lien is shown to exist by merely proving that the former furnished the lumber to another, who used it in improving such real estate. Pittsburg Plate Glass Co. v. Peters Land Co., 123 Ga. 723, 51 S. E. 725; Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Shiver, 125 Ga. 218, 53 S. E. 610. If lumber thus sawn is furnished to a contractor, in a proceeding to foreclose a materialman's lien, a prima facie case is not made out by proving merely the value of the material furnished and that it was used in the improvement of the real estate, in view of the provisions of Civil Code 1910, § 3352, that "in no event shall the aggregate amount of liens set up hereby exceed the contract price of the improvements made." Stevens v. Georgia Land Co., 122 Ga. 317, 50 S. E. 100.

(a) The court erred in directing a verdict fixing a lien on the property of the Georgia Steel Company. The entire verdict and judgment in favor of the defendant in error is directed to be set aside.

JOHNSON v. SAMS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 17, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EASEMENTS (§ 61*)—OBSTRUCTIONS—REMOVAL.

The ordinary of McIntosh county has jurisdiction of a proceeding to remove obstructions from an alleged private way existing by prescription over the lands of another within the limits of the town of Darien. Civil Code 1910, § 825; Duggan v. Cox, 78 Ga. 158, 1 S. E. 428.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. §§ 134-137; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

2. EASEMENTS (§ 61*)—ACQUISITION OF RIGHT—PRESCRIPTION.

To sustain an application for the removal of obstructions from an alleged private way, the right to which is based upon prescription by seven years' user, it is essential that he show, not only that he has been in the uninterrupted use thereof for seven years or more, that it does not exceed 15 feet in width, and that it is the same 15 feet originally appropriated, but that he had kept it open and in repair during such period. Collier v. Farr, 81 Ga. 749, 7 S. E. 860, and cases cited; Nashville, etc., Ry. Co. v. Coats, 133 Ga. 820, 66 S. E. 1085.

(a) In the present case there was evidence that the defendant had kept the alleged private way open, and had permitted the applicant for the removal of the obstructions to use it, but there was no evidence tending to show that the applicant had kept it open and made repairs on it; and hence the evidence was insufficient to authorize the ordinary to pass an order requiring the removal of the obstructions. Accordingly the judge of the superior court erred in sustaining, on certiorari, the judgment of the ordinary ordering such removal.

ALDRIDGE v. COLE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 14, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 133*)—PROCEDURE—DORMANCY OF JUDGMENT—ISSUANCE OF EXECUTION.

On the trial of a claim case it appeared that the judgment, upon which the execution issued, was rendered against the defendants in a justice's court of Coffee county, May 4, 1896; the execution was issued on May 10, 1896; an entry of "backing" on the execution was made by a justice of the peace of Appling county July 30, 1896; a judgment was rendered January 20, 1906, establishing a copy of the lost original execution, by the justice of the peace in Coffee county who rendered the original judgment; and an entry on such established copy execution of a levy on land situated in Appling county was made by the sheriff of the last-named county July 11, 1906 (the levy reciting that the defendants were then in possession), to which land the claim was interposed. Held, that the court properly dismissed the levy on the ground of the dormancy of the judgment. Civ. Code 1910, § 4355.

(a) An entry of the execution as follows: "Entered on general execution docket, this October 25, 1900"—signed by the clerk of the superior court of Appling county, did not prevent the dormancy of the judgment, as Civil Code 1910, § 4356 provides that, "If execution issues from a court having no execution docket, said record [the record of the execution] shall be made upon the execution docket [not the general execution docket] of the superior court of the county where the defendant resides." Nowell v. Haire, 116 Ga. 386, 42 S. E. 719; Smith v. Bearden, 117 Ga. 822, 45 S. E. 59; Columbus Fertilizer Co. v. Hanks, 119 Ga. 950, 47 S. E. 222; Rountree v. Jones, 124 Ga. 395, 52 S. E. 325; Palmer v. Inman, 126 Ga. 519, 55 S. E. 229.

(b) A levy of the execution made by the sheriff of Appling county on June 2, 1896, prior to the "backing" of the execution by a justice of the peace of that county, entered July 30, 1896, was unauthorized. Formby v. Shackelford, 94 Ga. 670, 21 S. E. 711; Wilcher v. Pool, 121 Ga. 305, 48 S. E. 956. Therefore neither such levy, nor the pendency of claims filed to the property so levied on, by persons other than the claimants in the present case, prevented the dormancy of the judgment.

(c) Nor was the dormancy of the judgment prevented by a levy of the execution made by the sheriff of Appling county on July 31, 1906, and the pendency of a claim, filed to the property so levied upon, by one other than the claimants in the present case, as this levy was not made within seven years either from the issuance of the execution or the "backing" of the same by the justice of the peace of Appling county.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 413-417; Dec. Dig. § 133.*]

2. ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

It follows that the court did not err in rejecting the evidence tending to show the facts referred to in the subdivisions (a), (b), and (c) of the foregoing headnote.

ATHENS MUT. INS. CO. v. EVANS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 643*)—ACTION ON POLICY—PLEADING.

Evans brought suit on a policy of fire insurance, making, among others, substantially the following allegations in the original petition and the amendment thereto: The house insured was erected for him by a firm of contractors, with the understanding they were to have deed to the same to secure the amount due them for building it. This deed, which was made after the policy was issued, was void because the debt to secure which it was given was infected with usury. Pending the suit, Evans assigned the policy to the contractors, and the suit was amended so as to proceed in the name of Evans, for their use. The plaintiff prayed for a recovery of the amount of the policy, and in an amendment prayed for a reformation of it, so that its provisions would conform to an alleged agreement between Evans and the agent issuing the policy, made when the policy was issued, as to what its provisions should be. The insurer pleaded, among other things, that the policy was void because of the execution of the deed, by reason of certain stipulations in the policy. The jury rendered the following verdict, "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff, principal $500, interest $80.69, making a total of $580.69," upon which a judgment was rendered, providing that the plaintiff recover of the defendant the amounts named in the verdict and costs. Held, there was no error in overruling the demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 643.*]

2. USURY (§ 111*)—ACTIONS—DEFENSES.

The fact that pending the suit the policy was transferred to the contractors to secure the debt to secure which the deed was given, and that the suit proceeded by amendment in the name of Evans, for their use, did not prevent the plaintiff from showing the deed to be void for usury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Usury, Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

3. USURY (§ 117*)—TRANSACTIONS INVALID—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The testimony of a member of the firm of contractors above referred to was as follows: They agreed to build the house "for the actual costs of materials and labor, with no charge for our services. We delivered the house to Evans December 1, 1906, when he owed us $698.52 for cost of labor and material" less a credit of $50. $8.48 was added as interest from December 1 to December 31, 1906, when Evans gave his note for $655 and the deed to secure it. "We charged 1 per cent. for December 1st to December 31st. Evans and we agreed that $655 was the cost of building the house, and was the amount due us. We had no written contract. The verbal agreement was that he was to have us build him a house, and he be allowed to pay for it in monthly installments of $10. Closed this agreement by taking a note for the whole amount; made no new agreement. I told him he owed $655, and he agreed to pay it, and gave his note for it. These are the original figures on which the settlement was made December 31st. They show the settlement." There was introduced in evidence an itemized statement of an account for labor and material in favor of the contractors, showing amount due December 1, 1906 (after deducting a credit of $50, paid October 16, 1906), to be $648.52, and showing that there was added to this amount $6.48 as interest for one month, and that the amount due December 31, 1906, was $655. Held, that this testimony was sufficient to authorize the jury to find that the note to secure which the deed was given contained usury, and that the deed was void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Usury, Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 328*)—FORFEITURE OF CONTRACT—CHANGE OF OWNERSHIP—INVALIDITY OF DEED.

Where a policy of fire insurance provides that, "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void, * * * if any change, other than by death of an insured, take place in the interest, title, or possession of the subject of the insurance (except change of occupants without increase of hazard), whether by legal process or judgment or by voluntary act of the insured or otherwise," and after the issuance of the policy a deed is made by the insurer to his creditor to secure a debt, without the agreement referred to above being indorsed on or added to the policy, such deed does not vitiate

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

the policy, if the deed is void for usury. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Asbury, 102 Ga. 565, 27 S. E. 667.

MARSHALL et al. v. PIERCE et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia, July 12, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MORTGAGES (§ 188*)—RIGHTS OF PARTIES—ACTION FOR POSSESSION.

If the grantee in a security deed goes into possession of the land thereby conveyed under no other claim than such a deed, he is in possession simply for the purpose of applying the rents, issues, and profits to the satisfaction of his debt; and, when the net amount received by him from the proceeds of the land is equal to or greater than the amount of his debt, his right of possession ceases, and the grantor, or his legal representative, and, if none, his heirs, may bring an action to recover the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 471-475; Dec. Dig. § 188.*]

2. EJECTMENT (§ 127*)—RENTS AND PROFITS—RECOVERY.

In a suit to recover land and cancel the deeds of the defendant as clouds on the plaintiff's title, the plaintiff, if entitled to recover the land, may also recover the rents, issues, and profits while possession of the land was wrongfully withheld by the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. §§ 433-443; Dec. Dig. § 127.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 471*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—IMPRESSION OF WITNESS.

A witness will be allowed to testify to his "impression" if derived from recollection; but if it be merely his belief founded on hearsay, or his own deduction or inference from the facts, the testimony is incompetent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2149-2185; Dec. Dig. § 471.*]

4. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 242*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS—EVIDENCE.

In an action by the holder of an equity against a purchaser for value from the former's grantee upon proof of purchase and payment, and in the absence of circumstances sufficient to put the purchaser on notice of the plaintiff's equity, the burden is on the plaintiff to show actual or imputable notice of his equity to the purchaser at the time of his purchase. The mere fact that the purchaser took a quitclaim deed is insufficient of itself to negative the purchaser's good faith, so as to cast upon him the burden of establishing the fact that he bought without notice of the plaintiff's equity.

(a) In view of the indefiniteness of the evidence relating to the time and manner of acquiring possession by the grantee of an absolute deed, no ruling is made as to the applicability of section 3258 of the Civil Code (1910), inhibitive of parol proof (except in cases of fraud), to show an absolute deed to be a mortgage as between the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 603-605; Dec. Dig. § 242.*]

Error from Superior Court, Taylor County; S. P. Gilbert, Judge.

Action by E. C. Pierce and others against the executors of T. J. Marshall and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, the defendants bring error. Reversed.

Hardeman, Jones, Callaway & Johnston, and C. B. Marshall, for plaintiffs in error. Jerre M. Moore, W. E. Steed, and Jos. E. Pottle, for defendants in error.

EVANS, P. J. E. C. Pierce and his nine children brought suit against the executors of T. J. Marshall, Gorman & Huggins and the Middle Georgia Land & Lumber Company to recover a certain tract of land and to cancel certain deeds as a cloud upon their title. On demurrer it was held that the plaintiffs' petition set forth a cause of action. Pierce v. Middle Georgia Land & Lumber Co., 131 Ga. 99, 61 S. E. 1114. In substance, the plaintiffs, suing as heirs at law of Mrs. Pierce, alleged, as a basis of recovery, that Mrs. Pierce, being a married woman, conveyed the premises in dispute to T. J. Marshall; that the consideration of the conveyance was to secure the debt of the grantor's husband; that the debt was infected with usury, and had since been paid; that Marshall conveyed the land by quitclaim deed to Gorman and Huggins, who at the time of their alleged purchase had notice of the facts and circumstances under which Marshall acquired title. Upon the remand of the case for trial certain amendments were submitted, and demurrers filed to the petition as amended. Some of the demurrers were sustained and some were overruled, and the case proceeded to trial, resulting in a verdict for the plaintiffs. The court refused to set aside the verdict on motion, and the defendants excepted.

[1] 1. When the case was considered on demurrer, it was held that the allegations of the original petition respecting the payment of the debts alleged to have been the consideration of the deeds from Mrs. Pierce to Marshall were defective by reason of a failure to allege the time of payment or to give sufficient reasons for the pleader's inability to give the exact dates of payment. An amendment was allowed wherein it was alleged that one J. A. Steed, as the agent of T. J. Marshall, had collected the rents from the land during the years from 1890 to 1903, inclusive, and had paid the same to Marshall during these years as credits upon the debt, and that the rents so received were sufficient in amount to fully discharge the debt, but that petitioners were unable from lack of information to give the exact dates and amounts of the various payments; that J. A. Steed kept no record of his payments, and petitioners were unable to allege more accurately the time of Marshall's receiving the payments. Though these allegations may not measure up to the requirements of a technical plea of payment, yet they are sufficient as alleging, in connection with other parts of the petition, that the alleged creditor while in possession of the land, through his agent collected the rents for the specific years, which were sufficient to discharge the debt. "If the grantee in a security deed goes into possession of the land thereby conveyed under no other claim than such a deed, he is in possession simply for the purpose of applying the rents, issues, and profits to the satisfaction of his debt; and, when the net amount received by him from the proceeds of the land is equal to or greater than the amount of his debt, his right of possession ceases, and the grantor, or his legal representatives, and, if none, his heirs, may bring an action to recover the land." Gunter v. Smith, 113 Ga. 18, 38 S. E. 374.

[2] 2. An amendment to the petition was allowed wherein the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants had cut from the land 700,000 feet of lumber of the value of $3,500, had gathered and sold turpentine extracted from the trees of the value of $1,000, and had received $3,000 from the use of the water power and water privileges on the land; and judgment was prayed for these sums. These allegations were attacked by demurrer, because it was alleged that in the doing of the acts complained of the defendants were trespassers and the subject-matter of the recovery was damages, and an improper standard of measuring damages was averred. We do not deem it necessary to set out in extenso these allegations. Their tenor was to charge the defendants with having received certain issues and profits in the land, and the allegations were germane to the original cause of action, which was to recover the land and cancel the defendants' deeds as clouds on the plaintiffs' title. If the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the land, they are likewise entitled to recover the rents, issues, and profits.

[3] 3. The following evidence was allowed over the defendants' objection: "It [the deed] was given to secure money borrowed. I knew from the conversation that passed there that that deed was given to secure money; that was the object. It wasn't a sale. I wouldn't undertake to say now definitely that Mr. Marshall said this is a security deed, but I knew it was. I knew it from the conversation that passed. I don't recollect what the conversation was, but I knew very well it was a security deed. All I undertake to testify is that the impression left on my mind from what was said was that it was a security deed. I couldn't undertake to tell the jury anything that Mr. Marshall said, or Mrs. Pierce said, or Mr. Pierce said. I don't know as I can recollect anything that was said about it; but, when I was called in to witness it, I knew it was a security deed. The only way I know it was a security deed is by what I heard, and I can't tell you what I heard, because I don't recollect. * * * I couldn't recollect that Mr. Marshall said that it was a security deed. I don't recollect any conversation hardly that took place at all. I didn't read it." This testimony was offered in support of the allegation that the deed from Mrs. Pierce to Marshall was a deed to secure a debt, and its rejection was moved on the ground that it was but an expression of a conclusion of the witness. A witness who is unable to recollect the exact words of a conversation will be permitted to relate their substance. If in doing so he says that his impression is as he purposes to narrate, the testimony is not necessarily objectionable on the ground that the witness' impression is but an inference from the facts. The rule is that the "impression" of a witness, if derived from recollection, is competent. Franklin v. City of Macon, 12 Ga. 257; Moody v. Davis, 10 Ga. 403. But if it be merely his belief founded upon hearsay, or his own deduction or inference from the facts, it is incompetent. Peterson v. State, 47 Ga. 524. The witness in the present case is the clerk of the superior court, and in his official capacity was called upon to attest the deed from Mrs. Pierce to Mr. Marshall. There was a conversation between the parties in the presence of the witness as to the character of the transaction. The occurrence was many years ago, and the witness candidly confesses his inability to recall the words of the parties. But there is one thing he does remember about the transaction, and that is the deed which Mrs. Pierce executed to Mr. Marshall was given to secure a debt. We think the witness' statement that it was his impression that the transaction was of that character is more a cautious mode of expressing his recollection of what the parties themselves pronounced that transaction to be, rather than his own deduction as to its nature. In Franklin v. City of Macon, supra, a bill was filed to restrain the municipality from selling a certain lot of land in the city, which was alleged to have been perpetually set apart and dedicated to the use of the public when the lots in that part of the city were originally surveyed and sold. The plaintiff introduced a witness who stated that he had been several times a member of council, though he could not recall the exact years, that he knew of the lot in dispute, and that "the impression resting on his mind was that it was to remain a perpetual reservation, or such was, as he conceived, the implied understanding at the time of the lease of some of the surrounding grounds." In holding that the testimony was competent the court said: "Every witness must swear according to the impressions on his mind. They are the materials of his knowledge. It is usually only a more cautious mode of expressing their belief. They mean to state the substance of what they hear and recollect, and not the exact words. The impressions of Mr. Roland were made from the consultations of the council chamber, and we think were sufficiently certain and positive as to be admissible."

[4] 4. The court charged: "Where the defendants rely upon a quitclaim deed as title, the presumption of good faith applicable to a warranty title does not arise, but the presumption is that they knew they were getting only what they actually got; and it is, under such circumstances, incumbent upon the defendants to show by proof that they bought in good faith, believing that they were getting a good title." Did this charge correctly present the rule respecting the burden of proof in a suit by the holders of a prior equity to recover land from a purchaser from their grantee? In such cases the burden is on the purchaser to show that he is a purchaser for value; and when this is made to appear, and no circumstances are developed tending to put him on notice of the plaintiffs' equity, the burden is shifted to the plaintiffs to bring home notice of their equity to the purchaser. Williams v. Smith, 128 Ga. 306, 57 S. E. 801. In the instant case the plaintiffs made no charge in their petition that the expressed consideration of the quitclaim deed from Marshall to Gorman and Huggins was an undervaluation of the land. Mr. Gorman testified that he paid $600 for the land, which was more than its full value, and that he was influenced to pay this amount because of consequential benefits which would accrue to his other property from the ownership of this land. One of the plaintiffs testified that the timber on the land at the time of Gorman and Huggins' purchase was worth between $800 and $1,000, but he gave no estimate of the value of the land. The essential point was whether Gorman and Huggins were purchasers without notice. The court in his instruction made that largely turn upon the effect of taking a quitclaim deed. While the jury were instructed that the taking of a quitclaim title did not necessarily negative good faith, they were also instructed that it put the burden upon the defendants to sustain their contention that they purchased in good faith without notice of the plaintiffs' equity. We think this was stating the rule too strongly against the defendants. It has been held that the receipt of a quitclaim deed does not of itself prevent the party from becoming a bona fide purchaser. Moelle v. Sherwood, 148 U. S. 21, 13 Sup. Ct. 426, 37 L. Ed. 350. And that a quitclaim does not of itself negative the presumption of good faith in one who holds under it. Hammond v. Crosby, 68 Ga. 767. An instruction to the effect that the taking of a quitclaim deed put the burden upon the defendant to prove that he is ignorant of the plaintiff's equity reverses the rule. The Code declares that a bona fide purchaser for value and without notice of an equity will not be interfered with by a court of equity. Civil Code (1910) § 4531. The plaintiffs are in a court of equity, asserting that though the apparent legal title is in Gorman and Huggins, yet at the time they acquired such title they had notice of their equity. The mere fact of taking a quitclaim title was not sufficient to change the rule respecting the burden of proof, and the court's contrary instruction was harmful error to the plaintiff.

The deed from Mrs. Pierce to Mr. Marshall was absolute in form. The evidence does not show with clearness how Mr. Marshall got possession of the land or the time when he entered into possession. Hence, we do not feel called upon in the present state of the record to decide the applicability of Civil Code (1910) § 3258, providing that a deed absolute on its face and accompanied by possession shall not be proved at the instance of the parties by parol evidence to be a mortgage only, unless fraud in its procurement is the issue to be tried.

MOORE v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 12, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 922*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESS.

Upon the trial of one charged with murder, the court charged the jury, regarding the testimony of a witness who testified for the state, as follows: "If you believe, previously to this trial, Strickland did go before the grand jury of this county, made sworn statements before them as to matters relevant to this issue, contradicting himself as to such matters even before that body, first swearing before them he knew nothing at all about this transaction, afterwards telling them that he did, then comes before you and swears to matters relevant to the issue in this case, in contradiction of some parts, or all, of the relevant matters he swore to before that body concerning this transaction, and you believe that whatever he said before that body was voluntarily, knowingly, and willfully said by him, then you should disregard his testimony in your investigation of this case. On the other hand, if you believe, although he may have sworn differently before that body to what he has in the trial of this case as to such relevant matters, contradicted himself in that way, he was influenced to make such statements before that body through fear either that his life might be taken or bodily harm might come to him, and that was the cause of his statements or testimony before that body, then I charge you, gentlemen, if you find his testimony, as delivered in this case, is corroborated by other competent and credible evidence, or is corroborated by the proven circumstances, in this case, you would still consider it in arriving at your verdict in this case." Held, that this charge was not error requiring a new trial for any reason assigned by movant, in view of the entire charge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2210-2218; Dec. Dig. § 922.*]

2. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—AMENDMENT—GROUNDS.

There is no merit in the ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial that the court "failed to leave to the jury the question of veracity of the witness Strickland [the witness referred to in the preceding note], under proper, full, legal charge on that subject."

ALLEN v. CLARE et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 12, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

EXECUTION (§§ 194, 196*)—CLAIM BY THIRD PERSON—BURDEN OF PROOF—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—DIRECTION OF VERDICT.

Where a claim was interposed to property levied on under an execution issued upon a judgment for costs rendered against the plaintiffs upon the dismissal of their petition, it was, in order to change the burden of proof from the plaintiffs in fi. fa. to the claimant, incumbent upon the former to show title in the defendant, or that subsequently to the rendition of the judgment he was in possession of the property. Thompson v. American Mortgage Co., 107 Ga. 832, 33 S. E. 659.

(a) Accordingly, where upon the trial of a claim interposed by C. C. Allen to land levied upon under such an execution as the property of Lewis J. Allen, one of the defendants, the plaintiffs introduced in evidence a certified copy of a deed executed by him subsequently to the rendition of the judgment conveying the land to the claimant, such copies being admitted because of the failure of the claimant to produce the originals upon notice and order of the court to do so, it was error for the court to direct a verdict finding the land subject; it not appearing that the defendant had ever at any time been in possession of the same. McConnell v. Rhodes, 14 Ga. 313; Wimberly v. Collier, 50 Ga. 144; Knowles v. Jourdan, 61 Ga. 300.

(b) The ruling of the court cannot be sustained by reason of the fact that, when the copy of the deed from the defendant to the claimant was offered in evidence by counsel for the plaintiffs in fi. fa., the judge inquired of him "if that was the deed under which the claimant claims," and the plaintiffs' counsel replied, "Yes, sir; that bears date of September 21, 1908, subsequent to the date of the fi. fa."

PHINIZY et al. v. WALLACE et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 23, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. WILLS (§ 801*)—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATE CONVEYED.

A testator, after providing for the payment of his debts, made certain special bequests. He then made the following provision as to the residue: "Now, all the rest and residue of my estate, including the principal of the legacy left to Miss Mary Richardson for her life, I give and bequeath and devise to the following nieces: Annie Martin Phinizy, daughter of Leonard Phinizy of Augusta; Eliza Pickens Phinizy, daughter of Stewart Phinizy of Augusta; Susan Welborn Calhoun, daughter of Dr. A. W. Calhoun of Atlanta; and Annie Barrett Phinizy, daughter of Billups Phinizy of Athens, share and share alike and I appoint Leonard Phinizy the trustee of his daughter Annie Martin Phinizy; Stewart Phinizy the trustee of his daughter Eliza Pickens Phinizy; Dr. A. W. Calhoun the trustee of his daughter Susan Welborn Calhoun; and Billups Phinizy the trustee of his daughter Annie Barrett Phinizy. Should any of these named trustees refuse to act, he is empowered to name his successor from among the other trustees. Should all refuse to serve, then I appoint my brother, Jacob Phinizy, as the sole representative of the trust, he to serve without being responsible to any of the beneficiaries for his management of the trust. Should any of the legatees or beneficiaries be deceased at the time of the decease of this testator, then her share is to go to her father, if he is living, or, if he is dead, to go to his children in the same manner as provided for in his will, or, if he died without will, in the manner the law directs. I direct the trustee of each beneficiary to invest the amount said beneficiary receives under the provisions of this will for the sole benefit of the beneficiary, the interest said amount brings annually to be added to the principal; this plan to be followed until said beneficiary attains the age of nineteen (19) years, when said trustee shall turn over to the beneficiary the entire income from said trust, she to do with the same as she thinks proper and best. When each beneficiary attains the age of nineteen (19) years, said trustee shall settle the full principal upon her and her children, male and female. Should any of the beneficiaries die before reaching the age of nineteen (19) years, then her share together with the accumulated interest shall go as provided for in the case of a beneficiary being deceased at the death of this testator. If, after the marriage of any of the beneficiaries, a child is born and survives its mother, and then also dies leaving no issue, the share it obtained from its mother shall revert to the living brothers and sisters of the mother, or, in case of the death of the mothers, brothers and sisters, to their natural heirs. Should any of the beneficiaries after marriage die without issue, then her share to go in the manner provided for a beneficiary dying before attaining the age of nineteen (19) years." At the time of the testator's death the four nieces named were young girls. All of them lived to be of age. One of them married and had a child born to her. They filed an equitable petition, alleging that they took in fee simple the property covered by the residuary clause, and seeking to have a partition by sale and division of the proceeds. Held that, under the common law as modified by the statutes of this state, the four nieces of the testator, under the item of the will above quoted, did not take a fee-simple estate, but each took a beneficial interest covering the entire fee in one share, subject to be reduced to a life estate with remainder over to her children, if she should marry and have a child or children, and subject to certain other limitations over, by way of executory devises, upon the happening of other contingencies specified.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1340-1350, 1608; Dec. Dig. § 601.*]

2. PERPETUITIES (§ 4*)—FUTURE ESTATES.

Relatively to the rule against perpetuities, as it is declared in the Civil Code of 1910, § 3678, the limitation over, after the death of each niece, in favor of her child or children, was valid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perpetuities, Cent. Dig. §§ 4-44; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

3. PERPETUITIES (§ 4*)—FUTURE ESTATES.

The limitation over in favor of the brothers and sisters of each niece, should she have a child and it should survive her and then die without issue, is invalid, because the condition may not happen, if at all, within the time limited by the rule.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perpetuities, Cent. Dig. §§ 4-44; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

4. PERPETUITIES (§ 4*)—FUTURE ESTATES.

The limitation over in favor of the father of a niece, if she should marry and die without issue (treating "issue" as meaning issue at the time of her death, in accordance with the statute of this state), is valid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perpetuities, Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

5. PERPETUITIES (§ 4*)—FUTURE ESTATES.

The limitation over in favor of brothers and sisters of a niece, in the event the niece should survive her father, is valid, as the persons who should take would be determined at the time of the death of the niece.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perpetuities, Cent. Dig. §§ 4-44; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

6. WILLS (§ 684*)—TRUSTS—DISTRIBUTION OF ESTATE.

It was error for the presiding judge to decree that the four nieces of the testator took a fee-simple estate, and that the property should be sold by commissioners, and the proceeds be divided among them. He should have required a reinvestment of each share in accordance with the valid provisions of the fifth item of the will of the testator.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. § 684.*]

Error from Superior Court, Clarke County; C. H. Brand, Judge.

Action by A. P. Wallace and others against Billups Phinzy and others. From a decree for plaintiffs, defendants bring error. Reversed.

Harry H. Phinzy died testate on May 1, 1890. The first four items of his will, after providing for the payment of debts, made certain specific legacies. The fifth item was as set out in the first headnote. The four nieces of the testator survived him and became of age. Two of them married, and one of them had a child born to her. The fathers, who were named as trustees, were in life. There were also brothers and sisters of the nieces. The four nieces filed an equitable petition, claiming that they were joint tenants with fee-simple interests, and praying for a sale of the property and a distribution of the proceeds among them. The fathers of the plaintiffs were made defendants, individually and as trustees. By interventions various persons were made parties, alleging that they were the brothers and sisters of the plaintiffs, and the only child of one of them. The minors appeared by guardians ad litem. The case was submitted to the presiding judge without a jury. He held that the nieces were owners of the property in fee simple, and directed a sale and division of the proceeds among them. The other parties excepted.

Leonard Phinzy, Max Michael, Carlisle Cobb, King & Spalding, and E. Marvin Underwood, for plaintiffs in error. Cobb & Erwin and J. L. Hopkins & Sons, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). We have rarely seen so many perplexing provisions crowded into a single item of a will. We have found no will sufficiently like it to derive much aid from authorities in its construction. After certain special bequests had been made in other items, the fifth item dealt with the residue of the testator's property. Its provisions, in the order in which they occur, may be thus summarized: (1) A devise and bequest to four named nieces of the testator, daughters of his three brothers and a sister, share and share alike. (2) The appointment of the father of each niece as her trustee. (3) A provision in case any or all of the trustees should refuse to act. (4) If any niece should die before the testator, her share should go to her father, if living; or, if he should be dead, "to go to his children in the same manner as provided for in his will, or, if he died without will, in the manner the law directs." (5) A direction to the trustee of each beneficiary to invest the amount the "beneficiary receives" under the provisions of the will "for the sole benefit of the beneficiary"; that the interest should be added to the principal annually, and this plan should be followed until the beneficiary should reach the age of 19 years, when the trustee should turn over to her the entire income from the trust. (6) "When each beneficiary attains the age of nineteen (19) years, said trustee shall settle the full principal upon her and her children, male and female." (7) If any beneficiary should die before reaching the age of 19 years, then her share, together with the accumulated interest, should go as provided in case of her death before the testator. (8) "If after the marriage of any of these beneficiaries, a child is born and survives its mother, and then also dies leaving no issue, then the share it obtained from its mother shall revert to the living brothers and sisters of the mother, or in case of the death of the mothers, brothers and sisters, to their natural heirs." (9) "Should any of the beneficiaries after marriage die without issue, then her share is to go in the manner provided for a beneficiary dying before attaining the age of nineteen (19) years," which was the same as the provision if she should die before the testator. The presiding judge held that the nieces took a fee-simple estate.

It does not appear on what grounds he based his decision. Most probably it rested on one or more of the following grounds: (1) That all words of survivorship and limitation over in the will were to be referred to the time of the testator's death or the time when each niece became 19 years of age, and that as all of the nieces survived the testator and became 19 years of age without being married, these provisions were at an end and a fee-simple estate vested in the nieces. (2) That the testator attempted to create an estate tail in each of his nieces, and, under our Code, a fee-simple estate resulted. (3) That the children of the nieces being thus eliminated, the other limitations over were violative of the rule against perpetuities, and could be disregarded.

[1] 1. The first ground suggested which was urged by counsel for defendants in error would furnish an easy solution, if we could adopt it. But we are unable to do so. It is undoubtedly the rule declared by our Code, that, "in construing wills, words of survivorship shall refer to the death of the testator in order to vest remainders, unless a manifest intention to the contrary appears." Civil Code 1910, § 3680. The trouble in this case is that we think a manifest intent to the contrary appears. The testator expressly provided for the devolution of the estate, if a niece should die before he did. If the other provisions as to the death of a niece, with or without issue, should be held to provide for such death before that of the testator, they would be mere surplusage. Nor can it be declared that the testator limited all such provisions to the occurrence of the death of a niece before reaching the age of 19. In one instance, he distinctly provided for that contingency. In another he provided for a case where a niece should die leaving a child, and that child should also die "leaving no issue." He could hardly have contemplated that such possibilities would all be solved before the niece reached 19 years of age.

Did the testator intend to create an estate tail in each of his nieces, so that, under our Code, a fee-simple estate in them resulted? Civil Code 1910, § 3661. Whom did the testator have in mind as objects of his bounty, as indicated by mentioning them in this item of the will? First, his four nieces; second, the children of his four nieces; third, the fathers of his four nieces; and, fourth, the brothers and sisters of such nieces. It is evident that he contemplated the children of nieces as persons who might take some character of interest. Shall it be held that the interest which he thus sought to confer was an entailment, and therefore illegal, under the law of this state?

If the clause which provided that when each beneficiary should attain the age of 19 years the trustee should settle the full principal "upon her and her children, male and female," stood alone, and were treated as a gift to the niece and her children, she having no children either at the time when the testator died, or upon the arrival at the age of 19 years, under the common law an estate tail would doubtless have been created. This would have been enlarged by our statute into a fee-simple estate. Wiley, Parish & Co. v. Smith, 3 Ga. 551. But this clause does not stand alone. If it created a fee-simple estate in the nieces, it was nevertheless followed by limitations over upon certain contingencies. If those contingencies were such as would, at common law, have created an estate tail by implication, then by section 3661 of the Code of 1910 it is declared that "Limitations which, by the English rules of construction, would create an estate tail by implication in this state shall give a life estate to the first taker, with remainder over in fee to his children and their descendants, as above provided; and if none are living at the time of his death, remainder over in fee to the beneficiaries intended by the maker of the instrument." If the will does not exhibit an intention to create a life estate, with remainder over, and the limitations over are not such as would have created an estate tail by implication at common law, nevertheless a base fee would result from later provisions, unless they can be rejected as invalid. The various clauses of this item should be construed together. If there should be an unavoidable inconsistency between a prior and a later clause, the last expression of the testator's will would control.

While there were some expressions in the opinion in Burton v. Black, 30 Ga. 638, which went beyond the necessities of the case decided, it is now the well-settled rule of construction in this court that, unless there be something to indicate a contrary intent on the part of the testator, a devise or bequest to a named person, followed by a provision that if he should die childless the property shall pass to some other person, conveys to him a fee, subject to be divested upon his dying childless, and does not of itself confer upon any child which he may have any interest or estate in remainder. Hill v. Terrell, 123 Ga. 49, 51 S. E. 81. The testator, however, may indicate a contrary intent; and if there are words in the will, in addition to the mere devise to one with limitation over upon condition of dying without children or issue surviving him, showing a different intention, such intention will be given effect. We must look to the will to see whether there are such words. The devise or bequest is not directly to each niece and her children upon the death of the testator or upon her arrival at nineteen years of age. The testator directed that the trustee of each niece, upon her reaching that age, should settle "the full principal upon her and her children, male and female." This expression indicated that the testator had in mind her children as objects of his bounty. He could hardly have anticipated that all four of his nieces (then little girls) would have children, male and female, before reaching the age of 19. The settlement which he intended must have been an entailment, or a settlement upon her, with remainder or devise over to her children, should she marry and have a child or children (not mentioning for the present the other limitations). A settlement of the latter character would not, under the circumstances, appear to do violence to the testator's intent. In 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 628, it is said: "In conveyancing, settlement is the limitation of real or personal property or the enjoyment thereof to several persons in succession, prescribing the mode of holding, enjoying, and disposing of it." In Micklethwait v. Micklethwait, 4 C. B. (N. S.) 858, it is said that "the meaning of a 'settled' estate, whether in legal or popular language, as contradistinguished from an estate in fee simple, is understood to be one in which the powers of alienation, of devising, and of transmission, according to the ordinary rules of descent, are restrained by the limitations of the settlement; it would be a perversion of language to apply the term 'settled' to an estate taken out of settlement, and brought back to the condition of a fee simple." See, also, Bouv. Law Dict. "Settlement, Deed of."

Estates tail are prohibited and abolished in this state. Gifts or grants to one and his children, he having no children when the estate vests, convey an absolute fee. But "estates tail being illegal, the law will never presume or imply such an estate." Civil Code 1910, § 3661. Again, in declaring a limitation over if a niece should marry and die leaving a child surviving, and such child should then also die, leaving no issue, it was by the will directed that "the share it obtained from its mother shall revert," etc. Thus we have on the part of the testator a direction that the trustee shall settle the property upon the niece and her children, and a reference to a share which a child of a niece will obtain from its mother. While it must be conceded that the will is not free from doubt, in view of the rules of construction laid down by our Code (which modify the common law and make a material change in the rule in Shelley's Case), it should be held that the intention of the testator was to direct a settlement which he could lawfully make, rather than to create a fee tail, which he could not lawfully do. A fee may be limited upon a fee in this state. Civil Code 1910, § 3658. The care with which the testator made provisions to cover various possibilities renders highly improbable the idea that he intended an incomplete scheme of disposition and the creation of an intestacy as to the share devised and bequeathed to any one of his nieces, should she survive him and live to be more than 19 years of age, but die without marrying, no express provision being made for such a case. It is much more probable that he intended to give to each niece one share in fee, but subject to be reduced or divested on certain contingencies. In the light of the entire fifth item of the will, we think the proper construction to be put upon it is that each of his four nieces took a beneficial interest amounting to the entire fee in one share, but subject to be reduced to a life estate, with remainder over to the child or children of such niece, if she should marry and have such child or children; and with limitations over to others, by way of executory devises upon the contingencies set forth.

In Holt v. Bowman, 33 Ga. Supp. 129, a testator by one item of his will devised and bequeathed to his daughter certain negroes and a half interest in certain land, and then proceeded: "All of which said property herein given I will and direct to be vested and given in proper and legal manner to my said daughter, and to her children, free from the debts or disposition of her present or any future husband." By another item the testator directed that certain other property should be given to his daughters, of which the legatee under the previous item was one, and then added: "The shares coming to my several daughters and their children to be secured to them in legal manner and form, as heretofore directed and specified in this will." The daughter then had three children. It was held that the daughter named took an estate for life in the property bequeathed to her, with remainder to her children born or to be born. In the opinion it was said: "What does the testator mean when he wills and directs the property to be given in proper and legal form to his daughter Julia, and to her children, free from the debts or disposition of her present and any future husband? And then again, the shares coming to my daughters and their children to be secured to them in legal manner and form as heretofore directed and specified in this will? He means what the words plainly indicate—not that the daughter and children should take as joint tenants; such a disposition requires no such terms. He intended a 'settlement,' which word of itself imports the settlement of the property upon the mother for life, remainder to her children, born or to be born."

[2-5] 2-5. Having determined what was the character of the estates created, the next question which presents itself is whether any of the limitations over are invalid as violating the rule against perpetuities. "Limitations of estates may extend through any number of lives in being at the time when the limitations commence, and 21 years, and the usual period of gestation, added thereafter. A limitation beyond that period the law terms a perpetuity, and forbids its creation. When an attempt is made to create a perpetuity, the law gives effect to the limitations not too remote, declaring the others void, and thereby vests the fee in the last taker under the legal limitations." Civil Code 1910, § 3678. In Gray's Rule against Perpetuities, § 201, it is said that "No interest subject to a condition precedent is good, unless the condition must be fulfilled, if at all, within twenty-one years after some life in being at the creation of the interest."

Let us apply this test, as modified by our Code, to the limitations over provided by the item of the will under consideration. The provisions in case of the death of a niece before that of the testator, or before arriving at the age of 19, may be omitted from consideration, except in so far as they are embodied by reference in other provisions, because none of the nieces died before the testator or before reaching nineteen years of age. The limitations over after the death of each niece were as follows: (1) In favor of her child or children. (2) In favor of her brothers and sisters, if after being married and having a child born such child should survive her but die without issue. (3) In favor of the father of the niece, if she should marry and die without issue, if the father should be living. (4) In favor of the children of the father if she should marry and die without issue, and the father should be dead when the niece dies. As to this contingency it was declared that the shares should go to the children of the niece's father in the same manner as provided for in his will, or if he should die without a will, in the manner the law directs.

Relatively to the rule against perpetuities, the limitation over to children of nieces is of course good. The limitations over in favor of the brothers and sisters, should a niece have a child and it should survive her and die without issue, is bad. This deals with a child not in being when the will took effect by the death of the testator, and which might never be born, or if born, might not die within 21 years. So that the limitation over to the brothers and sisters might not be determinable within the time limited by the rule. The limitation over in favor of the father of a niece, if she should marry and die without issue (treating issue used in this connection as meaning issue at the time of her death, as provided in Civil Code 1910, § 3662), is valid. The limitation in favor of children of the father, in the event the niece should survive her father, and die without issue, is valid, because the person to take would be determined upon the death of the niece. The power in the niece's father by will to discriminate among such children, if he should die before she did, was one which essentially had to be exercised before his own death, and hence before the death of the niece. If he did not exercise it, the law would determine the distribution.

[§] 6. There is no exception to that part of the decree directing a sale to be made, but the plaintiffs in error contend that the proceeds should be reinvested upon the terms and limitations contained in the fifth item of the will. This collaterally involves the power to make a sale and reinvestment. In regard to the ability to render a valid decree of sale binding upon parties who may not now be in existence, there is some difficulty of determination. But the general trend of modern authority is not favorable to tying up property and preventing sales, especially where necessary for the protection and preservation of the corpus, if they can be legitimately made. Here it appears to be conceded that on account of the character of the property, the expensiveness of keeping in repair a brick building on a portion of it, the necessity for further heavy expenses in the near future, and its indivisible character, it is for the advantage of all parties that it should be sold. The fifth item of the will, in the first part thereof, stated that the testator gave, bequeathed, and devised the residue of his property to his four nieces, naming them, and appointed the father of each niece as her trustee. Later it directed each trustee, as the niece should become of age, to settle the full principal upon her and her children. This power included something more than merely acting as trustee for the niece for life. A settlement generally involves a conveyance of the property. So that the testator evidently contemplated that the trustees should have an added authority beyond that of simply acting as trustees of life tenants. The testator evidently intended a division of the property so that each share should be held in severalty, and that the settlement directed should be made as to each share separately by the respective trustees. It was not his intention that the four nieces or the trustees should be bound together permanently as tenants in common. The estate was not divided, nor was the settlement made when the nieces arrived at the age of nineteen, as directed by the testator. The executors made a deed to the four trustees, and the shares have remained in common. In order to carry out the direction of the testator, it is necessary to have a division. Owing to the character of the property, partition cannot be made in kind. A sale is necessary. To hold that no sale can be made would, in effect be to prevent the testamentary scheme from being fully carried into effect. Under the facts, equity has jurisdiction, and may give a complete remedy. It was alleged that there were before the court, as plaintiffs or defendants, or by intervention, the nieces, their fathers individually and as trustees, the only child of one of the nieces who had married, and the brothers and sisters of the nieces. Under the terms of the will and with all these parties in interest before the court, we think that a valid decree of sale can be made, although it may be possible for other children, or brothers and sisters of nieces, to be born. We deem it unnecessary to enter into a discussion as to when unborn persons may be bound by a decree for the sale of property generally. It is sufficient to deal with the present case on its facts. Those who may desire to pursue the general subject will find interesting discussions of it in the following cases: Kent v. Church of St. Michael, 136 N. Y. 10, 32 N. E. 704, 18 L. R. A. 331, 32 Am. St. Rep. 693; Hale v. Hale, 146 Ill. 227, 33 N. E. 858, 20 L. R. A. 247; Gavin v. Curtin, 171 Ill. 640, 49 N. E. 523, 40 L. R. A. 776; Bofl v. Fisher, 3 Rich. Eq. (S. C.) 1, 55 Am. Dec. 627; Faulkner v. Davis, 18 Grat. (Va.) 551, 98 Am. Dec. 698; Richards v. East Tenn., Va. & Ga. Ry. Co., 106 Ga. 614, 33 S. E. 193, 45 L. R. A. 712; Brown v. Brown, 97 Ga. 531, 25 S. E. 353, 33 L. R. A. 816.

From the above discussion it will be seen that in our opinion the presiding judge erred in decreeing that, upon a sale by the commissioners appointed by him, the proceeds (after paying costs and expenses) should be divided among the nieces, who should take as owners in fee simple. He should have required a reinvestment of each share of the proceeds in accordance with the valid provisions of the will of the testator as above set forth.

HALL et al. v. EDWARDS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

The suit was to recover a tract of land which the plaintiff alleged had been conveyed to her by the mother of the defendants. The defendants admitted the conveyance from their mother to the plaintiff, but pleaded that their mother was non compos mentis at the time of making it, and that the plaintiff, in recognition of the mental incapacity of their mother to make a deed, had reconveyed the land to her, and further pleaded that one of the defendants took possession of the land upon the death of his mother as her administrator, and that the other defendant was in possession as tenant of the administrator. Without objection the administrator testified that his mother had made a parol gift to him of 50 acres of land, part of which was included in the premises in dispute, and that he had cultivated some of it for 80 years; but he gave no definition of the boundaries of the land claimed to be included in the alleged gift or of that part included in the premises in dispute. Held, that inasmuch as the evidence was wholly insufficient to establish a parol gift, and the alleged donee claimed the land in his pleadings as administrator of the alleged donor, it was not erroneous for the court to omit an instruction presenting the law relative to a parol gift of land by a parent to a child. Cordele Sash, Door & Lumber Co. v. Wilson, 129 Ga. 290, 58 S. E. 860.

WHEELER et al. v. HORNE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 22, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 314*) —ACTION—RIGHT OF ACTION—ACCOUNTING.

Florence Horne filed a petition against the administrators of Charles Wheeler, deceased, making, among others, substantially the following allegations: Wheeler died intestate, owning an estate of a named value, an inventory and appraisal of which was attached and made a part of the petition. The defendants became administrators of the estate more than a year ago, and took possession of the estate and converted it into cash, but have never made any returns, and the plaintiff is unable to state the exact amount of cash of the estate which the defendants have or should have. Plaintiff is the sole heir of the deceased and entitled to his entire estate. Plaintiff was the only issue of the marriage of her father and mother. Her father and mother were married in 1861. Her mother died in 1882. Her father obtained in 1860 a decree of divorce from her mother, but the same was void (for specified reasons). After this decree was granted, there were born to her father, as a result of two later marriages contracted while the mother of plaintiff was in life, certain children, who are not his lawful heirs, because the decree for divorce was void. If the plaintiff is not the sole heir of her father, she is one of his heirs, and entitled to a share of his estate. Defendants deny that the plaintiff is entitled to a share in the estate. The plaintiff prayed that she "be declared by the decree of this court to be the child and heir at law of said Charles Wheeler, deceased," and for an accounting. The defendants filed an answer, wherein, among other things, it was alleged that the plaintiff was not the legitimate child of Charles Wheeler, and not entitled to any interest in his estate; that the estate had been partially converted into cash and distributed but that the timber on about 200 acres of land and all the notes and accounts due the estate had not been converted into cash. Upon the trial the following verdict was rendered: "We, the jury, find that plaintiff, Mrs. Florence Horne, is a child of Charles Wheeler, and entitled to an equal share of the Charles Wheeler estate." Held, that an heir at law may bring an action in the superior court for her distributive share of an estate against the administrator thereof, and pray for an accounting and settlement, at any time after the expiration of one year from the time of his qualification. If there are debts due by the estate, the administrator can plead and prove them, and thus protect himself and creditors of the estate. Williams v. Lancaster, 113 Ga. 1020, 39 S. E. 471.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. § 314.*]

2. PARTIES (§ 53*)—BRINGING IN NEW PARTIES—PROCEDURE.

Plaintiff filed a written motion, stating that in the suit she was setting up an adverse claim against a named person (the reputed widow of Charles Wheeler) and other named persons (reputed children of Charles Wheeler), who claimed an interest and share in his estate, and prayed that they be made parties defendant to the case. On September 17, 1908, the court passed an order requiring that the persons referred to show cause on September 25, 1908, "why they should not be made parties defendant to the case stated at the head of the foregoing petition, and that said parties be each served by the sheriff of their respective counties with copies of the foregoing petition and this order." On September 21, 1909, the court passed an order reciting that the persons above referred to had been duly served "with rules returnable before me on September 25, 1908, calling on them to show cause why they should not be made parties defendant in the above-stated case, and no cause having been shown by them, or any of them, why they should not be made parties defendant to said case, it is ordered that all of the above-named parties are hereby made parties defendant to the said case." Held, that there is no merit in the contention of the administrators that the reputed widow and reputed children of the deceased were not properly made parties defendant in the case, on the ground that they were not served with a copy of the proceedings therein.

(a) In order to make new parties defendant to a pending proceeding, it is not necessary to serve them with a copy of the proceedings in the case prior to the time they are made parties; it only being necessary to serve them with a copy of the order of the court requiring them to show cause why they should not be made parties. Berryman v. Haden, 112 Ga. 752, 38 S. E. 53.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parties, Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 248*)—ON TRIAL OF ISSUES—CONFORMITY TO PLEADING AND VERDICT.

A decree was rendered, providing, among other things, that the plaintiff was declared to be a child of the intestate and entitled to an equal share with the other heirs of his estate, that the case be kept open for the purpose of determining the number of heirs and the amount to which the plaintiff was entitled, and to give the administrators time to reduce the remaining assets of the estate to cash, that the administrators advance to the plaintiff an amount equal to advances made by them to the other children of the intestate and charge the same to her distributive share, that they proceed at once to reduce the outstanding estate to cash and account to and pay over to the plaintiff a child's part of the estate, that they file to the next term of the court a report showing the true condition of the estate, and that the case be kept open for a full and proper accounting by the administrators to the plaintiff as to her share in the estate. Held, that the granting of this decree was not error "because the same is not warranted by the pleading or the verdict in said case, and leaves said case still open for further trial after a full and final trial on all the issues involved in the pleadings in said case."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Dec. Dig. § 248.*]

4. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 314*)—ACTION—PLEADING—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

No error requiring a new trial appears in overruling the demurrers, or in any of the rulings on the admission or rejection of evidence, or in the charges of the court of which complaint is made. The evidence was amply sufficient to support the verdict, and the court committed no error in refusing a new trial.

ATLANTA HOME INS. CO. v. SMITH et al. (Supreme Court of Georgia. June 19, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

INSURANCE (§ 378*)—ESTOPPEL TO AVOID POLICY—KNOWLEDGE OF AGENT.

The defendants in error applied to one who was the agent of an insurance company for a policy of fire insurance on their plant, fixtures, etc., stating to the agent that the insured premises were located on leased ground, owned by a third person. The agent applied to stated that he would be glad "to write the insurance," and, after examining the property, stated that "any policy he issued would be all right." This agent, after "consulting" the agent of the company issuing the policy, "made out slips for this particular policy." The latter agent countersigned and issued the policy and delivered it to the first-named agent, who in turn delivered it to the assured and received from them payment of the premium, commissions on which were divided between the two agents. The agent dealing directly with the assured did not communicate to the agent issuing the policy the information given by the assured with respect to the title of the land on which the insured property was located. The member of the firm, who in behalf of the firm made the application for insurance, paid the premium, and received the policy, testified he did not know until the fire occurred that the latter agent was the agent of the company issuing the policy, or had any connection with the issuance of the policy. The policy, when delivered, had on it a "paster," on which was printed the name and address of the agent to whom the assured made application, and the words, "Insurance, Fire," etc., though such paster was not on the policy when it was delivered to such agent. The commission allowed agents on the policy was divided between the agents countersigning it and the agent of the other company, to whom it was delivered, who delivered it to the assured. It was usual between the agents representing the defendant and the other agent to do so. This practice was confined to the two agents doing business in Savannah, they not being members of the local board, which prohibited its members from dividing commissions on policies thus issued. No agent of the company issuing the policy inspected the property. The agent of this company, after the fire, offered to return to the assured the premium paid by the latter, and it was refused. After loss, the assured brought suit on the policy, which the insurer defended on the ground that there had been a breach of the stipulation of the policy that "this entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void, * * * if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership, or if the subject of insurance be a building on ground not owned by the insured in fee simple." Held that, under the facts stated, the agent who received the application and delivered the policy was an agent of the insurer, and the knowledge of such agent, at the time of the issuance of the policy, of the status of the title to the ground on which the insured building was located, was imputable to the insurer, and estopped it from claiming a forfeiture of the policy on account of a breach of its conditions respecting the ownership of the assured above quoted. 3 Cooley's Briefs on Ins. 2529-2530, 2491; Springfield Fire, etc., Ins. Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the Gate City Terminal Company against M. L. Thrower. From the award of damages Thrower appeals to the superior court, and from an order refusing a new trial after verdict, the Gate City Terminal Company brings error. Affirmed.

On August 14, 1906, the Gate City Terminal Company gave proper notice and began proceedings to condemn certain property. On September 1, 1906, the defendant in error, M. L. Thrower, obtained a temporary restraining order enjoining these proceedings. One Bridwell also sought to enjoin proceedings by the same company to condemn his property. Both injunction proceedings involved the question as to whether the company had the right of eminent domain, and it was agreed that the injunction case begun by Thrower should abide the final judgment rendered in the case begun by Bridwell. It being finally decided by this court, on March 14, 1907, that the company had the right of condemnation, the restraining order obtained by Thrower was dissolved, after which the condemnation proceedings were carried on; and on April 20, 1907, an award was made by the assessors, valuing the property at $8,000, which the company tendered or paid on April 20, 1907, and on that day took possession of the property. Thrower entered an appeal from the award, and on the trial in the superior court the jury rendered a verdict valuing the property at $8,500. To the order of the court refusing a new trial, the company excepted. The plaintiff in error (hereinafter called the plaintiff) introduced upon the trial of the case before the jury testimony in part substantially as follows: Miss Flynn sold the property to Mr. Crockett for $1,800. The deed from the former to the latter, dated April 15, 1905, reciting a consideration of $1,800, was introduced in evidence. Several witnesses testified that they examined the property after the condemnation proceedings were begun. One of them testified that he estimated its market value to be $3,645, and in making the estimate he "made an allowance of 100 per cent. on account of the prospect of the railroad terminals being located in that locality." Another witness testified that the market value of the property was $3,750. Another witness testified that its market value was between $3,500 and $5,000.

Thrower testified, in part, as follows: He bought the property in 1906 from Mr. Crockett. "At the time I bought the property, the railroad had graded out alongside of the property, and they had practically bought everything in the block, with the exception of this and the Volberg property, and I agreed to pay Mr. Crockett $14,000 for the property. It was my estimate it was railroad property when I bought it. I bought it as such. * * * I agreed with Mr. Crockett, along the 1st of August or the latter part of July to give him $14,000 for it. I had the titles examined, and it was closed up some time the latter part of August, 1906. I bought the property before I knew of the condemnation proceedings. The agreement was made in July. * * * When I bought the property from Mr. Crockett it was graded along the side, the 200-foot side, down to a depth of some 20 feet, up to the line of this property. After I bought the property I tried to sell it. In April, 1907, the market value of this property was $16,000 or $17,000, considering the railroad there. Excluding the railroad purposes makes a difference in the value of that property of about one-half, possibly a little more. The house rented for $25 a month. Putting it on a 4 per cent. basis it would be worth about $7,500; you have got to pay taxes out of that. * * * He deeded me the property that is sought to be condemned after the condemnation proceedings about the latter part of August, the 27th I believe, 13 days after the condemnation proceedings started. * * * At the time I bought the property I didn't think the Gate City Terminal Company could condemn it. I thought I could get a little profit from it, like I would on any other piece of property I bought. I had a notion that I could get a little more for it than I gave for it. I didn't have a notion that I could get my own price for it. * * * When I bought I didn't know what they were going to do there. I know property went mighty high around the terminal station. * * * If the railroad had not taken the property—if they had built freight or passenger terminals in there—you could have used it for manufacturing sites close to it, or for warehouse or hotel property; it is closer to the center of the city than the Aragon Hotel. If the railroad had come up to my property, but had not taken it, it would have been worth about $10,000."

E. Y. Crockett testified: "I bought the property from Miss Flynn something like three years before April 15, 1905. I got my deed July or August of that year. I spent about $1,400 in improvements. * * * I considered the market price was what I got for it—$14,000. * * * I told Thrower that Adair was trying to buy this for the railroad." Geo. B. Saunders testified: In March, 1907, he thought the market value of the property was $15,000 or $16,000. It was worth $3,000 or $4,000 "before the contemplation of the railroad." John W. Alexander testified: "The depot is, I think, on a part of that lot now. * * * Before the excitement about the railroad, I don't think this lot would have been worth over four or five thousand dollars. About the middle of August, 1906, I considered the lot worth twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars. I considered the lot worth twenty to twenty-five thousand dollars because it was there on the railroad—that near in town; it was expected to have a railroad front at that time. We knew pretty well where they were going to locate the railroad. The whole of my valuation is if it had a railroad front. If it didn't have a railroad front, it would not be that valuable; if the road was right near it it would be worth $10,000." Fred J. Cooledge testified: "I think I knew what property was worth about August, 1906, that was after the railroad had bought nearly all of that property. The market value of the Thrower lot in August, 1906, was something like sixteen to eighteen thousand dollars. I got at that valuation by reason of the fact that the railroad owned right up to it, it had an alley coming up to the rear, and that was the key to the situation. I mean that the railroad had to have the alley to get into the property from back behind it. If the railroad didn't want that alley, they wouldn't have to take it. I should think that that property, before any railroad was contemplated there, would have brought in the neighborhood of $5,000." J. A. Bondurant testified: "In April, 1907, that property was worth sixteen or eighteen thousand dollars. Before the railroad entered that property was worth about $4,500, I think. Property went up as soon as they commenced building a terminal station around there, but it didn't go up like the property the railroad didn't take; it all went up pretty high. If the railroad had not built there, although the terminal station was built there, it would be worth $16,000. The terminal station has been built about five years. Property commenced going up from the time it was built. That piece of property was worth eight or ten thousand dollars after the terminal station went up. It was worth $4,500 before 1906." R. Blair Armstrong testified: "I was familiar with this piece of property owned by Mr. Thrower, formerly by Mr. Crockett, and with its market value in August, 1906. I think that piece was worth eight or nine thousand dollars. In the next twelve months the railroad had done a lot of grading, and I think they owned all but one piece of property around there, and that piece, and by that time I would say that piece was worth about $15,000, for Mr. Thrower held the key to the situation. That the railroad had to have that piece of property is one reason why it was the key to the situation; but it could have been used for a warehouse." Dr. De Los Hill testified: "I was familiar with my estimate of its market value in 1906, which is from $15,000 to $20,000. * * * There was an excavation going on in the same block, I can't say just how close to that lot, but all around the lot on one side at least there was a hole in the ground, on one side of the lot, some feet away, leaving room to hold up the bank, and some feet between that bank and that lot. I thought it possible that the railroad might have to have that property; that entered into the valuation of it; that was one of the points putting a valuation on it. The market value of the property in case the railroad did not take it, but made it a railroad front, was $15,000 to $20,000."

HOLDEN, J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. The Gate City Terminal Company instituted condemnation proceedings to condemn certain property in the city of Atlanta belonging to M. L. Thrower. Written notice by the former was given to the latter on August 14, 1906, of its intention to condemn the property, and therein a request was made that Thrower appoint an assessor to meet the named assessor selected by the company on the premises on September 3, 1906. On April 16, 1907, the two assessors selected appointed the third assessor, and on April 20, 1907, an award was made that the company pay Thrower $6,000 for the property. On April 25, 1907, Thrower entered an appeal from this award to the superior court, and on April 3, 1909, the jury upon the trial of the court rendered a verdict as follows: "We, the jury, assess the value of the defendant's property taken at the sum of eighty-five hundred dollars ($8,500)." A motion for new trial was made and overruled, and, to the refusal of a new trial, a bill of exceptions was filed by the Gate City Terminal Company. Thrower has made a motion to dismiss the writ of error upon the following grounds, to wit: "First, because there was no such case tried in the court below as is brought up in the bill of exceptions in this case; second, because the case tried in the court below was in the name of Henry M. Atkinson and Samuel F. Parrott, receivers of the Georgia Terminal Company, and the Georgia Terminal Company as the legal successors of the Gate City Terminal Company, and the motion for new trial filed in this case so states. As proof of this an appeal is made to the record." Whereupon the following motion was filed by counsel for the "Georgia Terminal Company and Henry M. Atkinson, receiver of Georgia Terminal Company": "(1) That the Georgia Terminal Company is the same as the Gate City Terminal Company, the name simply having been changed. (2) Henry M. Atkinson is now the sole receiver of the Georgia Terminal Company. (3) Samuel F. Parrott, formerly one of the receivers of the Georgia Terminal Company, is now dead, and said Henry M. Atkinson has been appointed and is now the sole receiver of said company. Now, therefore, the said Georgia Terminal Company and the said Henry M. Atkinson, as receiver of the Georgia Terminal Company, pray this court to be made parties plaintiff in error in the above-stated case."

On April 2, 1909, the following order was passed by the court in the case: "It being made to appear to the court that the property of the plaintiff corporation is in the hands of Henry M. Atkinson and Samuel F. Parrott as receivers of the United States Circuit Court for the Northern District of Georgia, it is therefore ordered that the said Henry M. Atkinson and Samuel F. Parrott as such receivers be and they are hereby made parties plaintiff in the above-stated cause in lieu of the Gate City Terminal Company, and that the case proceed in the name of said receivers." Upon the verdict rendered on April 3, 1909, a judgment signed by the court and counsel for Thrower was entered as follows: "Whereupon, it is ordered by the court that M. L. Thrower recover of H. M. Atkinson and Samuel F. Parrott, receivers of the Gate City Terminal Company, the sum of eight thousand five hundred dollars to be credited with six thousand dollars paid to M. L. Thrower on April 20, 1907, the date of the award of the assessors in said matter, and execution will issue in favor of M. L. Thrower against the Gate City Terminal Company for the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars and the sum of three hundred and fifty-six dollars as interest on twenty-five hundred dollars at 7 per cent. per annum from April 20, 1907, to date; and when said sums are paid the Gate City Terminal Company will be entitled to the possession and use of the property described in this proceeding." The original motion for new trial recites: "Now come Henry M. Atkinson and Samuel F. Parrott, receivers of the Georgia Terminal Company, and the Georgia Terminal Company, and, first, showing that they were, by order of the Honorable Don A. Pardee, judge of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Georgia, on the 19th day of March, 1906, appointed receivers of the Georgia Terminal Company, and that the said Georgia Terminal Company is the legal successor of the Gate City Terminal Company, the plaintiff in the above-stated case, say: Plaintiff, being dissatisfied with the verdict and judgment in the above-stated case," etc. The amendment to this motion begins as follows: "Now comes the movant, the Gate City Terminal Company, and before the hearing of its motion for new trial heretofore filed in the above-stated case;" and in the concluding sentence of the amendment it is recited: "Wherefore movant prays that the foregoing grounds be added to its motion for new trial by amendment." The original motion and the amendment thereto were both signed by attorneys as "Attys. for movant."

We think the motion to allow the receivers of the Georgia Terminal Company and the Georgia Terminal Company to be made parties plaintiff in error in the bill of exceptions should be allowed, and the motion to dismiss the writ of error denied; and it was so ordered. The record shows that an order was taken, before the trial of the case, making Atkinson and Parrott, receivers, parties plaintiff in the case. The original motion for a new trial was made by Atkinson and Parrott as receivers of the Georgia Terminal Company, and the Georgia Terminal Company, and recites that Atkinson and Parrott were appointed receivers of this company by the federal court, and that this company "is the legal successor of the Gate City Terminal Company, the plaintiff in the above-stated case." Counsel for Thrower acknowledged service of the motion, and the record does not show that they ever made any complaint that the recitals above referred to in the original motion were untrue; indeed, the ground of the written motion of Thrower to dismiss the writ of error is "because the case tried in the court below was in the name of Henry M. Atkinson and Samuel F. Parrott, receivers of the Georgia Terminal Company, and the Georgia Terminal Company as the legal successors of the Gate City Terminal Company." The amendment to the motion was in the name of the Gate City Terminal Company, and the judgment on the verdict, signed by counsel for Thrower, directs execution to issue against the Gate City Terminal Company for the amount of the judgment, and that upon the payment of that amount the Gate City Terminal Company "will be entitled to the use and possession of the property." It seems that the corporation organized as the Gate City Terminal Company still remains in existence, but under the name of the Georgia Terminal Company, for whom Atkinson and Parrott were appointed receivers. At the time of the trial these receivers were in possession of the property held by the corporation originally chartered in the name of the Gate City Terminal Company. The Gate City Terminal Company and the Georgia Terminal Company are not separate and distinct corporations. The corporation originally chartered as the Gate City Terminal Company has never gone out of existence, but its name has simply been changed to the Georgia Terminal Company. If a suit was instituted by an unmarried woman, and by amendment the suit proceeded in her name acquired by reason of her marriage pending the suit, and if a bill of exceptions was filed in which it was recited that the name of the plaintiff in error was the one she bore before her marriage, we think the mistake could be cured by amendment, if the record disclosed the facts hypothesized; as no new party could be substituted by such amendment, but the same person would be plaintiff in error under her proper name.

[1] We do not think the allowance of the motion that the name of the plaintiff in error be changed as therein prayed would be striking one party and adding another new and distinct party plaintiff in error, but we think the same corporation would be plaintiff in error under its proper name and the name of its receivers.

[2] 2. The proceedings to condemn certain property for public use, instituted by the Gate City Terminal Company, were begun on August 14, 1906, and on September 1, 1906, Thrower, to whom the property then belonged, obtained a temporary restraining order enjoining the further prosecution of these proceedings. This restraining order was dissolved in March, 1907, and on April 20, 1907, an award was made by the assessors valuing the property at $6,000. Thrower entered an appeal, and the jury in April, 1909, rendered a verdict fixing the value of the property at $8,500. A judgment on this verdict was rendered for the $8,500 "to be credited with six thousand dollars paid to M. L. Thrower on April 20, 1907, the date of the award of the assessors." In an agreed statement of facts, constituting a part of the evidence, it is said that after the dissolution of the injunction "condemnation proceedings were carried on and the award made and the money tendered and the property taken possession of on April 20, 1907." Complaint is made that the court erred in charging the jury that, "Just and adequate compensation means the market value of the property, the actual cash market value of the property on April 20, 1907;" and in refusing a timely written request of the plaintiff in error to charge, "Just and adequate compensation which the plaintiff must pay for the property sought to be condemned is the market value of the property at the time of the institution of the condemnation proceedings;" and also in refusing a written request to charge: "The just and adequate compensation which the plaintiff must pay for the property sought to be condemned is the market value at the time the defendant M. L. Thrower prevented the assessment of this property by enjoining the plaintiff from continuing with its condemnation proceedings." Complaint is also made that the court erred in admitting the testimony of Thrower that "the market value of the property in April, 1907, just before the appraisal in this case, considering the railroad there—the market value of that lot—was $16,000 or $17,000," over objections of the plaintiff that the same was irrelevant. The Constitution of this state (article 1, § 3, par. 1 [Civil Code 1910, § 6388]) provides that "Private property shall not be taken, or damaged, for public purposes, without just and adequate compensation being first paid." The time at which the value of property taken for public purposes should be fixed is the time it is taken, or the right to take it is complete. It cannot be taken until just and adequate compensation is "first paid." "Tender" is equivalent to "payment," and the right to take private property for public purposes by one having the right of eminent domain never exists until compensation is either paid or tendered.

On April 20, 1907, the day the award of the assessors for $6,000 was made, the company tendered or paid this amount and took possession of the property, and on the trial of the case before the jury, to whom an appeal was had from the award, the compensation the jury should have given Thrower was the value of the property on April 20, 1907, and interest thereon from that date. Young v. Harrison, 17 Ga. 30 (1), 39; Young v. Harrison, 21 Ga. 591; Selma, etc., Railroad Co. v. Keith, 53 Ga. 178 (6); Oliver v. Union Pt., etc., Railroad Co., 83 Ga. 257, 9 S. E. 1086; Georgia Southern & Fla. Ry. Co. v. Small, 87 Ga. 355, 13 S. E. 515; 2 Lewis on Eminent Domain, § 705, p. 1220, and authorities cited in note on pages 1224, 1225. The decision we make is not in conflict with the ruling in the case of Georgia So. & Fla. Ry. Co. v. Small, supra, where it was held that the compensation to be paid the owner was the value of the property at the time of the trial before the jury to whom an appeal was had from the award of the assessors. In that case, prior to the time of the trial before the jury there had been no payment or tender of the amount of the award of the assessors and the property had not been taken and no right to take it existed. The fact that Thrower obtained a restraining order enjoining the company from prosecuting the proceedings to condemn would not give the company the right to have awarded, as the amount of compensation to be paid, the value of the property at the date of the restraining order.

[3] 3. Complaint is made that the court erred in admitting in evidence, over objection of the condemning party, the following testimony: "The definite talk about a railroad coming in there enhanced the value of the property considerably in some places. I cannot say what per cent. it enhanced it; at least 200 per cent. Probably more than that in some cases; I can't say exactly." And the testimony of another witness, that "when it was determined where the terminal facilities of the A. B. & A. Railroad were going to be located, the property that was in the line of the improvements bounced up in price and went up very high; went towards the sky. The property that was in the line of the improvements jumped up higher in price than any other property. It increased the price of property, where they told us the railroad would be located, more than anything else." And the testimony of another witness that "by reason of the fact that this railroad was going to want that property in that neighborhood, and going to establish terminals there, this property appreciated very much in value after I had been there the first part of 1906." And the testimony of another witness that "the prospect of railroad terminals being built there increased the value of this property 100 per cent.; the prospect of the railroad enhanced this property." And the testimony of another witness that "the fact that a railroad would come in there and want that property had a splendid effect on that property as to price." The objection to the testimony of each of the witnesses was the same, and was as follows: "(a) On the ground that it was irrelevant; (b) and on the further ground that the benefit which this property would derive on account of a railroad coming through there could not be considered as an element in enhancing the value of the property of which the landowner could take advantage against the condemning railroad company."

Complaint is made that the court erred in refusing the following written request of the plaintiff: "The effect of any improvement that may be put upon the property by the party condemning may have upon its value cannot be considered by you in passing upon its market value." The language of the charge requested was such that, if it had been given, it would have been liable to impress the jury with the idea that they could not consider the effect of building the railroad station in the locality where the property was situate upon its market value, and was properly refused.

The testimony above quoted was admissible, and not subject to either of the objections made thereto. The market value of the property on April 20, 1907, was the measure of compensation to be awarded to Thrower. Prior to this time the railroad company "had graded out alongside of the property" to be taken. One witness testified: "We knew pretty well where they were going to locate the railroad." Another witness testified: "There was an excavation going on in the same block. I can't say just how close to that lot, but all around the lot on one side at least there was a hole in the ground; on one side of the lot, some feet away, leaving room to hold up the bank, and some feet between that bank and that lot." If at the time the market value of the property was to be estimated it was known or anticipated that the railroad company would construct a railroad and build the terminal station in the locality where the property was situated, and this fact served to enhance the market value, the owner would be entitled to the actual market value, as affected by reason of its being known or anticipated that a railroad station would be built in that locality. This is true though the projected improvement was to be made by the condemning party. At the time the market value of the property was to be estimated on April 20, 1907, it was known, or at least anticipated, that the railroad and terminal station would be constructed in that locality where this property was situated. Where improvements in any locality of a certain kind, if made, would enhance the value of property in that locality, and a party having the right of eminent domain begins such improvements, and because of its being known or expected that the improvements will be carried to completion, the market value of property in that locality is enhanced, the party seeking to condemn such property cannot object to being made to pay the actual market value of it before taking it because it has been enhanced by reason of the fact that the improvements which it is known or expected to be made, will be made by the condemning party. See Harrison v. Young, 9 Ga. 359; Young v. Harrison, 17 Ga. 30; s. c., 21 Ga. 584. In 2 Lewis on Eminent Domain, § 745, it is said: "Whatever the time fixed upon with reference to which the compensation shall be estimated, the owner is entitled to the actual value of the land at that time, even though it may have been enhanced by reason of the projected improvement for which it is taken. It is said that it is not really making the condemning party pay for an enhancement caused by its own work, as such enhancement does not come from the mere projection of the work, but from the existence of circumstances which create a demand for the work, and render it probable that such a work will sooner or later be built. In so far as the enhancement is due to such circumstances no doubt it is properly considered and allowed." See cases cited in notes to above text. We have been requested to overrule the decision in the case of Young v. Harrison, 17 Ga. 30, but we think the ruling there made is correct and decline to overrule it. Complaint is made that when that portion of the testimony of one of the witnesses above quoted was admitted, the court stated in the presence of the jury: "It doesn't make any difference what caused the market value, but what it would sell for in the market at that time, anything affecting its market value. If somebody had gone along and stated that there was a gold mine in there, and by reason of that idle rumor it would have brought a certain sum in the market, that was its market value. It doesn't make any difference what enters into it. It is what it would have sold for in the market; that is its market value." While this statement may not have been entirely accurate, we do not think it affords ground for a new trial.

Another ground of the motion for a new trial is as follows: "Because the court erred, when movant was cross-examining the witness M. L. Thrower, a witness for the defendant in said case, on the question that even after the railroad and terminals had been established there, improved property across the street would sell for less money than about $5,000 or $6,000, after stating in the presence of the jury, 'I think you have to prove that the other property is similarly situated,' in ruling and stating in the presence of the jury as follows: 'But I think if there is any evidence as to where a railroad was to go and where it was going to stop, that affected this property different from other property, that the valuation of other property is not material.'" The statement of the court complained of was not error requiring a new trial. Nor was there any error requiring a new trial in the ruling and statement referred to in the following ground of the motion for a new trial: "When movant sought, on cross-examination, to question the witness M. L. Thrower, with reference to what would be the market value of the property if the railroad had stopped its work at the time he bought the property and left it in the situation that it was then in, the court erred in ruling and stating in the presence of the jury: 'I don't think you can show that if you were going to abandon your proposition or anything of that sort it would not have been worth so much. "If" is always a very uncertain word. Anything that enters into its market value then. It may have been a mere rumor, or it may have been something that never was going to happen; people might change their minds about it. Property might be worth so much in the market to-day, and it might be worth half of that the day after to-morrow, but it is the thing that causes the market value at any particular time, but not what it would be worth if things changed or you didn't do something. I don't think that is admissible."

[4] 4. Complaint is made that the court erred in refusing to permit the plaintiff to introduce testimony of a witness "that the market value of this property in 1905 was between $2,500 and $3,000." In excluding this testimony, the court stated "that going back to the market value in 1905 was most too far back to go into the market value of the property." While we do not think that proof of the market value in 1905 related to a time too remote from that at which the market value was to be estimated as to render the testimony inadmissible, as there was testimony showing beyond dispute that the market value of the property before it was known or expected that the railroad or terminal station would be built was much less than it was after this fact was known or expected, we do not think the exclusion of the testimony affords grounds for a new trial.

Complaint is made that the court refused to permit the plaintiff to prove that in making trades regarding the purchase of other property, "in order to get them closed quickly we paid in some instances excessive prices for them." The exclusion of this testimony was proper.

One ground of the motion for a new trial is that the "court erred in stating in the presence of the jury that the defendant [M. L. Thrower] had a right to get more than he paid for said property." Complaint is made that this "was an expression of opinion by the court that the defendant was entitled to receive more money than he paid for said property." In this ground it is stated: "Movant sets out the following portion of the record as showing exactly what happened in reference to said statement: 'Q. Didn't you have the notion that they would have to pay you for that piece of property whatever you wanted to ask them for it? A. I had a notion that I could get a little more for it than I gave for it. Mr. Colquitt: I think the witness should answer my question, your honor. The Court: I think he has answered it—he had a right to get more than he paid for it.'" In the use of the words "I think he has answered it—he had a right to get more than he paid for it," the court was evidently undertaking to say that Thrower had answered the question asked him by stating that "he had a right to get more than he paid for" the property, and the court did not intend to state it as a fact that Thrower was entitled at the hands of the jury to more than he paid for the property. We do not think the jury were liable to misunderstand the language used by the court. The jury valued the property at less than the amount paid by Thrower for it, and the court instructed them that the compensation he was entitled to was the value of the property on April 20, 1907.

The court committed no error in excluding testimony to the effect that the railroad "had to fill in all the way from Bellwood in order to get into town." This testimony was irrelevant and illustrated no issue involved in the trial of the case.

Counsel for Thrower, in his argument to the jury, stated "that the assessors in said case had awarded Mr. Thrower $6,000, and that the jury should certainly give Mr. Thrower more than this amount." Counsel for the plaintiff in error moved for a mistrial because of this statement, whereupon the court stated "in the hearing of the jury, that in some jurisdictions the amount of the award was held to be prima facie evidence of the value of the property, and that the burden was upon the condemning party to show that this was not true." Plaintiff complains that the court erred in not declaring a mistrial, and in making the above-quoted statement in the hearing of the jury. The court in his charge said: "A statement was made in your hearing as to the amount the appraisers awarded the defendant. That statement must not be considered by you in any way. Eradicate it from your minds, and determine this case from the evidence before you." If the jury had no right to consider the award of the appraisers as prima facie evidence of the value of the property and the amount to be awarded the defendant, we do not think the refusal to declare a mistrial and the statement by the court in the hearing of the jury constitute cause for a new trial, in view of the above-quoted charge given the jury by the court in his general charge.

There was no error in the charge: "The price that the defendant paid for the property is a circumstance to be considered along with all the other evidence in the case in determining the issue in the case." The testimony showed that Thrower orally bargained with the owner of the property to buy it just a few days before the condemnation proceedings were instituted, and consummated the trade after such proceedings were begun, which was about seven or eight months before the award of the appraisers—the time when the value of the property was to be estimated. There was no error in the charge above quoted.

Complaint is made that the court refused to give the following charge requested by the plaintiff: "You have nothing to do with the question of whether or not Mr. Thrower makes or loses anything by his trade on this property; your only consideration is the market value of the lot taken;" and also in refusing to give the following written request of the plaintiff: "The mere value of the lot sought to be condemned—to the condemning party—is not the market value." While these charges might very well have been given, we do not think their refusal error requiring a new trial. The court charged the jury that the compensation to be awarded Thrower was the market value of the property, and this charge necessarily meant that they were to find its market value regardless of what Thrower paid for it, or its value to the plaintiff.

Complaint is made that the court refused the written request of the plaintiff to charge: "In finding the market value of this property you are not bound by the oral opinion of the witnesses as to its market value." The court charged the jury as follows: "The opinions of witnesses as to the value of property are not binding upon the jury in the sense that you must accept these opinions. You must give them such weight as you think they are entitled to under the instruction given you, and which will be given you." We think the charge given substantially covered the charge requested, and there was no error in refusing the request.

Complaint is made that the court erred in admitting, over the plaintiff's objections, the testimony of Thrower "that when he bought the piece of property sought to be condemned the railroad owned every other piece of property on a particular 20-foot alley that ran up to his property." Even if the testimony admitted was subject to the objection made thereto "that there was better evidence to show what it [the movant] owned there," we do not think its admission error requiring a new trial, in view of the fact that it related to a collateral matter, and there was other evidence, admitted without objection, substantially to the same effect as the evidence to which objection was made.

One ground of the motion for a new trial is that the court erred in admitting, over plaintiff's objection, the following testimony of a witness for the defendant: "The market value of this property, in case the railroad did not take it, but made it a railroad front, was $15,000 to $20,000." We think this testimony was subject to the objection thereto that it was "irrelevant and speculative," but we do not think its admission error requiring a new trial. There was testimony of other witnesses of the same nature as that objected to which was admitted without objection. One of these other witnesses testified that with a railroad front the property would be worth from $20,000 to $25,000. We do not think that a new trial should be granted because of the erroneous admission of this testimony, when the jury had before it, without objection, the testimony of several other witnesses regarding the value of the property based on the idea that the railroad company did not take it, but that it would front on the railroad to be constructed by the company; especially in view of the fact that the witness delivering the testimony objected to did not make any reference in his estimate of the value of the property with a railroad front, and of its value without such front.

Complaint is made that the court refused to give two written requests of the plaintiff to instruct the jury regarding the market value of the property. In one of these requests the following language appears: "'Market value' means the fair value of property as between one who wants to purchase and one who wants to sell, not what could be obtained for it under peculiar circumstances, when a greater [amount] than its fair market price could be obtained, nor its speculative value." In the other request the following language appears: "They [the jury] are not to consider the price at which the property would sell for under special or extraordinary circumstances." The language above quoted from the charges requested was liable to lead the jury to believe, under the special facts of this case, that they could not consider the market value as affected by the fact that it was known, or expected, that the plaintiff would construct a railroad or a terminal station in the locality where the property was situated, and the court properly refused to give the charges requested. A trial of the length and character of the one involved in this record before us is rarely kept entirely free from error. While some errors were committed, as herein pointed out, no error requiring a new trial appears, and the evidence was sufficient to support the verdict.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

Action by Mrs. A. L. Miller and another against R. L. Jones, as executor of the will of W. D. Jones, Sr., and others. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the petition, plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

Mrs. A. L. Miller (formerly Jones) and Nannie Jones brought an action against R. L. Jones, as executor of the will of W. D. Jones, Sr., deceased, T. F. Jones, Sr., T. F. Jones, Jr., W. W. Beard, W. B. Hattaway, and C. J. Rambo. The substance of the petition was as follows: W. D. Jones, Sr., died October 14, 1905, leaving a will, as follows:

"Item 1. I wish that my entire estate, both real and personal, be held without division or disposition by my executor for the term of three years, that my just debts may be paid, and that my two daughters be maintained and educated from the proceeds, and that my home and family, Rob, and Jennie and Nannie Jones, be maintained and kept as they now are, except when attending school.

"Item 2. I desire that as soon as it can be conveniently done, I direct my executor to pay to my wife, Carrie Jones, the sum of four hundred dollars, which amount is to be in lieu of dower and year's support.

"Item 3. I desire that at the end of the three years mentioned, any money from my estate shall be divided equally between my son, R. L. Jones, and Jennie and Nannie Jones.

"Item 4. I desire that at the end of three years, I wish my home place, where I now live, together with all personalty, to be the absolute estate of my three children, R. L., Jennie and Nannie, and they shall divide it as they wish.

"Item 5. I desire at the end of three years that all my interest in the Dennis place, now operated by me and my brother, Frank Jones, together with all personalty thereto, shall belong to W. D. Jones, Jr., T. F. Jones, Jr., and Emma Beard, which is to be divided as they desire.

"Item 6. I desire that R. L. Jones, my youngest son, shall be the executor of this my last will and testament, taking such compensation as the law allows administrators of estates, to act without giving bond as such executor."

The will was probated in solemn form on the first Tuesday in December, 1905, and R. L. Jones qualified as executor. For 18 years prior to the death of the testator, he and T. F. Jones, Sr. (Frank) conducted as partners a farming business on the Dennis place referred to in the will; each of the partners owning an undivided half interest in the land constituting such place, and of the personalty thereon used in such business. The testator acted as overseer or manager of the plantation at an agreed salary of $300 per year; and T. F. Jones, Sr., kept the accounts and books of the business, sold the produce made thereon, collected the proceeds of the sales, and managed the financial affairs generally of the business. A running account existed and continued between such partners, without a settlement, during the 18 years next preceding the death of the testator, at which time T. F. Jones, Sr., as a surviving partner, was indebted to the testator in a large amount. Within three years after the death of the testator and the probate of his will, W. D. Jones sold and conveyed all of his interest in all the property devised and bequeathed to him under the will to W. W. Beard. Subsequently, on October 31, 1907, W. W. Beard, T. F. Jones, Sr., and two of the older set of children mentioned in the will, viz., Emma Beard and T. F. Jones, Jr., under an agreement, made a division in kind of the Dennis place, and in accordance therewith executed deeds whereby each of such parties took the portion of the place so allotted. In November, 1907, T. F. Jones, Jr., sold and conveyed to T. F. Jones, Sr., all interest which the former had in the Dennis place under the will, and under the agreement above referred to. On February 14, 1908, T. F. Jones, Sr., sold and conveyed the portion of the Dennis place which had been conveyed to him by T. F. Jones, Jr., and certain produce from such place, to C. J. Rambo and W. B. Hattaway. All of such parties so dealing with the interest of the testator in the Dennis place went into possession of the portion thereof which they had obtained under such conveyances, and thereafter received the rents and profits thereof, and all of them had full notice, at the time of taking possession, of the rights of the plaintiffs under the will, and all of such parties confederated together and conspired with T. F. Jones, Sr., in the manner above indicated, to defeat the rights of the plaintiffs in and to such of the net income, rents, issues, and profits arising from the Dennis place, as plaintiffs were, under the terms of the will, entitled to receive and enjoy for their maintenance, etc., during the period of three years from the death of the testator. At the time of the death of the testator, his individual debts aggregated $680.24, which debts were by his will made a first charge upon the income arising from his entire estate. At the time of his death and for some time prior thereto, the testator, in partnership with his son, R. L. Jones, conducted a public cotton-ginning business on the home place mentioned in the will, the debts of which partnership, at the death of the testator, amounted to $4,119.96, or other large sum. On October 19, 1907, the ginning business was completely destroyed by fire, and R. L. Jones by way of compromise collected $2,012.50 as insurance thereon, half of which amount was assets belonging to the estate of the testator, and as such passed into the hands of R. L. Jones, as executor, subject to the indebtedness of the last-mentioned partnership.

In January, 1907, the dwelling on the home place mentioned in the will was also burned by fire, and R. L. Jones, as executor, collected on an insurance policy taken out upon such dwelling for the protection and benefit of himself and plaintiffs the sum of $1,597, which amount the plaintiffs charge, upon information and belief, was used by the executor in paying off debts owing by the estate of testator, and the last-mentioned partnership, instead of holding plaintiffs' two-thirds interest therein in trust for them and selling the personal property belonging to the estate of the testator for the purpose of paying the debts for which it was liable. The executor never called upon T. F. Jones, Sr., to account for any of the personalty, consisting of live stock, farming implements, etc., used in connection with the business conducted by the testator and T. F. Jones, Sr., on the Dennis place, and in which the testator owned an undivided half interest, but allowed such personalty to pass into the hands of W. W. Beard, Emma Beard, and T. F. Jones, Jr., C. J. Rambo, and W. B. Hattaway, as well as to remain in the hands of T. F. Jones, Sr., as long as he kept control of the Dennis place, which personalty such parties converted to their own individual use and placed the same beyond the power of the executor to sell for the purpose of paying the debts due by the testator. By reason of the failure of R. L. Jones, as executor, to sell a sufficient amount of the personal property of the estate to pay off its debts, and of his failure to pay his individual indebtedness as a member of the partnership in the ginning business that existed between him and the testator, as well as by reason of the fact that such executor permitted certain described lands constituting a part of the home place, which had been specifically devised to the plaintiffs and R. L. Jones, to be sold at sheriff's sale on April 2, 1908, and on May 6, 1908, under various executions for stated amounts in favor of different named plaintiffs against R. L. Jones, some of which were against him as executor and others against him individually and as executor, the plaintiffs' interests in the home place have been sacrificed. The value of the portions of the land of the home place sold under such executions was $5,800 or other large sum, and they were sold at forced sales, permitted and encouraged by the executor and the devisees of the Dennis place and their successors in interest, in the spring of 1908 during a financial panic, and were grossly sacrificed in order to pay the debts of the estate, which inured to the benefit of the devisees under the will of the testator's interest in the Dennis place, and entirely deprived plaintiffs of their interest in the lands so sold, and defeated the scheme of their father, the testator, as expressed in his will, which was to divide his land into two equal parts; one, consisting of the home place, to go to the three younger children, namely, the plaintiffs and R. L. Jones, and the other, consisting of his interest in the Dennis place, to go to his three older children, viz., Emma Beard, W. D. Jones, Jr., and T. F. Jones, Jr. The executor, R. L. Jones, has collected and received, as money belonging to the estate of his testator, $6,556.39, or other large sum, for which he has not accounted to plaintiffs, and they charge on information and belief that he has paid out of such moneys on his individual debts $792.83, and on the debts due by the partnership in the ginning business $4,119.96. In the language of the petition: The only amounts which the said executor has paid over to or in behalf of petitioners, since the death of his testator, are as follows:

Since the 14th of October, 1908, the time fixed by the will for a division of the property of the testator's estate by his executor among the beneficiaries, the plaintiffs have called upon the executor for an accounting and settlement with them for their respective shares of the estate, but he has failed and refused to comply with their demand; he has likewise refused to come to any accounting or settlement with any of the other parties above mentioned as interested in the estate, or to bring T. F. Jones, Sr., to an accounting or settlement with the estate, and therefore it is necessary that the plaintiffs themselves proceed to have such parties brought to an accounting and settlement with the estate. The prayers of the petition are: (1) That T. F. Jones, Sr., be brought to an accounting and settlement with the estate, respecting the business transactions between him and the testator as to the farming operations on the Dennis place, prior to the death of the testator, as well as the interest of the estate in all the personalty used in connection with such business prior to the testator's death, as well as for the rents, issues, and profits received by him from the interest owned by the estate in the Dennis place since the death of the testator. (2) That T. F. Jones, Jr., W. W. Beard, Emma Beard, W. B. Hattaway, C. J. Rambo each be required to come to an accounting and settlement with the estate, respecting the rents, issues, and profits arising from the interest of the estate in the Dennis place, received by them since the death of the testator, as well as for such of the personal property connected with such plantation as they or any of them may have received and used since such date. (3) "That the said T. F. Jones, Jr., W. W. Beard, Emma Beard, and R. L. Jones may be decreed to come to a full, just, and complete accounting and settlement with your petitioners as to the respective share of the debts of said estate which each of them should share, as a condition precedent to taking any of the benefits under the will of the said W. D. Jones, Sr., and that the share of each of them in such debts shall, when ascertained by such accounting, be decreed to be a charge upon the interest of said estate in the Dennis place, and that said interest in said plantation be sold for the purpose of making a just and fair division amongst the beneficiaries of said will (or their assignees), in accord with its scheme and purpose, of the moneys arising from all of the assets of said estate and remaining after discharging all of the debts of said estate." (4) That Beard, Hattaway, and Rambo, in so far as their claim of interest in the Dennis place is concerned, be decreed to stand in the shoes of the devisees named in the will, through whom they claim directly or indirectly. (5) That in the accounting and settlement with the estate the plaintiffs be decreed to be entitled to a credit of two-thirds of the amount collected as insurance on the dwelling destroyed on the home place, and two-thirds of a half interest in the insurance collected on the ginning outfit, and that the plaintiffs be further credited with two-thirds of the value of the lands forming a part of the home place which were sold under execution sales for the purpose of paying the debts of the estate. (6) That the executor be brought to an accounting with the plaintiffs respecting all of the assets of the estate which have come into his hands since his qualification, and that he be decreed to have forfeited the right to commissions as executor on account of the misapplication of the assets of the estate as before stated. (7) That the agreement between T. F. Jones, Sr., and T. F. Jones, Jr., on the one side, and W. W. Beard and Emma Beard, on the other, by which they undertook to divide in kind the Dennis place, be set aside and decreed to be inoperative in so far as the plaintiffs and other parties are concerned. (8) For general relief and process.

During the appearance term the trial judge announced that he would call the appearance docket on the succeeding day. When, in accordance with such announcement, the present case was called in its order, counsel for the defendants who had then been served announced that he had been actively engaged in court all the preceding week and had not had time to prepare and file defenses in their behalf, and asked for time within which to file such defenses. The court thereupon allowed him until the last day of the term to file them. This permission was given on April 13, 1909. Two days thereafter counsel for such defendants filed a joint demurrer and answer in their behalf. Counsel for the plaintiffs urged the court, when the case was called in its order upon the appearance docket, to enter the same as in default; and subsequently objected to the filing of the demurrer and answer of the defendants, on the ground that the case was in default when called upon the appearance docket. The objection was overruled, and the demurrer and answer allowed to be filed on April 15, 1909. Exceptions pendente lite were filed by the plaintiffs assigning error upon the ruling of the judge as to this matter. The remaining defendants at the October term, 1909, which was the appearance term as to them, filed demurrers and answers. The court sustained a common ground of demurrer of all of the defendants, attacking the petition for multifariousness. Plaintiffs excepted, assigning error upon their exceptions pendente lite, and upon the sustaining of the demurrer.

A. L. Miller and Glessner & Park, for plaintiffs in error. King & Castellow, Hawes & Pottle, Byron Collins, and Chas. D. Russell, for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. Upon the call of the appearance docket, the judge may in his discretion allow counsel for the defendant a reasonable time thereafter, and during the term, to demur and answer. There was no abuse of the judge's discretion in this case in allowing counsel, for the reasons set out in the statement of facts, two days after the call of the appearance docket in which to demur and answer: In Deering Harvester Co. v. Thompson, 116 Ga. 418, 42 S. E. 772, the order held to be invalid allowed the defendant until a date after the adjournment of the appearance term within which to file an answer.

[2] 2. The demurrer sustained by the court was that the petition was bad for multifariousness, because: (1) It sought an accounting with the executor, with which neither of the other defendants nor any one of them had any connection or concern; (2) it prayed for an accounting with T. F. Jones, Sr., as the surviving partner of a business conducted by him and the testator during the latter's life, as well as for an accounting of business transactions T. F. Jones, Sr., had with the testator, with neither of which accountings were any of the other defendants concerned; (3) It sought an accounting with and a contribution from "W. W. Beard, Emma Beard, and others, in reference to the indebtedness of the estate of W. D. Jones, and with such cause of action" the other defendants had no connection or concern; and (4) because "the only cause of action attempted to be set forth in said petition against W. B. Hattaway and C. J. Rambo is for an accounting and contribution in reference to the portion of the plantation known as the Dennis place, and the petition shows on its face that these defendants acquired title to said land from T. F. Jones, Sr., and have absolutely no connection or concern with the interest in any other of the matters or things or causes of action set forth in the petition."

"To sustain a bill against the charge of multifariousness, it is not indispensable that all the parties should have an interest in all the matters contained in the suit. It is sufficient if each party has an interest in some matter in the suit, which is common to all, and they are connected with others." Worthy v. Johnson, 8 Ga. 236 (1), 52 Am. Dec. 399. "Where the plaintiffs have a common interest against all of the defendants in a suit as to one or more of the questions raised by it, so as to make them all necessary parties for the purpose of enforcing that common interest, the circumstance of some of the defendants being subject to distinct liabilities in respect to different branches of the subject-matter will not render the bill multifarious." City Bank of Macon v. Bartlett, 71 Ga. 798. "Where all the complainants belonged to the same class and had a common interest, and all the defendants belonged to one class and were subject to a common liability, it does not matter that the extent of the rights of each of the complainants, or the liability of each of the defendants, may not be the same." Id. A petition is not multifarious, though it concerns things of different natures against several defendants, whose rights are distinct, if it sets forth one connected interest among them all, centering in the point in issue in the case. Conley v. Buck, 100 Ga. 187, 28 S. E. 97; Greer v. Andrews, 133 Ga. 193, 65 S. E. 416. Did the petition in the case now in hand set forth a common interest which the plaintiffs had against all the defendants as to any question raised, so as to make them all necessary parties for the purpose of enforcing that common interest? Before replying to this inquiry, it becomes necessary to construe the will involved in the case.

[3] The natural and reasonable presumption is that a testator, when he executes his will, intends to dispose of his whole estate, and does not intend to die intestate as to any part of his property, which presumption is overcome only where the intention of the testator to do otherwise is plain and unambiguous or is necessarily implied. Black v. Nolan, 132 Ga. 452, 64 S. E. 647. Moreover, it is clear, we think, from the will itself in this case, that the testator intended to dispose of his whole estate; for in the first item thereof he declares that: "I wish that my entire estate, both real and personal, be held without division or disposition by my executor for the term of three years, that my just debts may be paid, and that my two daughters be maintained and educated from the proceeds, and that my home and family, Rob, and Jennie and Nannie Jones, be maintained and kept as they now are, except when attending school." It is apparent that the testator desired his entire estate to be kept together for three years in order that his executor might discharge from the income thereof the debts against the estate, and from the same source defray the expenses of the maintenance and education of his two younger daughters, the plaintiffs, and the maintenance of his family consisting of his three younger children, R. L. Jones and the plaintiffs, and also from the same source that the executor, as soon as it could "be conveniently done," should pay to the testator's widow a given sum in lieu of dower and a year's support, as provided for in the second item of the will. The only property mentioned in and disposed of by the will was the interests of the testator in two places or plantations and the personalty on each and used in connection therewith. In one of these places known as the home place and in the personalty thereon, the testator owned the entire interest, all of which at the end of three years was "to be the absolute estate" of his three children, R. L. Jones and the plaintiffs, who should then divide amongst themselves. In the other lands, known as the Dennis place, and in the personalty thereon and used in connection therewith, the testator owned a half undivided interest. In reference to this property the testator declared in the fifth item of his will as follows: "I desire at the end of three years that all my interest in the Dennis place, now operated by me and my brother Frank Jones, together with all personalty thereto, shall belong to W. D. Jones, Jr., T. F. Jones, Jr., and Emma Beard, which is to be divided as they desire." It appears from the petition that the persons named in the fifth item were an older set of children of the testator, and that the persons named in the fourth item, to whom was given the home place and the personalty thereon, were the younger set of the testator's children. After providing that his entire estate should be kept together for the term of three years and that the income thereof should be devoted to certain specified purposes as already indicated, the testator declared in the third item of his will that: "I desire that at the end of the three years mentioned, any money from my estate shall be divided equally between my son, R. L. Jones, and Jennie and Nannie Jones." Construing the testamentary scheme as ascertained from the entire will and also the connection in which the language of the third item is used, and the language itself as there employed, we feel safe in saying that the intention of the testator was that at the end of three years "any money from [his] estate"—that is, any balance of the income, such as rents and profits belonging to the estate from the two plantations—should be equally divided between the three younger children named in the third item. At the end of the three years the corpus of the estate was to go to the children; the home place, including the personalty thereon, to the younger set, and all the "interest" in the Dennis place, including all personalty thereon, to the older set. The words "all my interest in the Dennis place," as used in the fifth item of the will, referred, we think, not merely to his half undivided interest in the land constituting that place and to a like interest in the personalty thereon, but also included whatever interest he might have in the business enterprise conducted by himself and T. F. Jones, Sr., as partners in connection with such place, and therefore covered any indebtedness in the way of profits, wages, etc., owing by the partnership to the testator at the time of his death.

Having set forth the real testamentary scheme of the will, does it follow that the plaintiffs under the allegations of their petition had a common interest as to some matter in the suit which was common to all of the defendants, and in which the latter were all interested in resisting? In our opinion the petition showed that the plaintiffs had such an interest.

In the effect, the plaintiffs alleged that under the terms of the will they were to be maintained and educated out of the income from the entire estate during the period of three years after the testator's death; that the executor failed to carry out this obligation placed upon him by the will; that he permitted the other defendants to go into possession of the land and personalty constituting the "interest" of the testator in the Dennis place, and to receive and appropriate to their own uses the income and profits of such property during the three years the executor was bound to hold the same together and to devote the income therefrom in part to the maintenance and education of the plaintiffs; and that at the expiration of the three years the plaintiffs were entitled to two-thirds of any money that should then have been in the hands of the executor from the income of the Dennis place. Surely the plaintiffs had the right to call the executor to an accounting and settlement in reference to this matter, as well as to all other matters in respect to which they claimed he had mismanaged his trust; and if the other defendants had appropriated, with notice of the plaintiffs' rights under the will, to their own uses any portion of the income belonging to the estate which should have come into the hands of the executor from the Dennis place during the three years after the death of the testator, and if the executor failed and refused to require the other defendants to account to him for such income appropriated by them, then the plaintiffs were entitled to bring an action against the other defendants for an accounting and settlement as to such income received and appropriated by them, and to make the executor a codefendant in such action. Worthy v. Johnson, 8 Ga. 236, 52 Am. Dec. 399.

Moreover, as we have seen, the scheme of the will was that the entire estate should be kept together by the executor for the term of three years before the division thereof, as provided in the will, should be made, and in the meantime the debts of the testator, as well as the money to be paid to his widow and the expenses of maintenance and education of the plaintiffs, should all be paid from the income derived from the entire estate. Of course all of the property of the estate was liable for the testator's debts, and creditors with executions could proceed against any of it. If the executor failed to pay the debts owing by the estate from the income thereof, and execution creditors had lands constituting a portion of the home place levied upon and sold to satisfy their debts, then the plaintiffs, to whom had been specifically devised a two-thirds interest in the lands of the home place, would have the right to require contribution from the devisees to whom had been specifically devised the testator's "interest" in the lands constituting the Dennis place, as well as from those holding under such last-named devisees with notice of the plaintiffs' rights as to this matter. 2 Jarman on Wills (6th Ed.) 2031; 37 Cyc. 392; 27 A. & E. Enc. Law, 251; Compton v. Pitman, 49 Ga. 612; Jones v. Sikes, 85 Ga. 546, 11 S. E. 664; Civil Code 1910, § 4588.

It was proper to have the alleged pro rata liability of each of the defendant devisees of the Dennis place and of the defendants holding under them determined in one action. See Chamblee v. Atlanta Brewing & Ice Co., 131 Ga. 554, 62 S. E. 1032. As was well said by Mr. Justice Warner in the case of Nail v. Mobley, 9 Ga. 278: "It is the interest of parties, as well as the interest of the public, that all matters in controversy between them should be settled in one suit, when it can be done with safety and without great practical inconvenience."

We have decided the only points necessary to dispose of the question as to whether or not the petition was multifarious, and with confidence have arrived at the conclusion that it was not; and therefore the judgment of the lower court must be reversed. All the Justices concur.

SOUTHERN CEMENT STONE CO. v.
LOGAN COAL & SUPPLY CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 21, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 884*)—RIGHT TO REVIEW—ACQUIESCENCE IN DECISION.

Upon the hearing of an application for an interlocutory injunction, the court enjoined the plaintiff from doing certain acts and the defendant from doing certain acts, but provided that the order granting the injunction against the plaintiff should be superseded upon the giving of a specified bond, conditioned to pay the defendant such damages as it may recover on the final trial. It being made to appear to this court that the plaintiff gave bond in accordance with the terms of the order, an exception to the order on the ground that the plaintiff should have been allowed to do the work without giving such bond will not be entertained.

(a) If the order be construed to mean that the defendant was permitted to do certain work merely upon giving bond conditioned to pay the plaintiff such damages as it might recover upon the final trial of the case, an exception to the order, on the ground that the defendant should have been enjoined without being permitted to perform the acts upon giving bond, will not be considered by this court, when it appears that the defendant gave bond in accordance with the terms of the order, and, since the bill of exceptions was filed, has performed the acts which the plaintiff sought to have the defendant restrained from doing; nor will such exception be considered if the order be construed to mean that the defendant was not permitted to do such work unless it gave the required bond and also registered its business with the municipality of Brunswick and took out a license from that city, where the work done by the defendant was upon the streets of the city and in pursuance of a contract between the defendant and the city, the latter being no party to the case.

Error from Superior Court, Glynn County; O. B. Conyers, Judge.

Action by the Southern Cement Stone Company against the Logan Coal & Supply Company. From an order granting an interlocutory injunction on condition, plaintiff brings error. Writ of error dismissed.

F. H. Harris and R. D. Meader, for plaintiff in error. Crovatt & Whitfield, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. This case involved a contest between the parties as to which had the right to do certain paving and curbing of the sidewalks on a street in the city of Brunswick. The appellant was plaintiff in the court below, and the parties will be referred to as plaintiff and defendant. On an interlocutory hearing for temporary injunction, the court issued an order enjoining the plaintiff from paving the sidewalks on specified portions of the street, and enjoining the defendant from paving certain other portions of the sidewalks. The terms of the order were such that the injunctions were superseded with respect to the plaintiff upon its giving a bond required by the order, conditioned to pay the defendant such damages as it might recover on the final trial of the case. Exceptions filed by the plaintiff assign as error: First, so much of this order as required it to give bond before allowing it to do certain work; and, second, so much of the order as permitted the defendant to continue certain other work upon complying with the conditions of the order and restrained the plaintiff from doing that particular work, plaintiff contending that the court should have enjoined the defendant from doing this portion of the work and have permitted the plaintiff to perform it without any restriction. The defendant filed in this court a motion to dismiss the writ of error, which motion contained the following grounds: "(1) The respective parties to said case, having each for itself made and filed in the office of the clerk of Glynn superior court the several bonds, certified copies of which are hereto attached and made a part of this motion, contemplated and authorized by the judgment of the court below excepted to and to be reviewed in said case, nothing remains upon which the judgment of the Supreme Court, if rendered now in the premises, can operate. (2) That each of said parties, having so made and filed in its own behalf the bond authorized by the judgment of the court excepted to and to be reviewed, thereby accepted the terms of said judgment and is estopped from excepting thereto, and no judgment rendered thereupon by the Supreme Court of Georgia can now be of effect. (3) The acts sought to be enjoined having been fully done and accomplished since the filing of the bill of exceptions in said case, the writ of error ought not to be entertained." Attached to the motion were certified copies of the bonds given by the plaintiff and the defendant pursuant to the terms of the interlocutory order referred to above.

Upon the plaintiff accepting the conditions of the order by giving the required bond, it became freed from any restraint under the injunction against its doing that portion of the work covered by the bond and which forms the basis of the assignment of error first mentioned above. Whether or not the third ground of the motion to dismiss can be construed as alleging that this portion of the work has been completed, the plaintiff rested under no injunction with reference thereto after the giving of the bond, and had a right to go ahead with that portion of the work. There is now, therefore, no question for this court to decide with respect to the action of the court in dealing with that portion of the work in the interlocutory order to which exception is made. The practical effect of the order was to enjoin the plaintiff unless it gave a certain bond, and, plaintiff having given the bond, there was no injunction outstanding against it. If the plaintiff wished to except to the order enjoining it unless it gave bond, it should have excepted without giving the bond and accepting the terms of the order. The attitude in which the plaintiff placed itself in excepting to the order enjoining it unless it gave bond, and that in which it placed itself in accepting the terms of the order by giving the bond so that it could proceed with the work, are inconsistent. The plaintiff could not except to the provisions of the order and also accept its terms. See, in this connection, Glover v. S. F. & W. Ry. Co., 107 Ga. 34, 32 S. E. 876 (3); Rome R. Co. v. Thompson, 101 Ga. 26, 28 S. E. 429 (11).

The third ground of the motion to dismiss

recites that the acts "sought to be enjoined" have been fully done and accomplished. A copy of the motion to dismiss, and a rule nisi of this court requiring counsel for the plaintiff to show cause why the motion should not be sustained, were served on such counsel, and in their answer to the latter they admit that the plaintiff and the defendant have given the bonds required by the order, and, with reference to the acts of the defendant sought to be enjoined, they state: "The defendant in error has not, so far as we are advised, performed the work of laying the pavement and curbing in compliance with its contract, and we do not admit that it has done so. The act sought to be enjoined originally was the laying of such paving and curbing by the defendant. Even if it has done so, it would have been in contempt of the trial judge's order as to registering its business and paying its license, and the court will not presume that it has done an illegal act." There is no denial of the statement, in the third ground of the motion to dismiss, that the acts sought to be enjoined have been fully done and accomplished since the filing of the bill of exceptions. Under this answer, it is proper for this court, in dealing with the motion to dismiss, to treat the work by the defendant, sought to be enjoined by the plaintiff, as having been "fully done and accomplished" since the filing of the bill of exceptions. See, in this connection, Henderson v. Hoppe, 103 Ga. 684, 685, 686, 30 S. E. 653. The bond required by the order as a prerequisite to the defendant doing the work sought to be enjoined having been given, the doing of such work by the defendant will not be held to be illegal. The order granted in this case is not altogether clear in its terms. It is susceptible of a construction that, upon the defendant merely giving the bond required, it could proceed with the work. If this construction be put upon it, it appearing that the bond has been given and the work completed, an exception to the order permitting the defendant to do the work upon giving the bond would not be considered. Baird v. Atlanta, 131 Ga. 451, 62 S. E. 525; Davis v. Jasper, 119 Ga. 57, 45 S. E. 724; Henderson v. Hoppe, supra. It should be construed to mean that, upon giving the required bond, the defendant should not do the work without first registering its business and taking out a municipal license. It should be borne in mind that this proceeding was not brought by the city, but was a controversy between two competing contractors to perform certain work on the sidewalks, and the work which the defendant was to do was under a contract with the city itself, and not as a general contractor doing work for other people. It appears that the bond was given and the work has actually been completed. While it is not affirmatively shown that the defendant registered and took out a municipal license, neither does it appear that it did not do so. As the work was done directly under a contract with the city and under its supervision, we cannot assume that it was illegally done without complying with the necessary municipal requirements. Nor do we think that under such circumstances, after the giving of the bond and the completion of the work, this court is bound to proceed to determine whether the court committed error in granting the order complained of respecting the injunction sought against its performance, on the assumption that such work was done for the city without a due compliance with the municipal laws, or merely because it is not affirmatively shown that there was a registration and an issuance of a license.

It appearing that there is now no substantial issue between the parties before this court for decision, the writ of error is dismissed. All the Justices concur.

McCOOK v. LAUGHLIN. (No. 3,051.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§§ 235, 277*)—FORECLOSURE—AFFIDAVIT OF ILLEGALITY—AMENDMENT—PAYMENT.

There was no error in the allowance of an amendment to the affidavit of illegality, which merely amplified a pre-existing ground alleging payment. The reference to the contract was immaterial. The material subject of inquiry was whether the mortgagor had paid the transferee of the mortgage a sufficient amount to discharge the mortgage, either in money or in specifics accepted by the transferee in lieu of money. A mortgagor has the right to direct that an unquestioned indebtedness due to him by the holder of a mortgage shall be applied towards the payment of the mortgage and the discharge of its lien, and such direction on the part of the debtor is equivalent to payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Dec. Dig. §§ 235, 277.*]

2. FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGES—STRIKING ANSWER.

There was no error in refusing to strike the answer of the defendant to the mortgage foreclosure. The answer stated the defendant's case so fully as to put the plaintiff on notice, and its allegations were such that, if they were proved, they constituted a valid defense.

3. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—REFUSAL OF NEW TRIAL.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and there was no error in refusing a new trial.

Error from City Court of Sparta; R. W. Moore, Judge.

Action by McGregor McCook, to foreclose a chattel mortgage, against Sid Laughlin. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

R. H. Lewis and R. L. Merritt, for plaintiff in error. Burwell & Fleming, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. [1] McCook foreclosed a mortgage on certain personal property. The mortgage was originally given to one Evans Johnson, and was by him transferred, on March 2, 1908, to McCook. To the foreclosure of the mortgage, Laughlin, the defendant, interposed an affidavit of illegality, in the first paragraph of which he pleaded that the mortgage had been fully paid, and in the remaining paragraphs proceeded to state the manner in which he claimed the payment was made. On the trial the defendant was permitted, over objection of the plaintiff, to amend his affidavit of illegality by setting up that the mortgage was originally made to Johnson, and that after December, 1908, the plaintiff advanced to the defendant sufficient money under said contract to pay off the mortgage, but that the plaintiff caused the mortgage to be transferred to himself, and held the same as an advance to the defendant under the contract, and that the defendant had paid it as a part of the things advanced under the contract.

[2] A second paragraph of the amendment averred that the defendant having paid the plaintiff since the said transfer considerably more than the amount of the mortgage the mortgage was fully paid off and discharged, and should be canceled. The plaintiff objected to the allowance of this amendment, upon the ground that the proceeding was "a foreclosure of a mortgage purchased by the plaintiff in this case from an outside party, against this defendant," and "that the defendant seeks to plead another contract between [the plaintiff] and the defendant, and not a plea to the mortgage sought to be foreclosed; and, further, because said amendment attempts to set up a plea of payment, and does not set out when paid, where paid, and to whom paid." The affidavit of illegality had attached to it an itemized bill of particulars, setting out certain lumber furnished by the defendant to the plaintiff, and certain labor which he alleged he had performed for him. We fall to see the point of the objection to the amendment, or how the question is affected by the fact that the mortgage was originally payable to Evans Johnson, instead of to McCook, the plaintiff in fi. fa. The question as to whether there was any other contract between McCook and Laughlin is immaterial, except in so far as it is a part of the history of the case.

The real question is whether, as stated by the defendant, he had paid McCook enough to discharge the mortgage. Whatever contracts may have existed between McCook and Laughlin, or regardless of when the mortgage was transferred to McCook, if, as a matter of fact, Laughlin made payments to McCook, at any time while McCook was the holder of the mortgage, which the debtor directed to be applied in extinguishment of the mortgage, these payments would be good, and if the payments made by him were sufficiently large to extinguish the indebtedness then the levy should be dismissed. According to the allegations of Laughlin's affidavit of illegality, or plea, he made a contract with McCook, in December, 1908, by which McCook agreed to buy certain lumber from him at a specified price, and this, so far as this case is concerned, is perhaps the only material use of the contract. According to the defendant's affidavit, when compared with the statement rendered him by McCook, he had paid enough to have discharged the mortgage, and he alleged that this was the understanding. He testified that he directed that the lumber for which he had not otherwise paid to be applied to the discharge of the mortgage, and this would have been equally effectual.

Judgment affirmed.

ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO. v. LANE & AUTRY. (No. 2,960.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 91*)—PROCEDURE—STATEMENT OF CAUSE OF ACTION.

The statement of the plaintiffs' cause of action was sufficient for the purposes of a suit in the justice's court. It set forth plainly an action for damages to personal property. The statements of fact in the summons impliedly charged negligence, although it was not expressly alleged that the defendant was negligent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 321; Dec. Dig. § 91.*]

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 194*)—APPEAL TO JURY—CERTIORARI.

There was no error in dismissing the certiorari. The remedy of the dissatisfied party was appeal, and not certiorari. An issue of fact was presented, which required the decision of a jury. Where the amount in controversy in a justice's court is $50 or less, and the issue involved is one purely of fact, there must be an appeal to a jury in the justice's court before the case can be carried to the superior court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 774, 775; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

Error from Superior Court, Grady County; Frank Park, Judge.

Action by Lane & Autry against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. From a judgment of the superior court, dismissing certiorari to a justice of the peace, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Cain & Wille, for plaintiff in error. Ledford & Terrell, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. [1] Lane & Autry sued the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company in a justice's court for damages. The justice of the peace rendered a judgment for the plaintiffs, and the defendant company sued out a writ of certiorari. Upon the hearing in the superior court the judge dismissed the certiorari. In the justice's court the plaintiff in error demurred to the summons generally, and also specially because it was not alleged the killing was done negligently, or by the negligent running of defendant's trains or cars. The justice overruled the demurrer, and exception was taken to this ruling. We think the ruling of the magistrate was right. The summons required the plaintiff "to answer to plaintiff's demand upon an action for damages to personal property, * * * a copy of which cause of action is hereto attached." In the copy of the cause of action attached to the summons, following an itemized statement of the dates upon which certain hogs were killed and the value of each, it is stated: "All of the above property killed by the running of engine, cars, or other machinery of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company at and near McGriff street crossing in the town of Whigham, Ga., and in said district G. M., said county and state." We have several times ruled that niceties of pleading are not required in a justice's court, though, of course, it is required that the plaintiff shall so plainly and distinctly set forth his complaint as to define his cause of action and enable the defendant to be clearly apprised of what he is required to defend. We understand this to be the rule laid down by the Supreme Court in Macon & Birmingham Railway Company v. Walton, 121 Ga. 275, 48 S. E. 940, which is cited by counsel for plaintiff in error. In that case it was held that although it was permissible to style the plaintiff's suit as an action upon an account, when it was not technically such an action, the plaintiff is not relieved from the necessity of setting out his cause of action with some degree of certainty, and having a copy of the same attached to the summons. In the Walton Case the summons called the action a suit upon an account, and did not have attached to it a copy of the cause of action actually sued upon. As Judge Simmons, in delivering the opinion, remarked: "It is impossible to tell, from the summons or from the 'account' thereto attached, the nature of the claim upon which the action was based. There was nothing to put the defendant upon notice of the character of such claim, that it might be able to prepare a defense." The court did not hold that it was necessary for an action for damages in a justice's court to specifically allege the negligence complained of, but only that the character of the action, if it was one for damages, should be stated. In the present case the summons says plainly that the suit is for "damages to personal property," and from the statement, in setting forth the cause of action, that the personal property damaged was killed by the running of the engine, cars, and other machinery of the railroad company, it is to be inferred that the railroad company was negligent, because this is the presumption of the law, and when such killing is done and proved the plaintiff has made a prima facie case.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes.

[2] 2. The judge dismissed the certiorari upon the ground that it was sued out from the judgment of the justice of the peace in a case where the amount claimed was less than $50, without an appeal to a jury. We think this ruling is correct. The decision is controlled by the ruling of this court in Schultes v. Campos, 5 Ga. App. 277, 63 S. E. 23. An issue of fact was presented in this case. The plaintiffs showed the killing of the hogs by the trains of the defendant company. This raised the presumption of negligence, which it was the duty of the defendant to rebut by testimony showing that there was no negligence. It could not be said as a matter of law that the testimony of defendant's witnesses was sufficient to rebut the presumption raised by law; and therefore there was an issue of fact which should have been determined by a jury upon appeal. As to one of the hogs alleged to have been killed on August 25th there was no evidence introduced in behalf of defendant.

Judgment affirmed.

STRICKLAND v. STATE. (No. 3,081.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 60*) — VOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER.

Where one shoots at another, intending to kill him, under such circumstances that the killing, if accomplished, would be voluntary manslaughter, but the shot misses him and accidentally kills an innocent third person, the homicide will be voluntary manslaughter. 1 Bishop's New Criminal Law, § 328; 2 Bishop's New Criminal Law, § 719.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1064½*) — REVIEW — ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR.

The only ground in the motion for a new trial which contains a special assignment of error of law is not verified by the trial judge, and therefore presents no question for this court.

GLASS v. CHILDS. (No. 2,861.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

GAMING (§ 19*)—CONTRACTS (§ 138*)—SPECULATIVE TRANSACTIONS—EFFECT OF ILLEGALITY—AID OF COURTS.

It being undisputed that the note and the check sued upon were given in settlement for the original margin and profits in a gambling contract or speculation in cotton futures, the verdict for the defendant was right, and the court did not err in refusing a new trial, especially as the alleged newly discovered testimony tended only to further show that the dealings between the plaintiff and defendant were of a character forbidden by law. The aid of courts of justice cannot be invoked to enforce alleged rights which depend upon contracts outlawed by sound public policy and good morals. The plaintiff having admitted upon the trial that the indebtedness he sought to recover was for money claimed by him as his share of a deal in cotton futures, in which the defendant and himself were to share jointly in the profits and loss, the verdict for the defendant was demanded, and, if there had been errors in the trial, they would be immaterial.

Error from City Court of Covington; W. H. Whaley, Judge.

Action by J. B. Glass against W. W. Childs. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

C. C. King, for plaintiff in error. Middlebrook, Rogers & Knox, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Glass brought suit against Childs upon a note and a check. Childs admitted the execution of both instruments. He admitted a refusal to pay the check, and that the bank upon which the check was drawn had not paid it upon presentation. He set up two defenses: One was that the note and check were without consideration; that at the time he gave the note he had forgotten, or was uncertain, whether he had paid the plaintiff what he owed him or not, and, not being willing to swear that he had paid him, he executed the papers in question, but thereafter he found a bank check which he had given to Glass, and which had been paid by the bank to Glass, which antedated the note and check sued upon, and which represented identically the same transaction. Upon that ground he claimed that his debt to Glass had actually been paid before he gave the note and check. It is alleged, however, in this plea, that "in the fall or winter of 1905 plaintiff asked defendant to join him in buying 100 bales of cotton futures, which defendant did, plaintiff and defendant each one putting up $100 as a margin to cover loss on said futures, and the contract was taken in defendant's name, and the note and draft or check sued on were given the plaintiff for his $100 so advanced as a margin on said cotton future contract, and for his part of the profits thereon, and the interest on the money up to the time of giving said note," and for this reason the defendant pleaded that both the note and the check were based on an illegal contract and speculation scheme, and cannot be enforced or collected out of him, and that the consideration of the note is illegal, void, and contrary to public policy, because it is a part of said illegal contract. It will thus be observed that each of the pleas in fact set up a total failure of consideration—the one, because the debt was alleged to have been paid by mistake before the note was given; the other, because the consideration was one not recognized nor tolerated by law.

There was conflict in the evidence with regard to the check said to be given in settlement of the differences between the plaintiff and defendant, but there was no conflict as to the nature of the dealings in which they were engaged with each other, and no dispute that if there was any dividend due the defendant to the plaintiff it was for the plaintiff's original margin and his share of profits and deals in cotton futures where the collections were made by the defendant. The plaintiff himself admitted in his testimony that the purchase of 200 bales of cotton futures, in two purchases and two sales of 100 bales each, was the only transaction they ever had, and that each purchase was made in the name of the defendant; one-half of the purchase being for himself and one-half for the defendant, the defendant receiving all the money for both sales—both the margin put up and the profits, though he insisted that the defendant had never paid anything. The defendant, agreeing with the plaintiff as to the nature of the transaction upon which the alleged indebtedness depended, simply urged that he had paid the debt before he gave the note and check through mistake, by means of a check for $245, which he had paid the plaintiff, and which he introduced in evidence as corroborative of his statement.

The finding in favor of the defendant upon the plea of failure of consideration by anterior payment of the indebtedness was supported by some evidence, and the defense based upon the illegality or immorality of the consideration was absolutely demanded by the evidence, because the plaintiff himself admitted this defense to be true. We find no error in the ruling of the court upon the admissibility of testimony, nor in the charge. But, even if there were errors, they would be immaterial, because the law will not lend its aid to secure for either party an advantage to which he might be entitled under a contract which is abhorrent to sound public policy and good morals. No principle of jurisprudence is better settled than this. An extensive citation of authority is unnecessary. We need only to refer to the cases of Watkins v. Nugen, 118 Ga. 373, 45 S. E. 262, Id., 118 Ga. 378, 45 S. E. 260, Tompkins v. Compton, 93 Ga. 525, 21 S. E. 79, and cases cited, as well as Hentz v. Booz, 8 Ga. App. 577, 70 S. E. 108. It is a general rule of law that, where it is plainly disclosed that the parties are themselves engaged in an undertaking which the law cannot decently afford to touch, the law will leave them where it finds them. A court of justice will not lend its aid to the enforcement of any contract, the making of which is prohibited, nor to the enforcement of anything which is necessary to complete the accomplishment of an unlawful purpose. If A. and B. make a sale of a forged paper, and the purchaser pays the proceeds to A., the aid of a court of law could not be invoked to force A. to pay to B. his part of the proceeds of the sale of the forged paper, and it would not give the court any concern if B. were successful in defrauding A. by withholding from his companion in guilt his share of the fruits of the iniquity. We grant that in the instance we have suggested the degree of moral obloquy would be far greater than in a case where the parties were simply engaged in gambling in cotton futures; but the principle is the same so far as the courts are concerned. Where an act which from beginning to end is contrary to public policy is incomplete, and something remains to be done to complete it according to the original undertaking of the parties thereto, the courts cannot afford to assist in the completion of the illegal act.

One of the grounds of the motion for new trial depended upon the fact that the plaintiff since the trial had found a check for $100 which antedated the check given by the defendant and upon which the defendant predicated his claim that he had paid the debt. For the reasons we have stated, it was not error for the trial judge to disregard the newly discovered evidence, because it only tended to show more clearly the nature of the transaction in which the parties to the case engaged. But, aside from this, the testimony is of no probative value, for it is merely cumulative of the testimony of the plaintiff and impeaching to the testimony of the defendant, and, furthermore, the plaintiff himself swore upon the trial that the first time they bought cotton futures together each party paid $100 margin, and the check which has been found does nothing more than sustain that statement. It would not illustrate anything as to the payment of the claim by the defendant, because it is not really inconsistent with the defendant's contention.

Judgment affirmed.

DUKES v. STATE. (No. 3,012.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 111*)—REQUISITES OF ACCUSATION—STATUTORY OFFENSES—EXCEPTIONS.

The chief enacting clause of the act of 1907, regulating the sale of narcotic drugs, does not render the sale of cocaine in every instance illegal. The things expressly excepted from the enacting clause of the law should be expressly negated, or the alleged violation should be so specifically charged as to negative the statutory exceptions by implication.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 295-298; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 91*)—REQUISITES OF ACCUSATION—UNLAWFUL NATURE OF ACT.

The true test of the sufficiency of an indictment to withstand a general demurrer, or a motion to quash, is found in the answer to the question: Can the defendant admit the charge as made and still be innocent? If he can, the indictment is fatally defective. The mere characterization of an act which may lawfully be committed as unlawful does not suffice to so inform one accused of crime of the nature of the offense with which he is charged as to enable him to prepare for trial. To charge that an act intrinsically lawful was done unlawfully, without more, is not a statement of a fact, but a mere conclusion of the pleader.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Dec. Dig. § 91.*]

3. DEMURRER TO INDICTMENT.

The court erred in overruling the defendant's demurrer, and all of the subsequent proceedings were nugatory.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

R. J. Dukes was convicted of violating Acts 1907, p. 121, relating to the sale of narcotic drugs, and brings error. Reversed.

Hitch & Denmark, for plaintiff in error. Walter C. Hartridge, Sol. Gen., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. [1,2] The defendant was indicted in the superior court of Chatham county charged with the offense of misdemeanor; it being alleged that in Chatham county, on a day named, he "did unlawfully sell and furnish cocaine, contrary to the laws of the said state," etc. The defendant demurred to the indictment upon the following grounds: Generally and also for the reason that the indictment charges conclusions only; that the selling or furnishing of cocaine is not necessarily unlawful; that the indictment fails to set forth any particular facts by reason of which the alleged selling was unlawful; that the indictment denies the accused the right to know enough of the particular facts constituting the alleged offense to enable him to prepare for trial, in that it fails to set out the essential elements of the particular offense charged, and because the indictment fails to inform the accused with sufficient definiteness and certainty as to the way or means by which he is alleged to have violated the law. There are two additional grounds of demurrer, one in which the plaintiff insists that the act under which the indictment was found is unconstitutional, and another which specifies all of the various ways in which the act in question may be violated, and avers that the indictment fails to negative the existence of any or all of the facts and circumstances under which the selling and furnishing of cocaine may be lawful.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The constitutionality of the act of 1907, regulating the sale of narcotic drugs (Acts 1907, p. 121), has been ruled by the Supreme Court, and consequently there was no error in overruling the demurrer based upon the contention that the act was unconstitutional.

We shall consider so much of the demurrer as relates to the proper characterization of sales of cocaine lawful and sales unlawful, in connection with what we shall have to say in regard to the sufficiency of the language used in the indictment in the present case, because in framing a criminal charge language may be employed which will as effectually relieve the defendant from the necessity of preparing to meet a different charge as if it were expressly excepted by distinct statement. One who is charged with the offense of carrying a pistol concealed would have no difficulty in being informed by the charge contained in such an accusation that he could not be tried for having a pistol at a public gathering. In other words, the distinct statement of the manner in which an offense was actually committed operates to exclude a charge that it was committed in any other way than that alleged. In the first enacting clause of the act now under consideration (Acts 1907, p. 121), it is made "unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to sell, furnish or give away any cocaine, alpha or beta eucaine, opium, morphine, heroin, chloral hydrate, * * * except upon the original written orders or prescriptions of a lawfully authorized practitioner of medicine, dentistry or veterinary medicine, which order or prescription shall be dated and shall contain the name of the person for whom prescribed, or, if ordered by a practitioner of veterinary medicine, shall state the kind of animal for which ordered, and shall be signed by the person giving the prescription or order." We are of the opinion that the indictment in the present case is fatally defective because it is not alleged either that the cocaine was sold without a written prescription of a lawful practitioner of medicine, dentistry, or veterinary medicine, or that it was sold upon a prescription which was not dated, or that it did not contain the name of the person for whom prescribed, and, if ordered by a practitioner of veterinary medicine, it did not state the kind of animal for which it was ordered, or that, the purchaser being a practitioner of veterinary medicine, the order did not state the kind of animal for which it was ordered, or that the prescription or order was not signed by the person giving the prescription.

A general negation of the exception would in many cases be sufficient, as where it is stated that it was sold upon no prescription at all, but in the present case there is neither express nor implied negation of the exception.

Judgment reversed.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 913*)—NEW TRIAL—GROUND—ACQUITTAL OF CODEFENDANT.

When two are jointly indicted for murder as principals in the first degree, and one is convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and subsequently the other is acquitted, this fact of itself would not entitle the former to a new trial; and this is especially true where the evidence authorized the finding that the act of killing, while actually perpetrated by the one acquitted, was, under legal principles, imputable to the one convicted.

J. W. V. Maughon was convicted of manslaughter, and brings error. Affirmed.

N. L. Hutchins, I. L. Oakes, J. A. Perry, and T. J. Shackelford, for plaintiff in error. Clifford Walker, Sol. Gen., O. A. Nix, and W. B. Sloan, for the State.

HILL, C. J. Maughon was jointly indicted with Kelley Elrod for the crime of murder, and on his separate trial was convicted of voluntary manslaughter. His motion for a new trial being overruled, he brings error.

This is the second time this case has been before this court for review, and on the previous occasion we granted a new trial on exceptions to the charge of the court. In the opinion then rendered we made a full statement of the evidence. Maughon v. State, 7 Ga. App. 660, 67 S. E. 842.

[1] It is not now deemed necessary to repeat this statement, except in a general way, for the purpose of showing the theories relied upon by the state and the defendant illustrative of the special assignments of error to be considered and determined.

Maughon was a constable. The sheriff of the county asked him to arrest two brothers, Zack and Jake Cleghorn, for whom he held warrants, exhibiting the warrants to Maughon. Complying with the request, Maughon did arrest both of the brothers, telling them that he had warrants against them. They escaped from custody. Subsequently Maughon requested Kelley Elrod to go with him to rearrest the two Cleghorns. They proceeded to the home of the brother-in-law of the two men for whom they were searching, having been informed that they might be found there, and reached there about daybreak Saturday morning. Maughon went to the front door of the house and Elrod to the back door. The brothers were inside this house, and attempted to escape therefrom. The decedent ran to the front door, where he met Maughon, who took hold of his arm and attempted to hold him, and he jerked loose from Maughon and ran out of the door and around the corner of the house, and while running away he was fired on twice, one shot taking effect. While this witness who testified to the facts could not positively identify either Maughon or Elrod as the party who fired the shot, she was positive that the shots both came from the direction of these two men. Immediately after the two shots were fired, she heard the decedent exclaim: "You have shot me." And the accused and Elrod ran off. About five minutes after the firing of these two shots, the decedent was found shot, and was dead. In addition to this direct evidence the state proved that the accused, subsequently to the killing, made incriminatory statements substantially as follows: In one of these statements he said that "they," referring to himself and his codefendant, Elrod, "shot twice, and at the second shot the decedent hollered." Another statement of this character was that the accused said that two or three shots were fired, and that while he was struggling with the decedent he called out to Kelley Elrod to shoot, and Kelley Elrod shot twice; that Cleghorn had hold of him when Elrod shot the first time; that Cleghorn then turned him loose and ran off about 10 steps; and that Elrod shot at him again and he hollered, and Elrod shot at him again. It will be seen from this evidence that the theory of the state was that, while Elrod fired the fatal shot, the two, Elrod and Maughon, were acting jointly, and that Elrod fired the shot in obedience to the request or command of the accused to do so, and that, therefore, as he was aiding and abetting the actual perpetrator of the offense, he was equally guilty.

The defense relied upon was that Maughon did not shoot at all; that, when the decedent came out of the door, the accused asked him who he was, taking hold of him with his left hand, and telling him to stop, for he was under arrest; that the decedent shoved him off the veranda, and struck him in the face with his fist, and knocked him to his knees, and, when he arose, his pistol being in his overcoat pocket, he attempted to get it, but while he was struggling with the decedent for the pistol he called to Elrod to come around where he was, and, as Elrod came around, he hollered, "Halt! halt!" and fired twice; that Elrod did not fire in the direction of the deceased, but up in the air; that the deceased then broke loose and ran away, and in a few seconds the third shot was fired in the direction in which the deceased ran. He denied the incriminatory statements made by the deceased, and denied that either he or Elrod had fired the fatal shot, and stated that the decedent was actually killed by his brother, who fired the third shot under the impression that he was firing at the officers.

The issues, clear cut and simply stated, between the state and the accused, are these: Did Elrod, under the circumstances as proved by the state, fire the fatal shot? If he did so, Maughon was as guilty as he was, being present, aiding and abetting the unlawful act. On the other hand, did the brother of the deceased fire the fatal shot? These conflicting theories are supported by evidence. The question was one for the jury to determine. They solved the problem in favor of the state, accepting the theory that Elrod fired the fatal shot under the order and command of Maughon; but mitigated, however, the theory of the state to the extent of believing that he was acting under a sudden heat of passion on account of the assault made upon him by the decedent, and so found him guilty of voluntary manslaughter.

The law applicable to both the theories of the state and the accused was fairly and clearly presented to the jury in the charge; and, unless there is merit in some of the special assignments of error, this court has no right to disturb the verdict. We will take up the special assignments of error in their order and consider them in the light of the evidence, which has been briefly, but substantially, stated.

[2] The first ground of the amended motion presents the fact that since the conviction of the accused for the offense of voluntary manslaughter Kelley Elrod, his codefendant, has been tried and acquitted, and it is insisted that as the state contended that the accused was guilty of murder because he was present, aiding and abetting Elrod to shoot the decedent, and since the verdict of the jury in the Elrod Case proved the fact that neither Elrod nor Maughon fired the fatal shot that took the life of the deceased, but that the fatal shot was fired by some one else, a new trial should be granted to the accused in order that he might have the benefit of the verdict in favor of Elrod.

[3] Both Maughon and Elrod were indicted as the actual perpetrators of the crime, the indictment containing only the one count, but under this one count it is well settled that either or both may have been convicted as principals in the first or second degree, if the evidence had so authorized, and they could have been convicted either of murder or manslaughter under this one count of the indictment. Collins v. State, 88 Ga. 347, 14 S. E. 474, and cases cited, especially Hill v. State, 28 Ga. 604; McLeod v. State, 128 Ga. 17, 57 S. E. 83; Bradley v. State, 128 Ga. 20, 57 S. E. 237; Lewis v. State, 71 S. E. 417, decided May 12, 1911, by the Supreme Court of Georgia. In the case of Collins v. State, supra, it is held that "one indicted as principal merely can be convicted on evidence proving him guilty as principal in the second degree, if the facts be such as that the act by which the crime was perpetrated will on established principles of law be imputed to him as committed by himself through the agency of another. In such case the distinction of degrees is immaterial." In the case of Bruce v. State, 99 Ga. 50, 25 S. E. 760, it is held that where two persons are indicted for murder, one as principal in the first degree, and the other as principal in the second degree, the latter may be tried and convicted of murder, although the former had been previously tried and convicted of voluntary manslaughter only. In the opinion the Chief Justice cited the following illustration from 1 Starkie on Criminal Pleading (2d Ed.) 81: "Where A. and B. are present, and A. commits an offense in which B. aids and assists him, the indictment may either allege the matter according to the fact, or charge them both as principals in the first degree; for the act of one is the act of the other. And upon such an indictment B., who was present, aiding and abetting, may be convicted, though A. is acquitted. * * * If an indictment for murder charges that A. gave the mortal stroke, and that B. was present, aiding and abetting, both A. and B. may be convicted, though it turn out that B. struck the blow, and that A. was present, aiding and abetting. To go one step further, upon a similar indictment, charging A. as a principal in the first degree, and B. as present aiding and abetting, B. may be convicted, though A. be acquitted." In Hill v. State, 28 Ga. 604, it is said: "The indictment charged the defendant as a principal. The evidence showed that another inflicted the mortal blow, the prisoner being present, aiding and abetting. Held, that the variance was immaterial; both being principals in law, as well as in deed, and the stroke of one being in law the stroke of the other." Plain v. State, 60 Ga. 284; 2 Bishop's New Criminal Procedure, §§ 3, 4. These decisions, and many others which we might cite, show that from a legal standpoint the conviction of the accused for voluntary manslaughter can be sustained, although the state claimed that Elrod was the actual perpetrator of the crime, and the jury had acquitted him of this offense. In other words, from a strictly legal standpoint, the acquittal of Elrod was wholly immaterial, and the fact of his acquittal furnishes no legal reason for the acquittal of the accused. This ruling is both sound and logical. The verdict in the Elrod Case, although conclusive as between the state and himself, is not in any sense conclusive of the truth of the transaction. He may have been guilty notwithstanding the verdict of the jury. There may have been reasons in his case, growing out of the inability of the state to produce the same evidence on this trial as on the first, which induced the jury to acquit him, which did not exist in the case of Maughon; but, irrespective of this question, we are simply concerned with the proposition of law that, where two are jointly indicted as principals, the acquittal of one does not in any legal sense inure to the benefit of the other, although it may be a circumstance of exculpation. The case of Jackson v. State, 54 Ga. 439, is relied on by learned counsel for the plaintiff in error in support of his position that a new trial should be granted in order that Maughon may have the benefit of the acquittal of Elrod. The Jackson Case does not support this contention. In the Jackson Case Judge McCay, speaking for the court, gives as the reason why Jackson, the principal in the second degree, ought to have a new trial on account of the grant of a new trial to the principal in the first degree, that the record of the conviction of the principal in the first degree had been used on the trial of the other case and may have injured the accused, and that, this record having been expunged by setting the verdict aside, the principal in the second degree ought to have a new trial without this evidence bearing against him. In construing this decision the Supreme Court holds in the Bruce Case, supra, that the principle there announced did not conflict with the holding that the principal in the second degree may be tried and convicted of murder, although the principal in the first degree had been convicted of voluntary manslaughter only. And we say in this case that this principle does not conflict with the enunciation here made that where two are jointly indicted as principals in the first degree, and one is convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and subsequently the other is acquitted, this presents no reason why the verdict of conviction should be set aside and another trial granted. If Elrod had been convicted as principal in the first degree, and then Maughon had been convicted of voluntary manslaughter or murder, and subsequently the record of Elrod's conviction had been used as evidence against Maughon, and subsequently Elrod was granted a new trial, this fact would justify the grant of a new trial to Maughon. The headnote in the Jackson Case, supra, is as follows: "When on the trial of A. for murder in the second degree the record of the conviction of B. as principal in the first degree was introduced as evidence, and A. was found guilty as such principal in the second degree, and afterwards B. was granted a new trial, upon which he was found not guilty, held, that A. ought to have a new trial." While, as Judge McCay says in the Jackson Case, there may be some little confusion in the books as to the use of a verdict of guilty or acquittal of the principal in the first degree on the trial of the principal in the second degree, we think the true distinction is this: Where two men are jointly indicted, one as principal in the first degree, and one as principal in the second degree, the guilt of the principal in the first degree must be established by the state, but the record is not conclusive of that fact, and the conviction or acquittal may be denied, notwithstanding the record, and the verdict simply goes in evidence for what it is worth; but it is not conclusive and the truth may nevertheless be shown by evidence. The way we look at this case under the evidence none of this discussion is really material. Here two men were jointly indicted as principals in the first degree. One was tried and convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and the second was tried and acquitted, wholly without reference to the truth of the verdict in the first case, and the only pertinent and material question before us is whether the verdict was authorized by the law under the evidence in the present case. The law, as we have endeavored to show, authorized a verdict of guilty of voluntary manslaughter, and there is evidence to support such a verdict, although a jury has acquitted the other defendant, Elrod. And the principle announced in the Jackson Case, which was relied upon by learned counsel for the plaintiff in error, is not at all applicable to the facts of this case, but must be limited entirely to the facts of that case as enunciated in the headnote above quoted. We therefore conclude that the accused is not entitled to another trial on this assignment of error.

Objection is made to the following excerpt from the charge of the court: "A person may be a principal in an offense in two degrees. A principal in the first degree is the actor or absolute perpetrator of the crime. A principal in the second degree is he who is present, aiding and abetting the act to be done. To illustrate, one person participating and attempting to strike is equally guilty with the one who strikes. In other words if the evidence shows to the jury to your satisfaction beyond a reasonable doubt, as explained to you, that Elrod fired the fatal shot that killed the deceased, and you further believe that he was told to do so, told to shoot him by Maughon, and he, Maughon, was present, aiding and abetting the act of killing and participating in the act of killing, then he would be just as guilty as Elrod, though he didn't fire the fatal shot. This is just an illustration or explanation of the two degrees of any offense known in law as principals in the first and second degree, and it is not meant on the part of the court, in making this illustration, to express or intimate any opinion whether Elrod fired the shot or not." It is insisted that this charge was inapplicable, misleading, and confusing, since the indictment charged both of the defendants with being the actual perpetrators and joint principals in the murder, there being no charge in the indictment against either as a principal in the second degree, and the contention and theory of the state being that Elrod alone fired the shot that took the life of the deceased; that this charge authorized the jury to return a verdict of guilty of voluntary manslaughter as principal in the second degree, and this would have been erroneous; and, further, that, where a defendant is charged in the indictment as the absolute actor and perpetrator of the crime, he cannot be convicted as a principal in the second degree. That portion of the above excerpt where the learned trial judge makes a concrete application of the general principle announced to the facts of this case is especially objected to, it being insisted that there was nothing in the evidence, or in the admissions, as contended by the state, of Maughon, to show that he ever told Elrod to shoot Cleghorn at the time Elrod fired his pistol, and that this was an improper intimation by the court of an opinion that the evidence showed that Maughon told Elrod to shoot the deceased, or to shoot at him, it being earnestly contended by learned counsel that, even if this language was used by the accused to Elrod, there was nothing to show that the language applied to Cleghorn, the deceased, and that it might reasonably have been inferred from the language that the accused did not mean for Elrod to shoot at the deceased, but meant for him to shoot in the air for the purpose of frightening the deceased in order that he might desist from resisting arrest; that the language of the court as objected to was calculated to impress the jury with the idea that the judge believed that the language of Maughon requesting Elrod to shoot was a direction to him to shoot Cleghorn.

The first objection urged against this charge need not be considered, since the jury did not find the defendant guilty of voluntary manslaughter as principal in the second degree, but did find him guilty as the principal perpetrator of the crime of voluntary manslaughter, which they were fully authorized to do under the indictment. We do not see, however, why the jury could not legally return a verdict in the second degree. [4] While one cannot be convicted as an accessory before the fact to a charge of voluntary manslaughter, because the existence of an accessory presupposes premeditation and preparation, yet we do not see why one could not be convicted as principal in the second degree in the offense of voluntary manslaughter, for one can presently aid and abet a crime which may be committed on a sudden heat of passion, and without premeditation. There is quite a difference in this respect in the offense of an accessory before the fact and that of a principal in the second degree.

The second objection made to this charge is fully answered in the first division of this opinion, where decisions are cited in support of the proposition that one indicted as the absolute actor and perpetrator of the crime could be convicted under such charge as principal in the second degree. The objection urged against the concrete application by the court of the general principles of law to the facts of this case we think is without merit. It will be remembered that the theory of the state was that Maughon was guilty because he commanded Elrod to shoot at Cleghorn; that this act made him a principal in the second degree at least; in other words, that the crime actually committed by Elrod was imputed to Maughon as being committed by him through the agency of Elrod, and this made him equally guilty. It was the duty of the court to present this contention of the state to the jury, and in doing so to make such intelligent application of the law to the facts proved as would make the contention understood by the jury. Neither is there any intimation that this language of Maughon applied to Elrod. The judge simply told the jury: "If the evidence shows to your satisfaction beyond a reasonable doubt that Elrod fired the fatal shot that killed the deceased, and if you further believe that he was told to do so, told to shoot him by Maughon, and he, Maughon, was present, aiding and abetting the act of killing and participating in the act of killing, then he would be just as guilty as Elrod, though he didn't fire the fatal shot." It was not necessary for the court to charge the converse of this proposition to the jury, for clearly the converse was included in the proposition itself. If they did not believe that Maughon told Elrod to shoot Cleghorn, or that he told him to shoot in the air, or at something else, the jury would have understood, and could have understood, nothing else but that in this latter event Maughon would not be guilty with Elrod. In brief, we think that the charge objected to not only laid down a correct proposition of law, but made a clear hypothetical application to the principal facts of the case, and that the jury could not have reasonably inferred from the language of the judge that the court either entertained or expressed any opinion on the subject.

The following charge of the court on the subject of voluntary manslaughter is objected to: "If you believe from the evidence that the deceased, Cleghorn, made an assault either with his fist, or otherwise, upon Maughon, or was attempting to get his pistol to assault him with it, and if you further believe that smarting under this provocation, and acting under a sudden heat of passion provoked thereby, he, Maughon, ordered Elrod to shoot Cleghorn, and Elrod, acting in pursuance of this request, then and there shot and killed Cleghorn while he was fleeing from them, the killing, under these circumstances, would be voluntary manslaughter; and, if you believe this to be the truth of the case, you would be authorized to find the defendant Maughon guilty of voluntary manslaughter." It is insisted that there is no evidence either on the part of the state or of the defendant to authorize a charge on voluntary manslaughter. The evidence for the state alone or for the defendant alone would probably not authorize a charge on the law of voluntary manslaughter, for, if the first was the truth of the transaction, the accused was guilty of murder; and, if the latter was the truth of the transaction, the accused was guilty of nothing, because the killing was not done by him or by Elrod, nor did he participate criminally therein, but it was the result of a shot fired by the brother of the decedent under the impression that he was shooting at the defendants. But the jury in considering the evidence was not compelled to find the truth either in the evidence for the state or in the evidence for the defendant, but they had a right to consider the evidence of both sides in determining the issues presented and in arriving at the truth. To illustrate by the facts of this case: The accused testified in part that the decedent came to the door, engaged in a struggle with him, assaulted him, pushed him off the porch, and attempted to get his pistol. The wife of the decedent testified that her husband was shot by one of the two defendants, which one she did not know, but that the shots came from their direction, and that, when the second shot was fired, her husband said that he was shot, and she found him in a few minutes thereafter dead. If the jury believed that this evidence of the accused and this evidence of the state was the truth of the transaction so far as it went, and was applicable to the case, and they believed that, smarting from the assault made upon him by the decedent, the accused either shot, or ordered Elrod, his companion, to shoot, the deceased, and this was done under a sudden heat of passion provoked by the assault thus made upon him, the law of voluntary manslaughter was applicable. Indeed, we think that taking the evidence altogether the charge on the law of voluntary manslaughter as given by the court was demanded, and that the accused would have had just cause of complaint against the judge if he had not charged the law of voluntary manslaughter just as he did.

The remaining ground of the motion for a new trial is not verified, and is not insisted upon in the brief filed by counsel for plaintiff in error. We have given the case a very careful examination, and we find no error of law, and there is evidence in the record which supports the verdict of voluntary manslaughter.

Judgment affirmed.

MILLER v. ROBERTS. (No. 2790.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CONTRACTS (§ 266*)—RESCISSION—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT—RESTORATION OF BENEFITS.

One party to a contract cannot rescind for fraud while retaining the benefits of the contract. In order to entitle him to rescind, he must promptly upon discovery of the fraud restore, or offer to restore, to the other party whatever he has received by virtue of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 1186; Dec. Dig. § 266.*]

2. SALES (§ 41*)—VALIDITY—MISREPRESENTATION BY SELLER—MEANS OF INFORMATION—RELIANCE BY BUYER.

When the means of knowledge are at hand and equally available to both parties to a contract of sale and purchase, if the purchaser does not avail himself of these means, he will not be heard to say, in impeachment of the contract of sale, that he was deceived by the representations of the seller.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. § 84; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

3. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 534*)—RECOVERY OF ATTORNEY'S FEES—CONDITION PRECEDENT—NOTICE—WAIVER.

Where a promissory note contains an obligation to pay attorney's fees, the statutory notice which the plaintiff is required to give to the defendant as a condition precedent to his right to recover attorney's fees cannot be waived in the note, and the attempt to waive it therein is unenforceable and of no effect. (Hill, C. J., dissents as to this ruling.)

Error from City Court of Blakely; W. A. Jordan, Judge.

Action by W. C. Miller against J. W. Roberts. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

W. L. Geer, for plaintiff in error. W. F. Weaver, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. This was a suit on a promissory note. A verdict for the defendant was rendered and plaintiff's motion for a new trial was overruled.

The consideration of the note was the exclusive right to sell, in the counties of Early, Decatur, and Miller, "a pinless clothesline," under patent rights issued by the government of the United States to the seller. The defendant pleaded that when the sale was made the plaintiff represented to him that the only costs connected with the sale of the pinless clothesline would be the purchase price represented by the note sued upon, that none of the towns in the three counties of Early, Decatur, and Miller required any license or special business tax for the sale of said clothesline, and that, relying upon the truth of this statement, the purchase was made and the note given. This representation the defendant "found to be absolutely without truth, and, on account of said fraudulent representation, the patent right became and instantly was, upon the defendant's being required to pay a license to sell pinless clotheslines, worthless and useless to the defendant, and he immediately offered to return said patent right to the plaintiff, which offer was refused." Neither the note nor the contract of sale contained any representation on the subject of the payment of a license as alleged by the plea, and the plaintiff testified that no such statement was ever made by him to the defendant.

The defendant, in support of his plea, testified that he had sold about $100 worth of the pinless clotheslines covered by his contract in the counties mentioned, but that on reaching the town of Bainbridge, in Decatur county, he was informed that a license would be required before he could sell the line in that city, and, on inquiry, found that such was the case in the other towns in the county. He introduced in evidence an ordinance of the town of Blakely requiring the payment of $25 as a license before he would have the right to sell in that town the aforesaid pinless clothesline, and he testified that when he found that this was required he went to the plaintiff and asked that he either pay the license or rescind the contract.

[1] 1. The evidence in behalf of the defendant did not make a case which, under the law, would entitle him to have the contract rescinded for fraud. Conceding that a fraudulent representation was made, and that upon its discovery the defendant promptly offered to rescind, he did not offer to restore to the plaintiff any of the proceeds which he had realized from sales under his contract of purchase, and which he testified amounted to at least $100. Certainly he was not entitled to rescind the contract for fraud, when, according to his own statement, he had received a benefit out of the contract greater than the consideration for which the contract had been made.

[2] 2. Nor do we think the defense of deceit or fraud was established. This court is thoroughly committed to a high standard of good faith in the making of contracts, and either party to a contract is bound to disclose to the other any knowledge he may have of a material fact which may affect the value of the subject-matter or consideration of the contract. Marletta Fertilizer Co. v. Beckwith, 4 Ga. App. 249, 61 S. E. 149. But it is well settled that the law does not afford relief to one who suffers by not using the ordinary means of information that may be at hand, whether his neglect be due to indifference or to credulity. Whether the towns in the three counties mentioned required the payment of a license by the seller of pinless clotheslines was a fact which could be found out by the defendant as easily as by the plaintiff. In other words, the information was equally available to both parties. It is a matter of general knowledge that most towns and cities do require licenses from vendors of such articles.

The assertion by the plaintiff (assuming that he made it) that no license was required by any of the towns in any of those three counties was simply the assertion of a fact, the truth of which could have easily been inquired into by the defendant, and the defendant was bound to make such inquiry, and would not be authorized to rescind the contract for any damage resulting from a misrepresentation which, by the exercise of the most ordinary and reasonable diligence, he could have discovered was a misrepresentation. Greene v. Bryant, 2 Ga. 66. As was tersely expressed by Lord Kenyon, in the old case of Pasley v. Freeman, 3 Term Reports, 64: "Undoubtedly, where the common caution and prudence of man are sufficient to guard him, the law will not protect him in his negligence."

But to sum the whole matter up in a nutshell: Neither the law, nor equity, nor good conscience, will allow one party to a contract to rescind the contract for alleged fraud, or will on that ground relieve him from a compliance with his contract, where, according to his own statement, he has received from the contract a pecuniary benefit greater in amount than the consideration of the contract, and retains in his possession the fruits of the contract, and makes no offer to make an equitable adjustment thereof with the plaintiff. We do not see how the defendant can be relieved of the obligations of his contract while retaining the benefits thereof.

[3] 3. The note sued on in this case contained an agreement to pay "all costs of collection, including 10 per cent. on principal and interest as attorney's fees, if collected by law or through an attorney at law, and contained, also, a provision as follows: "The makers, indorsers and sureties on this note waive the ten days notice that is now required by law to be given as to when, where, and in what court the owner will proceed to collect or sue this note, and agree that if the owner places this note in the hands of an attorney for collection he is to collect ten per cent. upon the principal and interest as attorney's fees, and the said ten per cent. is hereby made a part of the principal."

The court instructed the jury that this attempt to waive the notice which the statute makes a condition precedent to the recovery of attorney's fees was unenforceable and of no effect, and to this instruction the plaintiff excepts. While the writer is of the opinion that this instruction was erroneous, the other members of the court are of the view that the exception is not well taken, and the writer is authorized to state the following as the opinion of the majority of the court:

The Civil Code 1910, § 4252, provides: "Obligations to pay attorney's fees upon any note or other evidence of indebtedness, in addition to the rate of interest specified therein, are void, and no court shall enforce such agreement to pay attorney's fees, unless the debtor shall fail to pay such debt on or before the return day of the court to which suit is brought for the collection of the same: Provided, the holder of the obligation sued upon, his agent, or attorney notifies the defendant in writing, ten days before suit is brought, or his intention to bring suit, and also the term of the court to which suit will be brought."

Prior to the act of 1890, known as the Twitty bill (codified into section 3667 of the Civil Code of 1895), there was nothing in our law or public policy which forbade the maker of a note or other obligation from promising to pay attorney's fees in addition to the debt. By the Twitty bill it was provided that obligations to pay attorney's fees were void and unenforceable by the courts, unless the defendant, upon being sued, filed a plea which he failed to sustain. This declared a new public policy in this state as to obligations to pay attorney's fees in addition to the principal and interest due upon an indebtedness. In 1900 this law was amended so as to make it read as it appears in the Code of 1910, § 4252, but the same policy in general outline was preserved; that policy being that such obligations should not be enforced, unless the creditor was in fact put to the necessity of employing an attorney to collect the debt through suit. The law declaring this policy was so shaped that to the creditor himself should not be left the absolute determination of the time when this necessity to employ counsel was upon him. The legislative mind seemed to contemplate that the creditor would be afforded full measure of protection in this respect, if the law provided a means whereby he could employ the attorney on what is called the return day of the court (that is, the last day on which suit may be filed, as respects a particular term), so that the present law on the subject does not allow the creditor to collect attorney's fees, though stipulated for in the note, unless he gives the debtor 10 days notice of his intention to file suit, informing him as to the court in which it will be brought, and of the term to which it is to be brought, and if the debtor pays up before the return day of the court arrives, or before the suit is filed upon the return day itself, the creditor cannot even if the notice has been given, enforce the obligation to pay the attorney's fees.

It may be said, therefore, that the declared public policy of this state on this subject is that obligations to pay attorney's fees in addition to the principal and interest stipulated for in the instrument creating the indebtedness are to be wholly void and unenforceable, unless the debtor by his act of not paying the debt before the return day, after he has been given timely notice, puts the creditor to the necessity of hiring an attorney. If the provision in the statute as to the giving of the notice was merely something which the law had established in favor of the debtor, and not involving any public interest or public policy, the debtor would undoubtedly have the right to waive it, under the Civil Code 1910, § 10; but we understand the rule to be that, wherever a provision of law is made for the enforcement of some public policy of the state, no person will be allowed to waive that provision, though he himself may be the immediate beneficiary.

The welfare of the state itself frequently demands that the law-making power shall enact statutes and declare public policies for the purpose of protecting citizens from hard contractual exactions or stipulations against which they might naturally be expected to protect themselves, but against which, on account of certain inherent weaknesses common to many classes of the people, they do not ordinarily take care to protect themselves; and where such safeguards have been erected the courts will not allow the parties to contract against the enforcement of the policy declared by the law. Instances of such legislation are familiar, the debtor classes being perhaps the most frequent beneficiaries; for example, the laws against taking usury, the law which prohibits a mortgagor from waiving his equity of redemption, the law against the enforcement of contractual penalties, etc. It is a familiar notion, often given expression in our jurisprudence, that it is one of the objects of the law to prevent debtors, urged by the pressure of the necessity of securing credit, or money, or extension of indebtedness, from yielding to such unjust or unreasonable exactions as a hard creditor may see fit to make.

So as to the present matter, the law, recognizing that many debtors, pressed by their necessity, would, in order to get the money, credit, or the extension which they desired, be willing to contract to pay the creditor attorney's fees in addition to principal and interest, whether the creditor was ever put to the necessity of using the attorney or not, stepped in and declared, as a matter of public policy, that such an obligation should be unenforceable, unless the necessity arose, just as it has declared, upon a similar consideration, that a promise to pay more than 8 per cent. interest is void. If the courts should enforce a waiver, such as the one here presented, made contemporaneously with the obligation to pay the attorney's fees, the whole policy in the law could easily be avoided in all cases by the smallest amount of designing. A debtor, willing to promise to pay the attorney's fees, would make no quibble over waiving the statutory notice. If this court should hold this waiver to be valid, it would be but a short while before it would be usual for all standard, printed forms of notes to contain a similar provision, and the law would be a dead letter.

There is nothing in what is here held which would prevent a debtor, after his note had matured, or even when it was about to mature, from waiving formal service of the notice, if he was in fact informed that suit for the indebtedness would be brought to a designated term of a particular court; in other words, there is nothing in the policy of the law which would forbid him to acknowledge service of a notice, or even to waive service, if he was in fact given notice of the intention to sue, and given the opportunity contemplated by the statute of paying the debt before the return day; but the majority of the court does not think that the waiver can be made as a part of the original contract, or that the spirit of the law can be violated by the stipulations of the parties.

The writer thinks that the statute in question was made solely for the benefit of the makers of the obligations therein described, and the requirement that notice must be given 10 days before suit is a personal privilege, which can be waived by the defendant, and that when he does so in the note he is bound by the waiver, and cannot be heard subsequently to repudiate it. Defendants are authorized to waive process, as well as the time of filing suit, and to consent that a judgment may be taken at an earlier term than the law would otherwise authorize. Civ. Code, 1910, § 5561. Section 5562, is mandatory in its terms. It declares that "the petition shall be filed at least twenty days before the term to which it is returnable." This waiver is analogous to the statutory notice now under consideration, and yet the Supreme Court has held that where the defendant waives, in writing, the requirement, as between himself and the plaintiff, the waiver is binding, in the absence of fraud, and the defendant cannot subsequently be heard to object that the petition was not filed 20 days before the term of the court to which the suit was returnable. Steadman v. Simmons, 39 Ga. 591. Where the maker of an obligation makes a contract to pay the 10 per cent. attorney's fees, and the statutory notice is not given as required, can it be doubted that the defendant would have the right, where suit is brought for the recovery of attorney's fees, to come into court and consent that a judgment be rendered against him for the attorney's fees, although the notice had not been given? And what he can do after suit is filed it would seem he could do previously. As before stated, I think the notice in question is solely a personal right or privilege.

Section 10 of the Civil Code of 1910 provides as follows: "Laws made for the preservation of public order or good morals cannot be done away with or abrogated by any agreement; but a person may waive or renounce what the law has established in his favor when he does not thereby injure others or affect the public interest." The statute now under discussion was not made for the preservation of public order or good morals, and, clearly being enacted in favor of defendants who are sued on obligations wherein they agree to pay attorney's fees, may be waived by them, unless such waiver injures others or affects the public interest. The public has no interest in a contract of this character, and none, except those who are parties to the contract, can possibly be injured by any waiver relating thereto.

Nor do we think that contracts which provide for the collection of attorney's fees from the defendant are against the public policy of this state. Prior to the act of 1891, commonly known as the Twitty bill, there was no legislation on this subject; the matter being purely one of individual contract. The act of 1891 first declared that these contracts were "absolutely void," and could not be enforced by the courts, unless the defendant filed a plea or pleas which he failed to sustain. Acts 1891, p. 221. The contract, although declared to be absolutely void, was not in fact absolutely void. It depended upon whether the plea or pleas filed to the suit were sustained, and if the plea or pleas were not sustained the contract was enforceable and the fees were collectible.

The act of 1900 (Acts of 1900, p. 53) struck out the words in the act of 1891, "unless a plea or pleas be filed by the defendant and not sustained," and inserted in lieu thereof the following words, to wit: "Unless the debtor shall fail to pay such debt on or before the return day of the court to which suit is brought for the collection of the same; provided the holder of the obligation sued upon, his agent, or attorney, notifies the defendant in writing ten days before suit is brought, of his intention to bring suit, and also the term of the court to which suit will be brought." The contract to pay fees, although declared to be void, under this amendment was not absolutely void, but only voidable, for, notwithstanding the language of the statute, which declares that the contract is absolutely void, the contract is valid where the debtor fails to pay the debt before the return day of the court to which suit is brought, and provided, further, that the statutory notice is given to the defendant. The contract to pay attorney's fees, therefore, is not one in violation of any law of this state, or contrary to the public policy of this state, and is entirely in harmony with the law and public policy of the state, but must be enforced in accordance with the requirements of the statute.

The agreement to waive the statutory notice is not analogous to a contract to waive the exemption of wages from process of garnishment, or, independently of statutory or constitutional provision, the waiver of a homestead exemption. In the absence of any such statutory or constitutional provision, it has been uniformly held by the courts of this country that any agreement waiving the right to claim the exemption of property from execution, or from garnishment process, is against public policy, and is void. Freeman on Executions (3d Ed.) § 216. This class of exemptions applies to heads of families or to laborers who depend for their support upon their daily wages, and the benevolent purpose of such legislation is to protect dependent families or laborers. Even as to homestead exemptions in this state, there is an express provision allowing waiver of this exemption down to a certain limit. In the absence of such a provision, it is clear that the waiver of homestead exemption would not be upheld by the court. In the case of Traders' Investment Co. v. Macon Ry. Co., 3 Ga. App. 185, 59 S. E. 454, this court held that a contract, either specific or general, by which journeymen mechanics and day laborers, as debtors, attempt to waive the exemption of their wages from the process of garnishment is not enforceable, adopting as the decision of the court a learned opinion by Associate Justice Lumpkin of the Supreme Court, while on the circuit bench. In this opinion of Judge Lumpkin, it will be seen that he holds that these waivers are contrary to the public policy of the state, and are not valid, because they affect injuriously the rights of those who are dependent upon the laborer for support.

Looking at the subject now under discussion in its broadest aspect, I think that it is against the inherent right of individuals under a free government to curtail in any respect their absolute liberty of contract, unless such contract is against the declared policy of the state, or affects in some way injuriously the rights of others, or the public interest; and a statute made solely for the benefit of the individual, and limited to his personal rights, can be waived by him; and, when waived in writing, the waiver is binding and enforceable.

ALDERMAN v. VALDOSTA, M. & W. R. CO.
(No. 2,982)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 238*)—PROCEEDINGS TO TAKE PROPERTY—AWARD OF ASSESSORS—REVIEW BY COURT.

A party who is dissatisfied with the award in condemnation proceedings which have been instituted to assess the damages to private property taken for public use, and who desires to appeal from the decision of the assessors to the superior court, is not required to give bond for the eventual condemnation money as in case of other appeals.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Dec. Dig. § 238.*]

Error from Superior Court, Colquitt County; J. H. Merrill, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the Valdosta, Moultrie & Western Railroad Company against I. L. Alderman. From a judgment of a superior court dismissing an appeal from the award of assessors, Alderman brings error. Reversed.

Shipp & Kline and L. L. Moore, for plaintiff in error. E. K. Wilcox and J. A. Wilkes, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. According to the record, the Valdosta, Moultrie & Western Railroad Company, being unable to agree with Alderman, who owned certain real estate over which the company desired to construct its railroad, instituted proceedings in accordance with the provisions of sections 5208, 5209, 5218, 5220, and 5221 of the Civil Code (1910). Upon the hearing before the assessors they returned a finding fixing the value of the land at $225, awarding no consequential damages, and deducting nothing for consequential benefits. From this award Alderman entered an appeal to a jury in the superior court. He, however, did not give any bond or security, and when the case was sounded for trial the judge of the superior court sustained a motion to dismiss the appeal, based upon the ground that no appeal bond had been given.

The only question presented for our determination is whether one who is dissatisfied with an award in a proceeding brought for the purpose of condemning private property for a public use, and who desires to enter an appeal to the superior court, is required to give bond and security as in other cases of appeal. In our opinion it is unnecessary to give bond in an appeal from the award of assessors in condemnation proceedings. The learned judge of the superior court who presided in this case no doubt entertained the opinion that provisions of section 5228 of the Civil Code (1910), which gives the right of appeal to the superior court in condemnation proceedings, were to be construed as making the same requirements as are made to the appeals mentioned in sections 4998 and 4999, and that, as a bond is required in these cases, a party dissatisfied with an assessor's award should likewise give bond when entering an appeal therefrom. We confess that at first we were not free from doubt upon the subject. There is, however, a plain reason why appellants, in appeals generally, should give bond and security for the eventual condemnation money, while there is no substantial reason why any party who desires to appeal from the award of assessors in condemnation proceedings should be required to give bond for the eventual condemnation money.

If a public corporation is dissatisfied with the award and appeals, in order to reduce the amount which it is required to pay for the property it takes for public use, and the consequential damages, it is unnecessary for it to give bond, because it cannot acquire title to the property until it has paid the amount finally adjudged to be due to the property owner. If the property owner desires to appeal, because in his opinion the award is unjust to him, either because no damages have been assessed, or because in his judgment the amount is too small, it would be a vain thing to require him to pay the eventual condemnation money, for in the very nature of the case he cannot be liable to the corporation for any amount, even though the assessors might find that the consequential benefits to his land are greater than its original value, and therefore that he is not entitled to compensation. This states an extreme case. In no case could a railroad company or other public corporation be given a judgment against a landowner for consequential benefits, because, no matter how beneficial the construction of the proposed public work might be, the landowner has not asked for the construction of the improvements, nor is he liable for benefits conferred upon him without his request or consent. Cases might be imagined where a public corporation, in order to proceed with the work, might pay the amount of the award, and be unable to collect the sum allowed it by a jury, in case there was a reduction from the amount returned by the assessors; but this could not be reached by requiring the appellant to give bond, because, if the railroad was dissatisfied and entered an appeal, it, and not the appellee, would be the party to give bond. It would seem that, in any case of appeal from the award of the assessors in condemnation proceedings, the situation is such that, if the appellant should fail to sustain his contention, the appellee would not be injured by the appellant's failure to give bond, except in a case where the landowner might receive, upon his own appeal, a smaller finding than that awarded him by the assessors.

In a case where the public corporation, in order to proceed with the work, might have paid the original award, and the landowner had in the meantime become insolvent, a judgment against him for the difference between the amount paid him by the corporation and the amount of the jury's verdict might be barren of results. This phase of the case, however, seems to have been in legislative contemplation, for Civil Code 1910, § 5230, provides that, "If the amount so awarded by the assessors is less than that found by the final judgment, the company shall be bound to pay the sum so finally adjudged, in order to retain the property; and if it be less than that awarded by the assessors, the owner shall be bound to refund any excess paid to or received by him, and a judgment for such excess shall be rendered against him, to be collected by levy as in other cases." (Italics ours.) The peculiarity of this verbiage would seem to clearly indicate that the Legislature did not intend to require a bond in appeals from the award of assessors in cases of condemnation; for, if so, provision would have been made for the entry of judgment against the security as well as against the appellant himself, and a levy would have proceeded as in other cases of appeal, instead of "as in other cases" where a judgment is entered solely against the party himself. It is to be noted, too, that there is no reference to any proceeding or remedy against a security in any of the sections which go to make up chapter 9 of the second title of the Code of Practice in the Civil Code. Sections 5206-5246 relate to the condemnation of private property, while the practice of entering judgment against the security upon an appeal in other cases is familiar law.

As marking another difference between the appeal provided in cases of condemnations (Civil Code 1910, § 5228), and the appeals provided for in chapter 1 of the second title of the Code of Practice, the latter must be entered within four days after the adjournment of the court in which the judgment was rendered, with express provision for security and the payment of costs (except in the case of executors, etc.); or, in case of inability to pay costs and give security, an affidavit in forma pauperis supplies their place. The appeal in condemnation proceedings may be entered in writing within 10 days from the time the award is filed, and no reference is made either to the payment of costs, the giving of a bond, or the substitute of an affidavit in forma pauperis; and in section 5246 it is expressly provided that a county may decline to accept the land which it seeks to condemn, in case the final judgment fixing the damages is for any reason unsatisfactory to the county authorities, by merely paying the costs. Not only from these instances, but also on account of the very nature of the case, we think it is clear that it was not the intention of the Legislature, in cases of appeal from the award of assessors in condemnation proceedings, to require the appellant to give the security required in other cases of appeal, and we therefore think the judge of the superior court erred in dismissing the appeal in this case.

In those cases where the party seeking to condemn does not wish to proceed with the work, security would be unnecessary, because such party could not obtain the title or use of the land until the final judgment entered upon the verdict of the jury had been complied with; and the Legislature seemed to think it just to let the landowner appeal without security, although there might arise cases in which the condemning party, having paid the full amount awarded by the arbitrators in order to proceed with the work, would find himself in a position where, by reason of the landowner's insolvency, he could not collect the judgment which the jury might award him on the trial of the landowner's appeal; for, even on the landowner's appeal, the award of the arbitrators might be lowered.

DEAN v. STATE. (No. 3,520.)

INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 125*)—CRIMINAL LAW (§ 202*)—FORMER JEOPARDY—DUPLICITY—SEPARATE OWNERSHIP OF GOODS STOLEN.

Where several articles are stolen at one time, there is only one larceny, whether the ownership is in one person or in different persons. The state in such case may charge in one indictment the larceny of all the articles stolen, alleging ownership according to the fact. But after the thief has been indicted and convicted of the larceny of any one of the articles the prosecution is exhausted, and he cannot subsequently be indicted for the larceny of one of the articles embraced in the same larceny, and which the state chose to omit from the former indictment.

P. D. Rich, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Wooten, Sol. Gen., and F. A. Hooper, for the State.

HILL, C. J. The single question presented in this case for the decision of the court is whether a person who at the same time and place takes, steals, and carries away with the intent to steal five cows belonging to different owners, the larceny constituting but one transaction, can be indicted in separate indictments for five separate larcenies, or whether the indictment and conviction for larceny in stealing one of the cows, the property of a designated owner, would be a bar to subsequent indictment and prosecution for the larceny of any of the other cows. In our opinion the indictment and conviction of the accused for the larceny of one of the cows under the circumstances above stated would be a bar to further prosecution for the larceny of any of the other cows stolen by him at the same time and from the same place and in the same transaction. Unquestionably the state could include in the same transaction the larceny of all five of the cows, alleging different ownership and a different value as to each cow. This would constitute but one offense, covering the one transaction, and would be sustained by proof that the accused stole any of the cows as charged therein. In Lowe v. State, 57 Ga. 172, it is held that an indictment for simple larceny for stealing two hogs at the same time and place, though alleging that one is the property of one person, and the other of another, covers but one transaction, and charges but one offense, and judgment thereon will not be arrested. In the case of Tippins v. State, 14 Ga. 422, it is held that while the thief may be tried in any county in which he may be found in possession of the stolen goods, a trial in one county will be a bar to a trial in another county. Mr. Bishop in his work on Criminal Law (2 Bishop's New Criminal Law, § 888) declares that "it is a plain doctrine of all our courts that, if in a single transaction more articles than one belonging to the same owner are stolen, the indictment may charge the larceny of the whole in one count. It is but one larceny. And, should the articles have different owners, most permit the allegation to be in the same way. But, whether the ownership is in one person or many, the indictment need include no more of the articles than the prosecuting power chooses." And in further discussing this subject he says: "In principle the wrong as a crime is to the public, not to the private owner. The thief ordinarily does not care, and often he does not know, whose are the things he is taking. And, though the indictment is required to set out the ownership, the purpose is simply identification of the articles. So that the state, empowered by law to elect in what form it will accuse a wrongdoer, can put all of one theft into a single count, or a part thereof, as it chooses. Still, where many articles are stolen at one time, there is only one theft, whether the ownership is in one person or many. And, after the thief has been in jeopardy for any part of the one larceny, the prosecution is exhausted, and he cannot be indicted for anything the state chooses to omit." And, further, that, "though the articles are not taken and carried away together, yet, if the taking is one continuous transaction, the larceny is one." And he cites many decisions to sustain the text. In a well-considered decision by the Supreme Court of Indiana (Furnace v. State, 153 Ind. 95, 54 N. E. 441) it is said: "We recognize no good reason to depart from what may be considered the great current of authority and hold the pleading in question bad when it can reasonably be said that it discloses that the larceny complained of was but a single act or transaction in violation of the law against larceny, although the property which is the subject of the crime belonged to several different persons. The particular ownership, as charged in the pleading, of the money stolen, did not give character to the act of stealing it, but was merely a part of the description of the particular crime charged to have been committed. The indictment charged but one offense against the state." Many authorities are cited in support of the decision. In that case the defendant was indicted for stealing at the same time and place "$5 in money, the property of Jane Engle, and $4.50 in money, the property of Samuel Engle," and the court held that the larceny, occurring at the same time and place, constituted but a single transaction. In Holles v. United States, 8 MacArthur (D. C.) 370, 86 Am. Rep. 106, the federal judge held that for the indictment for larceny of the goods of several at the same time there can be conviction and sentence but for the single offense. The learned judge declared that it is a rule of criminal pleading that, where several articles of property are stolen at the same time and place, the stealing constitutes but one offense, and should be so charged in the indictment or information. It should be regarded as a single act, and the result of one intention. Where the articles are stolen at different times, they are different acts of larceny, and may be charged as different offenses. "But it seems that if the property of several persons, lying together in one bundle or chest, upon the same table, or even in the same house, be stolen together at one time, the value of the whole may be put together, for such stealing is one entire felony." 2 Russell on Crimes, 177. In 1 Hale's Pleas of the Crown, 531, the author gives the following illustration of the principle: "It seems to me that if at the same time the thief steals goods of A. to the value of sixpence, goods of B. to the value of sixpence and goods of C. to the value of sixpence, being, perchance, in one bundle, or upon a table, or in one shop, this is grand larceny, because it is one entire felony, done at the same time, though the persons had several properties." See, also, to the same effect, 3 Chitty's Criminal Law, 959. While there is some conflict among courts on this question, the text-writers do not differ as to the principle announced above in the quotation from Mr. Bishop's work on Criminal Law. And a large preponderance of the decisions of the courts is to the effect that the larceny of articles belonging to different owners, if committed at the same time and place, constitutes but one offense; and that while the state can, if it chooses, include all these offenses in one indictment, yet, if it chooses to indict the thief for stealing only one of the articles belonging to one of the owners, it cannot subsequently be allowed to indict for the larceny of any of the other articles taken at the same time and in the same transaction, but which had been omitted from the previous indictment. Here the plea of autrefois convict clearly alleged that the accused had stolen at the same time and place, as a part of the same transaction and constituting only one larceny, five cows belonging to different owners, and that he had been indicted and convicted for stealing one of the cows, and that this conviction was a bar to any further prosecution for the theft of any of the other cows which had been stolen at the same time, although belonging to different owners, and the demurrer admitted the truth of these allegations. In this state, where the "same-transaction test" is the rule for determining the question of jeopardy, we are clear that one larceny cannot be divided into several because there were several owners of the goods stolen at the same time, to allow separate prosecutions in each case of distinct ownership would be to regard the larceny as simply a trespass against the individual owner, and not a trespass against the public law, and would be contrary to both the letter and the spirit of the constitutional guaranty.

Action by Tinnie Campbell against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Ed. Quillian, O. R. Faulkner, and Jno. J. Strickland, for plaintiff in error. R. R. Arnold and Howard Thompson, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff, Mrs. Tinnie Campbell, brought suit against the Southern Railway Company to recover damages for the homicide of her son, A. C. Campbell, upon whom she alleged she was dependent. It appears that he was killed by a train of the defendant on November 27, 1908.

It appears from the record that a negro preacher named Pittman, on his way to the depot of the defendant at New Holland, to purchase a ticket to Alto, Ga., saw Campbell sitting on one side of the railroad track, with his feet in the center of the track, and with his hands between his knees and his head down. Pittman was crippled and was hurrying, because train No. 12, which he intended to board, was almost due. As he passed, according to his testimony, he said to Campbell, "It is nearly train time, and you had better get up from there. The train will be along directly." Pittman testified that he was about 40 feet from him when he spoke, and he spoke loud enough to be heard, though he did not stop walking; that he was trying to make connection with his train; that he looked back, and, as Campbell had not moved, he spoke again, saying, "It is nearly train time, and you had better get up." Campbell never moved at all. It appears that Pittman proceeded to the depot and told several parties who were at the depot door and in the waiting room: "Yonder sits a man up there on the railroad track, and I spoke to him twice, and he did not move, and if he sits there long the train will get him." He then went on to the depot agent, who was inside of the ticket office, writing. After calling for a ticket to Alto, Pittman told the agent: "There is a man sitting up there on the railroad track, and I spoke to him twice, and he did not give me any attention." The agent said, "Where?" and Pittman said, "Up yonder right on the railroad, just above the crossing." Just as the agent "struck" his ticket and handed him back his change, Pittman said, as he turned his back to the window, he saw the freight train coming in the cut away up there, and remarked, "Yonder comes the train now."

Other witnesses testified that as the train came in sight all the people out there were giving signs to the engineer; some threw up their hands, some waved their hats, and some their handkerchiefs. According to the testimony, the engineer saw the signals given him by the bystanders, but the train proceeded on its way. The deceased did not move, and was killed by the collision of the pilot of the engine with his body. The deceased was killed about 250 yards north of the station, and there was testimony to the effect that a person could see nearly a half mile from the point where the railroad track emerged from the cut to the point where the young man was killed, though it was admitted by these witnesses, upon cross-examination, that an engineer sitting on his engine could hardly distinguish a man or any object on the ground at the point where the deceased was killed, because, on account of the curve, the boiler would be between him and any object on the track at that point. In the main there is no conflict in the testimony.

It is apparent that almost immediately after the agent and several bystanders at the depot were notified by Pittman of Campbell's being upon the track, the freight train, composed of 23 cars, came in sight, running at a rate variously estimated as from 30 to 40 miles an hour. It was running down-grade. The witness Lewis, who was very specific in his testimony, says that when he first saw the train coming it was about 650 yards away. This freight train was to be followed, and was followed immediately, by a passenger train, No. 12, which was the train upon which passengers were intending to enter and did take passage. After the engine passed the depot, where the crowd made signals to the engineer to stop, and when it had reached a point of about 150 yards from where Campbell was sitting, the engineer gave three short whistles and applied the air brakes, but the train was not stopped until it had passed at least 50 to 75 feet beyond the point where the body lay, or about 100 or 125 feet from where the engine hit the man.

According to the testimony of the company's employes, of whom there were three upon the engine, as the train approached New Holland, running about 30 miles an hour, and when the engine came within 150 yards of the depot, there were several in the yard, and the engineer was blowing his fancy whistle, and there were two or three out there waving their hands on the fireman's side. It is customary for crowds to gather around a station, though not necessarily waving their hands. Those were not any kind of signals at all. The waving of the hands is not a stop signal. A stop signal is backward and forward. According to their testimony, the employes with the crowd were just out there "cutting up" and there was no signal that was recognized as a danger signal or a stop signal. The waving of hands and throwing up of the hats began when the engine was about 150 yards from the station. They testified that when they got even with the office some one pointed north of the depot, and the engineer and fireman looked in that direction, and discovered some one lying on the track about 100 yards ahead of the train. The engineer applied air in emergency and tried to stop the train. He put on the emergency first, and then blew the alarm signal. The air was working in good condition and everything was done that could be done to stop the train. The engineer used sand and reversed the engine before he got to where this man was lying, but it took about 200 yards to stop the train after he undertook to stop it.

The engineer testified that he was running about 35 miles an hour when he passed the depot at New Holland. When he got close enough to see the people there, he noticed them throw up their hands, two or three of them. He just considered it a kind of salute, a kind of waving at him. "Very frequently we see people doing that while passing stations along a public place, when we pass them near the railroad. Very often I see a man throw up his hands to me, especially those I am acquainted with along the line, and sometimes those I am not acquainted with. There was not anything when I first saw the signal to indicate to right to disturb the verdict. We will take up the special assignments of error in their order and consider them in the light of the evidence, which has been briefly, but substantially, stated.

[2] The first ground of the amended motion presents the fact that since the conviction of the accused for the offense of voluntary manslaughter Kelley Elrod, his codefendant, has been tried and acquitted, and it is insisted that as the state contended that the accused was guilty of murder because he was present, aiding and abetting Elrod to shoot the decedent, and since the verdict of the jury in the Elrod Case proved the fact that neither Elrod nor Maughon fired the fatal shot that took the life of the deceased, but that the fatal shot was fired by some one else, a new trial should be granted to the accused in order that he might have the benefit of the verdict in favor of Elrod.

[3] Both Maughon and Elrod were indicted as the actual perpetrators of the crime, the indictment containing only the one count, but under this one count it is well settled that either or both may have been convicted as principals in the first or second degree, if the evidence had so authorized, and they could have been convicted either of murder or manslaughter under this one count of the indictment. Collins v. State, 88 Ga. 347, 14 S. E. 474, and cases cited, especially Hill v. State, 28 Ga. 604; McLeod v. State, 128 Ga. 17, 57 S. E. 83; Bradley v. State, 128 Ga. 20, 57 S. E. 237; Lewis v. State, 71 S. E. 417, decided May 12, 1911, by the Supreme Court of Georgia. In the case of Collins v. State, supra, it is held that "one indicted as principal merely can be convicted on evidence proving him guilty as principal in the second degree, if the facts be such as that the act by which the crime was perpetrated will on established principles of law be imputed to him as committed by himself through the agency of another. In such case the distinction of degrees is immaterial." In the case of Bruce v. State, 99 Ga. 50, 25 S. E. 760, it is held that where two persons are indicted for murder, one as principal in the first degree, and the other as principal in the second degree, the latter may be tried and convicted of murder, although the former had been previously tried and convicted of voluntary manslaughter only. In the opinion the Chief Justice cited the following illustration from 1 Starkie on Criminal Pleading (2d Ed.) 81: "Where A. and B. are present, and A. commits an offense in which B. aids and assists him, the indictment may either allege the matter according to the fact, or charge them both as principals in the first degree; for the act of one is the act of the other. And upon such an indictment B., who was present, aiding and abetting, may be convicted, though A. is acquitted. * * * If an indictment for murder charges that A. gave the mortal stroke, and that B. was present, aiding and abetting, both A. and B. may be convicted, though it turn out that B. struck the blow, and that A. was present, aiding and abetting. To go one step further, upon a similar indictment, charging A. as a principal in the first degree, and B. as present aiding and abetting, B. may be convicted, though A. be acquitted." In Hill v. State, 28 Ga. 604, it is said: "The indictment charged the defendant as a principal. The evidence showed that another inflicted the mortal blow, the prisoner being present, aiding and abetting. Held, that the variance was immaterial; both being principals in law, as well as in deed, and the stroke of one being in law the stroke of the other." Plain v. State, 60 Ga. 284; 2 Bishop's New Criminal Procedure, §§ 3, 4. These decisions, and many others which we might cite, show that from a legal standpoint the conviction of the accused for voluntary manslaughter can be sustained, although the state claimed that Elrod was the actual perpetrator of the crime, and the jury had acquitted him of this offense. In other words, from a strictly legal standpoint, the acquittal of Elrod was wholly immaterial, and the fact of his acquittal furnishes no legal reason for the acquittal of the accused. This ruling is both sound and logical. The verdict in the Elrod Case, although conclusive as between the state and himself, is not in any sense conclusive of the truth of the transaction. He may have been guilty notwithstanding the verdict of the jury. There may have been reasons in his case, growing out of the inability of the state to produce the same evidence on this trial as on the first, which induced the jury to acquit him, which did not exist in the case of Maughon; but, irrespective of this question, we are simply concerned with the proposition of law that, where two are jointly indicted as principals, the acquittal of one does not in any legal sense inure to the benefit of the other, although it may be a circumstance of exculpation. The case of Jackson v. State, 54 Ga. 439, is relied on by learned counsel for the plaintiff in error in support of his position that a new trial should be granted in order that Maughon may have the benefit of the acquittal of Elrod. The Jackson Case does not support this contention. In the Jackson Case Judge McCay, speaking for the court, gives as the reason why Jackson, the principal in the second degree, ought to have a new trial on account of the grant of a new trial to the principal in the first degree, that the record of the conviction of the principal in the first degree had been used on the trial of the other case and may have injured the accused, and that, this record having been expunged by setting the verdict aside, the principal in the second degree ought to have a new trial without this evidence bearing against him. In construing this decision the Supreme Court holds in the Bruce Case, supra, that the principle there announced did not conflict with the holding that the principal in the second degree may be tried and convicted of murder, although the principal in the first degree had been convicted of voluntary manslaughter only. And we say in this case that this principle does not conflict with the enunciation here made that where two are jointly indicted as principals in the first degree, and one is convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and subsequently the other is acquitted, this presents no reason why the verdict of conviction should be set aside and another trial granted. If Elrod had been convicted as principal in the first degree, and then Maughon had been convicted of voluntary manslaughter or murder, and subsequently the record of Elrod's conviction had been used as evidence against Maughon, and subsequently Elrod was granted a new trial, this fact would justify the grant of a new trial to Maughon. The headnote in the Jackson Case, supra, is as follows: "When on the trial of A. for murder in the second degree the record of the conviction of B. as principal in the first degree was introduced as evidence, and A. was found guilty as such principal in the second degree, and afterwards B. was granted a new trial, upon which he was found not guilty, held, that A. ought to have a new trial." While, as Judge McCay says in the Jackson Case, there may be some little confusion in the books as to the use of a verdict of guilty or acquittal of the principal in the first degree on the trial of the principal in the second degree, we think the true distinction is this: Where two men are jointly indicted, one as principal in the first degree, and one as principal in the second degree, the guilt of the principal in the first degree must be established by the state, but the record is not conclusive of that fact, and the conviction or acquittal may be denied, notwithstanding the record, and the verdict simply goes in evidence for what it is worth; but it is not conclusive and the truth may nevertheless be shown by evidence. The way we look at this case under the evidence none of this discussion is really material. Here two men were jointly indicted as principals in the first degree. One was tried and convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and the second was tried and acquitted, wholly without reference to the truth of the verdict in the first case, and the only pertinent and material question before us is whether the verdict was authorized by the law under the evidence in the present case. The law, as we have endeavored to show, authorized a verdict of guilty of voluntary manslaughter, and there is evidence to support such a verdict, although a jury has acquitted the other defendant, Elrod. And the principle announced in the Jackson Case, which was relied upon by learned counsel for the plaintiff in error, is not at all applicable to the facts of this case, but must be limited entirely to the facts of that case as enunciated in the headnote above quoted. We therefore conclude that the accused is not entitled to another trial on this assignment of error.

Objection is made to the following excerpt from the charge of the court: "A person may be a principal in an offense in two degrees. A principal in the first degree is the actor or absolute perpetrator of the crime. A principal in the second degree is he who is present, aiding and abetting the act to be done. To illustrate, one person participating and attempting to strike is equally guilty with the one who strikes. In other words if the evidence shows to the jury to your satisfaction beyond a reasonable doubt, as explained to you, that Elrod fired the fatal shot that killed the deceased, and you further believe that he was told to do so, told to shoot him by Maughon, and he, Maughon, was present, aiding and abetting the act of killing and participating in the act of killing, then he would be just as guilty as Elrod, though he didn't fire the fatal shot. This is just an illustration or explanation of the two degrees of any offense known in law as principals in the first and second degree, and it is not meant on the part of the court, in making this illustration, to express or intimate any opinion whether Elrod fired the shot or not." It is insisted that this charge was inapplicable, misleading, and confusing, since the indictment charged both of the defendants with being the actual perpetrators and joint principals in the murder, there being no charge in the indictment against either as a principal in the second degree, and the contention and theory of the state being that Elrod alone fired the shot that took the life of the deceased; that this charge authorized the jury to return a verdict of guilty of voluntary manslaughter as principal in the second degree, and this would have been erroneous; and, further, that, where a defendant is charged in the indictment as the absolute actor and perpetrator of the crime, he cannot be convicted as a principal in the second degree. That portion of the above excerpt where the learned trial judge makes a concrete application of the general principle announced to the facts of this case is especially objected to, it being insisted that there was nothing in the evidence, or in the admissions, as contended by the state, of Maughon, to show that he ever told Elrod to shoot Cleghorn at the time Elrod fired his pistol, and that this was an improper intimation by the court of an opinion that the evidence showed that Maughon told Elrod to shoot the deceased, or to shoot at him, it being earnestly contended by learned counsel that, even if this language was used by the accused to Elrod, there was nothing to show that the language applied to Cleghorn, the deceased, and that it might reasonably have been inferred from the language that the accused did not mean for Elrod to shoot at the deceased, but meant for him to shoot in the air for the purpose of frightening the deceased in order that he might desist from resisting arrest; that the language of the court as objected to was calculated to impress the jury with the idea that the judge believed that the language of Maughon requesting Elrod to shoot was a direction to him to shoot Cleghorn.

The first objection urged against this charge need not be considered, since the jury did not find the defendant guilty of voluntary manslaughter as principal in the second degree, but did find him guilty as the principal perpetrator of the crime of voluntary manslaughter, which they were fully authorized to do under the indictment. We do not see, however, why the jury could not legally return a verdict in the second degree. [4] While one cannot be convicted as an accessory before the fact to a charge of voluntary manslaughter, because the existence of an accessory presupposes premeditation and preparation, yet we do not see why one could not be convicted as principal in the second degree in the offense of voluntary manslaughter, for one can presently aid and abet a crime which may be committed on a sudden heat of passion, and without premeditation. There is quite a difference in this respect in the offense of an accessory before the fact and that of a principal in the second degree.

The second objection made to this charge is fully answered in the first division of this opinion, where decisions are cited in support of the proposition that one indicted as the absolute actor and perpetrator of the crime could be convicted under such charge as principal in the second degree. The objection urged against the concrete application by the court of the general principles of law to the facts of this case we think is without merit. It will be remembered that the theory of the state was that Maughon was guilty because he commanded Elrod to shoot at Cleghorn; that this act made him a principal in the second degree at least; in other words, that the crime actually committed by Elrod was imputed to Maughon as being committed by him through the agency of Elrod, and this made him equally guilty. It was the duty of the court to present this contention of the state to the jury, and in doing so to make such intelligent application of the law to the facts proved as would make the contention understood by the jury. Neither is there any intimation that this language of Maughon applied to Elrod. The judge simply told the jury: "If the evidence shows to your satisfaction beyond a reasonable doubt that Elrod fired the fatal shot that killed the deceased, and if you further believe that he was told to do so, told to shoot him by Maughon, and he, Maughon, was present, aiding and abetting the act of killing and participating in the act of killing, then he would be just as guilty as Elrod, though he didn't fire the fatal shot." It was not necessary for the court to charge the converse of this proposition to the jury, for clearly the converse was included in the proposition itself. If they did not believe that Maughon told Elrod to shoot Cleghorn, or that he told him to shoot in the air, or at something else, the jury would have understood, and could have understood, nothing else but that in this latter event Maughon would not be guilty with Elrod. In brief, we think that the charge objected to not only laid down a correct proposition of law, but made a clear hypothetical application to the principal facts of the case, and that the jury could not have reasonably inferred from the language of the judge that the court either entertained or expressed any opinion on the subject.

The following charge of the court on the subject of voluntary manslaughter is objected to: "If you believe from the evidence that the deceased, Cleghorn, made an assault either with his fist, or otherwise, upon Maughon, or was attempting to get his pistol to assault him with it, and if you further believe that smarting under this provocation, and acting under a sudden heat of passion provoked thereby, he, Maughon, ordered Elrod to shoot Cleghorn, and Elrod, acting in pursuance of this request, then and there shot and killed Cleghorn while he was fleeing from them, the killing, under these circumstances, would be voluntary manslaughter; and, if you believe this to be the truth of the case, you would be authorized to find the defendant Maughon guilty of voluntary manslaughter." It is insisted that there is no evidence either on the part of the state or of the defendant to authorize a charge on voluntary manslaughter. The evidence for the state alone or for the defendant alone would probably not authorize a charge on the law of voluntary manslaughter, for, if the first was the truth of the transaction, the accused was guilty of murder; and, if the latter was the truth of the transaction, the accused was guilty of nothing, because the killing was not done by him or by Elrod, nor did he participate criminally therein, but it was the result of a shot fired by the brother of the decedent under the impression that he was shooting at the defendants. But the jury in considering the evidence was not compelled to find the truth either in the evidence for the state or in the evidence for the defendant, but they had a right to consider the evidence of both sides in determining the issues presented and in arriving at the truth. To illustrate by the facts of this case: The accused testified in part that the decedent came to the door, engaged in a struggle with him, assaulted him, pushed him off the porch, and attempted to get his pistol. The wife of the decedent testified that her husband was shot by one of the two defendants, which one she did not know, but that the shots came from their direction, and that, when the second shot was fired, her husband said that he was shot, and she found him in a few minutes thereafter dead. If the jury believed that this evidence of the accused and this evidence of the state was the truth of the transaction so far as it went, and was applicable to the case, and they believed that, smarting from the assault made upon him by the decedent, the accused either shot, or ordered Elrod, his companion, to shoot, the deceased, and this was done under a sudden heat of passion provoked by the assault thus made upon him, the law of voluntary manslaughter was applicable. Indeed, we think that taking the evidence altogether the charge on the law of voluntary manslaughter as given by the court was demanded, and that the accused would have had just cause of complaint against the judge if he had not charged the law of voluntary manslaughter just as he did.

The remaining ground of the motion for a new trial is not verified, and is not insisted upon in the brief filed by counsel for plaintiff in error. We have given the case a very careful examination, and we find no error of law, and there is evidence in the record which supports the verdict of voluntary manslaughter.

Judgment affirmed.

MILLER v. ROBERTS. (No. 2790.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CONTRACTS (§ 266*)—RESCISSION—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT—RESTORATION OF BENEFITS.

One party to a contract cannot rescind for fraud while retaining the benefits of the contract. In order to entitle him to rescind, he must promptly upon discovery of the fraud restore, or offer to restore, to the other party whatever he has received by virtue of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 1186; Dec. Dig. § 266.*]

2. SALES (§ 41*)—VALIDITY—MISREPRESENTATION BY SELLER—MEANS OF INFORMATION—RELIANCE BY BUYER.

When the means of knowledge are at hand and equally available to both parties to a contract of sale and purchase, if the purchaser does not avail himself of these means, he will not be heard to say, in impeachment of the contract of sale, that he was deceived by the representations of the seller.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. § 84; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

3. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 534*)—RECOVERY OF ATTORNEY'S FEES—CONDITION PRECEDENT—NOTICE—WAIVER.

Where a promissory note contains an obligation to pay attorney's fees, the statutory notice which the plaintiff is required to give to the defendant as a condition precedent to his right to recover attorney's fees cannot be waived in the note, and the attempt to waive it therein is unenforceable and of no effect. (Hill, C. J., dissents as to this ruling.)

Error from City Court of Blakely; W. A. Jordan, Judge.

Action by W. C. Miller against J. W. Roberts. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

W. I. Geer, for plaintiff in error. W. F. Weaver, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. This was a suit on a promissory note. A verdict for the defendant was rendered and plaintiff's motion for a new trial was overruled.

The consideration of the note was the exclusive right to sell, in the counties of Early, Decatur, and Miller, "a pinless clothesline," under patent rights issued by the government of the United States to the seller. The defendant pleaded that when the sale was made the plaintiff represented to him that the only costs connected with the sale of the pinless clothesline would be the purchase price represented by the note sued upon, that none of the towns in the three counties of Early, Decatur, and Miller required any license or special business tax for the sale of said clothesline, and that, relying upon the truth of this statement, the purchase was made and the note given. This representation the defendant "found to be absolutely without truth, and, on account of said fraudulent representation, the patent right became and instantly was, upon the defendant's being required to pay a license to sell pinless clotheslines, worthless and useless to the defendant, and he immediately offered to return said patent right to the plaintiff, which offer was refused." Neither the note nor the contract of sale contained any representation on the subject of the payment of a license as alleged by the plea, and the plaintiff testified that no such statement was ever made by him to the defendant.

The defendant, in support of his plea, testified that he had sold about $100 worth of the pinless clotheslines covered by his contract in the counties mentioned, but that on reaching the town of Bainbridge, in Decatur county, he was informed that a license would be required before he could sell the line in that city, and, on inquiry, found that such was the case in the other towns in the county. He introduced in evidence an ordinance of the town of Blakely requiring the payment of $25 as a license before he would have the right to sell in that town the aforesaid pinless clothesline, and he testified that when he found that this was required he went to the plaintiff and asked that he either pay the license or rescind the contract.

[1] 1. The evidence in behalf of the defendant did not make a case which, under the law, would entitle him to have the contract rescinded for fraud. Conceding that a fraudulent representation was made, and that upon its discovery the defendant promptly offered to rescind, he did not offer to restore to the plaintiff any of the proceeds which he had realized from sales under his contract of purchase, and which he testified amounted to at least $100. Certainly he was not entitled to rescind the contract for fraud, when, according to his own statement, he had received a benefit out of the contract greater than the consideration for which the contract had been made.

[2] 2. Nor do we think the defense of deceit or fraud was established. This court is thoroughly committed to a high standard of good faith in the making of contracts, and either party to a contract is bound to disclose to the other any knowledge he may have of a material fact which may affect the value of the subject-matter or consideration of the contract. Marietta Fertilizer Co. v. Beckwith, 4 Ga. App. 249, 61 S. E. 149. But it is well settled that the law does not afford relief to one who suffers by not using the ordinary means of information that may be at hand, whether his neglect be due to indifference or to credulity. Whether the towns in the three counties mentioned required the payment of a license by the seller of pinless clotheslines was a fact which could be found out by the defendant as easily as by the plaintiff. In other words, the information was equally available to both parties. It is a matter of general knowledge that most towns and cities do require licenses from vendors of such articles.

The assertion by the plaintiff (assuming that he made it) that no license was required by any of the towns in any of those three counties was simply the assertion of a fact, the truth of which could have easily been inquired into by the defendant, and the defendant was bound to make such inquiry, and would not be authorized to rescind the contract for any damage resulting from a misrepresentation which, by the exercise of the most ordinary and reasonable diligence, he could have discovered was a misrepresentation. Greene v. Bryant, 2 Ga. 68. As was tersely expressed by Lord Kenyon, in the old case of Pasley v. Freeman, 3 Term Reports, 64: "Undoubtedly, where the common caution and prudence of man are sufficient to guard him, the law will not protect him in his negligence."

But to sum the whole matter up in a nutshell: Neither the law, nor equity, nor good conscience, will allow one party to a contract to rescind the contract for alleged fraud, or will on that ground relieve him from a compliance with his contract, where, according to his own statement, he has received from the contract a pecuniary benefit greater in amount than the consideration of the contract, and retains in his possession the fruits of the contract, and makes no offer to make an equitable adjustment thereof with the plaintiff. We do not see how the defendant can be relieved of the obligations of his contract while retaining the benefits thereof.

[3] 3. The note sued on in this case contained an agreement to pay "all costs of collection, including 10 per cent. on principal and interest as attorney's fees, if collected by law or through an attorney at law, and contained, also, a provision as follows: "The makers, indorsers and sureties on this note waive the ten days notice that is now required by law to be given as to when, where, and in what court the owner will proceed to collect or sue this note, and agree that if the owner places this note in the hands of an attorney for collection he is to collect ten per cent. upon the principal and interest as attorney's fees, and the said ten per cent. is hereby made a part of the principal."

The court instructed the jury that this attempt to waive the notice which the statute makes a condition precedent to the recovery of attorney's fees was unenforceable and of no effect, and to this instruction the plaintiff excepts. While the writer is of the opinion that this instruction was erroneous, the other members of the court are of the view that the exception is not well taken, and the writer is authorized to state the following as the opinion of the majority of the court:

The Civil Code 1910, § 4252, provides: "Obligations to pay attorney's fees upon any note or other evidence of indebtedness, in addition to the rate of interest specified therein, are void, and no court shall enforce such agreement to pay attorney's fees, unless the debtor shall fail to pay such debt on or before the return day of the court to which suit is brought for the collection of the same: Provided, the holder of the obligation sued upon, his agent, or attorney notifies the defendant in writing, ten days before suit is brought, or his intention to bring suit, and also the term of the court to which suit will be brought."

Prior to the act of 1890, known as the Twitty bill (codified into section 3667 of the Civil Code of 1895), there was nothing in our law or public policy which forbade the maker of a note or other obligation from promising to pay attorney's fees in addition to the debt. By the Twitty bill it was provided that obligations to pay attorney's fees were void and unenforceable by the courts, unless the defendant, upon being sued, filed a plea which he failed to sustain. This declared a new public policy in this state as to obligations to pay attorney's fees in addition to the principal and interest due upon an indebtedness. In 1900 this law was amended so as to make it read as it appears in the Code of 1910, § 4252, but the same policy in general outline was preserved; that policy being that such obligations should not be enforced, unless the creditor was in fact put to the necessity of employing an attorney to collect the debt through suit. The law declaring this policy was so shaped that to the creditor himself should not be left the absolute determination of the time when this necessity to employ counsel was upon him. The legislative mind seemed to contemplate that the creditor would be afforded full measure of protection in this respect, if the law provided a means whereby he could employ the attorney on what is called the return day of the court (that is, the last day on which suit may be filed, as respects a particular term), so that the present law on the subject does not allow the creditor to collect attorney's fees, though stipulated for in the note, unless he gives the debtor 10 days notice of his intention to file suit, informing him as to the court in which it will be brought, and of the term to which it is to be brought, and if the debtor pays up before the return day of the court arrives, or before the suit is filed upon the return day itself, the creditor cannot even if the notice has been given, enforce the obligation to pay the attorney's fees.

It may be said, therefore, that the declared public policy of this state on this subject is that obligations to pay attorney's fees in addition to the principal and interest stipulated for in the instrument creating the indebtedness are to be wholly void and unenforceable, unless the debtor by his act of not paying the debt before the return day, after he has been given timely notice, puts the creditor to the necessity of hiring an attorney. If the provision in the statute as to the giving of the notice was merely something which the law had established in favor of the debtor, and not involving any public interest or public policy, the debtor would undoubtedly have the right to waive it, under the Civil Code 1910, § 10; but we understand the rule to be that, wherever a provision of law is made for the enforcement of some public policy of the state, no person will be allowed to waive that provision, though he himself may be the immediate beneficiary.

The welfare of the state itself frequently demands that the law-making power shall enact statutes and declare public policies for the purpose of protecting citizens from hard contractual exactions or stipulations against which they might naturally be expected to protect themselves, but against which, on account of certain inherent weaknesses common to many classes of the people, they do not ordinarily take care to protect themselves; and where such safeguards have been erected the courts will not allow the parties to contract against the enforcement of the policy declared by the law. Instances of such legislation are familiar, the debtor classes being perhaps the most frequent beneficiaries; for example, the laws against taking usury, the law which prohibits a mortgagor from waiving his equity of redemption, the law against the enforcement of contractual penalties, etc. It is a familiar notion, often given expression in our jurisprudence, that it is one of the objects of the law to prevent debtors, urged by the pressure of the necessity of securing credit, or money, or extension of indebtedness, from yielding to such unjust or unreasonable exactions as a hard creditor may see fit to make.

So as to the present matter, the law, recognizing that many debtors, pressed by their necessity, would, in order to get the money, credit, or the extension which they desired, be willing to contract to pay the creditor attorney's fees in addition to principal and interest, whether the creditor was ever put to the necessity of using the attorney or not, stepped in and declared, as a matter of public policy, that such an obligation should be unenforceable, unless the necessity arose, just as it has declared, upon a similar consideration, that a promise to pay more than 8 per cent. interest is void. If the courts should enforce a waiver, such as the one here presented, made contemporaneously with the obligation to pay the attorney's fees, the whole policy in the law could easily be avoided in all cases by the smallest amount of designing. A debtor, willing to promise to pay the attorney's fees, would make no quibble over waiving the statutory notice. If this court should hold this waiver to be valid, it would be but a short while before it would be usual for all standard, printed forms of notes to contain a similar provision, and the law would be a dead letter.

There is nothing in what is here held which would prevent a debtor, after his note had matured, or even when it was about to mature, from waiving formal service of the notice, if he was in fact informed that suit for the indebtedness would be brought to a designated term of a particular court; in other words, there is nothing in the policy of the law which would forbid him to acknowledge service of a notice, or even to waive service, if he was in fact given notice of the intention to sue, and given the opportunity contemplated by the statute of paying the debt before the return day; but the majority of the court does not think that the waiver can be made as a part of the original contract, or that the spirit of the law can be violated by the stipulations of the parties.

The writer thinks that the statute in question was made solely for the benefit of the makers of the obligations therein described, and the requirement that notice must be given 10 days before suit is a personal privilege, which can be waived by the defendant, and that when he does so in the note he is bound by the waiver, and cannot be heard subsequently to repudiate it. Defendants are authorized to waive process, as well as the time of filing suit, and to consent that a judgment may be taken at an earlier term than the law would otherwise authorize. Civ. Code, 1910, § 5561. Section 5562, is mandatory in its terms. It declares that "the petition shall be filed at least twenty days before the term to which it is returnable." This waiver is analogous to the statutory notice now under consideration, and yet the Supreme Court has held that where the defendant waives, in writing, the requirement, as between himself and the plaintiff, the waiver is binding, in the absence of fraud, and the defendant cannot subsequently be heard to object that the petition was not filed 20 days before the term of the court to which the suit was returnable. Steadman v. Simmons, 39 Ga. 591. Where the maker of an obligation makes a contract to pay the 10 per cent. attorney's fees, and the statutory notice is not given as required, can it be doubted that the defendant would have the right, where suit is brought for the recovery of attorney's fees, to come into court and consent that a judgment be rendered against him for the attorney's fees, although the notice had not been given? And what he can do after suit is filed it would seem he could do previously. As before stated, I think the notice in question is solely a personal right or privilege.

Section 10 of the Civil Code of 1910 provides as follows: "Laws made for the preservation of public order or good morals cannot be done away with or abrogated by any agreement; but a person may waive or renounce what the law has established in his favor when he does not thereby injure others or affect the public interest." The statute now under discussion was not made for the preservation of public order or good morals, and, clearly being enacted in favor of defendants who are sued on obligations wherein they agree to pay attorney's fees, may be waived by them, unless such waiver injures others or affects the public interest. The public has no interest in a contract of this character, and none, except those who are parties to the contract, can possibly be injured by any waiver relating thereto.

Nor do we think that contracts which provide for the collection of attorney's fees from the defendant are against the public policy of this state. Prior to the act of 1891, commonly known as the Twitty bill, there was no legislation on this subject; the matter being purely one of individual contract. The act of 1891 first declared that these contracts were "absolutely void," and could not be enforced by the courts, unless the defendant filed a plea or pleas which he failed to sustain. Acts 1891, p. 221. The contract, although declared to be absolutely void, was not in fact absolutely void. It depended upon whether the plea or pleas filed to the suit were sustained, and if the plea or pleas were not sustained the contract was enforceable and the fees were collectible.

The act of 1900 (Acts of 1900, p. 53) struck out the words in the act of 1891, "unless a plea or pleas be filed by the defendant and not sustained," and inserted in lieu thereof the following words, to wit: "Unless the debtor shall fail to pay such debt on or before the return day of the court to which suit is brought for the collection of the same; provided the holder of the obligation sued upon, his agent, or attorney, notifies the defendant in writing ten days before suit is brought, of his intention to bring suit, and also the term of the court to which suit will be brought." The contract to pay fees, although declared to be void, under this amendment was not absolutely void, but only voidable, for, notwithstanding the language of the statute, which declares that the contract is absolutely void, the contract is valid where the debtor fails to pay the debt before the return day of the court to which suit is brought, and provided, further, that the statutory notice is given to the defendant. The contract to pay attorney's fees, therefore, is not one in violation of any law of this state, or contrary to the public policy of this state, and is entirely in harmony with the law and public policy of the state, but must be enforced in accordance with the requirements of the statute.

The agreement to waive the statutory notice is not analogous to a contract to waive the exemption of wages from process of garnishment, or, independently of statutory or constitutional provision, the waiver of a homestead exemption. In the absence of any such statutory or constitutional provision, it has been uniformly held by the courts of this country that any agreement waiving the right to claim the exemption of property from execution, or from garnishment process, is against public policy, and is void. Freeman on Executions (3d Ed.) § 216. This class of exemptions applies to heads of families or to laborers who depend for their support upon their daily wages, and the benevolent purpose of such legislation is to protect dependent families or laborers. Even as to homestead exemptions in this state, there is an express provision allowing waiver of this exemption down to a certain limit. In the absence of such a provision, it is clear that the waiver of homestead exemption would not be upheld by the court. In the case of Traders' Investment Co. v. Macon Ry. Co., 3 Ga. App. 185, 59 S. E. 454, this court held that a contract, either specific or general, by which journeymen mechanics and day laborers, as debtors, attempt to waive the exemption of their wages from the process of garnishment is not enforceable, adopting as the decision of the court a learned opinion by Associate Justice Lumpkin of the Supreme Court, while on the circuit bench. In this opinion of Judge Lumpkin, it will be seen that he holds that these waivers are contrary to the public policy of the state, and are not valid, because they affect injuriously the rights of those who are dependent upon the laborer for support.

Looking at the subject now under discussion in its broadest aspect, I think that it is against the inherent right of individuals under a free government to curtail in any respect their absolute liberty of contract, unless such contract is against the declared policy of the state, or affects in some way injuriously the rights of others, or the public interest; and a statute made solely for the benefit of the individual, and limited to his personal rights, can be waived by him; and, when waived in writing, the waiver is binding and enforceable.

Judgment reversed.

ALDERMAN v. VALDOSTA, M. & W. R. CO.
(No. 2,982.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 238*)—PROCEEDINGS TO TAKE PROPERTY—AWARD OF ASSESSORS—REVIEW BY COURT.

A party who is dissatisfied with the award in condemnation proceedings which have been instituted to assess the damages to private property taken for public use, and who desires to appeal from the decision of the assessors to the superior court, is not required to give bond for the eventual condemnation money as in case of other appeals.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Dec. Dig. § 238.*]

Error from Superior Court, Colquitt County; J. H. Merrill, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the Valdosta, Moultrie & Western Railroad Company against I. L. Alderman. From a judgment of a superior court dismissing an appeal from the award of assessors, Alderman brings error. Reversed.

Shipp & Kline and L. L. Moore, for plaintiff in error. E. K. Wilcox and J. A. Wilkes, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. According to the record, the Valdosta, Moultrie & Western Railroad Company, being unable to agree with Alderman, who owned certain real estate over which the company desired to construct its railroad, instituted proceedings in accordance with the provisions of sections 5208, 5209, 5218, 5220, and 5221 of the Civil Code (1910). Upon the hearing before the assessors they returned a finding fixing the value of the land at $225, awarding no consequential damages, and deducting nothing for consequential benefits. From this award Alderman entered an appeal to a jury in the superior court. He, however, did not give any bond or security, and when the case was sounded for trial the judge of the superior court sustained a motion to dismiss the appeal, based upon the ground that no appeal bond had been given.

The only question presented for our determination is whether one who is dissatisfied with an award in a proceeding brought for the purpose of condemning private property for a public use, and who desires to enter an appeal to the superior court, is required to give bond and security as in other cases of appeal. In our opinion it is unnecessary to give bond in an appeal from the award of assessors in condemnation proceedings. The learned judge of the superior court who presided in this case no doubt entertained the opinion that provisions of section 5228 of the Civil Code (1910), which gives the right of appeal to the superior court in condemnation proceedings, were to be construed as making the same requirements as are made to the appeals mentioned in sections 4998 and 4999, and that, as a bond is required in these cases, a party dissatisfied with an assessor's award should likewise give bond when entering an appeal therefrom. We confess that at first we were not free from doubt upon the subject. There is, however, a plain reason why appellants, in appeals generally, should give bond and security for the eventual condemnation money, while there is no substantial reason why any party who desires to appeal from the award of assessors in condemnation proceedings should be required to give bond for the eventual condemnation money.

If a public corporation is dissatisfied with the award and appeals, in order to reduce the amount which it is required to pay for the property it takes for public use, and the consequential damages, it is unnecessary for it to give bond, because it cannot acquire title to the property until it has paid the amount finally adjudged to be due to the property owner. If the property owner desires to appeal, because in his opinion the award is unjust to him, either because no damages have been assessed, or because in his judgment the amount is too small, it would be a vain thing to require him to pay the eventual condemnation money, for in the very nature of the case he cannot be liable to the corporation for any amount, even though the assessors might find that the consequential benefits to his land are greater than its original value, and therefore that he is not entitled to compensation. This states an extreme case. In no case could a railroad company or other public corporation be given a judgment against a landowner for consequential benefits, because, no matter how beneficial the construction of the proposed public work might be, the landowner has not asked for the construction of the improvements, nor is he liable for benefits conferred upon him without his request or consent. Cases might be imagined where a public corporation, in order to proceed with the work, might pay the amount of the award, and be unable to collect the sum allowed it by a jury, in case there was a reduction from the amount returned by the assessors; but this could not be reached by requiring the appellant to give bond, because, if the railroad was dissatisfied and entered differ from my Associates as to its applicability to the facts appearing in the present record. We all agree in the assertion of the general principle that the defendant has the right to make just such statement as he may see proper in his own behalf, yet that there are some instances in which the court is not only authorized, but may be required, to interfere with defendant's going into matters entirely disconnected with the trial. However, many facts which might not be competent or relevant as testimony might corroborate a defendant's statement or tend to prove its truth. For instance, a man prosecuted for carrying a concealed pistol, as this defendant was, might be able to impress the jury more strongly with the truthfulness of his denial that the pistol was concealed by going into a detailed account as to why he had the pistol at all, and the purpose for which he was carrying it, or by detailing circumstances which would lead a reasonable mind to conclude that it was incredible that under the circumstances he could have had a pistol at all, if (as in the present instance) he denied having a pistol altogether. I think that the statement which the court prevented the accused from making falls within this rule. The reasons why, in my judgment, the law intended that the utmost liberality should be allowed the defendant in the making of a statement are set forth in Richardson v. State, 3 Ga. App. 313, 59 S. E. 916.

The brief filed for the railway company, plaintiff in error, opens with the following sentence: "There is no error in the charge of the court, or in any ruling of the court upon the trial. A new trial should have been granted because the verdict was contrary to the undisputed evidence." The correctness of the statement contained in the first sentence above quoted is fully concurred in, and no error of law is complained of. A careful consideration of the evidence leads this court to a directly opposite conclusion from that stated in the second sentence above. The plaintiff in error, as the initial carrier, did not successfully carry the burden of proof by showing that the contents of the baggage of a passenger intrusted to its care had not been stolen while the baggage was in its own possession. Besides, the most reasonable deduction from the undisputed evidence was that the contents of the baggage had been stolen by an employé of the initial carrier, and before the baggage had been delivered by the initial carrier to the connecting carrier.

Several persons were jointly indicted, jointly tried, and jointly convicted. All but two of the defendants voluntarily complied with the judgment and sentence of the court, and these two filed a joint motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and they brought the case to this court on a joint writ of error from the judgment overruling their motion for a new trial. Held that, having been jointly indicted, jointly tried, and jointly convicted they had the right to bring a joint writ of error to this court to review the judgment overruling their joint motion for a new trial. The fact that the others who were jointly indicted and convicted with them failed to join them in the motion for a new trial, but voluntarily complied with the judgment and sentence of the court, does not affect the right of those who do except.

me that there was any danger, or trying to stop me; no signals across the track that I saw. The ones I saw were on the left-hand side, the fireman's side. I do not know just exactly how far I was when I saw it—150 to 200 yards. One man crossed over on my side before I passed the depot there. About the time the engine passed the depot or passed the man, he threw his hands up like that, and pointed down that way, and I threw my hands on the throttle and shut the engine off, and at that time the fireman discovered he saw something on the track and called my attention to it, and I applied the air in emergency, reversed the engine, and used sand. When he did that, I did everything possible to stop my train as soon as I could." According to the testimony of the engineer, Campbell was lying down on the track parallel with the rails just before he was struck by the pilot of the engine, and seemed to raise himself and make an effort to get off the track just before he was struck.

The plaintiff testified that her son contributed $100 or more each year toward her support, and that she was dependent upon him to that extent, as her husband was only earning $1 per day. The jury returned a verdict for $2,000 in favor of the plaintiff. Exception is taken to the judgment refusing the defendant's motion for new trial.

We think that the evidence is sufficient to authorize the conclusion that the plaintiff was dependent upon the deceased, and that he contributed to her support. While there must be both dependence and contribution, we do not think that the fact that the plaintiff's husband was bound for her support, and may have been able to supply her with a maintenance more meager than that which she received, would preclude the idea of dependence; and the fact that the mother may sometimes have supplied the deceased with small articles, or even advanced to him small sums of money, would not have been sufficient to contradict the fact that he contributed to her support, in view of the evidence that he frequently supplied her with larger sums and with various necessities of life.

None of the exceptions to the refusal of the court to give instructions which were requested can be sustained; for it appears, from a review of the charge as delivered, that each of the instructions requested was given in charge to the jury. The excerpt in the charge of which complaint is made should, in our opinion, have been qualified by an explanation of the term "imminent peril," and the jury should have been told that the liability for gross negligence, which attaches when negligence is tinged with wantonness and willfulness, would not attach, if the circumstances were such as not to impress the engineer with the belief that the deceased was in imminent peril. In other words, we do not think that it is to be assumed as a matter of course that one who is in front of an engine upon a railroad track is necessarily in imminent peril. On the contrary, the natural presumption would seem ordinarily to be that such a one would get off the track before the train would reach him. But it is not necessary for us to pass upon this question, in view of the ruling of the Supreme Court in Atlanta Railway & Power Company v. Walker, 112 Ga. 725, 88 S. E. 107.

[1] Conceding that the depot agent could have made more exertions to avert the terrible catastrophe which overtook the deceased, and that the engineer was negligent in not attempting to stop the train when the bystanders first signaled or waved to him, the real question in this case is, Do the facts show that the killing of the deceased was wanton and willful? In other words, conceding that both of the agents of the company were negligent, is the negligence so gross as to lead to a fair and reasonable inference that it must have been induced by recklessness amounting to wantonness. While neglect, in some cases, may be so gross as to warrant the presumption that it was wanton, and thus authorize the inference that the act was willful, still this is a matter to be determined in the light of all the circumstances, and especially in the light of the mind of the actors in the casualty.

Let us look at the facts of the case at bar. In the first place as to the depot agent. There can be no negligence, unless the person charged with neglect owes a duty toward the object of the negligence. The depot agent owed Mr. Campbell no duty. Of course, if it had been possible for the agent, in the exercise of humanity, to have done anything to remove Campbell from the track, morally and personally it would have been his duty to do so. But when it is said that his negligence amounts to wantonness, and when it is sought to charge the defendant company with liability for his act, it must be remembered that this agent is a special agent charged with special duties, and that the company is liable, neither for his negligence nor for any overt act committed, except within the scope of his duties. This principle is clearly stated in the case of Christian v. Columbus Railroad Company, 79 Ga. 460, 7 S. E. 216, which is cited by counsel for defendant in error, in which the railroad company was held liable, according to the allegations of the petition, for the wrongful homicide of a patron, committed by its depot agent in his office while the customer was lawfully there for the transaction of business with the agent pertaining to his agency. But even in that case the action was allowed to stay in court only because it was alleged in the petition that the railroad company employed the agent knowing that he was insane at the time of his employment; for Judge Bleckley holds that if the homicide was the result of insanity, and the railroad company was faultless in regard to employing the agent, anything which would excuse the agent criminally for the act would have excused the railroad company civilly.

Was it the duty of the depot agent as a servant of the railroad company, employed for the special purpose of selling tickets at that particular time, to remove trespassers from the tracks, and was the statement of Pittman sufficient to give notice to the agent of the company that Campbell was in fact in peril? The statement that Campbell did not move when the negro Pittman called to him does not carry to our minds the conclusion that he was unable to move, and was therefore in peril. The bystanders whom Pittman notified at the door of the depot could see Campbell, and, so far as the instincts of humanity were concerned, their duty and their natural impulse to save him harmless was as great as that of the agent of the railroad company. Evidently, therefore, the bystanders did not consider him to be in peril, because none of them made any effort to remove him from the track. So far as the depot agent is concerned, he is employed for the specific purpose of selling tickets at those periods or particular times when passengers desire to take passage. They are not charged with any duties towards those who may be trespassing upon the railroad tracks.

It is most lamentable that the plaintiff's son lost his life, but it cannot be assumed that it was due merely to negligence, however culpable it may have been, and that this negligence amounted to wantonness and willfulness, unless the negligence was that of one of the defendant company's servants charged with some duty in reference to the tracks where the decedent was sitting. The defendant's depot agent could not in any view owe a duty towards the deceased as a trespasser until he discovered his peril; and, as we view it, there was not sufficient evidence to put him on notice that the deceased was in peril. But even if the notice he received from Pittman had been sufficient to put him on notice that the deceased was in peril, and he endeavored to stop the train, although in a negligent manner, or in the wrong way, it was mere negligence or unskillfulness in stopping the train, and it could not be charged against the railroad company as wantonness or willfulness, because he was not under any duty originally to stop the train at all.

[2] As to the engineer, it is perfectly plain that, just as soon as the fact reached his mind and took lodgment that there was a helpless man on the track, he made every effort to stop the train. All his conduct goes toward negating a reckless or wanton state of mind. It might have been a negligent mistake of judgment for him to have mistaken, and therefore to have failed to heed, the attempt at warning which the bystanders undertook to give by waving their hands and throwing up their hats, but this does not make his act wanton or willful. The plaintiff failed to show that the defendant's agents acted wantonly or willfully; the defendant showed that they did not. Hence the verdict is contrary to the law, and it is our plain duty to reverse the judgment.

Judgment reversed.

ZUBER v. SOUTHERN RY. CO. (No. 8,045.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 20*)—REGULATION—RULES OF RAILROAD COMMISSION—VIOLATION—PENALTIES—NATURE.

The sums which an offended shipper may recover from a delinquent carrier under the several storage rules of the Railroad Commission are not penalties in the strict sense of the word, but are fixed civil punitive liabilities (in the nature of a substitute for punitive damages) which the shipper has the option of suing for and recovering at his election instead of pursuing his common-law remedies for redressing the same delinquency.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 10*)—REGULATION—RAILROAD COMMISSION—NATURE AND POWERS.

The Railroad Commission is an administrative, and not a legislative, body. It has only such powers as the Legislature has expressly, or by fair implication, conferred upon it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 60*)—LEGISLATIVE POWERS—DELEGATION—ADMINISTRATIVE BODIES.

Under the Constitution the General Assembly is made the legislative body of the state, and it cannot delegate its powers; but it may confer upon administrative bodies the power to make regulations and to deal in a somewhat legislative way with matters which are quasi legislative, but which are predominantly administrative in their nature.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 62*)—LEGISLATIVE POWERS—DELEGATION—ESTABLISHMENT OF PENALTIES.

The general power of imposing punishment for wrongs or neglects is a legislative function, and this is true whether the punishment is to be imposed by the infliction of a criminal penalty, or of civil punitive liability. In some cases, when the determination of what would be a just and reasonable penalty depends upon a consideration of so much data or of so many details and exigencies that the Legislature could not intelligently and justly fix the amount of the penalty without further inquiry and investigation than is expedient in the ordinary course of the passage of legislation, it may in general terms declare the punishableness of the thing to be penalized, and leave to an administrative body or officer the ascertainment and declaration of what the amount of the penalty should be.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 94-102; Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

5. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 62*)—LEGISLATIVE POWERS—DELEGATION—RAILROAD COMMISSION—RULES PRESCRIBING PENALTIES.

The question as to what amount of penalty should be assessed against a railroad company for delinquency in furnishing cars and in other respects relative to its duty of receiving, forwarding, and delivering freight promptly is a question involving inquiry into so many facts and conditions capable of accurate ascertainment only "outside of the halls of legislation" as to make it a matter which the Legislature could delegate to the Railroad Commission; provided that the Legislature itself in general terms performed the purely legislative act of declaring expressly, or by fair implication, that the delinquency should be punishable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 94-102; Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

6. CARRIERS (§ 20*)—RAILROAD COMMISSION—RULES PRESCRIBING PENALTIES.

As to the matters dealt with in storage rule 9 of the Railroad Commission, the Legislature declared the general punishableness of the delinquencies there dealt with, and left to the Railroad Commission the working out of the details of the penalty, and therefore the civil punitive liability imposed by that rule is enforceable. Prior to the adoption of the act of 1907 (Laws 1907, p. 72), enlarging the powers of the Railroad Commission, the Legislature had never declared, either expressly or by any fair implication, that the delinquencies dealt with in storage rules 1, 10, and 12 of the commission should be punishable otherwise than by the infliction of the penalty of $250 imposed by the fourth section of the act approved August 23, 1905 (Georgia Laws, 1905, p. 121); hence so much of those rules as impose an additional civil punitive liability is unenforceable as to matter occurring prior to the passage of the act of 1907.

Moore & Pomeroy and W. W. Hood, for plaintiff in error. McDaniel, Alston & Black, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The plaintiff's action was dismissed on general demurrer, and only a pure law point is presented, namely, Did the act of August 23, 1905 (Georgia Laws 1905, p. 120), confer upon the Railroad Commission power to enact so much of storage rules 1, 10, and 12 as names and fixes the amount which the shipper may recover from the carrier in the event the latter is delinquent as to the matters dealt with in those rules? The cause of action arose after the passage of the act of 1905, above referred to, and prior to the act of 1907 (Laws 1907, p. 72), enlarging the powers of the commission. The case is controlled by the law as it stood in the latter part of the year 1905, and during the year 1906. It will be difficult to understand the precise question here presented, unless we quote somewhat at length from both the act of 1905 and the rules in question. The act of 1905 is as follows:

"An act to further extend the powers of the Railroad Commission of this state, and to confer upon the commission the power to regulate the time and manner within which the several railroads in this state shall receive, receipt for, forward and deliver to its destination all freights of every character, which may be tendered or received by them for transportation; to provide a penalty for non-compliance with any and all reasonable rules, regulations and orders prescribed by the said commission in the execution of these powers, and for other purposes.

"Section 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Georgia, and it is hereby enacted by authority of the same, that from and after the passage of this act, the Railroad Commission of this state shall be, and is, hereby vested with full power and authority to make, prescribe, and enforce all such reasonable rules, regulations and orders as may be necessary in order to compel and require the several railroad companies in this state to promptly receive, receipt for, forward and deliver to destination all freights of every character which may be tendered or received by them for transportation; and as well such reasonable rules, regulations and orders as may be necessary to compel and require prompt delivery of all freights, on arrival at destination, to the consignee.

"Sec. 2. Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that whenever a shipper or consignor shall require of a railroad company the placing of a car or cars to be used in car load shipments, then in order for the consignor or shipper to avail himself of the forfeitures or penalties prescribed by the rules and regulations of said Railroad Commission, it must first appear that such shipper or consignor made written application for said car or cars to said railroad; provided further, that such Railroad Commission shall, by reasonable rules and regulations, provide the time within which said car or cars shall be furnished after being ordered as aforesaid, and the penalty per day per car to be paid by said railroad company in the event such car or cars are not furnished as ordered, and provided further, that in order for any shipper or consignor to avail himself of the penalties provided by the rules and regulations of said Railroad Commission, such shipper or consignor shall likewise be subject, under proper rules to be fixed by said commission, to the orders, rules and regulations of said Railroad Commission.

"Sec. 3. Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that before any railroad company is subjected to the penalties provided by this act, said Railroad Commission shall require said railroad company to show cause therefor; and if sufficient cause is shown then said company shall be relieved from any further liability under this act.

"Sec. 4. Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that for the violation of any such rules, orders or regulations, so established by said commission, the railroad company so offending shall incur a penalty in a sum not exceeding two hundred and fifty dollars ($250), to be fixed by the jury after suit is brought therefor, under the provisions of existing laws regulating the institution and prosecution of suits for penalties incurred by railroad companies in consequence of violations of the rules and regulations prescribed by said commission."

The rules which are about to be quoted were prescribed under the first section of the act, but it is important to notice, also, the second section because that section and storage rule 9 of the commission adopted in pursuance of it have been the subject of several decisions of the Supreme Court and of this court; and it will be necessary to determine in the course of this discussion how far the decisions which have been made as to rule 9 affect the question raised as to these other rules to which section 2 does not relate. The parts of rules 1, 10, and 12, which are here material, are as follows:

Rule 1: "(a) Upon the arrival at destination of any and all freights, the delivering line shall within twenty-four hours thereafter, give to consignees thereof legal notice of such arrival. For failure to give such legal notice of arrival, the railroad company at fault shall pay to the consignee so offended the sum of one dollar per car per day on car load shipments, and one cent per hundred pounds per day, on less than car load shipments, for each day during which the terms of this rule are not complied with."

Rule 10: "Whenever freight of any character, proper for transportation, whether in car load quantities or less, is tendered to a railroad company at its customary place for receiving shipments, and correct shipping instructions given, such railroad company shall immediately receive the same and issue bills of lading therefor. And when a shipment is thus received, the same must be carried forward at a rate of not less than fifty miles per day of twenty-four hours computed from seven o'clock a. m., of the day following the receipt of shipment. * * * For failure to so receive or transport shipments as hereinbefore provided for, the railroad company at fault shall, within thirty days after demand in writing is made therefor, pay to the shipper so offended, or other party whose interest is affected thereby, the sum of one dollar per car, on car load shipments, and one cent per hundred pounds, subject to a minimum of five cents, on less than car load shipments, for each day or fraction thereof, that the terms of this rule are not complied with."

Rule 12: "Railroad companies are required to make prompt delivery of all freights upon the arrival thereof at destination. For failure to deliver at freight depot, or to place loaded cars at an accessible point for unloading the same, within forty-eight hours, exclusive of Sundays and legal holidays, computed from seven o'clock a. m., the day after the arrival of same at destination over its line, the railroad company at fault shall pay to the shipper or consignee of such goods, one dollar per day on car load shipments, and one cent per hundred pounds per day on less than car load shipments, for each day or fraction thereof, that such delivery is so delayed."

By rule 9 (which, as has been stated already, does not apply to the case at bar, but which has been before the courts for adjudication several times) the carrier is required to furnish cars for loading within four days after written request, and, in case of failure, allows the offended shipper to recover $1 per day per car for each day's delay in excess of the free time allowed. The plaintiff in his petition alleged a number of failures on the part of the defendant to comply with the respective terms of rules 1, 10, and 12, and a refusal on the defendant's part to pay the sums which the rules allowed as a result of these failures, and further alleged that his claim had been presented to the Railroad Commission in pursuance of section 8 of the act and had been duly allowed after the defendant had failed to show sufficient cause to relieve it from liability. The trial judge held that the commission exceeded its authority in naming and fixing the amounts which the shipper might recover from the carrier for a violation of the rules in question, and therefore sustained the demurrer to the plaintiff's petition.

[1] The exact nature of this liability which attaches against the carrier and in favor of the shipper on account of a violation of these rules of the Railroad Commission, and which in the second section of the act of 1905 is called a penalty, has never been judicially declared. Some progress towards a definition has been made in the cases of Southern Ry. Co. v. Melton, 133 Ga. 277, 65 S. E. 665, and of Southern Ry. Co. v. Moore, 133 Ga. 806, 67 S. E. 85, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 851, in the first of which it was held not to be a penalty in the sense in which that word is used to express the notion of criminal punishment for wrong; and in the other of which it was held not to be such liquidated damages as to preclude the shipper from resorting to his common-law remedy at his election. See, also, Southern Ry. Co. v. Atlanta Sand Co., 135 Ga. 35, 68 S. E. 807. Giving due effect to all of these cases, it may be said that these rules fix a liquidated sum in the nature of civil punitive damages which an offended shipper may recover from a delinquent carrier by pursuing the course mentioned in the act, but that the remedy thus given is not exclusive, and the shipper may nevertheless at his election bring his common-law action, in which event he must prove his damages and leave to the jury the assessment of the amount. The question, therefore, narrows to this: Did the commission have the power to provide that a breach of its rules on the part of the carrier should result in the shipper's having the right to recover punitive damages without further proof of bad faith or any of the other elements which usually characterize punitive damages, and to recover them in a fixed amount instead of leaving the amount to the assessment of the jury according to their enlightened consciences?

[2] It is well settled that the Railroad Commission is an administrative, and not a legislative, body. It has only such powers as the Legislature has expressly, or, by fair implication, conferred upon it.

[3] The Constitution makes the General Assembly the legislative body of the state, and it cannot delegate its general legislative powers. Nevertheless, it may confer upon administrative bodies quasi legislative functions which it itself might perform, but could not so adequately perform directly as it could by delegating them.

[4] For example, the matter of declaring that common carriers shall charge reasonable rates is a legislative function, and the matter of declaring what shall be a reasonable rate is a quasi legislative function, and the Legislature, after outlining as its policy for the regulation of rates that they should be established upon a reasonable basis, and having thus dealt with the strictly legislative phase of the matter, might go forward and declare specifically what the rate should be for this or that particular service, thus performing also the quasi legislative function; but it would ordinarily be highly inexpedient for the Legislature to undertake to deal directly and specifically with this latter phase, owing to its limited facilities for acquiring the vast mass of data and of particular and technical details which enter into the fixing of rates. Hence it legitimately delegates this power to the administrative body which possesses these facilities—the Railroad Commission.

To say that wrongful or neglectful conduct shall be penalized is such a legislative function as cannot be delegated by the Legislature. That this is true as to penalties of a criminal nature will not be questioned, and we believe that the same principle applies where a wrong or neglect is penalized by giving the person against whom the wrong or neglect particularly operates the right to recover punitive damages in a civil action. In other words, it is purely a legislative function to authorize the imposition of punitive liability, whether that liability is to be enforced in a civil or in a criminal action. The Legislature may authorize an administrative body or officer to make regulations and may declare it to be punishable for any person to violate those regulations; but, unless the Legislature itself gives its sanction, at least in general terms, to the imposition of punishment, or of civil redress in the nature of punishment, for an act or general class of acts, no merely administrative board can provide for the punishment of that act or class of acts and supply the details of how and when the penalty or punishment shall be imposed. Cf. United States v. Grimaud (U. S. Law Ed. advance sheet, June 1, 1911) 220 U. S. 506, 31 Sup. Ct. 480, 55 L. Ed. —, and cases there cited.

[5] As to the portion of rule 9 of the Railroad Commission in which it is provided that the offended shipper may recover of the delinquent carrier $1 per day per car for the delay after the specified free time has expired the Supreme Court in the Melton Case, supra, held that, since the Legislature had declared that the commission should make the rule on the subject and fill in the details and name the penalty, the rule in this respect was enforceable and the penalty named by the commission collectible. It is plain from a study of the whole opinion in that case (as well as of the opinion in the Atlanta Sand Co. Case, supra) that the court took the view that, as to this specified thing of failing to furnish cars after written demand, the Legislature had given not only its sanction that the delinquency should be penalized, but had in terms required the commission to name the penalty as a part of its rule on the subject; and that, the Legislature having performed the strictly legislative function of declaring that the violation of the commission's rule on the subject should be punishable, it did not delegate a legislative duty, but only a quasi legislative duty, which was largely of an administrative character, to the commission when it authorized that body to say how much per day per car that penalty or punitive liability should be. This ruling of our Supreme Court, thus interpreted, is somewhat of an extension of the doctrine so ably set forth by Mr. Justice Lamar in the Grimaud Case, supra, but it is an extension which may be justified by the nature of the subject-matter of the penalty.

As to some subjects it might be easy for the Legislature not only to declare that a delinquency should be redressed by civil or criminal penalty, but also for it justly to assess and fix upon the exact amount of the penalty, or at least to set certain limits. As to other subjects, the determination of the amount of the penalty or of the basis on which it should justly be laid may involve such an amount of investigation and a consideration of so many particular exigencies as to make the fixing of the amount of the penalty only quasi legislative and predominantly administrative in character; and the determination of what would be a just and reasonable penalty to allow for a failure to furnish the cars and of what amount of delay or free time should elapse before liability for the penalty should begin would seem to be one of the subjects in which the administrative elements predominate. While the fact that the commission has dealt with this subject by laying a uniform penalty and creating a uniform free time as to all classes of freight and as to all classes of carriers might militate against the contention that the fixing of the penalty was a thing which the Legislature could not have easily done directly; still, it must be kept in mind that it is the nature of the subject itself, and not the manner in which it has been dealt with by the administrative body, which determines whether the power to deal with it has been legally delegated or not, and it may readily be seen that the fixing of a just penalty for a violation of the rule in question is a subject which the commission might very naturally have dealt with by entering into the field of particularization and classification. For instance, the commission, instead of saying that the free time for furnishing all classes of cars should be four days, might have said that as to fruit cars one day should be allowed, as to grain cars two days, as to cars for cotton three days, as to cars for lumber four days, as to cars for ordinary merchandise five days, and so on; or it might have classified the railroads, and have said that those say in class A with great facilities for obtaining and furnishing cars should have two days, while those in class C, with small facilities, should have four days, and so on. It might have said that the penalty for failing to furnish fruit cars should be $4 per day, and cars $1 per day, and so on, or that the roads of one class should pay one penalty for delinquency, and that the roads of another class differently situated should pay a different amount. As the Supreme Court of the United States declared in Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, 143 U. S. 694, 12 Sup. Ct. 505, 36 L. Ed. 294: "The Legislature cannot delegate its power to make a law, but it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes or intends to make its own action depend. To deny this would be to stop the wheels of government. There are many things upon which wise and useful legislation must depend which cannot be known to the lawmaking power, and must therefore be a subject of inquiry and determination outside of the halls of legislation." The fact that the Railroad Commission decided after investigation that the matter of penalizing delinquency as to furnishing cars could be adequately and justly dealt with by a simple and uniform rule on the subject renders that matter none the less a legitimate "subject of inquiry and determination outside of the halls of legislation," to the end that the action of the law which the Legislature itself enacted should be adequately and justly exerted in the general manner intended. This we conceive to be the rationale of the ruling in the Melton Case, supra, and the reconciliation between that case and the Grimaud Case, supra.

[8] The Melton Case dealt with rule 9 of the commission, which, as may be seen above, was adopted under the express authorization of the second section of the act of 1905. And the validity of that rule and of the penalty, or rather civil punitive liability, provided in it was upheld. The rules involved in the case at bar, so far as the penalty feature is concerned, rest on no such basis. The Legislature did not as to the matters dealt with in the first section of the act (and it must be kept in mind that the rules here in question were adopted under the authority of that section) say anything as to penalty, except in so far as the fourth section of the act lays the criminal penalty of $250. As to the civil punitive liability which any of these rules impose, the entire act, except the second section, is silent so far as any express language is concerned.

Counsel for the plaintiff in error concede this, but say that the power to impose this punitive liability is by fair and necessary implication given also as to the matters dealt with in section one of the act. They call attention to the fact that by the language of that section as to these matters the commission "is vested with full power and authority to make and enforce all such reasonable rules, regulations, and orders as may be necessary in order to compel and require the several railroad companies" to be prompt in the performance of the duties dealt with in these rules. They stress the words "enforce," "compel," and "require." We think that it is plain that the Legislature intended that the commission should make rules specifying the time within which the railroad companies should perform the various acts necessary to the receipt, forwarding and delivery of freights, and that the time should be so fixed as to make the companies act promptly; but that as to these matters (except as to the solitary case of furnishing cars dealt with specifically in the second section) the Legislature evinced no intention of penalizing delinquencies by imposing any punitive civil or criminal liability other than the penalty of $250 mentioned in section 4 of the act. If the act be construed in the light of its title, this conclusion becomes only the more irresistible. The title of the act reads thus: "An act to further extend the powers of the Railroad Commission of this state, and to confer upon the commission the power to regulate the time and manner within which the several railroads in this state shall receive, receipt for, forward and deliver to its destination all freights of every character, which may be tendered or received by them for transportation; to provide a penalty for non-compliance with any and all reasonable rules, regulations and orders prescribed by the said commission in the execution of these powers, and for other purposes." The title speaks of regulations as to "time and manner," and the words "enforce," "compel" and "require" do not appear in that context. The title uses the words "a penalty" it is true; but these words undoubtedly refer to the penalty laid in the fourth section of the act (and it was so expressly held in the Melton Case, supra), and not to the civil punitive liability imposed by these rules. If the act itself had not provided a specific penalty, thus giving a punitive sanction sufficient ordinarily to insure obedience, there might be greater color to the argument that the Legislature in the use of the words "enforce," "compel," and "require," as they appear in the context already quoted, evinced such a clear intention of putting some punitive sanction back of the rules as to authorize the commission to perform the merely administrative function of saying how much that penalty or civil punitive liability should be. But, as it is, the Legislature has named one penalty and has suggested no other.

It seems to us that in the rules now before us the Railroad Commission attempted not only to perform the administrative act of assessing the amount of a penalty, but also to perform the purely legislative function of creating the element of civil punishableness as to things which the Legislature had not declared to be punishable otherwise than criminally. As the Legislature had not paved the way by furnishing in advance the legislative object on which the administrative act was to operate, so much of these rules as lay the penalties in question must fail. As an unfertilized egg, which contains all the elements of the embryonic chicken except that one thing which distinguishes fertile eggs from the unfertile, will not hatch, so these rules, though they contain all the elements of a valid basis for legal action, except the one vitalizing thing of express legislative authorization, are legally sterile, and cannot support a cause of action; and the court did not err in sustaining the general demurrer.

Judgment affirmed.

CAROLINA PORTLAND CEMENT CO. v.
MARSHALL (No. 3,131.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. July 25, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TRIAL (§ 25*)—CONDUCT IN GENERAL—RIGHT TO OPEN AND CLOSE.

When the admissions of the defendant in an action, without more, entitle the plaintiff to recover, and the defendant merely seeks to recoup under a contract which he admits to have been fulfilled, the defendant, and not the plaintiff, has the burden of proof, and consequently right to open and conclude the argument to the jury. The admissions of the defendant in his answer would have entitled the plaintiff to a verdict without the introduction of any testimony; consequently the court did not err in holding that the burden of proof was cast upon the defendant, and that he was entitled to open and conclude the argument in the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 44-75; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 150*)—COMPETENCY—RESULT OF EXPERIMENT.

There was no error in the admission of the testimony which was objected to. The testimony which was repelled was testimony as to experiment, and its admission or rejection was within the discretion of the judge. It cannot be said that this discretion was abused. The charge of the court presented the issue fully and fairly, and the evidence authorized the verdict.

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodges, Judge.

Action by the Carolina Portland Cement Company against W. J. Marshall. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Walter T. Johnson and Ryals, Grace & Anderson, for plaintiff in error. Oliver C. Hancock and Miller & Jones, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. [1] 1. One of the points most vigorously stressed, on the consideration of the present writ of error, was the alleged error of the trial judge in holding that under the pleadings the defendant assumed the burden of proof, and was entitled to the opening and conclusion. Some point is made upon the fact that the judge permitted the defendant's counsel to state what meaning was intended to be conveyed by his answer, and that he rendered the decision partly upon the oral statement or admission of the defendant's counsel. Of course, the admissions on the part of the defendant which would entitle him to take the burden of proof and be awarded the opening and conclusion must appear in the pleadings, and the decision is to be made by their contents, and nothing else. However, in the present case the record shows that, if the judge committed error in allowing the oral statement by counsel for defendant, the error was harmless, for by the pleadings it was shown that the defendant admitted every material thing required to authorize the plaintiff to recover under the form of action brought by him.

The petition was as follows:

"To the City Court of Macon:

"The petition of Carolina Portland Cement Company of Atlanta, Georgia, Fulton county, respectfully shows:

"(1) That W. J. Marshall of Bibb county, Ga., is indebted to plaintiff in the sum of ninety-three dollars and forty-eight cents ($93.48), besides interest, upon an open account which he, said W. J. Marshall, refuses to pay, copy of which is hereto attached.

"(2) That the said W. J. Marshall has not paid the same nor any part thereof.

"Wherefore petition prays that process may issue requiring the said W. J. Marshall to be and appear at the next term of said court to answer petitioner's complaint."

To this was attached a sworn statement of account as follows:

W. J. Marshall, Lizella, Ga., Bought of Carolina Portland Cement Co.

In the first paragraph of defendant's answer "defendant denies paragraph 1 of plaintiff's petition, except that he admits that he is a resident of Bibb county, Ga.; also defendant admits that he refused to pay the said $93.48, as alleged in said paragraph 1. Defendant admits paragraph 2 of plaintiff's petition."

The defendant then proceeds to set up in his own behalf an affirmative issue by alleging the breach of an express warranty, and that by reason of the breach he was damaged in various particulars to an amount specified in the answer; but in paragraph 4 of the answer he admits that he bought the cement and used it. The effect, then, of the defendant's answer, while in a sense he denied the indebtedness by reason of the fact that he claimed that the plaintiff owed him more than he owed it, was to admit every fact necessary to be proved by the plaintiff in order to establish its case. He admitted that he resided in Bibb county; that he received the cement; that the contract price was that set forth in the declaration; that he used the cement, and that he had refused to pay for it. It is clear that, unless he established the affirmative defense he was attempting to set up by way of recoupment, the plaintiff must inevitably recover. Therefore the burden of proof was cast upon him, and the plaintiff, not being required to maintain the affirmative of the proposition, was relieved of the necessity of offering any testimony in support of its case as laid.

[2] 2. Though there are several exceptions in the record, this is the only proposition to which it is necessary to make special reference. The evidence in regard to the test to which the dam was subjected by a freshet subsequent to the one in which the dam constructed of the standard cement was washed away was admissible as a circumstance likely to illustrate the value of the cement first used, and the cost of the dam as a whole was one of the factors which would enable a jury to determine what was the probable loss of the defendant in using the worthless cement, if the jury found it to be worthless. The testimony that the standard cement was used with good effect in performing other contracts might have been admitted without error; we think we would have admitted it, but it is well settled that the admission of evidence of experiment is a matter peculiarly within the discretion of the trial judge, and it cannot be said that in this instance that discretion was abused. One of the exceptions to the charge of the court (which is presented in several different ways) is that the court laid down the same rule or measure of proof necessary to establish indirect or consequential damages as it applied in the case of direct damage; but on an examination of the charge as a whole we do not find the exception to be well taken. Judgment affirmed.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 668*)—STATEMENT BY ACCUSED.

In the exercise of his statutory right, the accused is authorized to make any statement to the jury in his defense that he may deem necessary, and, so long as he confines himself to the transaction under investigation, this right cannot be restricted by the trial judge. This does not mean, however, that the accused can occupy the time of the court in making wholly irrelevant statements, entirely inapplicable to the case, and the judge, in his discretion, can interrupt him when he is doing so, and instruct him to confine his statement to the case. Coxwell v. State, 66 Ga. 309.

RUSSELL, J. (dissenting). I do not dissent from the clear statement of the abstract principle announced by Chief Judge HILL in the first paragraph of the decision, but I differ from my Associates as to its applicability to the facts appearing in the present record. We all agree in the assertion of the general principle that the defendant has the right to make just such statement as he may see proper in his own behalf, yet that there are some instances in which the court is not only authorized, but may be required, to interfere with defendant's going into matters entirely disconnected with the trial. However, many facts which might not be competent or relevant as testimony might corroborate a defendant's statement or tend to prove its truth. For instance, a man prosecuted for carrying a concealed pistol, as this defendant was, might be able to impress the jury more strongly with the truthfulness of his denial that the pistol was concealed by going into a detailed account as to why he had the pistol at all, and the purpose for which he was carrying it, or by detailing circumstances which would lead a reasonable mind to conclude that it was incredible that under the circumstances he could have had a pistol at all, if (as in the present instance) he denied having a pistol altogether. I think that the statement which the court prevented the accused from making falls within this rule. The reasons why, in my judgment, the law intended that the utmost liberality should be allowed the defendant in the making of a statement are set forth in Richardson v. State, 3 Ga. App. 313, 59 S. E. 916.

HILL, C. J. The brief filed for the railway company, plaintiff in error, opens with the following sentence: "There is no error in the charge of the court, or in any ruling of the court upon the trial. A new trial should have been granted because the verdict was contrary to the undisputed evidence." The correctness of the statement contained in the first sentence above quoted is fully concurred in, and no error of law is complained of. A careful consideration of the evidence leads this court to a directly opposite conclusion from that stated in the second sentence above. The plaintiff in error, as the initial carrier, did not successfully carry the burden of proof by showing that the contents of the baggage of a passenger intrusted to its care had not been stolen while the baggage was in its own possession. Besides, the most reasonable deduction from the undisputed evidence was that the contents of the baggage had been stolen by an employé of the initial carrier, and before the baggage had been delivered by the initial carrier to the connecting carrier.

All but two of the defendants voluntarily complied with the judgment and sentence of the court, and these two filed a joint motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and they brought the case to this court on a joint writ of error from the judgment overruling their motion for a new trial. Held that, having been jointly indicted, jointly tried, and jointly convicted they had the right to bring a joint writ of error to this court to review the judgment overruling their joint motion for a new trial. The fact that the others who were jointly indicted and convicted with them failed to join them in the motion for a new trial, but voluntarily complied with the judgment and sentence of the court, does not affect the right of those who do except.

Error from City Court of Statesboro; J. F. Brannen, Judge.

Action by D. E. McEachern against Mrs. Zada Ingraham, and attachment levied on J. A. Wilson. Treverse to answer to gar-nishee sustained and motion for new trial overruled, and he brings error. Reversed.

Fred T. Lanier, for plaintiff in error. R. Lee Moore, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. On July 6, 1907, McEachern sued out an attachment against Mrs. Zada Ingraham. This attachment was on the same day levied by service of summons of garnishment upon Wilson, plaintiff in error. His answer denying indebtedness was traversed and the jury sustained the traverse, and the garnishee's motion for a new trial was overruled. In support of the traverse the following facts were proved: In March, 1907, Wilson, the garnishee, being indebted to Mrs. Zada Ingraham in the sum of $490, paid this indebtedness by cash and a duebill, and on July 4, 1907, he took up this duebill from Mrs. Ingraham, giving her therefor his check on the Bank of Statesboro. There is some slight question in the evidence whether this check was for $240 or $283, and also some slight question whether the check was dated on July 4, 1907, or whether it was a postdated check, being dated October 1, 1907. The jury were fully authorized to believe from the evidence that the amount of the check was $283, and that it was issued and delivered by Wilson to Mrs. Ingraham on the 4th day of July, 1907, and that it was actually dated October 1, 1907. When the summons of garnishment was served on Wilson July 6, 1907, Mrs. Ingraham had the check in question in her possession, and on or about July 12th she made an effort to get the bank upon which the check was drawn to cash the same, but the bank refused to cash it, on the ground that it was postdated. On July 16, 1907, the J. W. Olliff Company, at the instance of Perry Rountree, cashed the check for Mrs. Ingraham, after deducting from the face thereof an account which she owed this firm, and on this date Wilson, the garnishee, took up this check from the firm of J. W. Olliff Company by giving his promissory note therefor for $283, due October 1, 1907. On the trial the judge, over the objection of the defendant, admitted the testimony of the bank officials that Mrs. Ingraham attempted to have the check cashed, and that the check was for $283 and was dated October 1, 1907. This evidence was admitted after preliminary proof that the garnishee, Wilson, had been served with notice to produce the check which he had given to Mrs. Ingraham for $283, and that he had not produced it. Objection was also made to the introduction of an entry from the journal of J. W. Olliff Company, showing that the company had cashed the check in question on July 16, 1907, and that the garnishee had on that day taken up the check and substituted therefor his note due October 1, 1907, for $283. This entry was admitted after preliminary proof that the book on which it was entered was the book of original entries kept by J. W. Olliff Company.

The following excerpt from the charge of the court is also excepted to: "I charge you further that if you find, from the evidence in this case, that the garnishee drew a check for the indebtedness existing at the time, on July 4, 1907, in favor of Mrs. Zada Ingraham, on the Bank of Statesboro, and you find that he parted from that check on July 4, 1907, and it was not regularly negotiated, and was dishonored and payment refused, then the garnishee would be liable, and the plaintiff would be entitled to recover in this case." It is insisted that this charge is error and does not state the law applicable to the evidence in the case. There is no merit in the objections made to the admissibility of the testimony in view of the preliminary proof.

The charge of the court objected to did not state the law applicable to the facts, and was calculated to mislead the jury. There was no evidence whatever that the check had been dishonored. The evidence did show that its payment was refused by the bank because the day of its date had not arrived, and it further discloses the fact that the check had been cashed by the J. W. Olliff Company for the payee, Mrs. Ingraham, before the day of its date. Now, a postdated check, or one which bears a date subsequent to that of its actual issue, is payable on or after the day of its date, being in effect the same as if it had not been issued until that date. The failure of the bank to pay the postdated check until the day of its date was not a dishonor of the check. It would not be dishonored unless it was presented on the day of its date and payment was then refused. And the fact that the bank refused to pay a postdated check before the day of its date would not of itself render liable the drawer of the check, who had been served with summons of garnishment before the day of the date of the check. While the drawer of a postdated check can be garnished as debtor of the payee with respect to the debt for which the check was given, no judgment should be rendered against the drawer of the check as garnishee unless it is affirmatively shown that at the time of the rendition of the judgment the check had become due, and was still the property of the original payee. A postdated check payable to the order of the payee is in effect a negotiable instrument, and before this negotiable instrument is due, the maker thereof cannot tell to whom he will owe it at maturity, because his obligation is not to pay it to any particular person, but to the holder at maturity, whomever he may be; and for the court to render a judgment against the garnishee, on such a negotiable instrument, as the debtor of the original payee, necessarily assumes that the payee is the holder of the note or check when the same fell due, and this the court cannot assume to be the fact, for the instrument may in the meantime and before maturity have been transferred to an innocent bona fide holder for value, who, as such holder, would be protected in his title, notwithstanding the maker of the negotiable instrument had been served with the summons of garnishment requiring him to answer what he was indebted to the payee who may have been the owner of the negotiable instrument at the time of the service of the summons.

The rights of a purchaser for value before maturity and without notice are paramount to those of a garnishing creditor, and the doctrine of lis pendens does not apply to negotiable instruments not due, and the summons of garnishment on the maker of such an instrument does not impound the fund in his hands so that the transfer of the instrument in good faith before maturity would not defeat the claim of the creditor. Mims v. West, 38 Ga. 18, 95 Am. Dec. 379. The bank upon which the check in question was drawn had the right to refuse to pay it in July, because, by its date, it was not to be paid until the following October; but this was no dishonor of the check. The payee of the check, it being a negotiable instrument, could transfer it before maturity, for value, and if the transferee took it without notice of any defect or defense, or of any summons of garnishment on the maker of the check, and bought it in good faith, paying value therefor, then the maker of the check could not, under the law, have been liable as garnishee. The maker of the check had the right to take it up and pay it in the hands of the transferee, even after the service of summons of garnishment had been made upon him, because the holder of the check was his creditor, and not the original payee. We are inclined to think from the evidence that the jury might have inferred that the J. W. Olliff Company were not in fact bona fide holders of this check, but that in cashing it before its date they were endeavoring to aid Mrs. Ingraham, the original payee, in avoiding the effect of the summons of garnishment which had been issued in the case and served upon the drawer of the check. At least this question was, under all the circumstances, issuable. But the charge of the court ignored entirely the legal effect of the transfer of the check to J. W. Olliff Company, and eliminated from the jury any position which they may have occupied as a bona fide transferee of the check, and in effect instructed the jury that they might find the garnishee liable on the check without reference to the intervening rights of a bona fide purchaser thereof before maturity. In other words, under the charge of the court, the maker of this check may have been called upon to pay not only the check, but also the debt represented by the check, as garnishee, to the garnishing creditor, and again, as maker of the check, to the bona fide holder thereof. It is well settled that no judgment can be legally rendered against a garnishee unless such judgment when satisfied would protect him against a subsequent suit to recover the same debt.

Because of the error contained in the charge excepted to, as above discussed, we are constrained to grant another trial.

Judgment reversed.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 159*)—APPEAL—BOND—SUFFICIENCY.

Where a defendant in attachment has replevied the property levied upon, giving the statutory bond, and has also filed a traverse to the grounds of the attachment, and the plaintiff in attachment elects to take a general judgment, but does not dismiss the attachment, and the defendant appeals to the superior court, the surety on the replevy bond cannot be surety also on the appeal bond.

Error from Superior Court, Clinch County; T. A. Parker, Judge.

Action in attachment by E. L. Thomas against J. W. McGarrity & Co. General judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal to the superior court. Motion to dismiss appeal sustained, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

An attachment was levied upon certain personal property, and the defendants replevied the property, giving the replevy bond as provided by the statute, and traversed the grounds of the attachment. The plaintiff thereupon elected to take a general judgment against the defendants, and not a judgment in rem, nor a judgment on the replevy bond; and the defendants entered an appeal to the superior court, furnishing an appeal bond with the same surety thereon that had been previously given on the replevy bond. When the case was called for trial in the superior court, the plaintiff moved to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the same surety appeared on both the appeal bond and the replevy bond, and this motion was sustained. The judgment dismissing the appeal is assigned as error.

S. C. Townsend, for plaintiffs in error. Patterson & Copeland, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). We think the judgment of dismissal was right, under the general principle decided in Woodliff v. Bloodworth, 121 Ga. 456, 49 S. E. 289, and cases there cited. The plaintiffs in error seek to avoid the effect of this decision and of others announcing the same principle, by insisting that their election in the court below to take a general judgment was tantamount to an abandonment of their attachment, and the abandonment of the attachment carried with it the replevy bond, and the surety thereon was no longer liable, and that, being released from liability on the replevy bond, he became a proper surety on the appeal bond. This would be true if the premise were entirely sound.

The plaintiff did not dismiss the attachment in the court below, but, in view of the traverse to the grounds of the attachment, only took in that court a general judgment in personam. But the appeal which was subsequently entered by the defendants carried with it the entire case and became a de novo investigation in the superior court, and the plaintiff in attachment, notwithstanding the fact that he had taken only a general judgment in the court below, could, on the trial of the appeal, insist on a judgment in rem, as well as on a judgment in personam. Civ. Code 1910, § 5113. And this right kept alive the possible liability of the defendant in attachment and his surety on the replevy bond.

We think, therefore, that under the facts in this case and in view of the contingent liability on the replevy bond resulting from the appeal and the de novo investigation, the court was fully warranted in dismissing the appeal, on the ground that no sufficient appeal bond had been given, because the surety on that bond was also surety on the replevy bond.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Kershaw County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Nannie M. McKain, as administratrix of the estate of Richard N. McKain, deceased, against the Camden Water, Light & Ice Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The following are the exceptions referred to in the opinion:

Exceptions.

"The plaintiff excepts to the rulings of the trial court, and to the charge to the jury, and to the judgment entered upon the verdict, upon the following grounds of error:

"(1) In refusing to allow the question, 'Was that protected?' alluding to crank which came within two inches of a guard surrounding fly wheel; the error of law being found: (a) In refusing to allow witness to testify as to an allegation of negligence, the unguarded condition of fly wheel, it being for the jury to determine whether the protection of the crank would not also have been a protection of the fly wheel, whether or not one could be protected without the other. (b) In refusing to allow testimony as to the conditions or surrounding circumstances of the alleged unsafe place where plaintiff's intestate met his death, because of an unprotected and unguarded fly wheel.

"(2) In allowing and permitting the witness Boynton, over plaintiff's objection, to testify as to the terms of a verbal contract between the defendant and the Camden Oil Mill, whose machinery defendant was using when plaintiff was killed. The error of law being found: (a) In allowing testimony as to irrelevant matter calculated to mislead the jury from one of the true issues in this case, whether or not defendant furnished plaintiff's intestate with a reasonably safe place to work. (b) In allowing testimony tending to show that the unsafe place was furnished defendant by the Southern Oil Mill, under terms and conditions which prohibited or excused defendant from making any changes, thereby injecting into the case a foreign issue calculated to mislead, and which could in no way excuse defendant for not performing its legal duty to furnish plaintiff with a reasonably safe place to work.

"(3) In allowing and permitting the witness Eve, over plaintiff's objection, to testify as to the terms of a verbal contract between the defendant and the Camden Oil Mill, whose machinery defendant was using when plaintiff was killed. The error of law being found: (a) In allowing testimony as to irrelevant matter calculated to mislead the jury from one of the true issues of this case, whether or not defendant furnished plaintiff's intestate with a reasonably safe place to work. (b) In allowing testimony tending to show that the unsafe place was furnished defendant by the Southern Oil Mill, under terms and conditions which prohibited or excused defendant from making any changes, thereby injecting into the case a foreign issue calculated to mislead, and which could in no way excuse defendant for not performing its legal duty to furnish plaintiff with a reasonably safe place to work. (c) In allowing testimony of terms of a contract which witness testifying did not inform plaintiff's intestate of, or know of his own knowledge that plaintiff's intestate derived such information from any other source, the only effect of which could be to bolster up the witness Boynton's testimony to show that he was telling the truth about an irrelevant and undisputed fact.

"(4) In charging without qualification: 'And it is the duty of the master to furnish, not an absolutely safe place for the servant to work in, but a reasonably safe place.' The error of law being found: (a) In charging in effect that if a man of ordinary care and prudence, under all the circumstances, would furnish an absolutely safe place to work in, it would not be negligence to leave undone what said man of ordinary care and prudence would have done.

"(5) In charging: 'I might be negligent in leaving my horse hitched to the buggy out here, without tying him, and if that horse did anybody any injury I would not be liable.' The error of law being found in erroneously defining the proximate cause. If I negligently cease to control a dangerous and unreasoning instrumentality which belongs to me, in a public place, and damage ensues to some one as a direct consequence of my negligence, I am liable.

"(6) In charging that: 'If the master furnishes a place, and it is defective to such an extent that a man of ordinary prudence, care, and reason can see for himself that it is defective, knows it is defective, knows the danger, and, after knowing that, he undertakes to operate, why he assumes that risk. I say that he assumes it, although the master directs him to go and perform that work.' The error of law being found in making knowledge of the danger on the servant's part the sole criterion of his negligence, or assumption of risk, whereas the correct legal principal is that, if a person of ordinary care and prudence, under all the circumstances, would undertake to operate with knowledge, such person does not assume the risk.

"(7) In charging: 'It might not be negligence for me to undertake to jump over that gate out there, but if I had one leg it might be negligence for me to undertake to do it.' The same being a thinly veiled charge upon the facts; it being in evidence that plaintiff's intestate only had one leg when he was killed.

"(8) In not charging the seventh request to charge of plaintiff, viz.: 'A promise by the master to remedy a defect, after notice or protest, tends to rebut the inference of waiver of the defect by the servant's remaining in the master's service after knowledge. If the servant continued in discharge of his duties, relying on the master's promise to remove a defect, he could not be said to have waived such defect. The jury is the proper tribunal to determine this question in the case.' Whereas it is submitted that the request stated a correct proposition of law applicable to the facts in this case; it being in evidence that plaintiff's intestate protested to defendant about the unsafe place where he met his death, and defendant promised to remedy the defect."

Clark & Von Treskow, for appellant. T. J. Kirkland, M. L. Smith, and E. D. Blakeney, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages, alleged to have been sustained on account of the wrongful acts of the defendant, causing the death of plaintiff's intestate.

The allegations of the complaint, material to the questions involved, are as follows:

"That on or about the 30th day of July, A. D. 1906, and some time prior thereto, the plaintiff's intestate was engaged as a servant and employé by the defendant, and was at the time hereinafter mentioned acting within the scope of his employment.

"That it was the duty of plaintiff's intestate to perform services and labor upon the machinery operated by the defendant, by applying grease thereto and otherwise doing such acts and things as he was directed to do, and as were necessary and proper to run said machinery.

"That on the night of the 13th day of July, A. D. 1906, the plaintiff's intestate, in the discharge of his duties, filled up an oil cup, on the 'eccentric,' and turned to further discharge his duties in and about said machinery. That the floor whereon plaintiff's intestate was walking was greasy and slippery, and his left leg had been amputated below the knee, and plaintiff's intestate used an artificial limb and foot in walking. That defendant had caused plaintiff's intestate to labor and work, until the stump of his left leg, where it rested in the artificial limb, was bruised and sore, and caused much pain, suffering, and difficulty in walking, all of which defendant well knew. That the machinery was running unevenly, and jerking, making it well-nigh impossible for any one to avoid slipping on the greasy floor. That near the 'eccentric,' and where plaintiff's intestate was walking, was a large revolving wheel, unguarded and unprotected by a foot-board, or guard rail, or in any other way. That plaintiff's intestate's artificial foot caught in said revolving wheel, he was hurled to and through the floor, and his body, head, and limbs were so bruised, mangled, and crushed that he died of the injuries so received. That plaintiff's intestate was ordered and directed to perform the labor and work in which he received the above-mentioned injuries.

"That said Camden Water, Light & Ice Company was in default, and did violate and fail to observe and discharge the plain duty which it owed to the plaintiff's intestate, as its servant and employé, while engaged as aforesaid, under its authority and direction, in this: In carelessly and negligently providing and furnishing to plaintiff's intestate unsafe and defective appliances, in that said Camden Water, Light & Ice Company did carelessly and negligently fail and neglect to provide and furnish ordinarily safe, secure, and proper machinery, free from jerk and jars when running. That the defendant was careless and negligent in ordering and directing plaintiff's intestate to go to an unsafe and dangerous place to work, in the nighttime, in his overworked and weakened condition. That defendant was careless and negligent in allowing and permitting said revolving wheel to be and remain unguarded, thereby furnishing plaintiff's intestate with an unsafe and dangerous place to work."

The defendant denied the allegations of the complaint, and set up the defenses of contributory negligence and assumption of risk.

The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed upon exceptions, which will be reported.

We proceed to the consideration of the exceptions.

[1] First Exception:

His honor, the Presiding Judge, thus stated the issues raised by the pleadings, as to the alleged acts of negligence: "The two specific acts of negligence, that I conclude you are to pass upon, under my construction of these pleadings, are these: The first one is that the defendant was careless and negligent in regard to directing the plaintiff's intestate to go to an unsafe and dangerous place to work, in his overworked and weakened condition, etc. That is one act of negligence you are to pass upon; and the other is that the defendant was careless and negligent in allowing and permitting said revolving wheel to be and remain unguarded, thereby furnishing plaintiff's intestate an unsafe and dangerous place to work in. These are the two acts of negligence that will be for your consideration. And plaintiff alleges, by reason of these two acts of negligence—one or both of them—that the intestate was killed." No objection was interposed to this construction of the complaint. In the case of Spires v. Railway, 47 S. C. 28, 24 S. E. 992, the rule is thus stated: "If the complaint alleges specific acts of negligence, then the plaintiff will be restricted to the introduction of such testimony only as would tend to prove the acts of negligence alleged in the complaint." The same principle was recognized in the case of Jenkins v. McCarthy, 45 S. C. 278, 22 S. E. 883, wherein the court ruled that a plaintiff who sets up negligence solely in the manner of driving piles will be confined to such issue, and cannot introduce evidence that the piles were not sufficiently driven; that a party alleging a specific act of negligence cannot, after issue joined on that allegation, introduce evidence of any other kind of negligence. These authorities show that this exception cannot be sustained.

[2] Second Exception:

When the defendant's attorney undertook to introduce the testimony mentioned in the exception, the plaintiff's attorney simply said, "We object," but did not state the grounds of objection. The objection was not properly taken, as it failed to state the grounds thereof. Youghblood v. Railway, 60 S. C. 9, 38 S. E. 232, 85 Am. St. Rep. 824; Bryce v. Cayce, 62 S. C. 546, 40 S. E. 948.

Third Exception:

The grounds of objection to the introduction of the testimony mentioned in this exception were thus stated by the plaintiff's attorney: "I object. He cannot bolster up his witness by another, as to an agreement; no evidence of anything Mr. Eve is going to state was communicated to Mr. McKain. This witness never stated to Mr. McKain what the agreement was." His honor ruled that, unless the defendant brought home knowledge to Mr. McKain of the terms of the agreement under which the defendant was operating the machinery, then the testimony would not be competent; thus practically sustaining the objection interposed by the plaintiff's attorneys.

[3] Fourth Exception:

We do not deem it necessary to cite authorities to sustain the proposition which the Presiding Judge charged. Nor can we conceive how it was subject to the error assigned in the exception.

[4] Fifth Exception:

The Presiding Judge was not attempting to define the proximate cause. Another reason why the exception cannot be sustained is because the appellant's attorneys have failed to show that the error assigned was prejudicial.

[5] Sixth Exception:

We desire to call attention to the only error assigned, which was as follows: "In making knowledge of the danger on the servant's part the sole criterion of his negligence, or assumption of risk, whereas the correct legal principle is that, if a person of ordinary care and prudence, under all the circumstances, would undertake to operate with knowledge, such person does not assume the risk."

The plaintiff's third, fourth, and eighth requests to charge were as follows:

"(3) Where a servant is ordered to do a certain piece of work, if he undertakes to obey the order given, with knowledge of the dangers incident to obeying said order, whether or not he assumed the risk or was guilty of contributory negligence are questions of fact for the jury that would depend upon whether a man of ordinary reason and prudence would undertake to obey a command of that sort, with knowledge of the dangers 'incident to obeying the command.'"

"(4) Since the master is under a special duty to inspect and investigate risks to which the servant is exposed, and since the servant may rely upon the performance of this duty, the fact that the servant proceeds under the orders of the master, in performing an act, whereby he is exposed to unusual danger, renders the master liable for a resulting injury to the servant, unless the risk of the act was fully realized by the servant, and was so apparent that no man of ordinary prudence, situated as he was, would have undertaken it."

"(8) If a master or superior orders an inferior into a situation of danger, and he obeys and is injured, the law will not charge him with assumption of risk, unless the danger was so glaring that no prudent man would have entered into it."

In disposing of each request, the Presiding Judge said: "I charge you that. That is the law, as I have already charged it." Thus showing that he not only charged the requests, but that he construed them as embodying the principles which he had already charged. Therefore the charge, when considered in its entirety, gave the plaintiff the full benefit of the principle for which she contended.

[§. 7] Seventh Exception:

The language of the charge was merely used by way of illustration. Furthermore, it cannot be denied that persons laboring under physical disabilities must be more careful than others in going where they may encounter danger.

[§] Eighth Exception:

The language of the request is, with one or two minor changes, what was said by the court in Powers v. Oil Co., 53 S. C. 358, 31 S. E. 276, upon the question whether, as a matter of law, a servant who relies upon the promise of the master to repair a defective appliance waives his right to insist upon the fact that it was defective by remaining in the service of the master. The Presiding Judge could not have charged the request without violating section 26, art. 5, of the Constitution, which provides that, "Judges shall not charge juries, in respect to matters of fact." The request undertook to say what force and effect should be given to certain facts, which could only be determined by the jury, unless that mode of trial was waived. Judgment affirmed.

(89 S. C. 352)

In re GADSDEN.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 20, 1911.)

1. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 57*)—SUSPENSION AND DISBARMENT—PROCEEDINGS.

Where a judgment of the inferior court reflects upon the integrity of an attorney, and review thereof on appeal is prevented by a settlement between the parties, such attorney is entitled to an investigation of his conduct by the Supreme Court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. §§ 81, 82; Dec. Dig. § 57.*]

2. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 53*)—DISBARMENT—EVIDENCE—FRAUDULENT CONDUCT.

In a proceeding for the disbarment of an attorney for the fraudulent procurement of a release of a distributee's interest in an intestate's estate, evidence held to show that the attorney was not guilty of intentional misrepresentation of facts or opinions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. §§ 74, 75; Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

3. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 53*)—DISBARMENT—PRESUMPTIONS.

As no one can become an attorney until he has furnished satisfactory proof of good character, the presumption is that members of the bar are of good character, and their dishonesty or depravity must be established by a clear preponderance of evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. §§ 74, 75; Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

4. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 38*)—DISBARMENT—MISCONDUCT.

The administratrix of an estate being trustee for one entitled to a distributive part in the estate, an attorney representing the administratrix occupies a fiduciary relation to the distributee, and hence a release which he induced the distributee to execute to her part of the estate was invalid, and his act in procuring such release was reprehensible, it appearing that the distributee was an old woman unfamiliar with the affairs, and that most of the estate consisted of stock having only a prospective value, which the attorney represented as being practically valueless, and for the further reason that contracts between a trustee and cestui que trust are presumed to be invalid, save where it is shown that they deal on equal terms.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. §§ 51, 61; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

5. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 38*)—DISBARMENT—MISCONDUCT.

Where an attorney, without intentional misrepresentation, and for the benefit of his client, who was administratrix of an estate, procured a distributee to release her share in the estate to the administratrix, his conduct, while reprehensible, in that he took a position opposite to the interests of the distributee toward whom he also occupied a fiduciary relation, does not warrant disbarment, for an attorney should not be disbarred unless the evidence shows that his misconduct was due to a bad or fraudulent motive, or that it was so gross as to show want of integrity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. §§ 51, 61; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

6. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 58*)—DISBARMENT PROCEEDINGS—STATUTES.

While Civ. Code 1902, § 2816, provides that an attorney may be removed or suspended who shall be guilty of any deceit, malpractice, or misdemeanor, the statute neither limits the power of courts to disbar or suspend for misconduct not falling within its terms, nor deprives the courts of the power to inflict a less punishment for a misconduct not grave enough to warrant suspension or disbarment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. §§ 76-78; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

"To be officially reported."

In the matter of Philip H. Gadsden, as a member of the bar of South Carolina. Disbarment and suspension refused.

Miller, Whaley & Bissell, for petitioner.
J. Fraser Lyon, Atty. Gen., for the State.

WOODS, J. The matter to be considered and decided in this cause is whether Philip H. Gadsden was guilty of such false representations or other misconduct in procuring from Miss Mary Lawrence an assignment of her interest in the estate of Joseph S. Lawrence to Mrs. E. Charlotte Lawrence as would warrant this court in ordering his name to be stricken from the roll of attorneys, or in inflicting any other penalty.

[1] This issue grew out of the settlement of the estate of Dr. Joseph S. Lawrence, who died at Capon Springs, W. Va., in August, 1899. His family consisted of his wife, E. Charlotte Lawrence, and two minor stepchildren. Diligent search having failed to disclose a will, the widow, E. Charlotte Lawrence, applied for letters of administration, which were granted to her on October 25, 1899. Upon inquiry it was discovered that the only person entitled to take with the widow under the statute of distributions was Miss Mary Lawrence, a half-sister, living at Halcyondale, a small village in the state of Georgia. Philip H. Gadsden was the attorney for Mrs. E. Charlotte Lawrence, and in that capacity he went to the residence of Miss Mary Lawrence and there obtained from her on November 3, 1899, an assignment to Mrs. E. Charlotte Lawrence of all her interest in the estate of her brother for the consideration, as therein expressed, of "love and affection for my sister E. Charlotte Lawrence and other valuable consideration to me paid." Miss Mary S. Lawrence died in 1905; and her heirs and distributees on November 7, 1907, brought an action to set aside the assignment, alleging fraud and misrepresentation in the procuring of the assignment and the mental incapacity of Miss Mary S. Lawrence to execute such a paper. Joseph M. Lawrence, having been thereafter appointed administrator of the estate of Miss Mary S. Lawrence, was made a party plaintiff in his representative capacity, and appropriate amendments were made to the complaint. The Charleston Consolidated Railway, Gas & Electric Company, was made a party defendant, but it had no real interest in the controversy, and its answer consisted of a formal denial on information and belief. By her answer Mrs. E. Charlotte Lawrence denied the allegations of misrepresentation and fraud, and of the incapacity of Miss Lawrence, and she set up the statute of limitations as a further defense.

The trial of the cause resulted in a decree of Hon. Robert Aldrich, circuit judge, adjudging the annulment of the assignment on the following findings of fact and of law: "I find as a matter of fact: That at the time the conveyance of interest or release of Miss Mary S. Lawrence, to Mrs. E. Charlotte Lawrence, on the third day of November, 1899, was made, two pregnant statements were made to her calculated to influence her to part with her interest in the estate of her deceased brother Dr. Joseph S. Lawrence, for a trifle or for very slight consideration: First. That her brother died leaving a will under which she took nothing. Secondly. That, even, if there was no will, his estate was insolvent, and she would get nothing in that event as well. That both of these statements were misrepresentations. Third, that at the time of this transaction the defendant Mrs. E. Charlotte Lawrence, who was making the dealing through her attorney and agent, was administratrix of her husband's estate and as such was trustee for the creditors and the heirs, and Miss Lawrence was her cestui que trust, and that the transaction was in violation of the fiduciary relation existing between them. As a matter of law that the said conveyance or release thus procured was fraudulent, null, and void."

Mrs. Lawrence appealed from this decree, assigning errors of both law and fact in the foregoing findings of the circuit court. While the cause was pending on appeal in this court, Mrs. Lawrence, against the protest of Mr. Gadsden and contrary to the advice of counsel who had represented her in the litigation, through other attorneys substituted on the record as her counsel, compromised the suit by the payment of the sum of $95,000 to the plaintiffs. An order was then made by this court on the consent of the attorneys for the plaintiffs, and the substituted attorneys of Mrs. Lawrence, dismissing the appeal. If the appeal had been sustained, the plaintiffs would have recovered nothing, and, if they had been successful, the property recovered would have been worth to them about $192,000. Miss Lawrence received only $500 in connection with the assignment, but the contention of the defendants was that this was a gift, and that the real consideration was her generosity combined with her conviction of duty induced by Mr. Gadsden's statement that there was a last will by which her brother had left all his property to his wife and stepchildren. After the consent order had been taken for the abandonment of the appeal, Mr. Gadsden filed his petition in this court, in which, after setting out the history of the litigation between Mrs. Lawrence and the administrator of the estate of Miss Lawrence and her heirs, he alleged: "That, if the opportunity for an appeal to and a review by this court be otherwise denied to the petitioner, the judgment and decree of the circuit judge will constitute and remain a permanent and final record and decision disastrously reflecting upon the professional character of the petitioner; that, as petitioner is informed and believes, he has no other adequate remedy or means of redress except by appeal to this honorable court, and while, as aforesaid, petitioner has no pecuniary interest at stake, the petitioner has that at stake which is of more value than pecuniary interest, namely, his good character as an attorney at law and an officer of the courts of South Carolina." The prayer of the petition was: "Wherefore, petitioner prays that this court will retain the record sent upon appeal from the lower court upon which the judgment and decree of the circuit judge are based, and will examine the same in so far as it relates to the actings and doings of this petitioner, and, inasmuch as the dismissal of the said appeal will deprive the petitioner of the opportunity of having this court examine the record in a trial upon the merits, the petitioner appeals, as an officer of the court, to the jurisdiction of the court for such protection as is due to an officer of the court under such circumstances, and he asks that the court will upon such examination of the record pronounce such judgment with respect to the petitioner as the record shall in the opinion of this court demand."

Upon hearing the petition, this court held that Mr. Gadsden, as an officer of the court, had the right to an investigation of his conduct and a judgment thereon at the hands of the court. The Attorney General was requested by the court to appear as amicus curiae in the public interest. At the hearing the petitioner submitted the entire record in the original cause, including all the evidence, as his vindication. The only additional evidence offered was the testimony of Mr. Holman, one of the attorneys for the administratrix and heirs of Miss Mary Lawrence, as to the terms of settlement of the original cause made by Mrs. Lawrence. After consideration of the evidence in the light of the able arguments presented in the cause, the court now gives its judgment on the conduct of Mr. Gadsden.

[2] The first and most important question is, Did Mr. Gadsden intentionally misrepresent the value of the estate of Dr. Lawrence or any other matter in his interview with Miss Lawrence which resulted in the execution of the assignment? The only persons now living who were present at the interview are Mrs. Tarver, one of the plaintiffs, and Mr. Gadsden himself. According to Mrs. Tarver's testimony, Mr. Gadsden told Miss Lawrence in his interview with her that the estate was so indebted that Miss Lawrence would not receive from it as much as the $500 which he was offering for her interest. She testified further: "Mr. Gadsden and I got in a little dispute about her signing the paper. I was not willing for her to sign it, and we argued quite a while, and he then asked me to read the paper, and I told him I was not a lawyer and could not unravel it. He then read it to me, and when I objected so bitterly to her signing it, he then told me it was only to allow Mrs. E. Charlotte Lawrence to, I would say, manage the property of Mr. Joe Lawrence, and then he stated to us that if there was any will or any proviso made to her that this paper would not interfere with it in the least." Mr. Gadsden testified that he carried with him $1,000 received from Mrs. Lawrence, believing that to be a fair price to pay for Miss Lawrence's interest. He thus states his representations to Miss Lawrence: "I went to Halcyondale, arriving there in the morning, and was directed to the Tarver house; went up to the house, and inquired for Miss Mary Lawrence. I was asked in, and Miss Lawrence came to meet me. I introduced myself to her by name; told her I had come to see her with reference to her brother's estate, and told her of her brother's death. I told her of the fact of his illness, of his having been abroad, of his death at Capon Springs. I told her of the letter which we had written to Dr. Buist, stating that he had left a will, and also in that letter where he had determined he wanted to be buried, and I told her of the conversation that Dr. Buist had related to me between the doctor and himself, as to his having left his property to his wife and children. I told her practically what I have testified here, as to what I had done to try and find the will, the various efforts I had instituted, and the fact that up to date I had been unsuccessful. I told her of this key that I had, and told her that I felt satisfied that there was a will, but I could not find or had been unable to find it up to that time. I then went on to tell her about her brother's estate, and told her that the doctor, so far as I knew, had left $10,000 in bonds, about $16,000 or $17,000 in cash and something over 9,000 shares of Consolidated stock. I did not state 9,200, but something over 9,000 shares. The stock, I told her, in my judgment had no value. I also told her that a large number of claims had been put in against her brother's estate, and that those claims were coming in every week or so, and that in my judgment the estate had little value. I mentioned some of the claims by name to her. About this point of the interview Miss Lawrence said to me that she felt satisfied that if her brother Joe had left anything that he wanted it and intended it to go to his wife and children, and that he did not intend to give it to her; that she felt satisfied from what I said that he left a will, and that she hoped the will would be found, and that she certainly did not propose to take advantage of the accident of the loss of the will to claim any part of his estate; that she would feel as if she were taking something she was not entitled to. I had explained to Miss Lawrence that in the absence of a will under our law, she, being a half sister, was entitled to 50 per cent. of the estate. I said that if she felt that way that, in order to carry out the views that she had, it would be necessary that she sign a release or assignment of her interest to Mrs. Lawrence which she said she would very readily do." He further testified that Miss Lawrence signed the paper solely through her desire to carry out what she thought were her brother's wishes with respect to the property as expressed by his will, and that the payment of $500 was not mentioned until after the transaction had been concluded, when he offered the money on behalf of Mrs. Lawrence in recognition of Miss Lawrence's magnanimous action; that Miss Lawrence at first refused to accept it, but later did so upon Mrs. Tarver's earnest solicitation. He denied the representation imputed to him by Mrs. Tarver that the paper would have no effect beyond allowing Mrs. Lawrence to manage the estate, but admitted the statement that, if a will should be found, the assignment would not defeat any provision for Miss Lawrence.

The complaint itself sustains Mr. Gadsden's version of the representations made by him; for it is therein alleged that the untrue statement made to Miss Lawrence was that the estate of her brother was of "small value," not that it was of no value, and there is in the complaint no allegation of misrepresentation as to the nature and effect of the paper. In this hotly contested litigation, with so great pecuniary interests involved, it seems certain that, if such untrue representations had been made, they would have been alleged in the amended complaint. The legal opinion that the discovery of a will containing a provision for Miss Lawrence would have made the assignment of no effect, though incorrect, cannot be fairly regarded as intentionally false. The evidence tends to the inference that the conviction expressed by Mr. Gadsden that Dr. Lawrence had made a will leaving all his property to his wife and stepchildren had strong support in the facts ascertained by him, and was sincere. George B. Edwards testified that Dr. Lawrence, just before leaving Charleston in the spring of 1899, told him he had made a will in order to protect his wife and stepchildren. Dr. Lawrence wrote his friend Dr. Buist from Italy in April, 1899, referring to his will; and Dr. Buist testified that in the summer of the same year Dr. Lawrence while at Capon Springs, suffering from his last illness, told him he had made a will appointing Dr. Buist executor, and leaving all his property to his wife and stepchildren. All this was communicated to Mr. Gadsden, and was calculated to induce a belief that Dr. Lawrence intended his wife and stepchildren to have his property, and that he had left a will carrying his intention into effect. It is true that Mr. Gadsden knew that the most diligent search for a will had been made without success; but in a letter dated November 10, 1899, Miss Lawrence wrote to Mrs. Lawrence, "I trust the will which Joe made will be found and everything will be cleared up," thus confirming Mr. Gadsden's statement that he had told her the will could not be found. The finding of the circuit court that Mr. Gadsden's statements as to the will were misrepresentations, if the finding meant that they were known to be untrue, is, we think, contrary to the evidence.

We next inquire into the finding of the circuit judge that Mr. Gadsden represented the estate to be of no value, when, in fact, it was of great value. The real representation, as we have seen, was the expression of the opinion that the estate would be of little value after the payment of debts, not that it would be of no value. Mr. Gadsden testified that he mentioned the items of property of which the estate consisted, and there is no testimony to the contrary. These items were $19,803.57 in cash, $10,000 in bonds and 9,200 shares of stock of Charleston Consolidated Railway, Gas & Electric Company, of the par value of $50 per share. In the beginning of his evidence Mr. Gadsden testified that he represented the cash to be $16,000 or $17,000, but he afterwards testified that he had refreshed his memory, and that he knew that he had stated to Miss Lawrence the true amount of the cash from memoranda in his possession at the time. The bonds, admitted to be worth at the time about $9,000, with the cash of $19,803.57, made up a known value of $29,803.57. The representation by Mr. Gadsden that in his opinion the 9,200 shares of stock were of no value requires particular attention. Dr. Lawrence came to Charleston as a promoter in 1896, and after much effort succeeded, in 1899, in bringing about a consolidation of the street car lines and certain other public service corporations under the name of the Charleston Consolidated Railway, Gas & Electric Company. The new company issued mortgage bonds to the amount of $2,500,000, using the proceeds to acquire the property of other corporations. Its stock issue of 30,000 shares, of the par value of $50 per share, was to some extent given in exchange for the stock of the merged corporations, but in the main it was issued as promotion fees to the parties interested. The evidence leads to the inference that the 9,200 shares held by Dr. Lawrence were received as compensation for his services as promoter.

There is no evidence whatever that at the date of the consolidation, or at any time prior to the assignment by Miss Lawrence the franchises and other property of the Consolidated Company could have been sold for more than the amount of the mortgage debt. It is no doubt true that the promoters of the scheme hoped that the stock would become valuable, but the evidence from business men apparently disinterested is conclusive that, when Mr. Gadsden's representations were made to Miss Lawrence, the stock could not have been sold or used as collateral. In the year 1900 the company would have defaulted in the payment of the interest on its bonds, had not S. H. Wilson, one of the parties interested, borrowed for it $60,000 on his personal credit. This state of depression continued until the launching of the exposition in Charleston in 1901. A dividend was not declared until 1903, and that was only one-half of 1 per cent. The first sale of the stock was in 1903 at $4 per share. After that time the stock steadily increased in value and was worth on the market at the time of the trial about $30 per share. In view of this summary of the evidence as to the speculative character of the scheme which was the origin and basis of the stock, and as to the estimation in which it was held by the investing public, it seems clear that a business man might have held and expressed the opinion in 1899 with entire sincerity that stock of the Consolidated Company was of no value. The fact mainly relied on to show that the opinion Mr. Gadsden expressed was not sincere is the prosperity of the company, which came afterwards, due to the exposition, the construction of the Navy Yard, and the extraordinary increase in general prosperity. We do not think this evidence warrants the inference of intentional misrepresentation of the value of the stock.

As to the charge of misrepresentation of the amount of the debts, little need be said. Dr. Lawrence was no exception to the rule that men engaged in speculative enterprises usually leave their affairs in a state of complication. The claims presented to the administratrix aggregated more than the cash and the value of the bonds. Even allowing that Mr. Gadsden expected successful resistance to some of the claims, still the record indicates that there was reason to apprehend that, if the stock was worthless, the debts would absorb far the larger part of the cash and the value of the bonds, and leave the estate of little value. After litigation and compromise, the net amount paid in satisfaction of debts was about $18,000.

[8] In considering the conclusion to be drawn from these conditions, it is to be borne in mind that the law forbids that any person should participate officially as an attorney in the administration of justice until he has furnished satisfactory proof of good character. The presumption is, therefore, in favor of the integrity of the bar; and on the great issue of the honesty or depravity of an attorney the rule of authority and reason is that the court should require the charge of depravity to be established by the clear preponderance of the evidence. In re Evans, 22 Utah, 386, 62 Pac. 913, 53 L. R. A. 952, 83 Am. St. Rep. 894; In re Newby, 82 Neb. 235, 117 N. W. 691; People v. Matthews, 217 Ill. 94, 75 N. E. 444; 4 Cyc. 915; Ex parte Wall, 107 U. S. 285, 2 Sup. Ct. 569, 27 L. Ed. 552; In re O., 73 Wis. 602, 42 N. W. 221; In re Eaton, 4 N. D. 514, 62 N. W. 597. The charge of falsehood is not established by mere proof that the statement made was untrue, when the evidence shows that there was reasonable ground for believing it to be true.

On consideration of the entire evidence and the rules of law applicable thereto, we reach the conclusion that Mr. Gadsden must be acquitted of intentional misrepresentation of the facts or of his own opinions in his interview with Miss Lawrence.

[4] Nevertheless, Mr. Gadsden's conduct was by no means free from fault. His offense was in the act itself of taking from Miss Lawrence the assignment which he knew she was induced to make by his representations. His client, Mrs. Lawrence, as administratrix of the estate of her husband, was trustee for Miss Lawrence as a distributee entitled to one-half of the estate, and was charged with the duty of protecting her interests in the estate. Mr. Gadsden, having accepted the responsibility of guiding the administratrix in the discharge of her trust, stood in the same fiduciary relation to Miss Lawrence. He is a man of unusual intelligence who had been at the bar for 10 years, and must have known of the obligation of a trustee not to acquire a personal advantage at the expense of a cestui que trust. He must have known also the repugnance with which not only the courts, but all fair men regard conveyances or transactions obtained by a trustee from a beneficiary of the trust.

Judicial distrust of such transactions runs through the whole history of jurisprudence, and has been expressed with emphasis in a number of cases in this state. The general rule against the validity of such transactions does not depend on a presumption that there was actual fraud or intentional wrong, but on the principle that the trust relation places such obligations on the trustee that he should not occupy that position of opposition to his cestui que trust which trading with him denotes, and on the presumption that the trustee by reason of his superior knowledge of the trust estate occupies such a vantage ground that the parties do not deal on equal terms. There are, it is true, exceptions to the rule, and such transactions may be sustained when there is clear affirmative proof of a fair consideration, perfect candor, and of the absence of advantage of superior information; in other words, when the cestui que trust deals on equal terms, and is fully advised of what he is doing and the effect of his act. The absence of full information and independent advice is always regarded a strong circumstance against the validity of the transaction. Among the many authorities on the subject, we cite the following: Butler v. Haskell, 4 Desaus. 698; McCants v. Bee, 1 McCord, Eq. 383, 16 Am. Dec. 610; Parris v. Cobb, 5 Rich. Eq. 450; Way v. Union, C. L. Ins. Co., 61 S. C. 501, 39 S. E. 742; Scottish Am. M. Co. v. Clowney, 70 S. C. 229, 49 S. E. 569; Tindall v. Sublett, 82 S. C. 199, 63 S. E. 960; Perry on Trusts, § 194 et seq.

These rules of law are founded on obvious ethical obligations, and they were violated by Mr. Gadsden under circumstances which subject him to censure. The inequality of the parties could hardly have been greater, and was perfectly apparent. Miss Lawrence was a gentle old woman who had always lived in the complete retirement of a somewhat obscure home life, without business associations or experience, and with little knowledge of the world outside of her own narrow environment. The evidence does not lead to the conclusion that she was mentally deficient in the sense of being below the average intelligence of persons of her opportunity and experience; but it establishes beyond doubt that she was evidently without capacity to comprehend a complex business affair, or to co-ordinate the facts and estimate the value of bonds and stocks, or to weigh the evidence as to the alleged will, or to reach unaided a correct conviction as to her own rights and obligations. On all these matters Mr. Gadsden could not fail to know that she relied entirely on his representations and his opinions. Assuming the utmost good faith in his representations and opinions, yet it is impossible to doubt that Mr. Gadsden as a lawyer and a man of affairs, who had fully considered all the facts in his possession, must have been conscious that there was information which might lead other reasonable persons to conclusions different from his own. The fact that the will had not been found after diligent search afforded ground for an inference that Dr. Lawrence had destroyed it. The fact that the stock in the Consolidated Company had been acquired by much pains and labor with the expectation of profit from it, and that the business had been launched but a few months, afforded ground for a competent adviser of Miss Lawrence to caution her against regarding the stock valueless until the corporate scheme had been fully tried. We cannot doubt that the incapacity of Miss Lawrence to see the bearings of these facts on her legal rights and her moral obligations must have been evident to Mr. Gadsden. It certainly was evident to him that full acceptance of his opinion that her brother had died leaving a will in force expressing his desire that all his property should go to his wife and her children induced the gulleless old lady to believe it was her duty to relinquish her interest in the estate. It is impossible to resist the conclusion that these considerations, so obvious and so convincing of the impropriety of taking the assignment, ought to have deterred Mr. Gadsden from entering into the transaction. Besides, he had a strong reminder of his duty. Mrs. Tarver, the niece of Miss Lawrence, when called in to witness the paper, according to her testimony, earnestly protested against the proposed transaction; according to Mr. Gadsden's testimony the protest was not directed to him, but to Miss Lawrence. The difference is immaterial. It placed Mr. Gadsden in the position of accepting an assignment of her property offered by an untutored woman under a sudden conviction of duty induced by his expression of opinion against the solicitous advice and protest of her closest friend. The conclusion is inevitable that the transaction was invalid, and the conduct of Mr. Gadsden with respect to it reprehensible.

[5] This court would refuse, however, to inflict for such degree of misconduct the extreme penalty of disbarment or suspension from his office as an attorney at law, so humiliating and disastrous, even if it were within its discretion to impose such a penalty, because of two facts, which taken together are of great importance. These facts are: First, the evidence does not prove intentional misrepresentation of facts or of opinion in the interview between Mr. Gadsden and Miss Lawrence; second, the breach of duty grew out of excess of zeal for the interests of a client, and not in pursuit of his own interests. The second fact is of importance when taken in connection with the first.

The general power of courts with respect to the imposition of penalties on attorneys for misconduct is thus stated by that great jurist Mr. Justice Bradley in delivering the opinion of the court in Ex parte Wall, supra: "It is laid down in all the books in which the subject is treated that a court has power to exercise a summary jurisdiction over its attorneys to compel them to act honestly towards their clients, and to punish them by fine and imprisonment for misconduct and contempts, and in gross cases of misconduct to strike their names from the roll." The severe punishment of disbarment or suspension should not be inflicted when the less punishment of reprimand or fine would accomplish the purpose. Bradley v. Fisher, 80 U. S. 335, 20 L. Ed. 646.

[6] Section 2816 of the Civil Code provides that an attorney "may be removed or suspended who shall be guilty of any deceit, malpractice or misdemeanor." The statute does not express any intention to take away or limit the common-law power of courts to disbar or suspend for gross misconduct not falling within the terms of the statute, nor does it purport to affect the common-law power of courts to inflict a less punishment for misconduct not grave enough to warrant the penalty of suspension or disbarment. In the absence of such express restriction, the inherent common-law power of the courts in these respects remains. Boston Bar Ass'n v. Greenwood, 168 Mass. 169, 46 N. E. 568; In re Smith, 73 Kan. 743, 85 Pac. 584; In re Mills, 1 Mich. 392; Commonwealth v. Roe, 129 Ky. 650, 112 S. W. 683, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 413; 114 Am. St. Rep. note page 839; 4 Cyc. 906; Weeks on Attorneys at Law, 155. We express no opinion as to the power of the legislative department to control the courts in this respect, as the attempt to exercise such power has not been made.

Under the rule laid down in Duncan's Case, 64 S. C. 461, 42 S. E. 433, an attorney should not be disbarred or suspended in a case like this, involving fairness in a business transaction, unless the evidence leads the court to the clear conviction that the misconduct was due to a bad or fraudulent motive—that it was so gross as to show a want of integrity. As we have endeavored to demonstrate, the evidence does not produce a clear conviction of moral fraud, and the court will not inflict the penalty of suspension or disbarment.

Some less penalty must be imposed. The mere expression of the opinion of this court that a member of the bar in even a single instance has fallen below the ethical standards of the profession is in itself a serious penalty, and we think none greater should be inflicted in this instance.

BROWN v. GREEN, Sheriff, et al.

HOMESTEAD (§ 209*)—SALE ON EXECUTION—INJUNCTION.

Plaintiff was the owner of a building subject to two mortgages. Defendant obtained a judgment against him, and levied execution thereon. The commissioners made a return that the property exceeded in value $1,000, and that it could not be divided and the homestead set off without injury to the remainder. Held, that plaintiff was not entitled to enjoin the sale on the ground that his homestead would be lost, as under Civ. Code 1902, § 2628, the homestead could not be sold unless more than $1,000 was bid, but, if more was bid, $1,000 of the price must be filed with the judge to be applied on a new homestead. Therefore only the equity of redemption would be sold.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marlboro County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by George A. Brown against M. B. Green, sheriff, and others, for temporary injunction. From an order vacating an order granting a temporary injunction, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

McColl, McColl & Le Grand, for appellant. Newton & Owens, for respondents.

HYDRICK, J. Plaintiff brought this action to enjoin the defendant Green, as sheriff, from selling a storehouse and lot in which he claims homestead.

The material allegations of the complaint, which are undisputed, are: That plaintiff is and for some time has been the owner of a certain storehouse and lot in the town of Bennettsville, and is entitled to a homestead therein. On March 18, 1909, he executed a mortgage thereon to secure his bond for $3,786, with interest thereon from date at 8 per cent. per annum. On June 8, 1909, he executed a second mortgage thereon to secure a debt of $2,000. Both mortgages were promptly recorded, and the lien of each is superior to that of the judgment of Bird & Co., hereinafter mentioned, and both are still unpaid. In November, 1909, William M. Bird & Co. obtained judgment in Williamsburg county against him for $276.93, a transcript of which was duly filed and docketed in the office of the clerk of court for Marlboro county, on February 19, 1910, and execution was thereupon issued and directed to the defendant Green, as sheriff. Commissioners were duly appointed to set off the judgment debtor's homestead. They made their return, certifying that the property exceeded in value $1,000, and that it could not be divided and the homestead set off without injury to the remainder, and appraised it at $6,000, which is its full value. On the filing of the return, to which no exceptions have been taken, the sheriff served notice on the debtor that, unless he paid into his office the excess of the appraised value of the property above the homestead $1,000—that is, unless he paid in $5,000 within 60 days from date of the notice—he would sell the property under the execution. Upon the foregoing facts and the further allegation that, if the sheriff sold the property, his right of homestead would be defeated, the plaintiff asked that the sale be enjoined. The court granted a temporary order of injunction, which it vacated, on motion of defendants.

As far as they went, the proceedings below were in exact conformity to the provisions of section 2628, 1 Code 1902. The complaint did not state a cause of action for injunction. We fail to see wherein the sale will defeat appellant's right of homestead. Under the provisions of section 2628, above referred to, there can be no sale unless more than $1,000 is bid at the execution sale. If more than $1,000 is bid, the sale is made, and the sheriff deposits $1,000 with the clerk to be applied, under the order of the circuit judge, on application of the judgment debtor, to the purchase of a homestead of that value; and the residue is applied to the payment of the costs and expenses of the appraisal and sale and the executions in the hands of the sheriff, according to law. The fact that the property is covered by mortgages makes no difference, because at a sale of property covered by mortgages under a junior execution, as in this case, only what for the sake of convenience is called the mortgagor's equity of redemption is sold, which is, however, the legal title subject to the lien of the mortgages, and therefore the purchaser is supposed to bid no more than the value of the property over and above the mortgage debts. Moss v. Bratton, 5 Rich. Eq. 3; Norman v. Norman, 28 S. C. 46, 11 S. E. 1096, and cases cited by the court. Presumptively no bid will be received at such a sale for more than the value of the property over and above the mortgage debts. If the property is worth less than the aggregate value of the homestead and the mortgage debts, as alleged in this case, it cannot be supposed that a bid for more than $1,000 will be received, and, if not, then no sale will be made. On the contrary, if it is worth more, the judgment creditor has the right to have it sold. Otherwise, the judgment debtor will be allowed to have property in excess of the value of the homestead which cannot be reached by execution.

Affirmed.

REMBERT et al. v. VETOE et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 7, 1911.)

1. WILLS (§ 498*)—MEANING OF WORDS—"HEIRS OF THE BODY"—"ISSUE."

The words "heirs of the body" and "issue" in a will are generally equivalent, and the word "issue" is one of limitation, and not less extensive in its import than the words "heirs of the body."

2. WILLS (§§ 506, 498*)—CONSTRUCTION—BENEFICIARIES—STATUTES.

Where a devise is to the heir or heirs of the body, or issue, it is necessary to resort to the statute of distribution to ascertain who the beneficiaries are, and in what proportions they take.

3. WILLS (§ 498*)—BENEFICIARIES—STATUTE OF DISTRIBUTION.

The court, in construing a testamentary gift to testator's daughter for life and at her death to such of her issue as she may leave living at the time of her death, to be equally divided among such issue, must, to determine the issue on the daughter's death, resort to the statute of distribution, and among the grandchildren and great-grandchildren of the daughter who may take are those whose parents were dead at the daughter's death.

4. POWERS (§ 33*)—EXECUTION—ACTS CONSTITUTING.

Where a donee of a power created by will intends to execute the power, the intention makes the execution operative, and the intention to execute the power is manifested where there has been some reference in the deed or other instrument to the power, or a reference to the property, which is the subject on which the power is to be executed, or where the deed or other instrument executed by the donee will otherwise be ineffectual.

5. POWERS (§ 33*)—EXECUTION—ACTS CONSTITUTING.

Testator owning two tracts, one known as the home tract, gave the same to his wife for life, with power to dispose of one-third in any way she might choose. The wife conveyed to a daughter all her right, title, and interest in the home tract, "being the same tract of land wherein an interest was devised to me," to hold the premises after the wife's death, etc. Held, that the deed was an execution of the power, for, though the quoted phrase did not refer to the power, it referred to the property which was the subject on which the power was intended to operate.

Woods, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court, of Fairfield County; Ernest Moore, Special Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Sarah Emeline Rembert and others against Carrie Veto and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

The following is the opinion referred to in the dissenting opinion:

"Thereafter the said cause came on to be heard by his honor, Special Judge Ernest Moore, at the regular September (1910) term of the court of common pleas for Fairfield county, and after said hearing the said judge filed his judgment and decree in said cause, bearing date October, 1910, of which the following is a copy:

"This is an action seeking a sale for partition of certain real estate, described in the complaint, alleged to be owned as tenants in common by the plaintiffs and defendants. Certain issues as to the title to the lands and as to the accountability of certain parties for rents and profits being raised by the pleadings, a jury trial of any legal issues of title having been expressly waived, it was referred to James G. McCants, Esq., to take the testimony upon the issues, and report the same to the court. The testimony having been taken and reported accordingly, the cause came on for hearing before me at the last term of the said court, and after full argument, decision thereupon was reserved for further consideration.

"The lands in question were formerly the property of one Ralph Jones, who died in July, 1854, leaving of force his last will and testament, which was thereafter duly admitted to probate in the said county. One of the principal questions in the case is as to the proper construction of this will, by which, in the residuary clause thereof, the testator devised as follows: "Item 6. All the rest and residue of my estate of any kind and description, real and personal, not hereinbefore disposed of, I devise and bequeath to my beloved wife, Sarah H. Jones, for and during the term of her natural life, with the power to dispose of one-third thereof, while living, in any way she may choose to do; the remaining two-thirds thereof, after the decease of my said wife, I devise and bequeath to my daughter Martha Amanda, to her sole and separate use, during her life, and at her death to such of her issue as she may leave living at the time of her death, to be equally divided among such issue, but if my said daughter should die leaving no issue alive at the time of her death, it is my will that said two-thirds be equally divided among my next of kin at that time living according to the statute of distribution of intestate's estates." While it is doubtless unimportant, yet I have preserved in the above quotation the exact punctuation of the will, which was evidently drawn by a lawyer of some experience and accuracy of expression.

"As a matter of fact, it appears from the evidence that Sarah H. Jones, the widow of the testator, died in October, 1891, and Martha Amanda Robertson, the daughter mentioned in said will, died July 2, 1908, the latter leaving as her issue 2 children, Sarah Emeline Rembert, one of the plaintiffs, and Ruth Mason, one of the defendants, 14 grandchildren (of whom 8 were children of the said Sarah Emeline Rembert, 2 were children of the said Ruth Mason, and 4 were children of Thomas W. Robertson, a predeceased son of the said Martha Amanda Robertson), and 21 great-grandchildren (of whom 20 were grandchildren of the said Emeline Rembert, and 1 a grandchild of the said Thomas W. Robertson). The plaintiffs (except D. W. Ruff, who has purchased the interest in the home tract of land of the plaintiff George English Rembert, a son of the said Sarah Emeline Rembert) include all the Rembert branch of the lineal descendants of the said Martha Amanda Robertson living at the time of her death, and the defendants Ruth Mason and her two children, Edward B. Mason and Ralph W. Mason, represent the Mason branch of such defendants, while all of the other defendants, except Frank W. Vetoe, are children of Thomas W. Robertson, already mentioned as a predeceased son of Martha Amanda Robertson; the said Frank W. Vetoe being the infant son of the defendant Carrie Vetoe, and a great grandchild of the said Martha Amanda Robertson, and living at the time of her death; his said mother being a grandchild of the said Martha Amanda Robertson.

"Since the commencement of this action, Annie Rembert Thomas, being a daughter of the said Sarah E. Rembert, and a plaintiff in this case, has died intestate, and her heirs at law, Samuel P. Thomas, her husband, and Annie Rembert Thomas and Sarah Emeline Thomas, her children, have been substituted as parties plaintiff in her stead.

"The lands in question embrace two tracts described in the complaint; the one containing 1,055 acres, more or less, being called the "Jones Home Place," and the other, containing about 496 acres, being known as the "Piny Woods Place."

"Another question arising in the case is as to the construction and effect of a certain instrument in writing, executed by the said Sarah H. Jones, under date of June 26, 1875, in the form of a deed, by the granting clause of which the said Sarah H. Jones undertakes to convey to the said Sarah E. Rembert the above-mentioned home place in the following terms (certain descriptive matter being omitted as indicated), to wit: "I, Sarah H. Jones, * * * in consideration of the sum of one dollar to me in hand paid by Sarah Emeline Rembert, * * * and of the natural love and affection which I bear to the said Sarah Emeline Rembert and her children, * * * have granted, bargained, sold and released, and by these presents do grant, bargain, sell and release unto the said Sarah E. Rembert all my right, title and interest in all that piece, parcel or tract of land * * * containing one thousand and fifty-five acres, more or less, being the same tract of land wherein an interest was devised to me in by my husband, Ralph Jones, in his last will and testament;" the habendum and tenendum clause of this instrument being: "To have and to hold all and singular the said premises from and after my death unto the said Sarah Emeline Rembert for and during the term of her natural life, and after her death to such of her issue as she may leave living at the time of her death, their heirs and assigns, forever;" and the warranty clause thereof being: "And I do hereby bind myself and heirs, executors and administrators to warrant and forever defend all and singular the said premises unto the said Sarah Emeline Rembert and her issue from and against me and my heirs, and all other persons lawfully claiming or to claim the same or any part thereof." By an indorsement upon the back of this deed, it appears that Col. Jas. H. Rion was the conveyancer drawing the same.

"The plaintiffs contend that under the provisions of the will above quoted all the lineal descendants of Martha Amanda Robertson, living at the time of her death, took as remaindermen, being denoted by the term "issue;" that the distribution amongst such issue must be per capita; while the defendants maintain that the words "according to the statute of distribution of intestate's estates," which are found in the latter part of said item 6 of the will, must be regarded as qualifying, not only the words "next of kin" immediately preceding the phrase quoted, but also the word "issue," as used in the preceding clause of the same item, and that, therefore, Mrs. Emeline Rembert is entitled to one-third, Mrs. Ruth Mason to one-third, and the children of Thomas W. Robertson, deceased, are entitled to the remaining third; the distribution being per stirpes.

"It is also contended on behalf of Mrs. Sarah Emeline Rembert and her issue in esse (all of whom are before the court) that, as to the one-third interest in the home place, the same was duly conveyed to them by the terms of the above instrument in the form of a deed, which said plaintiffs submit was a valid execution of the power of sale thereof conferred on Sarah H. Jones by the will of Ralph Jones, above quoted.

"Considering now the first question presented for determination, as to the proper construction of the sixth item of the will of Ralph Jones, the settled rule of construction is that the intention of the testator must be ascertained from the language used by him, but that, in so ascertaining the intention, not only the sentence or clause of the sentence to be construed is to be considered, but that the provisions of other clauses or sentences may also be taken into the account in determining the particular intent with which the words in question were used by the testator. The primary rule for ascertaining the intention, however, is that the same must be determined from a consideration of the words used by him in expressing that intention, and a resort to conjecture for the purpose of determining the intention is not permitted. Therefore, it has been properly held that limitations imposed by one clause under one contingency cannot be applied to dispositions made by another clause for a different contingency. See, Mobley v. Cummings, 35 S. C. 101 [14 S. E. 721].

"Now the devise here in question, by its express terms, is to Martha Amanda Robertson for life, and after her death "to such of her issue as she may leave living" at that time, "to be equally divided among such issue." By an immediately succeeding clause in the same sentence, however, separated only by a comma, it is further provided that, "if my said daughter should die leaving no issue alive at the time of her death, it is my will that said two-thirds be equally divided among my next of kin at that time living, according to the statute of distribution of intestate's estates." The argument is that, since the testator has directed the distribution among the next of kin, to be made according to the statute of distributions, it must be concluded that he desired the division among the issue of his daughter to be made in the same way, although the next of kin referred to are the testator's next of kin, while the issue intended are the issue of his daughter; and it is further insisted that no special force can be given to the words "to be equally divided," as applied to the issue of the daughter, for the reason that the same words are used with reference to the division to be made among the next of kin of the testator, in the event of the death of the daughter without leaving living issue.

"Upon well-settled principles of construction, however, it would seem to be clear that by the term "issue," as used in this will, the testator must be held to have intended the lineal descendants of Martha Amanda Robertson, whether children or grandchildren, living at the time of her death; and the words "to be equally divided among such issue" plainly import a division per capita. Corbett v. Laurens, 5 Rich. Eq. 801; Rutledge v. Rutledge, Dud. Eq. 201; Allen v. Allen, 13 S. C. 512, 36 Am. Rep. 716.

"It is true that, whenever, by the terms of description in a devise, resort must be had to the statute of distributions for the purpose of ascertaining the objects of the gift, reference must be also had to the statute to determine the proportions in which the donees shall take, unless a different rule of distribution is provided by the will. Templeton v. Walker, 3 Rich. Eq. 548 [55 Am. Dec. 646]; Collier v. Collier [8 Rich. Eq.] 555 [55 Am. Dec. 653]. But while this rule applies in all cases where the words "heirs" or "next of kin" are used, it has no application to the use of the term "issue," for that word is not a term depending upon the statute of distributions for an interpretation of its meaning. See Corbett v. Laurens and Rutledge v. Rutledge, supra.

"By grammatical construction, the words "according to the statute of distribution of intestate's estates" appearing in the will now at bar can be taken only as qualifying the immediately preceding words "my next of kin at that time living." The words in question naturally relate and apply only to the immediately preceding phrase "next of kin," and have no reasonable relation to the remotely preceding word "issue." To adopt the construction as contended for by the defendants, and interpolate after the word "issue" the phrase "according to the statute of distribution of intestate's estates," would be in effect to add to the will of the testator words which he has not in any way evinced an intention of using in that connection, and which would necessarily destroy the force and effect of the immediately preceding words actually there used by him that the property in question is "to be equally divided among such issue." To so interpolate the words mentioned would be practically to strike out of the will words used by the testator, which are apt and fit words to express an intention that the division among the "issue" of his daughter living at her death would be per capita. Even if no reason could be seen for a distinction in the matter of the mode of the division prescribed in the case of a taking by the "issue" of Martha Amanda Robertson, and that provided in the case of the happening of the contingency upon which the "next of kin" of the testator are to take, nevertheless the will must be construed as written, and effect given to the expressed intention of the testator. Mobley v. Cummings, supra; Manigault v. Deas, Ball. Eq. 298; Moon v. Moon, 2 Strob. Eq. 327; Bowers v. Newman, 2 McMul. 472.

"It must therefore be concluded that all the lineal descendants of Martha Amanda Robertson, living at the time of her death, are entitled to participate in the division of the 'remaining two-thirds' of the estate of the testator, passing under the residuary devise in said item 6 of the will in question, and that such division must be made among such 'issue' of the said Martha Amanda Robertson per capita, and not per stirpes.

"The next question to be considered is as to whether the instrument styled a deed from Sarah H. Jones to her daughter, the plaintiff Sarah Emeline Rembert, and her issue, is a valid execution of the power conferred upon the said Sarah H. Jones by the will of the testator, Ralph Jones. It is not questioned but that this instrument was duly executed, delivered, and recorded, but it is objected that it makes no reference to such power of disposition given by the will, nor does it purport to be an execution of such power, nor does it specify what interest in or portion of the lands in question is thereby sought to be conveyed.

"Now it is true that Sarah H. Jones had a life estate in the home place of 1,055 acres mentioned in this instrument, and that she had a power of disposition inter vivos as to one-third of the fee thereof, but it is also true that she makes no direct reference to this power. But she did undertake to convey "all her right, title and interest" in the tract in question by the granting clause of the instrument executed by her, and by the habendum clause thereof she limits a fee estate in "the said premises" to such of the issue of Sarah E. Rembert as she may leave living at the time of her death, while by the warranty clause she warrants "the said premises" to the said grantees from and against herself and her heirs, and all other persons. The paper, therefore, must be held to have been intended as a conveyance of the fee in these lands, as its terms could not be satisfied by considering it merely as a conveyance of the life estate of the grantor. Furthermore, after thus conveying or attempting to convey all her "interest" in the tract, the grantor proceeds to define what is meant by the word "interest" in that clause of the deed, where she says, in describing the land, "being the same tract of land wherein an interest was devised to me in and by my husband, Ralph Jones, in his last will and testament." In the case of Moody v. Tedder, 16 S. C. 563, the use of this very word "interest" was held to manifest an intention by the grantor to execute a power of sale given by will. In that case, which upon the point at issue here closely parallels the one at bar, the grantor had a life estate in the property, coupled with a power of disposal for certain purposes, and she made a conveyance containing no direct reference to the power, but conveying "all her interest and life estate" in the property. In holding this to be a good execution of the power, the Supreme Court of this state says: "It may be true that the word 'interest' was not the technical term to express the idea of a power; but in the ordinary acceptation of the word it was broad enough to cover it, and we think the deed was intended to include the power. The question of the execution of a power is always one of intention, and if the devisee of the power intends to execute it that intention, however manifested, whether directly or indirectly, positively or by just implication, will make the execution valid and operative."

"In the case just cited, the court quotes with approval the doctrine as laid down in 1 Sudg. Pow. 419, that, "when a man has a power and an interest, and he creates an estate which will not have an effectual continuance in point of time, if it be fed out of his interest, it shall take effect by force of the power." See, also, 31 Cyc. 1125.

"Applying these principles to the case at bar, it seems to be clear that the grantor intended to convey to the grantees named in the instrument all the interest which she could convey under the provisions of the will of her husband, Ralph Jones, for she grants, not only her "right and title," but also all the "interest" which she took under said will, and this could not be satisfied, nor could the apparent purpose to convey a fee-simple estate be fulfilled, except by considering it as referring to the power of disposition of the one-third interest in the fee thereof given to her by said will. Moreover the terms of the instrument, showing the intention of the grantor to reserve her life estate in the very lands, unquestionably and conclusively evidence the purpose to execute the power given by the will, as otherwise the paper would have been entirely inoperative.

"But it is said that the instrument in question is not effective as an execution of the power, for the reason that (as defendants maintain) an attempt is thereby made to limit a freehold estate to commence in futuro, which cannot be done by way of direct grant, and the defendants also submit that the deed cannot be sustained as a covenant to stand seised to uses, for the reason that it is not supported by a valuable consideration.

"It is considered, however, that even if the written instrument in question cannot be held valid as a deed by which the title passes in present, the grantor merely reserving to herself the use and possession during her life, as was held in the somewhat similar cases of Merck v. Merck, 83 S. C. 332 [65 S. E. 347, 137 Am. St. Rep. 815], Sumner v. Harrison, 54 S. C. 353 [32 S. E. 572], and Cribb v. Rogers, 12 S. C. [564, 32 Am. Rep. 511], it may nevertheless be held effective as a covenant to stand seised to uses, being supported by the consideration of blood relationship between the grantor and grantee, notwithstanding the absence of a valuable consideration, and notwithstanding any limitation of a fee to commence in futuro, which may be contained therein. Watson v. Watson, 24 S. C. 235 [58 Am. Rep. 247]; Chancellor v. Windham, 1 Rich. 164 [42 Am. Dec. 411]; Kinsler v. Clark, 1 Rich. 170.

"But the defendants nevertheless maintain that this deed, considered as a covenant to stand seised to uses, cannot be held as an execution of the power conferred by the will of Ralph Jones, for the reason that (by the terms of the covenant therein) no estate in the lands is created or conveyed until after the death of the said Sarah H. Jones, the donee of the power under the said will, whereas, by the express terms of the will of Ralph Jones, the said donee was empowered to dispose of the said one-third of these lands only "while living." The answer to this position, however, is that the condition of the exercise of the power was merely that it should be exercised by the said Sarah H. Jones "while living"; that is to say, during her lifetime by any instrument then taking effect. The use of the testator of the expression "while living" was merely a declaration that the power could not be executed by a will which becomes operative only at death, but that it could be executed by any mode of conveyance taking effect inter vivos. Manifestly the execution of a covenant to stand seised to uses operates as a conveyance in present of the estate thereby created in the lands. The only limitation of the power of disposition given by the will in question was that it should be so exercised that the transfer of the title to the fee-simple remainder after the life estate of Sarah H. Jones should take effect in the lifetime of Sarah H. Jones, by her act. Clearly this requirement was as fully satisfied by the execution of a covenant to stand seised to uses as it could have been by a deed of conveyance in trust for herself for life, with remainder in fee to the grantees named therein. In either case the transfer of the title to the fee-simple remainder, which Sarah H. Jones was empowered to make, would take effect from the date of the execution and delivery of the instrument, which was during the lifetime of the grantor or covenantor, and there was no condition of the execution of the power that she should likewise convey her life estate."

McDonald & McDonald and Ragsdale & Dixon, for appellants. A. S. & W. D. Douglas, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for partition.

Ralph Jones departed this life in 1854, leaving in full force and effect his last will and testament, whereby he disposed of the lands described in the complaint. The sixth clause of the will, which gave rise to this action, is as follows: "All the rest and residue of my estate, of any kind and description, real and personal, not hereinbefore disposed of, I devise and bequeath to my beloved wife, Sarah H. Jones, for and during the term of her natural life, with the power to dispose of one-third thereof, while living, in any way she may choose to do; the remaining two-thirds thereof, after the decease of my said wife, I devise and bequeath to my daughter, Martha Amanda, to her sole and separate use, during her life, and at her death to such of her issue as she may leave living at the time of her death, to be equally divided among such issue, but if my said daughter should die leaving no issue alive at the time of her death, it is my will that said two-thirds be equally divided, among my next of kin at that time living, according to the statute of distribution of intestate's estates."

The widow, Sarah H. Jones, died in October, 1891, and Martha Amanda Robertson, the daughter mentioned in said clause, departed this life on the 2d of July, 1908. Martha Amanda Robertson had three children, to wit, a son, Thomas W. Robertson, who predeceased her, and two daughters, Sarah Emeline Rembert and Martha R. Mason, who survived her. She also left 14 grandchildren and 21 great-grandchildren, 28 of whom were descendants of Sarah Emeline Rembert. At the time of Martha Amanda Robertson's death, in 1908, there were in esse four children and one grandchild of Thomas W. Robertson, then deceased.

In discussing the proper interpretation of the word "issue," in the sixth clause of the will, his honor, the circuit judge, says: "Upon well-settled principles of construction, it would seem to be clear that, by the term 'issue' as used in this will, the testator must be held to have intended the lineal descendants of Martha Amanda Robertson, whether children or grandchildren, living at the time of her death; and the words 'to be equally divided among such issue' plainly import a division per capita. It must therefore be concluded that all the lineal descendants of Martha Amanda Robertson, living at the time of her death, are entitled to participate in the division of the 'remaining two-thirds' of the estate of the testator, passing under the residuary devise in said 'item 6' of the will in question, and that such division must be made among such 'issue' of the said Martha Amanda Robertson per capita, and not per stirpes."

The circuit judge relies upon the following cases to sustain his conclusion, namely, Rutledge v. Rutledge, Dnd. Eq. 201; Corbett v. Laurens, 5 Rich. Eq. 301; Allen v. Allen, 13 S. C. 512, 36 Am. Rep. 716. In the case of Rutledge v. Rutledge, supra, it was held that the issue of a child, who died in the lifetime of the surviving tenant for life, took equal shares with the children of the marriage, as they were alike comprehended under the word "issue." In the case of Corbett v. Laurens, the court ruled that, upon the authorities cited in Rutledge v. Rutledge, all the descendants of the life tenant, grandchildren as well as children, were embraced by the term "issue," and took per capita. But, in neither of these cases was the question raised as to the necessity to resort to the statute of distributions for the purpose of determining who were comprehended under the word "issue." And the case of Allen v. Allen, 13 S. C. 512, 36 Am. Rep. 716, while sustaining the conclusion that the issue take per capita, lays down the principle that when the word "heirs" is used, it is necessary to resort to the statute of distributions, and that those who would not be entitled to take as heirs under the statute would not have the right to participate in the division of the property.

In that case the rule is thus stated: "The general rule is that, where there is a gift to a class of persons, without any direction as to the proportions in which the individuals of the class are to take, all who can bring themselves within the class are entitled to participate in the distribution which must be per capita. But where the gift is to a class, the individuals of which can only be ascertained by a resort to the statute of distributions, then the provisions of the statute must also be resorted to, for the purpose of ascertaining the proportions in which the donees are to take, unless in the instrument by which the gift is made a different rule of distribution shall be prescribed. Templeton v. Walker, 3 Rich. Eq. 543, 55 Am. Dec. 646. If, therefore, the gift is to a class of persons, designated as heirs of a particular person, then, as it is necessary to resort to the statute to ascertain who are the individuals composing the class, resort must also be had to the statute to determine how, or in what proportions, such individuals shall take. This is upon the presumption that the donor having, by implication at least, referred to the statute as to the persons who are to take also intended that reference should be had to the statute to determine the proportions in which they should take, unless he expressed a different intention. But when he prescribes a different mode of distribution, then no such presumption can arise, and the distribution must be made in the manner prescribed." See, also, Brantley v. Bittle, 72 S. C. 179, 51 S. E. 561, and Carolina B. & Ina. Co. v. Caldwell, 86 S. C. 331, 68 S. E. 640.

It is, however, contended that, although it may be necessary to resort to the statute when a devise is to the "heirs" or "heirs of the body," no such necessity exists, when the word "issue" is used by the testator. In determining this question, it will be well to state the reasons upon which the rule is founded, requiring that those words should be interpreted in the light of the statute. Chancellor Harper, in Lemacks v. Glover, 1 Rich. Eq. 141, used this language: "In England, when the term 'heirs' or 'heirs of the body' is taken to mean a class of persons, these cannot, in any manner or respect, take as heirs, or heirs of the body. Whether construed children, issue or descendants next of kin, etc., they must be always different persons from the heirs; not so with us."

In the case of Templeton v. Walker, 3 Rich. Eq. 543, 55 Am. Dec. 646, it is said: "Our act of 1791 is an act of descents, as well as distributions, and determines at once who shall be the heirs of the real estate of an intestate, and the distributees of his personalty." "The term 'heirs' is inapplicable to the succession to personal estate, and even as to real estate we have no other heirs, except hæredes facti of our statute of distributions. Seabrook v. Seabrook [McMull. Eq. 201]. In the case under consideration the Court of Appeals, in equity; could not have attained the conclusion that the 'heirs of the body' of the tenant for life took as purchasers, within the rules as to the remoteness of limitations, otherwise than by construing these terms to mean the descendants of the tenant for life, living at the time of her death, or something equivalent. No one can take as heir of the body of another, unless he fulfills the description, and is not only such a person as would take the real estate of that other under our act of distributions, but likewise a lineal descendant." (Italics ours.) The court also says: "We do not go to the statute to discover who are children, next of kin, etc., but we are obliged to look there to find out who are heirs of the body, descendants, or relations entitled to take; and the cases which actually occur, we commonly find them, not strictly a class, but individuals standing in various degrees of kindred to the intestate or first taker, and entitled to unequal shares of the estate."

The rule is thus stated in Dukes v. Faulk, 37 S. C. 255, 16 S. E. 122, 34 Am. St. Rep. 745: "When the words 'heirs of the body' occur in a devise, accompanied by the words 'share and share alike,' or 'equally,' or 'in equal parts,' or kindred words, and also the words 'their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns,' then we must look to the statute of distributions of our state for the parties who shall answer the description, and therefore take the devise, but that the method of distribution is fixed by the devise itself to be per capita, and not per stirpes, and that the estate is one of purchase, and not of descent. It seems to us that the 'heirs of the body' must be persons, not only who answer the requirement of lineal descendants of the parent stock, but, also, such persons who would stand, at the date of the death of the life tenant, as an heir, under the provisions of our statute of distributions." (Italics ours.) Continuing, the court, in commenting on the case of Lemacks v. Glover, 1 Rich. Eq. 141, used this language: "The will of Peter Sinkler gave the use of certain property to his sister, Jane Glover, for life; Mrs. Glover, at the time of her death, had but one child, Dr. Glover; testator, after the death of the life tenant (Mrs. Glover) bequeathed such property 'to the heirs of her body, to them and their heirs and assigns, forever.' Mrs. Glover died 51 years after her brother's death. She had four other children born to her, all of whom, but one (Mrs. Lemacks), died before Mrs. Glover, the life tenant, and all were survived by children. The question was made as to the distribution. It was held that Dr. Glover took one share. Mrs. Lemacks one share, and each grandchild, who was the child of a deceased child, took one share each. Both Mrs. Lemacks and Dr. Glover had children, but they were denied participation in the estate. Why? Because, at the death of Mrs. Glover, the life tenant, although her lineal descendants, they were not her heirs, under our statute of distributions; their respective parents, Dr. Glover and Mrs. Lemacks, were alive, and were such heirs." (Italics ours.)

The case of Kerngood v. Davis, 21 S. C. 183, shows that it is necessary to resort to the statute of distributions, when the devise is to heirs of the body. In that case the court says: "The terms of the devise here being 'to heirs of the body' imposed the necessity of referring to the statute to ascertain who were such 'heirs,' and if the devise had stopped there the children of Henry W. would undoubtedly have taken in the manner prescribed by the statute. That is to say, they would have represented their father, and taken together, per stirpes, his share—one-seventh part of the estate—besides their distributive portion of the share of their deceased aunt, Carolina. But the superadded words 'share and share alike' imply equality of division, and we think made the exceptional case 'when the instrument creating the gift, indicates the intention of the donor'—citing Templeton v. Walker, 3 Rich. Eq. 543, 55 Am. Dec. 646; Allen v. Allen, 13 S. C. 531, 36 Am. Rep. 716. In Deveaux v. Deveaux, 1 Strob. Eq. 283, it is said: "The first duty is to ascertain how many of the claimants before the court come within the description given in the will; and the second is to discover whether all who do come within the description can be allowed, by the rules of law, to partake of the bounty intended. These are very distinct inquiries, though often confounded." (Italics ours.)

[1] The words "heirs of the body" and "issue" are generally equivalent in a will. Whitworth v. Stuckey, 1 Rich. Eq. 404. "Issue" is a word of limitations, and not less extensive in its import than the words "heirs of the body." Williams v. Gause, 83 S. C. 265, 65 S. E. 241; Arlidge v. Arledge, 86 S. C. 237, 68 S. E. 549.

[2, 3] The foregoing authorities show, first, that it is necessary to resort to the statute, when the devise is to the heirs or heirs of the body; that the words "heirs of the body" and "issue" have practically the same import in a will; that no good reason can be assigned why the necessity is not as great to resort to the statute in a case where the gift is to the "issue," as when it is to "heirs of the body." Therefore only those grandchildren and great-grandchildren of Martha Amanda Robertson whose parents were not in esse at the time that Martha Amanda Robertson died are to be construed as issue in contemplation of law; and those alone who would have taken under the statute are embraced within the term "issue." The exceptions raising this question are sustained.

The next question that will be considered is whether the power conferred upon Sarah H. Jones to dispose of one-third of the real and personal property while living, in any manner she may choose to do, was properly executed.

The lands in question embrace two tracts; one containing 1,055 acres, more or less, known as the "Home Place," and the other containing about 496 acres, known as the "Piny Woods Place." On the 26th of June, Sarah H. Jones executed an instrument of writing in the form of a deed, whereby she undertook to convey to Sarah Emeline Rembert, her daughter, the home place in manner and form as follows: "I, Sarah H. Jones, * * * in consideration of the sum of one dollar to me in hand paid by Sarah Emeline Rembert, * * * and of the natural love and affection which I bear to the said Sarah Emeline Rembert and her children * * * have granted, bargained, sold and released, and by these presents do grant, bargain, sell and release unto the said Sarah E. Rembert all my right, title and interest in all that piece, parcel or tract of land, * * * containing one thousand and fifty-five acres, more or less, being the same tract of land wherein an interest was devised to me in by my husband, Ralph Jones, in his last will and testament;" the habendum and tenendum clause of this instrument being: "To have and to hold all and singular the said premises, from and after my death, unto the said Sarah Emeline Rembert, for and during the term of her natural life, and after her death, to such of her issue as she may leave living at the time of her death, their heirs and assigns, forever;" and the warranty clause thereof, being: "And I do hereby bind myself and heirs, executors and administrators to warrant and forever defend, all and singular, the said premises, unto the said Sarah Emeline Rembert and her issue, from and against me and my heirs, and all other persons lawfully claiming or to claim the same or any part thereof."

[4] The rule as to the execution of a power is thus stated in Blagge v. Miles, 1 Story, 426, Fed. Cas. No. 1,479: "The authorities on this subject may not all be easily reconcilable with each other, but the principle furnished by them, however occasionally misapplied, is never departed from; that if the donee of the power intends to execute the power that intention, however manifested, whether directly or indirectly, positively or by just implication, will make the execution valid and operative. I agree that the intention to execute the power must be apparent and clear, so that the transaction is not fairly susceptible of any other determination. If it is doubtful, under all the circumstances, then that doubt will prevent it from being deemed an execution of the power." In that case Mr. Justice Story stated, as the result of the English authorities, that three classes of cases have been held sufficient to manifest an intention to execute the power: (1) Where there has been some reference in the deed or other instrument to the power; (2) or a reference to the property, which is the subject upon which it is to be executed; (3) or where the provision in the deed or other instrument executed by the donee of the power would otherwise be ineffectual, or a mere nullity; in other words, it would have no operation except as an execution of the power. See, also Bilderback v. Boyce, 14 S. C. 528; Moody v. Tedder, 16 S. C. 557; Lee v.

Simpson, 134 U. S. 572, 10 Sup. Ct. 631, 33 L. Ed. 1038. The foregoing language is quoted with approval in Mims v. Hair, 80 S. C. 460, 61 S. E. 968.

[5] Conceding that the words "being the same tract of land, wherein an interest was devised to me by my husband, Ralph Jones, in his last will and testament," have no reference to the said power, nevertheless they have reference to the property, which was the subject upon which the power was intended to operate; and the deed would be ineffectual to convey all the "right, title and interest" of Sarah H. Jones in the land, if the execution of her deed cannot be referred to the power contained in said will.

[6] We deem it only necessary to cite the following authorities to sustain the proposition that the reservation of a life estate by the grantor did not invalidate the deed as an attempt to convey a freehold to commence in futuro; it being effectual as a covenant to stand seised to uses: Chancellor v. Windham, 1 Rich. 161, 42 Am. Dec. 411; Kinsler v. Clark, 1 Rich. 170; Dinkins v. Samuel, 10 Rich. 68; Cribb v. Rogers, 12 S. C. 564, 32 Am. Rep. 511; Jacobs v. Insurance Co., 52 S. C. 110, 29 S. E. 533; Sumner v. Harrison, 54 S. C. 353, 32 S. E. 572; Cook v. Cooper, 59 S. C. 560, 38 S. E. 218; Merck v. Merck, 83 S. C. 329, 65 S. E. 347, 137 Am. St. Rep. 815.

[7] The next assignment of error is because the circuit judge permitted the plaintiffs to amend their complaint, so as to allege damages as the result of waste committed by Ruth Mason. Motions to amend are addressed to the discretion of the circuit judge, and his rulings are not the subject of appeal, unless there is an abuse of discretion, which has not been made to appear in this case.

The foregoing conclusions dispose of all questions presented by the exceptions, except those relating to the accountability of the plaintiff Sarah Emeline Rembert for rents of the home place. The appellant's attorneys have failed to satisfy this court that the preponderance of the testimony is against the findings of fact by the circuit judge touching this question.

Judgment modified.

JONES, C. J., and HYDRICK, J., concur.

WOODS, J. (dissenting). I dissent, and think the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed for the reasons therein stated.

(89 S. C. 266)

DEVLIN et al. v. DEVLIN et al.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 11, 1911.)

1. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INSTRUCTIONS—INVOLVING FACTS.

A charge, in a suit to set aside a deed for fraud and undue influence exercised by the grantee, who occupied a fiduciary relation towards the deceased grantor, that, if there was a fiduciary relation between the parties, the deed was presumptively fraudulent, and the burden was on the grantee to show that the deed was free from fraud, and that the grantor executed it of her free will, was not a charge on the facts, but merely stated a correct principle of law applicable to the assumed facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

2. DEEDS (§ 196*)—VALIDITY—FRAUD AND UN-DUE INFLUENCE—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where a relation of trust and confidence existed between a grantor and grantee, the presumption is against the validity of the conveyance, and the grantee has the burden of rebutting it, though generally fraud is not presumed, but must be proved by the party alleging it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 587-593; Dec. Dig. § 196.*]

3. DEEDS (§ 203*)—VALIDITY—EVIDENCE.

In a suit by an heir of a deceased grantor to set aside a deed on the ground of fraud and undue influence exerted by the grantee, who occupied a fiduciary relation to the grantor, the withholding of the deed from record until after the grantor's death may be considered by the jury in determining the issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1066*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in a suit to set aside a deed on the ground of fraud and undue influence and non-delivery, if there was no evidence of want of delivery, the error in a charge on the subject of delivery was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4220; Dec. Dig. § 1066.*]

5. DEEDS (§ 208*)—NONDELIVERY—EVIDENCE.

Proof that a deed was antedated and that the grantee had not obtained possession of it until 10 days before the death of the grantor, who might then have been in extremis, affords some grounds for an inference of nondelivery of the deed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Dec. Dig. § 208.*]

6. JURY (§ 99*)—QUALIFICATION—POWER OF COURT TO EXCUSE JURORS—DISCRETION.

The action of the court on the fourth trial of a case in inquiring of jurors if they had formed any opinion, and in excusing two who stated that their opinion was of such a nature that evidence was necessary to remove it, though they could render a verdict according to the law and evidence, was within its discretion, and the court on appeal will not disturb it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 438-448; Dec. Dig. § 99.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Abbeville County; C. C. Featherstone, Special Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by W. P. Devlin and another against R. H. Devlin and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. N. Graydon and D. H. Magill, for appellants. F. B. Gary, Wm. P. Greene, and Grier & Park, for respondents.

HYDRICK, J. This action was brought for the partition of two tracts of land among the heirs of Sallie M. Devlin, and involves the validity of two deeds, alleged by the defendant R. H. Devlin, to have been executed and delivered to him by Sallie M. Devlin, on March 31, 1905, 10 days before her death, which occurred April 10, 1905, under which he claims to be the sole owner of both tracts. Plaintiffs allege that these deeds were never in fact executed and delivered; but if so, that they were obtained by fraud and undue influence practiced upon the grantor by the grantee. The verdict and judgment were in favor of plaintiffs.

Sallie M. Devlin was an unmarried woman, between 65 and 70 years of age. For many years she lived on one of the tracts in dispute, near her brother, the defendant R. H. Devlin. She had confidence in him and trusted him to a considerable extent with the management of her affairs, in which he was her general adviser and often acted as her agent. She was fond of him and of his family. He in turn was kind to her and considerate of her and her interests, and devoted much of his time to looking after her welfare and business. Some of the witnesses said that she always spoke of him in terms of affection, and said that he was her sole dependence, and that she intended for him and his family to have her property. The testimony tends to show that the same cordial relations did not exist between her and her only other brother, the plaintiff W. P. Devlin, though the relations between them were not exactly unfriendly. The relations between her and one or more of her sisters, while not unfriendly, were a little cool. She seemed ordinarily fond of her other sisters, and more fond of the youngest than of any of the others. She was in failing health for a year, or perhaps longer, before she died. Her decline was most marked and rapid after the first of the year 1905. From that time till her death, she was almost continually under the care of a physician. At times she suffered intense physical pain, which for the time unnerved her, and for which morphine was occasionally administered, though there was no evidence that she was under the influence of that drug when the deeds were executed. Some of the plaintiffs testified that defendant had such influence over her; that when he was present she treated them indifferently, while she treated them affectionately when he was not present.

The deeds bear date January 5, 1905, although, according to the testimony of defendant's witnesses, they were not actually executed until March 31, 1905. The defendant's son, who drew them, testified that they were antedated according to the direction of the grantor, because she said she had given the land to the defendant on that day. The consideration expressed is $600 for the 86-acre tract, and $2,500 for the 370-acre tract. There was testimony that they were worth twice that amount. Defendant admits that no consideration was in fact paid, other than the kindness which he had previously shown to his sister, and the time and attention which he had devoted to her and her affairs. The deeds were drawn by one of defendant's sons and witnessed by two others, one of whom was grantor's physician, then paying her a professional visit, and, according to their testimony, there was no one present when they were executed, except the grantor and grantee and members of his family, and a negro girl, who was a servant of the grantor. There was testimony that the grantee's son, who drew the deeds, left his aunt's house on the night of March 30th, accompanied by a negro, and went to his home in Verdery, several miles distant, where he procured blanks and prepared the deeds and sent them back to his aunt's by the negro, who arrived there between 2 and 3 o'clock that night.

On the morning after the funeral, defendant left his home at daylight and drove 10 miles to Abbeville, arriving there a little after sunrise, and went to the residence of his attorney to consult him about the deeds, the existence of which had not been made known to any one outside of his immediate family, notwithstanding inquiries had been made of him by his brother and several of his sisters as to what disposition their sister Sallie had made of her property. They were not informed of the deeds, until they were spread upon the records, on April 19, 1905. In response to their inquiries, he told them that he paid her the consideration expressed in the deeds. On being asked what she had done with the money, he said it might be in bank somewhere, or it might be sewed up in a featherbed, or she might have given it to his sons. The evidence contains a good many other circumstances which are relied upon by the plaintiffs to show fraud and undue influence, but the foregoing statement of it is sufficient to show clearly that there was no error in refusing defendant's motion for nonsuit and for the direction of a verdict in his favor, made upon the ground that there was no evidence tending to show fraud or undue influence in procuring the deeds.

The court charged the jury that, where confidential relations exist between persons, the law looks with suspicion upon any transaction between them, whereby the superior gains an advantage to himself over the other, and, if a fiduciary relation existed between Miss Sallie Devlin and the defendant when the deeds were executed, they were presumptively fraudulent, and the burden was upon the defendant to show that the transaction was free from fraud, and that the grantor executed them of her free and independent will and judgment, without being improperly or unduly influenced to do so by him.

The appellant contends that this was error (1) because it was a charge on the facts, telling the jury what weight to give the evidence; (2) because the law does not presume fraud, but requires him who alleges it to prove it; (3) because it transferred the burden of proof from the plaintiffs, who allege fraud, to defendant, and required him to prove a negative; (4) because proof that one person is merely the agent of another does not establish such a relation of trust and confidence as will raise a presumption against or cast a suspicion upon transactions between them.

[1] We cannot see that the charge in any way involved the facts. It merely stated a principle of law that proof of the existence of a relation of trust and confidence between parties gave rise to a presumption as to certain transactions between them.

[2] No doubt, as a general proposition, the rule is, as stated by appellant, that fraud will not be presumed, but who alleges it must prove it. But that rule, like all general rules, has its exceptions, and the principle announced in this case is one of the exceptions. When the facts proved or the relation established raise a presumption against the validity of the transaction assailed, unless the presumption is rebutted, the transaction must fall. Hence the effect of the presumption is to shift the burden of proof. The mere fact that one has been the agent of another will not of itself raise a presumption against or cast suspicion upon transactions between them wholly disconnected with the subject of the agency. But where, by reason of the relationship, the agent acquires particular knowledge with regard to the subject of the agency, or gains a peculiar and special influence over his principal, transactions between them with regard to the subject of the agency in which the agent gains an advantage over his principal fall within the rule. The presumption will be strong or weak according to the character and situation of the parties, and the character of the relationship between them. These principles are well settled by our own decisions.

In Way v. Insurance Co., 61 S. C. 501, 39 S. E. 742, the relation was that of husband and wife. In Tindal v. Sublett, 82 S. C. 199, 63 S. E. 990, it was that of principal and agent, coupled with that of mother-in-law and son-in-law, with whom the mother-in-law resided. In Craddock v. Weekly, 85 S. C. 329, 67 S. E. 308, it was applied in a transaction between an aged and widowed mother and her daughters and their husbands. In that case it was held that the evidence rebutted the presumption. In this case the relation between the parties was not only that of principal and agent in a general way, but it was also that of an aged sister and a brother, in whom she had great confidence and upon whom she felt dependent for advice in the management of her affairs. The principle is applicable wherever there is a relation of trust and confidence, no matter from what cause it arises.

[3] The defendant requested the court to charge: "That at the time the deed here in question is alleged to have been executed any person procuring a deed had 40 days in which to record the deed, and if the defendant had said deed recorded with 40 days after its execution that circumstance can have no legal weight in this case." The court properly refused to charge that the circumstance could have no weight, because withholding them from record until after the death of the grantor was a circumstance which the plaintiffs had the right to have the jury consider, and the charge requested would have withdrawn it from their consideration. The immediate record of the deeds would, just like any other act of the parties in connection with the transaction, have afforded a circumstance for the consideration of the jury, whose province it was to draw the proper inferences from all the facts and circumstances.

[4, 5] Appellant alleges error, in that the court charged on the subject of the delivery of deeds when there was no evidence of want of delivery. If so, the error was harmless. But there was reasonable ground for an inference that the deeds were not delivered in the lifetime of the grantor. The fact that they were dated in January, and admitted by defendant not to have been in his possession until March 31, 1905, just 10 days before the death of the grantor and when she may have been in extremis, affords reasonable ground for such an inference.

[6] The record shows that the case had been tried three times; this being the fourth trial. The court therefore inquired of the jurors if any of them had formed any opinion as to the case. Two of them said they had, and that their opinion was of such a nature that it would require evidence to remove it, though they both thought they could render a verdict according to the law and evidence. The court, nevertheless, excused them. Matters pertaining to the trial rest in the sound discretion of the trial court, and this court will not interfere, unless it is made to appear that that discretion has been abused. We think it was wisely exercised in this case. Parties to an action have no right to any particular juror or jurors. They have not the right to select, but merely the right to reject any number for cause, and the number allowed by statute peremptorily.

Action by James Cofield against the E. A. Jenkins Motor Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Robt. Moorman, for appellant. S. G. Finley and Nelson, Nelson & Gettys, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. For valuable consideration, defendant gave plaintiff the exclusive agency to sell its motor cars in a certain territory for a specified time, and agreed to allow him a discount of 10 per cent. from the catalogue prices on all cars sold. During the life of the contract, defendant, knowing that it was acting in violation of its terms, sold four cars in plaintiff's territory worth, at catalogue prices, $5,300. Held, in an action for breach of the contract, that the measure of plaintiff's damages was 10 per cent. of the catalogue prices of the cars so sold by defendant.

MERCK et al. v. MERCK et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 18, 1911.)

1. WITNESSES (§ 159*)—COMPETENCY—"TRANSACTION" WITH DECEDENT—PARTICIPATION OF WITNESS.

Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 400, excludes testimony of a party in interest as to any transaction between such witness and a person deceased against a party prosecuting or defending as assignee or heir of the decedent. Defendant in partition, who claimed as an assignee of a decedent as against heirs of the decedent, offered as a witness to prove the execution of a deed by the decedent to one of the defendants a party who had purchased from that defendant and conveyed to himself. Held, that while a witness was not disqualified under the section because of interest from testifying as to transactions with a deceased person, at which he was present without being a participant, the term "transaction" was very comprehensive, meaning the carrying on or through of any matter or affair, and that as the witness had witnessed the deed and given it validity this was a transaction between him and the deceased grantor in which the witness had participated; and hence he was incompetent to testify to the execution of the deed.

2 EVIDENCE (§ 374*)—DOCUMENTS—PROOF OF EXECUTION—HANDWRITING.

Under the general rule that whenever witnesses to a deed are dead or inaccessible, or deny the execution in their presence, other evidence may be introduced, a party claiming under a deed, one of the witnesses to which is hostile and the other incompetent to testify, may introduce evidence of the handwriting of the subscribing witnesses, and of the grantor, and his admission that he had conveyed the lands, and evidence of its possession and control by the grantee, and as to the recording of the deed, are likewise admissible in substitution of the testimony of the subscribing witnesses.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Pickens County; Ernest Gary, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Daniel M. Merck and others against Lawrence C. Merck, W. B. Mann, and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant Mann appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

J. P. Casey, for appellant. Breazeale & Long, Cothran, Dean & Cothran, and J. M. Boggs, for respondents.

WOODS, J. The opinion in the former appeal (Merck v. Merck, 83 S. C. 329, 65 S. E. 347, 137 Am. St. Rep. 815) contains a detailed statement of the issues in this action for partition. For the purposes of this appeal, it is sufficient to say that the title of the defendant Mann, who claims to be the exclusive owner of the land in dispute against the heirs of Blumer Merck, depends on the validity of an alleged deed from Blumer Merck to L. C. Merck, his son, through whom Mann claims. On the second trial before the jury, on the legal issue of title, the circuit judge directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, and the defendant Mann appeals.

The defendant offered M. F. Hester as a witness to prove the execution of the deed from Blumer Merck to Lawrence C. Merck. The evidence of Hester was excluded, on the ground that he had purchased the land from Lawrence C. Merck and had conveyed it to the defendant Mann, and was thus disqualified to testify as to the execution of the deed to Lawrence C. Merck, under section 400 of the Code of Procedure of 1902. The contention of appellant's counsel is that the witnessing of a deed in the manner prescribed by law is not a transaction or communication between the witness and the grantor. So far as we can discover, the only cases seeming to support this contention are Collins v. Collins, 101 N. C. 114, 7 S. E. 687; In re Young's Will, 123 N. C. 358, 31 S. E. 626; and Bates v. Officer, 70 Iowa, 343, 30 N. W. 608. These cases, however, depend in some measure at least upon the terms of the state statutes with respect to the proof of wills. Except as affected by such statutes, the North Carolina cases seem irreconcilable with later cases in that state. See Witty v. Barham, 147 N. C. 479, 61 S. E. 372, and Harrell v. Hagan, 150 N. C. 242, 63 S. E. 952. The Supreme Court of Iowa seem to have adopted a laxer rule than other courts in permitting interested parties to testify under such statutes as we are now considering.

[1] There are numerous cases in this state and elsewhere holding that a witness is not, under section 400, disqualified because of interest from testifying as to transactions and communications with a deceased person, at which he was present without being a participant. Roe v. Harrison, 9 S. C. 279; Hughey v. Elchelberger, 11 S. C. 36; Kennemore v. Kennemore, 26 S. C. 251, 1 S. E. 881; Sullivan v. Latimer, 38 S. C. 158, 17 S. E. 701; Colvin v. Phillips, 25 S. C. 228; Moore v. Trimmer, 32 S. C. 512, 11 S. E. 548, 552; Sloan v. Hunter, 56 S. C. 385, 34 S. E. 658, 879, 76 Am. St. Rep. 551.

It cannot be doubted that evidence from an interested person of such communications and transactions, even where he is not a participant, is within the evil which the statute was intended to prevent; and such evidence has been held admissible because not within the letter of the statutory inhibition. It has never been held in a case in this state that testimony as to an act of the witness contributing to the legal effect of the transaction or communication was admissible. Here it was necessary to the validity of the deed that as a part of the transaction the deed should be witnessed, and that the witnesses should subscribe their names as witnesses. "Transaction" is a very comprehensive term, meaning the carrying on or through of any matter or affair. When one witnesses a deed and thereby gives it vitality, we do not see how the conclusion can be escaped that he is a participant in the transaction. To give any other construction to the statute, it seems to us would emasculate it, and open the door to the fraud and imposition which it was intended to prevent. We think the true rule is that laid down by the New York Court of Appeals, after a review of all the New York authorities: "It has now been limited to this extent at least: That all conversations or transactions between persons since deceased and a third party, in the presence or hearing of the witness, may not be testified to by such witness if he by word or sign participated in the transaction or conversation, or is referred to in the course of it, or was in any way a party to it." Hutton v. Smith, 175 N. Y. 375, 67 N. E. 633. The same conclusion is reached in the note to Mollison v. Rittgers (Iowa) 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1179, after a review of many authorities. We think there was no error in not permitting the witness Hester to testify to the execution of the deed, and the exceptions on that point must be overruled.

[2] We are of the opinion, however, that the circuit judge erred in excluding evidence of the handwriting of the persons whose names are on the paper as subscribing witnesses. The defendant Mann was in this plight: Mrs. L. C. Merck, one of the persons whose names were subscribed as witnesses to the alleged deed from Blumer Merck to L. C. Merck, was hostile, and upon being put on the stand testified in effect that the deed was not delivered. The other witness, Hester, was excluded because disqualified by interest. Under these conditions the defendant Mann had a right to introduce other testimony tending to prove the execution of the deed; and evidence of the handwriting of the witnesses, of the grantor's acknowledgment of the validity of the deed after its execution, and of any other facts tending to show that the deed had been executed, was clearly admissible. Land titles would be very insecure if they should fail whenever the subscribing witnesses might deny that they witnessed the execution of a deed, or might become for any cause incompetent to testify to its execution. It is true in proving a deed the subscribing witnesses must be produced or their absence accounted for, but manifestly the title cannot be made to depend entirely on their testimony. Whenever the witnesses are dead or inaccessible, or have become incapacitated, or deny the execution in their presence, or for any cause are unable or unwilling to prove the execution, then other evidence may be introduced. This is a principle of general recognition. Pearson v. Wightman, 1 Mill Const. 336, 12 Am. Dec. 636; Congdon v. Morgan, 14 S. C. 594; Gable v. Rauch, 50 S. C. 95, 27 S. E. 555; Brucke v. Hubbard, 74 S. C. 144, 54 S. E. 249; Buchanan v. Simpson, 105 Ga. 393, 31 S. E. 105; Greenleaf on Evidence, vol. 1, p. 762; 11 A. & E. Ency. 598.

On this principle the court erred, also, in holding that the admissions of Blumer Merck that he had conveyed the land to his son, L. C. Merck, were not admissible as evidence of the execution of the deed, but only to show the character of the possession. Such admissions, together with testimony as to the handwriting of the grantor, and of the witnesses, as to the independent possession and control of the land by the grantee and as to the recording of the deed, were all admissible, either to support the testimony of the subscribing witnesses that the deed had been executed or in substitution of the testimony of the subscribing witnesses, if that testimony, without fault of the party in interest, was not available, or was adverse.

There must be a new trial on this ground. Whether the testimony which the defendant Mann may be able to offer on the subject of the execution of the deed will be of such character that it will constitute some evidence of the complete execution of the deed, and so entitle the defendant Mann to have the issue of complete execution submitted to the jury, is a question which cannot be anticipated. As the case is to go back for a new trial, we refrain from any discussion or expression of opinion as to the facts, further than to say that we think there was a scintilla of evidence for the consideration of the jury on the issue of estoppel.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the cause be remanded to that court for a new trial.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by the Southern Railway, Carolina Division, against J. L. Howell. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Simpson & Bomar, for appellant. Sanders & De Pass, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. This is the second appeal in this case. The first is reported in 79 S. C. 281, 60 S. E. 677.

In 1874, John Bankston Davis conveyed to the Spartanburg & Asheville Railroad Company a right of way 200 feet wide, measuring from the center of the railroad, through a tract of land owned by him at or near Campobella. The deed was not recorded until after the controversy herein arose. Davis died in 1888, leaving a will wherein he devised the whole tract, including the right of way, to his niece, the wife of I. W. Wingo. In 1896, Mrs. Wingo conveyed it to her husband. On December 27, 1900, Mr. Wingo conveyed a part of the tract to defendant. The deed to defendant describes the lot conveyed as containing 5 acres and a fraction, and extending to a line 50 feet from and parallel to the railroad. Some time after defendant bought, he inclosed his lot with a fence, and thereby prevented the railroad company and its patrons from using that part of the right of way conveyed to him and inclosed within his fence. This action was brought to enjoin the maintenance of the fence as a continuing trespass. All the defenses originally set up by defendant have been abandoned, except two, to wit, estoppel in pais, and abandonment by plaintiff's predecessor in title of the easement in that part of the right of way inclosed. The court ruled that the defense of estoppel was equitable in its nature, and therefore presented only an equitable issue which should be decided by the court and not by a jury; and that the defense of abandonment was analogous, and made no issue upon which the defendant had the right of trial by jury. The appeal questions this ruling.

[1] It will not be necessary to notice the complaint in detail to determine whether, in form, it is an action for the recovery of the possession of real estate, as contended by appellant, or whether it is only an action in equity for injunction, as contended by respondent, and, therefore, one of equitable cognizance. It has been decided by this court too often to require citation of the cases that a plaintiff cannot, by framing his complaint so that his action would, under the old procedure, be one cognizable only by a court of equity, select the forum in which the issue shall be tried, and thereby defeat a defendant's constitutional right of trial by jury. The complaint alone does not necessarily determine the character of the issues—whether they are legal or equitable—or the mode of trial to which the parties are entitled. Those are questions which must be determined from an examination of all the pleadings in the case.

[2] Now, in this case, the defendant claims title to the land in dispute, based upon the defenses mentioned. If they present issues which, before the adoption of the reformed procedure, were legal in their nature—that is, issues which were cognizable by a court of law—then the defendant was entitled to have them decided by a jury. Adickes v. Lowry, 12 S. C. 108; Chapman v. Lipscomb, 18 S. C. 222; Holliday v. Hughes, 54 S. C. 115, 31 S. E. 867; Alston v. Limehouse, 61 S. C. 1, 39 S. E. 192, and cases cited.

It is not surprising that some confusion has arisen from expressions which are frequently found in the text-books and decided cases, characterizing estoppel in pais as equitable in its nature. It had its origin chiefly, if not wholly, in the courts of equity, and, at first, it was available only in that forum. Naturally, therefore, it has always been spoken of as equitable, and so it is, not only in its origin, but also in its nature. But, in various ways, many of the maxims and principles which originated in the courts of equity became engrafted upon the common law. Sometimes it was done by statute, but not infrequently it was accomplished merely by the adoption of them by the common-law courts, so that, in time, many of them were as available to litigants in those courts as to those in courts of equity. It was this tendency which finally resulted in the adoption of the reformed procedure and the amalgamation of the courts of law and equity. But an examination of the cases above cited shows that that great reform wrought no change in the inherent differences which previously existed between legal and equitable actions and defenses, or in the mode of trying them. Those which were legal—that is, cognizable by the courts of law—are still so, and those which were equitable still retain that character, and each must be tried by its appropriate tribunal.

[3] As far back in the history of the administration of the law in this state as 1792, we find the doctrine of estoppel in pais administered by the law courts. In Lessee of Tarrant v. Terry, 1 Bay, 241, it was allowed to avail the defendant in an action of ejectment to try title to land. From that time to the present, our Reports show that the principle has been administered by the law courts as a defense in actions to recover possession of land. Marines v. Goblet, 31 S. C. 153, 9 S. E. 803, 17 Am. St. Rep. 22; Scarborough v. Woodley, 51 S. C. 329, 62 S. E. 405; Railroad Co. v. Cotton Mills, 52 S. C. 24, 61 S. E. 1089, 62 S. E. 1119. It was also recognized in the first trial in this case. That it is a legal defense, in an action like this, which the defendant has the right to have submitted to a jury, was expressly decided by this court in Sullivan v. Moore, 84 S. C. 429, 65 S. E. 108, 66 S. E. 561, where the court said: "The appellant's first contention is that the issue of estoppel is equitable in its nature, and therefore should have been tried by the court, and not submitted to the jury on the issue of legal title. The position is not tenable." The court then quotes at length from the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in Drexel v. Berney, 122 U. S. 241, 7 Sup. Ct. 1200, 30 L. Ed. 1219, to show that the doctrine is cognizable, at law as well as in equity, and that, "in order to justify a resort to the court of equity, it is necessary to show some ground of equity other than the estoppel itself, whereby the party entitled to the benefit of it is prevented from making it available in a court of law. In other words, the case must be one where the forms of law are used to defeat that which, in equity constitutes the right. Such a case is one for equitable interposition." See, also, Kirk v. Hamilton, 102 U. S. 68, 26 L. Ed. 79; Brown v. Bowen, 30 N. Y. 519, 86 Am. Dec. 406; Odlin v. Gove, 41 N. H. 465, 77 Am. Dec. 773; Putnam v. Tyler, 117 Pa. 570, 12 Atl. 43; Snow v. Hutchins, 160 Mass. 111, 35 N. E. 315. In Townes v. City Council, 52 S. C. 408, 29 S. E. 855, the court said: "An estoppel in pais is a mixed question of law and fact. When the facts relied on to create an estoppel are admitted, or undisputed, or ascertained by the proper tribunal, then whether such facts create an estoppel is a question of law for the decision of the judge; but when the facts relied on to create an estoppel are disputed, then the case must go to the jury, under proper instructions from the court as to what constitutes an estoppel, leaving it to the jury to determine whether the evidence establishes or not the facts necessary to create an estoppel." In this case, as in that, the facts relied on to create the estoppel were disputed, and should have been submitted to the jury.

[4] That an easement may be lost by abandonment is a principle too well established to admit of argument.

[5] Whether a party has abandoned his right to an easement is a question of fact and intention proper for the decision of a jury. Parkins v. Dunham, 3 Stro. 224; Lorick v. Ry., 87 S. C. 71, 68 S. E. 931, and cases cited.

[6] Whether a railroad company can lose a part of its right of way by abandonment is a question which was not considered by the circuit court, and therefore not properly before this court.

KENNEDY et al. v. HILL.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 24, 1911. On Rehearing, Sept. 6, 1911.)

1. PARTNERSHIP (§ 305*)—DISSOLUTION—CONTRACT—INSTRUCTION.

Where a partnership contract provided that the capital should be $105,000; that plaintiffs together had contributed $25,000, and that defendant had contributed $80,000, it was error for the court on dissolution to take the then present value of the assets as shown by an inventory instead of the amount stated in the contract as the original capital as a basis for distribution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 703-705; Dec. Dig. § 305.*]

2. PARTNERSHIP (§ 308*)—DISSOLUTION—DISTRIBUTION—CAPITAL AND PROFITS.

Partnership articles provided that the capital should be \$105,000; that defendant had contributed $\frac{80}{105}$ thereof, and the two plaintiffs $\frac{25}{105}$; and that in the event of dissolution the stock and other assets were to be taken at their actual value and divided in the same proportion between plaintiffs and defendant. It appeared on dissolution that the gross value fixed by appraisal was \$139,856.97, and that the debts were \$28,869.18, leaving net assets \$110,987.79, and a net profit of \$5,987.79. Held, that the assets for distribution being insufficient to liquidate both the capital and profit account the depreciation of assets valued under the contract at \$110,987.79 should be apportioned between capital as stated in the contract at \$105,000, and profits as ascertained under the contract at \$5,987.79 and funds realized by the receiver applied to capital and profits in the proportion that \$105,000 bore to \$5,987.79.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 700; Dec. Dig. § 303.*]

3. PARTNERSHIP (§ 306*)—DISSOLUTION—INTEREST.

Where, in the formation of a partnership, plaintiffs agreed to pay interest to defendant on $45,000, in order to give them an equal interest in the profits, plaintiffs' liability for such interest ceased on the date of the dissolution of the firm.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 706-709; Dec. Dig. § 306.*]

4. PARTNERSHIP (§ 308*)—DISSOLUTION—INDIVIDUAL ACCOUNTS—INTEREST.

On dissolution of a firm, the individual accounts of the partners bore interest from the date of dissolution, and should be regarded as assets in the hands of the receiver, applicable to capital and profits in the same proportion that the original capital bore to the ascertained profits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Dec. Dig. § 308.*]

5. PARTNERSHIP (§ 325*)—DISSOLUTION—EARNINGS BY RECEIVER.

Funds earned by a receiver after dissolution of a firm should not be credited to the capital account, but should be paid into the general fund to be applied with other assets to capital and profits, according to the proportion that the original capital bore to the profits earned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 757-767; Dec. Dig. § 325.*]

6. PARTNERSHIP (§ 346*)—DISSOLUTION—RECEIVERS—COST OF RECEIVERSHIP.

Where, on dissolution of a firm, a receiver was required because of irreconcilable differences between the partners, it was within the discretion of the court to require one of the partners to pay the costs of the receivership.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 820; Dec. Dig. § 346.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of York County; J. C. Klugh, Judge, and Ernest Moore, Special Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Suit by Chris L. Kennedy and another against W. L. Hill, for dissolution and settlement of the firm of Hill, Kennedy & Co. From a decree settling the account and providing a scheme for dissolution, both parties appeal. Modified and affirmed.

Geo. W. S. Hart and Witherspoon & Spencers, for W. L. Hill. Finley & Jennings, and J. Hardin Marlon, for C. L. and P. B. Kennedy.

WOODS, J. In this action for the dissolution and settlement of a partnership between the plaintiffs and the defendant, a receiver was appointed on account of irreconcilable differences and disputes between the partners, and the assets are now in his hands. The questions to be determined relate to the distribution of the assets between the plaintiffs and the defendant. The record contains two reports of Mr. J. Lyles Glenn as referee, decrees by Judge Klugh and Special Judge Moore, and numerous exceptions to these reports and decrees. We shall not state the various steps in the protracted litigation, nor refer in detail to the many exceptions, for the reason that it is conceded on all sides that the rights of the parties and the method of stating the accounts depend on the construction of the partnership contract.

Before the partnership was formed the defendant had been conducting a mercantile business at Sharon for about 15 years. The plaintiffs Chris L. Kennedy and Porter B. Kennedy, under the firm name of Kennedy Bros., had been engaged in the mercantile business at the same place for about 3 years. The two concerns were merged into a new partnership, and a formal written agreement was signed on June 14, 1906, in which it was recited that the partnership had been actually formed on May 20, 1903. The following provisions of the partnership contract bear upon the questions at issue:

"Life of partnership: The partnership is to expire by its own limitation on the 1st day of January, 1907; provided, that it shall be incumbent upon the member or members desiring a dissolution of the partnership at that time to give written notice, not less than thirty days prior to the 1st day of January, of such desire; and the effect of the failure to give such notice shall be to extend the life of the partnership for one year; and so, from year to year, the partnership may be dissolved on any 1st day of January, commencing with January of 1907, by the giving of such written notice, by any one or more of its members, thirty days prior to the 1st day of January, the failure to give such notice to result in extending the life of the partnership for one year.

"Capital stock: The capital stock of the firm is to be one hundred and five thousand dollars. * * *

"Division of profits: The profits and losses are to be equally divided. W. L. Hill has contributed eighty thousand dollars to the capital stock, and C. L. and P. B. Kennedy twenty-five thousand dollars. C. L. Kennedy and P. B. Kennedy are to pay W. L. Hill interest at eight per cent. per annum on forty-five thousand dollars; that is to say, interest on $22,500 that W. L. Hill loans to each of them (out of $80,000) to give them an equal interest in the profits. * * *

"Dissolution: In the event of dissolution the stock and other assets are to be taken at their actual market value, W. L. Hill to receive $\frac{80}{100}$ and the two Kennedys $\frac{25}{100}$. Provision must of course be made for the indebtedness of W. L. Hill and Kennedy Brothers, that was outstanding when the partnership was formed.

"Where moneys of the new firm are used for that purpose, a strict account must be kept; and the accounts so paid shall bear interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum (to be paid by the party for whose benefit the moneys are so used). For convenience it is agreed that the interest shall be computed from the end of the month in which the moneys are so used, upon the aggregate of the sums so paid."

Under the clause first quoted W. L. Hill gave due notice of his desire that there should be a dissolution on January 1, 1907. The partners undertook to make the dissolution settlement, but fell into disputes about the meaning of the contract; and the plaintiffs brought this action for a settlement under the orders of the court. It will be observed that under the contract the Kennedys had together only $\frac{25}{100}$ interest in the capital, while they had together two-thirds interest in the profits. Hence it was to their advantage that as little as possible of the firm assets should be regarded capital and as much as possible profits. Hill, on the other hand, was interested to make the capital as large as possible and the profits as small as possible. Nearly all the entanglement of this complex cause unwinds on the adjudication of this point. The main question, then, is what portion of the assets now in the hands of the receiver shall be regarded capital and what portion profits.

[1] Judge Klugh held that the property put into the new firm, consisting of the assets of the Kennedy and Hill mercantile establishments, was shown by the evidence to be worth only $84,000, and that therefore that sum and not $105,000, as stated in the contract, should be taken as the original capital. Carrying out this view he held the contribution of Hill to the capital stock to have been $64,000 and that of the Kennedys $20,000. He held, further, that the net assets in the hands of the receiver should be applied to the repayment of the capital stock of $84,000 and the remainder regarded as profits and paid out to the parties in equal shares as provided by the partnership contract.

We are unable to agree to the first conclusion, for the reason that it seems to us to be a substitution of that which the court thought it would have been prudent for the parties to agree to for the agreement which they actually made. They expressly agreed that the capital stock should be $105,000, and recited in the contract that "W. L. Hill has contributed $80,000 to the capital stock and C. L. and P. B. Kennedy $25,000." There is no evidence of fraud or imposition in this valuation of the property, nor is there any dispute that the property was actually received by the firm. Judicial authority can no more alter the contract by substituting what seems to be a true valuation for that agreed upon by the parties than it can refuse to enforce or undertake to reform a contract for the purchase of land on the ground that the price agreed on was beyond the real value of the property. The contract may have been improvident, but persons who are sui juris cannot have relief from their agreement on that ground.

[2] We think there was also error in holding that the entire assets must be applied to the repayment of the capital stock. Such a conclusion is inconsistent with the following provision of the contract: "In the event of dissolution the stock and other assets are to be taken at their actual market value, W. L. Hill to receive $\frac{80}{100}$ and the two Kennedys $\frac{25}{100}$." This indicates that the partners did not contemplate that dissolution and settlement of the affairs of the firm should be made by reducing the assets to cash by sale or otherwise; but, on the contrary, that the stock and other assets should be taken, that is, listed and appraised at their market value, and a settlement of the firm affairs made on that basis. The design of the partners and the purpose to be gained in this taking of stock was the ascertainment of the value of the whole and the value of the share of each partner. The only ultimate end to be attained by this ascertainment of values was to enable the partners to divide the assets among themselves. It was contemplated that, when the total market value had been fixed by the taking of the stock and other assets, it should be the basis for the ascertainment of the rights of the partners with respect to partnership matters, including profits and losses.

This seems clearly to be the meaning of the contract as written, and it was the interpretation placed on it by the partners themselves; for when they undertook to make the settlement they commenced by taking stock. Unfortunately they could not agree, and the court is deprived of the benefit of an appraisal of the property at its market value made by the partners on January 1, 1907, the date fixed for dissolution. But the circuit court very wisely ordered an appraisal by three disinterested persons. That appraisal must be regarded as taking the place of the estimate the parties themselves were to make, subject of course to correction by adding any omitted items of either assets or liabilities, or by correcting any clear mistake of fact. The gross value of the assets as fixed by the appraisal was $139,856.97. The deductions made by the appraisers, together with the debts of the firm not taken into account by them, aggregated $28,869.18. This left as the assets on hand as valued by the appraisers, $110,987.79. The net profit at the date of dissolution was, therefore, $5,987.79. These are the figures reported by Mr. Glenn in his statement of the accounts on the principle which we have adopted. They were obtained by an appraisal made as soon as possible after dissolution, and represent as nearly as possible what would have been the result of the settlement among the partners according to the scheme contemplated by the contract.

It is admitted that the assets which the receiver will have for distribution will not be sufficient to liquidate both the capital and profit account. So that it is necessary to determine how the funds in the hands of the receiver shall be distributed. The general rule is that stated by Special Judge Moore, namely, that the assets must be applied to the payment of the capital stock until it is refunded and the remainder only distributed as profits. The rule is not without exceptions, however, and is subject to the contract of the partners when creditors are not interested. In this case, as we have endeavored to show, the partners contracted to ascertain the relative proportion of capital and profits by a valuation of the assets at the date of dissolution, and not by actual reduction into cash. The depreciation of the assets valued under the contract at $110,987.79, due to the failure of the partners to settle under the contract, must be apportioned between the capital as stated in the contract as $105,000 and the profits as ascertained under the contract as $5,987.79. The funds realized by the receiver from the assets must therefore be applied to capital and profits in the proportion that $105,000 bears to $5,987.79.

[3] In adjusting the individual accounts of the partners the charge of interest on $45,000 which the Kennedys were to pay to Hill "to give them an equal interest in the profits" should cease on January 1, 1907, the date of dissolution. The profits having ceased to accrue at that time, this interest charge was likewise at an end.

[4] As to other items, the individual accounts of the partners owing at the time of dissolution should bear interest from the date of the dissolution; and these accounts should be regarded as assets in the hands of the receiver applicable to capital and profits in the proportion above indicated.

[5] Judge Moore properly held that no interest should be allowed on the capital contributed by the partners; but he also held that certain interest on the funds earned by the receiver should be credited to the capital account. Under the view we have taken, the interest so earned falls into the general fund to be applied along with the other assets to capital and profits according to the proportion above stated.

[6] It was within the discretion of the circuit court to require the defendant to pay the costs of the receivership, and we think the record shows that the discretion was justly exercised.

The judgment of this court is that the decrees of Judge Klugh and Special Judge Moore be modified to conform to the conclusions herein stated, that the cause be remanded to the circuit court for such further proceedings as may be necessary.

JONES, C. J., and GARY, A. J., concur.

Order Dismissing Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. The point referred to in the petition was considered by the court before the decree was filed, but it seemed to require no special mention. The defendant, it is true, testified that the ginnery was worth only $2,250, but he did not testify that there had been any depreciation after the appraisal; and the impartial judgment of the appraisers fixing the value at $3,000 was properly adopted by the circuit court in preference to the estimate of an interested party. Since the receiver has had the rent of the ginnery the charge of $3,000 to the defendant will, of course, bear interest only from the date on which he takes possession.

It might have been more logical to require the receiver to dispose of the ginnery along with the other assets, but it does not appear that any substantial injustice will result from assigning it to the defendant at $3,000, and the court is unwilling to disturb the circuit decrees on that point.

The petition for rehearing is dismissed, and the order staying the remittitur is revoked.

HYDRICK, J. This is an action at law to recover possession of real estate, which plaintiff claims as heir of Baron De Kalb Myers. By consent, the issues were tried by the court upon the testimony which was taken and reported by the master. The court found:

(1) That the evidence did not warrant the finding that title was ever in Baron De Kalb Myers.

(2) That plaintiff is an illegitimate son of Baron De Kalb Myers, and therefore not his heir.

(3) That plaintiff is estopped by the judgment of the court of common pleas for Richland county in the case of Josephine Moore v. Jane Myers et al., to which action he was a party, and in which it was adjudged that he was illegitimate, and not an heir of Baron De Kalb Myers, and had no interest in the land in dispute in that action, which is the same land herein sued for.

These findings are all supported by the evidence, and are therefore not reviewable by this court.

HUMPHREY v. PALMER et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 31, 1911.)

1. JURY (§ 59*)—SUMMONING—JURY COMMISSIONERS—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—IN GENERAL.

The determination whether the relationship of a jury commissioner to party litigant is such as to impair the proper discharge of his duties, rests in the sound discretion of the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 268-272; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

2. JURY (§ 59*)—SUMMONING—JURY COMMISSIONERS—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—ABUSE.

The deceased wife of one of the jury commissioners who drew the jury was the daughter of plaintiff, and the children of the commissioner were plaintiff's heirs. The names in the jury box were selected in 1906, and the cause of action did not arise until 1910. Act Feb. 7, 1902 (23 St. at Large, p. 1068) § 3 provides that the jury box shall be kept securely locked with three locks, having different keys, all held by different county officers. Section 4 of the same act gives jury commissioners the right to reject names drawn from the box in certain cases, and section 6 requires the drawing to be public. Held, that as under this statute a party has the right to be present at the drawing he should ascertain whether a jury commissioner related to another party improperly performs his duty; and hence it was not an abuse of the discretion of the trial court to overrule an objection to the entire venire, there being nothing to show that the commissioners improperly influenced its selection.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Florence County; T. S. Sease, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by S. L. Humphrey against George G. Palmer and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Willcox & Willcox, for appellants. J. W. Ragsdale, for respondent.

WOODS, J. When this action of damages for assault and battery was called for trial, defendants' counsel, in the form of a challenge to the array of petit jurors, objected to trial of the case before the jury on the ground of the relationship and close personal association between the plaintiff and Charles T. Haynie, treasurer of Florence county, who as one of the jury commissioners had participated in the drawing of the jury. The court took evidence on the point, from which it appeared that Haynie was the son-in-law of the plaintiff; that his wife, who was the only child of the plaintiff, was dead, and that her children, as the grandchildren of the plaintiff, would in case of his dying intestate inherit his property; and that the intimacy which usually flows from such a relationship existed between the plaintiff and Haynie. Haynie testified that he knew of the pendency of the action, but did not regard it, or even have it in mind, when he participated in the drawing of the jury. The court refused to sustain the objection to the jury, taking the precaution, however, to examine each juror on his voir dire.

[1] The general rule on the subject is thus stated in State v. Perry, 73 S. C. 199, 53 S. E. 169: "The correct rule is that the consanguinity or affinity must be such as would reasonably lead to the presumption that the jury commissioner would thereby be affected in such manner as to impair the proper discharge of his duties, and this fact must be determined by the presiding judge in the exercise of a sound discretion. It would tend to retard the trial of cases very much to adopt any other rule." This does not mean that the discretion of the circuit judge is absolute, without respect to the closeness of the relationship. In the case under consideration, if the decision of the circuit court depended on an opinion of the circuit judge that the close relationship here shown was not sufficient to lead to the presumption that the jury commissioner would be affected by it in selecting the names of jurors to be placed in the box, we think this court would be obliged to hold that there had been an abuse of discretion.

But in the recent case of State v. Smith, 71 S. E. 830, not yet officially reported, the court said: "It may be well to remark that the trial judge in exercising his discretion is not restricted to the consideration of the degree of relationship only. The court may inquire whether the case had arisen and whether the officer knew of its pendency when the jury was drawn. These and other pertinent inquiries in addition to the fact of relationship may well enter into the exercise of the discretion of the court." In this case there are other facts besides the degree of relationship which must be looked at in the light of the statute law on the subject in considering whether there was an abuse of discretion.

[2] The important fact is to be first considered that the names in the jury box had been selected and placed therein, written on folded slips, in December, 1909, under the statute which so requires; whereas, the cause of action did not arise until September, 1910. It was therefore impossible that the names in the box could have been chosen with any view to this case; and there could be no abuse of discretion in holding that the defendant could not have been prejudiced by the participation of Haynie in selecting the names and placing them in the jury box.

The following provisions of the statute safeguard the box after it is made up against the corruption or misconduct or partiality of any one or two of the jury commissioners: "That of the list so prepared, the county auditor, county treasurer and clerk of the court of common pleas, shall cause the names to be written, each on a separate paper or ballot, so as to resemble each other as much as possible and so folded that the name written thereon shall not be visible on the outside, and shall place them, with the said list, in a strong and substantial box, without apertures or openings when closed (to be known as the "jury box"), to be furnished to them by the county supervisor of their county for that purpose, and of such size and shape as that, when such separate papers or ballots shall have been folded and placed therein as above required, they may be easily shaken up and about and well mixed therein, and it shall be the duty of the clerk of the court to keep such box in his custody. The said jury box shall be kept securely locked with three separate and strong locks, each lock being different and distinct from the other two and requiring one key peculiar to itself in order to be unlocked and the key to one of said three locks shall be kept by the county auditor himself, the key to another of said three locks by the county treasurer himself, and the key to the third of said three locks by the clerk of the court of common pleas himself, so that no two of them shall keep a similar key or similar keys to the same lock, and so that all three of them must be present together at the same time and place in order to lock or unlock and open said jury box." Act 1902 (23 St. at Large, p. 1066).

In directing the drawing of jurors to serve at any term of the court, the act, by section 4, confers on the jury commissioners no right of selection, but does confer the discretion to reject in these words: "If there shall be drawn from said jury box a ballot containing the name of any person not between the ages of twenty-one and sixty-five years, or not of good moral character, or who has died, or who has removed from the county or is otherwise disqualified to serve as a juror, such ballot shall be destroyed and such name struck from the said list and another ballot drawn."

But the act also contains, in section 6, the following very important provision as to the publicity of the drawing of the jury: "That the said drawing shall be made openly and publicly in the office of the clerk of the court of common pleas, and the county auditor, the county treasurer and the clerk of the court of common pleas shall give ten days notice of each of said drawings by posting in a conspicuous place on the courthouse door, or by advertisement in a county newspaper, a notice of the place, day and hour of such drawing: Provided, That in case any term of court is to be held within less than twenty days after the approval of this act, such jurors may, nevertheless, be drawn without such notice."

No provision similar to this was contained in the acts under which it was decided, in the case of State v. McQuaige, 5 S. C. 429, that an objection to the jury on similar grounds should be sustained. Under the law as it then stood, there was no way for a litigant, or any person interested as one of the general public in the purity of the jury box, to ascertain whether the jury commissioners in drawing the names from the box had in fact exercised any right of rejection of any juror drawn. The statutory requirement of publicity now in force in giving everybody the opportunity to be present at the drawing of the names from the box imposes upon interested parties the obligation to avail themselves of the protection which the public drawing affords. The actual drawing from the box under the contrivances of the statute is entirely mechanical, except for the discretion lodged in the commissioners to reject or select a name after it is drawn. Any one present at the drawing could discover whether it was in fact mechanical, and also whether the commissioners actually exercised the discretion to reject any name. If a commissioner within the close relationship from which partiality is presumed should participate in the exercise of any act of discretion in rejecting or accepting a name drawn from the box, then there would be cause of complaint and ground of objection to the jury, but not otherwise. And, if the parties litigant had no right to be present and ascertain the facts, the court might well presume, without proof, that the commissioners did exercise the discretion of rejecting or accepting names. But when the party complaining knows of an objectionable relationship of one of the commissioners, and has the right to be present and inspect the drawing, it is his duty to avail himself of the right by attending at the drawing and objecting to the participation of such commissioner. If his objection be disregarded, then it is his duty to show to the court that fact, and the fact that the commissioner objected to acted with the other commissioners in exercising the discretion of rejecting or accepting a name drawn out, or in some way influencing the result of the drawing.

Applying the rule laid down in Jeffers v. Jeffers, 71 S. E. 810, recently decided, it would seem to follow that it is the further duty of a litigant to use reasonable diligence to ascertain before the drawing whether one of the commissioners is related to the parties in interest, so that he may be present at the drawing and protect his rights.

The publicity statute should be given full force as a law made, not only to secure the purity of the jury box, but to enable parties to ascertain any facts which would give ground of complaint against the fairness of the drawing, and make them plain to the court.

Summarizing the considerations entering into the exercise of judicial discretion, we think it is clear that there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to hold the jury not a legal one for the trial of this case. The objection on account of the relationship to one of the parties was not to the making up of the jury list or placing it in the box, but to the drawing only; the defendant had a right to be present at the drawing and object to Haynie's participation, and then ascertain whether the board of which he was a member exercised the discretion of accepting or rejecting any name drawn, or only performed the mechanical function of drawing the names from the box; and no evidence of objection to Haynie's participation or of the exercise of any discretion to reject or accept was furnished to the court.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

YOE v. SAVANNAH RIVER POWER CO.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 26, 1911.)

1. ELECTRICITY (§ 9*)—ERECTION OF POLES—ACTION FOR TRESPASS—NONSUIT.

Where a town purchased a part of a tract of land on which to erect an electric light plant, and was given the right to enter on any land of the grantor for any purpose incident to or connected with the use, construction, or operating of the water and electric light plant to be erected on the parcel purchased, and the town entered into an agreement with defendant power company, agreeing to give defendant the necessary right of way for a pole line from its plant to the town, and on the refusal of plaintiff, who had acquired the rights of the town's grantor, to give defendant a right of way, the line was erected over plaintiff's land by the agents and servants of the town without her consent, it was error in an action against defendant for the trespass to grant a nonsuit, since the jury might have inferred that the town, in building a line across the plaintiff's land, was acting as defendant's agent.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenwood County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Belle Yoe against the Savannah River Power Company. From an order of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Cothran, Dean & Cothran and H. C. Tillman, for appellant. Grlier & Park, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. [1] This appeal is from an order of nonsuit in an action for damages for trespass on land. The trespass consisted in the erection of a line of poles on plaintiff's land on which electric light wires were strung. Some years ago, the town of Greenwood built its own electric light plant. For that purpose, and, also, for use in connection with a system of waterworks, it purchased from B. F. Yoe, in 1898, three acres of land about two miles from the town; same being part of a tract of 230 acres owned by Yoe. In 1904 Yoe conveyed 71 acres of the same tract to plaintiff, which is the tract on which the alleged trespass was committed. The deed to the town, after the grant of the right to use and divert the water courses on the whole tract, and to construct and lay thereon dams and water conduits, proceeds as follows: "And may enter upon said lands, or any part thereof, for such said purpose, or for any other purpose incident to or connected with the use, construction, maintenance or operating a water and electric light plant to be erected on the parcel of three acres of land above mentioned and described, and also such other rights and privileges as may or shall be necessary to the full use and enjoyment of the said plant, and the said maintenance and operating the same, with full right, at any time therefor, to enter upon my said adjoining lands, or any part thereof." Under this grant, a line of poles was erected from the power house on the lot conveyed to the town. The line erected on plaintiff's land extends in the opposite direction—from the power house to defendant's plant on Savannah river. Finding it cheaper to take electricity from defendant than to develop it by its own plant, the town entered into an agreement with defendant to furnish it, agreeing to give defendant the necessary right of way for a pole line from its plant to the town. Agents of defendant tried to get from plaintiff a right of way through her land. After her refusal to grant it, the line was erected without her knowledge or consent by the agents and servants of the commissioners of public works of the town, under the supposed license, above recited, contained in the deed from Yoe. For the erection of the line, defendant furnished the necessary materials, such as insulators and wire, and perhaps the poles—although the witness was not certain whether these were furnished by defendant or the town.

[2] The ground upon which the nonsuit was granted was that there was no testimony that defendant had committed the trespass. From the facts and circumstances stated, the jury may have inferred that, in building the line across plaintiff's land, the town was acting as defendant's agent—especially as there was no testimony that the town had agreed with defendant to build any part of the line, or that it had, in fact, built any other part of it. The only testimony on that point was that the town was to give defendant the necessary right of way.

It is not necessary to consider the exceptions assigning error in the admission of evidence. As the case did not go to the jury, the plaintiff was not prejudiced by the rulings questioned.

McBRAYER v. VIRGINIA CAROLINA CHEMICAL CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 26, 1911.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 101, 102*)—MASTER'S DUTY—SAFE PLACE TO WORK.

The master must furnish his servant with a safe place to work, as well as a safe method of doing it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 180-184; Dec. Dig. §§ 101, 102.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 190*)—VICE PRINCIPAL.

A general foreman, with authority to employ and discharge men and direct them where and how to work, represented the employer in directing laborers, engaged in digging down a large pile of phosphate rock, to cut a deep trench in the pile, and in directing them where to cut it, so as to make the employer liable for his negligence in so doing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 449-474; Dec. Dig. § 190.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 245*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

To constitute contributory negligence in obeying a master's orders, it is not sufficient that the employé believe the act required to be hazardous, unless the danger is so obvious that one of ordinary prudence would not incur it; the servant being entitled to rely upon the master's judgment, if there is ground for reasonable difference of opinion as to danger.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 778-788; Dec. Dig. § 245.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 219*)—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—OBEYING MASTER'S ORDERS.

In determining whether a servant assumed the risk of obeying his employer's orders and continuing in service after knowledge of danger in doing so, the degree of danger, the extent of the employer's appreciation thereof, and the necessity of doing the work should be considered, there being no absolute rule to determine the question, though generally the employé does not assume the risk, unless the danger is so obvious that one of ordinary prudence would not incur it.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 288*)—INJURIES—JURY QUESTION—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

If the evidence as to whether an employé assumes the risk of injury from obeying an order is susceptible of more than one inference, the question is for the jury.

7. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 289*)—INJURY—JURY QUESTION—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In an employé's action for personal injuries, while digging down a pile of ground phosphate rock, by the pile falling upon him, whether plaintiff was negligent held a jury question.

8. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 288*)—INJURIES—JURY QUESTION—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

In an employé's action for personal injuries, while digging down a pile of ground phosphate rock, by it falling upon him, whether plaintiff assumed the risk held a jury question.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Cherokee County; W. B. Gruber, Special Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Joseph McBrayer against the Virginia Carolina Chemical Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

N. W. Hardin and Sanders & De Pass, for appellant. Butler & Hall, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. Plaintiff was injured while working in defendant's fertilizer factory. At the time of his injury, he was engaged with other laborers in digging down a large pile of material composed of ground phosphate rock mixed with sulphuric acid. The pile was from 25 to 30 feet high and about 100 feet long, and originally shaped somewhat like a railroad fill or embankment, with sloping sides; the loose material being dumped on it from above. Owing to a difference in the character of the phosphate rock used, some parts of the pile were dense and hard, while others were more yielding and loose, like sand, and would therefore more readily slide down from the pile, as the supporting mass beneath was removed. Plaintiff and another laborer were digging it down with picks, so that others could shovel it into the wheelbarrows and carry it to the mixers. The pile had been cut into for some distance from the bottom, until its side for some distance up had become nearly, if not quite, perpendicular. Plaintiff was working under the direction of John Byers, who was defendant's general foreman of work, with authority to employ and discharge hands, and direct them what to do and where and how to work. He had authority to direct how the pile was made, and how it should be dug down and removed. Byers ordered plaintiff to dig a trench at a particular place in the pile, and plaintiff proceeded to do so, but stopped, saying it was dangerous; Byers ordered him to go on digging. He said he thought there was danger, but waived his own judgment and relied upon that of the foreman, and obeyed his orders. While digging the trench, the pile fell on him, and he was injured. The court granted a nonsuit, on the ground that plaintiff's injury was caused by his own contributory negligence, and was the result of a risk which he assumed.

[1, 2] It is the duty of the master to furnish his servant with a safe place to work, and also a safe method of doing the work. Under the circumstances stated, Byers was the representative of the master in ordering the plaintiff to cut the trench in the pile, and in telling him where on the pile to cut it. If, in doing so, he was guilty of negligence which resulted in plaintiff's injury, defendant would be liable, unless the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, or unless his injury was the result of a risk which he assumed.

[3] In Stephens v. Railway, 82 S. C. 549, 64 S. E. 604, the rule as to when a servant will be guilty of contributory negligence in obeying an order of the master is thus stated: "To show contributory negligence, it is not sufficient that the employé receiving the order should have misgivings, and believe the act required to be hazardous, unless the danger is so imminent and obvious that a man of ordinary prudence would not incur it. If there is ground for reasonable difference of opinion as to the danger, the servant is not bound to set up his judgment against that of his superior, whose orders he is required to obey, but he may rely on the judgment of such superior. The matter is thus well stated by Mr. Justice Holmes, in McKee v. Tourtellotte, 167 Mass. 69, 70, 44 N. E. 1071, 1072 (48 L. R. A. 542): 'When we say that a man appreciates a danger, we mean that he forms a judgment as to the future, and that his judgment is right. But if against this judgment is set the judgment of a superior, one, too, who, from the nature of the callings of the two men and of the superior's duty, seems likely to make the more accurate forecast, and if to this is added a command to go on with the work and to run the risk, it becomes a complex question of the particular circumstances whether the inferior is not justified as a prudent man in surrendering his own opinion and obeying the command. The nature and degree of the danger, the extent of plaintiff's appreciation of it, and the exigency of the work, all enter into consideration, and no universal rule can be laid down.' The numerous authorities sustaining this statement of the law are collated in the note in Houston, etc., Ry. Co. v. De Walt, 97 Am. St. Rep. 877." Lyon v. Railway, 84 S. C. 391, 66 S. E. 282; Lowe v. Railway, 85 S. C. 372, 67 S. E. 460, 137 Am. St. Rep. 904.

[4, 5] A similar rule prevails with regard to the assumption of risk in obeying an order of the master, and in continuing in the service after knowledge of risk or danger, or of defects in the machinery or appliances or place to work furnished by the master. If the evidence is susceptible of more than one inference, it is a question for the jury. Bussey v. Railroad Co., 52 S. C. 438, 30 S. E. 477; Mew v. Railway, 55 S. C. 90, 32 S. E. 828.

[6-8] In this case the evidence tending to show negligence on the part of defendant, and contributory negligence and assumption of risk on the part of plaintiff, was susceptible of more than one inference. It was therefore error to grant the nonsuit. This case is distinguished from Martin v. Royster Guano Co., 72 S. C. 237, 51 S. E. 680, because in that case there was no testimony that the foreman ordered Martin to work at the particular place at which he was injured, or that he ordered him to remain there and work after he became apprehensive of danger.

ALLWORDEN v. NELSON et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 24, 1911.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 657*)—STREETS—VACATION—"STREETS WITHIN SAID LIMITS."

The city of Columbia having been laid out, the title to the land and streets vested in commissioners, for the use of the state, as provided by Act March 22, 1786 (4 St. at Large, p. 751). By Act Dec. 19, 1816 (6 St. at Large, p. 53), the commissioners were required to convey to the Columbia Academy all the unsold land lying in the outer town of Columbia east of B. street, south of S. street, west of H. street, and north of L. street; and also such lots or squares as include the marsh north of S. street, and eastward of the town; and that "the streets within said limits" be vested in trustees, who should have power to dispose of them, reserving a right of way to such persons as might become owners of lots, squares, or portions of lands within such limits. Held, that the description of some of the lots to be conveyed as lying south of S. street, and others as lying north of the street, did not imply an intention to exclude that street lying between the lots so conveyed, but that the words "the streets within said limits" included that part of S. street lying between the lots north and south of it designated in the act, and therefore passed a title to such part of the street, which was thereafter subject to conveyance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 657.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Robt. Aldrich, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by George V. Allworden against P. H. Nelson and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. S. Nelson and J. Tom Gettys, for appellant Nelson. Christie Benet, for appellant City of Columbia. W. M. Shand and H. N. Edmunds, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. Plaintiff and defendant P. H. Nelson entered into a written contract for the sale of a lot in the city of Columbia. Mr. Nelson wants to comply with the contract, but, having some doubt of plaintiff's title, he refused to do so, in order that the validity of the title might be adjudicated. He bases his refusal to accept the title on the ground that the lot is a part of one of the streets of the city, which is therefore made a party that its right to claim the lot as part of one of its streets may also be adjudicated.

The issues of law and fact were referred to the master, who reported that plaintiff's title was good, and recommended that he have judgment for specific performance.

From a decree of the circuit court confirming the master's report, both defendants have appealed.

As originally laid out, the city of Columbia consisted of a tract of land two miles square, with two principal streets, running through the center of the town at right angles; each being 150 feet wide. One of these was Senate street. The title to the land and streets was vested in commissioners, for the use of the state. 4 St. at Large, p. 751.

By an act of the Legislature passed in 1816 (6 St. at Large, p. 53) the commissioners were "authorized and required to convey to the Columbia Academy all the unsold lots and squares of land lying in the outer town of Columbia, east of Bull street, south of Senate street, west of Harden street, and north of Lower Boundary street; and also all such lots or squares as include the marsh north of Senate street and eastward of the town; and that the streets within the said limits be, and they are hereby, vested in the said trustees, who shall have power to dispose of the same, reserving always the right of way to such persons as now are, or hereafter may become, the owners of lots, squares, or portions of land within the said limits."

The validity of plaintiff's title depends upon the proper construction of the language of the statute above quoted. It appears from the evidence that the lots lying north and south of Senate street were conveyed by the commissioners to the trustees of the Columbia Academy according to the directions of the act, and presumably also all that portion of Senate street lying between the lots so conveyed and east of Winn (now Gregg) street, including the lot in controversy, which fronts on Gregg street; and that the same has come by mesne conveyances to the plaintiff. The sole question for decision is whether the words "the streets within said limits" in the act above quoted include that part of Senate street lying between the lots north and south of it designated in the act. It is contended that the description of some of the lots to be conveyed as lying south of Senate street, and others as lying north of that street, expresses, by implication at least, the intent to exclude the street lying between the lots so conveyed.

The section, read as a whole, shows that such an inference was not intended. It is manifest that the method of description referred to was adopted merely because all the unsold lots and squares south of Senate street and east of Bull street were to be conveyed; while north of Senate street the conveyance was to include only "all such lots or squares as include the marsh." But the fact that title to the streets within the limits described was to be conveyed and vested in the trustees, with power to dispose of the same, shows clearly an intention that the land within the boundaries described was to be conveyed, not as city lots, accessible to streets, but as an entire body of land; the only reservation being a right of way to such persons as were then, or might thereafter become, the owners of lots within said limits. No claim on the part of any such owner appears in this case. It follows, therefore, that the words "the streets within said limits" include all the streets within the boundaries covering the land conveyed as an entire tract, and the testimony shows that the lot in question was included in that boundary. This construction is strengthened by the construction given to the act and the conveyances thereunder by the parties interested. Because as far back as the memory of some of the oldest citizens of Columbia goes—certainly as far back as 1852—at least a part of the land included in the description given in the statute, including the part of Senate street here in controversy, has been under fence and occupied as a farm, until the year 1901, when the plaintiff conveyed 75 feet of the southern half of what was formerly Senate street, east of Gregg street, for a distance of 390 feet (together with other streets within the boundaries mentioned) to the city for a street. During all these years, no claim was made, so far as the evidence shows, by the city or by any individual, that the lot in question was a part of Senate street.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The construction which we have placed upon the statute of 1816 makes it unnecessary to consider the contention of plaintiff that the city of Columbia is now estopped from claiming the lot in question as a part of Senate street.

Judgment affirmed.

CRAIG v. AUGUSTA-AIKEN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 7, 1911.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 312*)—ACCIDENTS AT CROSSING—PERSONS ON HIGHWAYS.

It was error, in an action by one who, while in a helpless state of intoxication, was run over at a railroad crossing, to instruct the jury that the railroad company was not bound to keep a lookout.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 983-1001; Dec. Dig. § 312.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 106*)—ARGUMENTS OF COUNSEL—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT.

In an action against a railroad company by one injured at a crossing, the refusal of the court to allow plaintiff's counsel to comment upon an order setting aside the verdict in a former trial, and the action of the court in prohibiting plaintiff's counsel in his argument from making further comments on the failure of defendant's attorneys to introduce in evidence the testimony of one of their witnesses at a former trial, was not an abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Aiken County; Thos. S. Sease, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by M. C. Craig against the Augusta-Aiken Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

The exceptions were as follows:

"(1) Because his honor, the presiding judge, erred in modifying and altering the plaintiff's fifth request to charge, which is as follows: 'Fifth. That if the motorman discovers, or by reasonable lookout ahead could have seen, a person on the track at a public crossing in an apparently helpless condition from drunkenness or other cause, or if he sees on the track an object, or could have seen it by keeping a reasonable lookout, which from all appearances may be a human being lying in an apparently dangerous position, unable to avoid danger, it is his duty to resolve all doubt in favor of the preservation of life, and immediately to use every available means short of imperiling lives to stop the car in time to avoid an injury, and if from all the circumstances the motorman should have resolved doubt in favor of life and stopped his car, but negligently failed to do so, then the company would be liable in damages, even though the motorman might have thought that the object on the track was something other than a human being.' His honor's modification was as follows: 'And I put in the words "Knew he was there." In addition to that, I also charge you and modify that request by charging you: "That, if the motorman on this particular car knew that this man was there in a helpless condition, then he owed him due care."' It is respectfully submitted that his honor erred in making the modification herein. (1) Because the request was a sound proposition of law and should have been charged as it stood. (2) Because he erred in charging that the duty of the motorman to exercise ordinary care depended on the fact whether he knew such person was on the track in a helpless condition; whereas, he should have charged them that it is the duty of the motorman in charge of the train, on approaching a public crossing where people are likely to travel, to exercise ordinary care in keeping a lookout ahead for persons on the track at said crossing in a helpless condition, and if he could have seen such person by reasonable care, but failed to do so, they would be just as liable in damages as though the person had in fact been seen.

"(2) Because his honor, the presiding judge, erred in modifying plaintiff's sixth request to charge, which is as follows: 'Sixth. Failure of a motorman operating a car to perform his duty in keeping a reasonable lookout ahead on its tracks in front of its car at a public crossing renders the company liable for injuring a human being lying on the track in an apparently helpless condition from drunkenness or other cause. The fact that the motorman did not see him in time to stop his car is no excuse, for the company would still be liable in damages, if he, by keeping a reasonable lookout ahead, could have discovered him in time to have stopped the car and avoided the injury.' His honor modified the same as follows: 'I charge you that, also modifying that by saying if the motorman of this particular car knew that he was there in a helpless condition, it was his duty to keep a lookout for him.' There is error in said modification for the following reasons: (1) Said request stated a sound proposition of law and should have been charged as it stood. (2) It was error to instruct the jury that the motorman was bound to keep a lookout for a person at a public crossing only on condition that he knew that he was there; whereas, the law is that the motorman, on approaching a public crossing or traveled place, is bound to exercise ordinary care in keeping a reasonable lookout ahead for helpless beings on the track, and this duty he must perform whether he knew the person was there or not; and if he could have seen such person by ordinary care, but failed to do so, then the company would still be liable for any injury sustained as the proximate result of such negligence.

"(3) Because his honor modified the plaintiff's seventh request, which is as follows: 'Seventh. That if the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was put off the defendant's car by its agents and servants, and left in a dangerous position in the nighttime, where it might reasonably be supposed injury would result, while in such a condition from drunkenness or other cause that he was unable to appreciate danger, or to avoid it, and such servants knew, or ought to have known, of his condition from all the circumstances, then the defendant company could not successfully plead contributory negligence on the part of such person.' His honor modified the same by leaving off this clause, 'even if he was lying on the track in a drunken condition.' It is respectfully submitted that the request as it stood as a whole was a sound proposition of law, and that plaintiff should have been allowed the benefit thereof, for it is a principle of law that, where the dangerous situation of a person is brought about through the wrongful acts of another, the latter cannot charge the former with negligence for what his own wrong has brought about.

"(4) Because his honor, the presiding judge, erred in modifying the plaintiff's tenth request to charge, which is as follows: 'The jury is further charged that if they find from the evidence that the defendant knew, or as reasonably prudent men ought to have known from all the circumstances, that the plaintiff was in such a condition as to be unable to take care of himself from any cause, or was likely to become helpless, but, notwithstanding the same, ejected and left him in an apparently dangerous position on its railway track, where it was probable that he might sustain injury from other cars passing along the same, and if any injury resulted under these circumstances you cannot find that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence for being on the track in such a condition.' His honor modified the same as follows: 'I charge you that with this modification, that if you find from the evidence that the defendant knew that the plaintiff was in such a condition as to be unable to take care of himself from any cause, but notwithstanding the same ejected him and left him in an apparently dangerous position on its railway track where it was probable he might sustain injury from other cars passing along and over said railway track, and injury resulted under these circumstances, you cannot find that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence by being on the track in such a condition. I charge you that, in addition to the charge that if the motorman on this car knew that this man was or would be in a helpless condition, then he owed him due care, and not only due care, but he owed him the duty of course not to willfully injure him.' His honor erred in modifying the same for the following reasons: (1) That said request was a sound proposition of law and should have been charged as it stood. (2) That said modification deprived the plaintiff of one phase of the law, namely, that if the defendants, as reasonably prudent men, ought to have known from all the circumstances that the plaintiff was unable to take care of himself, or was likely to become so, then they would be liable for wrongfully ejecting him in a dangerous place under these circumstances; whereas, his honor's modification made the duty of the company depend on actual knowledge—that is, the defendants must have known that the plaintiff was in such a condition.

"(5) Because his honor violated section 26, art. 5, of the Constitution of 1895, by charging on the facts when he submitted the defendant's second request to charge, which is as follows: (2) The jury is further charged that, if you find that the plaintiff's injury was not the proximate result of any negligence or fault on the part of the defendant's agents or servants, but was the proximate result of his own carelessness and negligence in going upon the track of the defendant and lying down thereon in an intoxicated condition or otherwise, then your verdict should be for the defendant.' For it is submitted that he intimated his opinion to the jury that the plaintiff had done certain acts and could not recover if the injury was 'the proximate result of his own carelessness and negligence in going upon defendant's track and lying down thereon in an intoxicated condition or otherwise,' for it is submitted that he should not have stated the fact that the plaintiff went upon the defendant's track and lay down thereon in an intoxicated condition or otherwise.

"(6) Because his honor, the presiding judge, erred in not modifying the defendant's fifth request to charge, which is as follows: 'The jury is further charged that, if you find that the plaintiff was a trespasser down drunk or asleep upon defendant's track, then the defendant owed him no duty except not to willfully injure him, so I charge you that if the plaintiff was a trespasser on the defendant's track, and the motorman did all he could to avoid injuring him after he discovered him, then the plaintiff cannot recover.' For it is respectfully submitted that, as hypothetical facts fitting the true facts in the case were used in this request, it is the duty of the court to explain to the jury what a trespasser in law was, and his failure to explain the same could not but help mislead the jury; and he should have also advised the jury of the different duties that the motorman is bound to exercise when approaching a person in a helpless condition at a crossing as distinguished from a person drunk or asleep on the track at some other place than a crossing.

"(7) Because his honor, the presiding judge, erred in charging the defendant's eighth request, which is as follows: 'While a traveler on a public highway that crosses a railway track has the right to be at and upon such crossing for the purpose of passing over the same in the due course of travel, if in the exercise of that care and diligence required by law at such places, he has no right to make a camping ground or bed of such crossing and to rest or go to sleep thereon. A person undertaking to so use the highway at the point where the railway track crosses it would be as much a trespasser relatively to the railroad company as though he were camping or sleeping upon the track at a place other than the crossing, and relatively to such trespasser upon the track of a railway company, even though it be at a public crossing, there is no duty on the part of the trainmen to take special precaution to avoid injuring such trespasser upon its track until the presence of the trespasser becomes known. It is not enough that the trespasser might have been seen by the engineer or motorman in time to have avoided injuring him, but it must be made to appear that he was seen.' His honor modified this, but in such manner as not to change the effect of the request, which is as follows: 'I charge you that, and that is the law, of course, modified by the charge that I have already made as to special notice. If this motorman had special notice, as alleged in the complaint, that this man was on the track, it was his duty to keep a lookout and avoid injuring him, if by the use of ordinary care and prudence he could have avoided injuring him.' It is respectfully submitted that said request and the modifications thereof are both erroneous.

"(8) Because his honor violated section 26, art. 5, of the Constitution of 1895 of South Carolina, by inferring for the jury what facts would practically amount to negligence as would bar the plaintiff's recovery when he instructed them in this language: 'He has no right to make a camping ground or bed of such crossing and to rest or go to sleep thereon. A person undertaking to so use the highway at the point where the railroad track crosses it would be as much a trespasser relatively to the railroad company as though he were camping or sleeping on the track at a place other than the crossing.' For it is submitted that the law required his honor to charge what duties the railroad owes to helpless people at a public crossing, or other place along its track, and, if he infers that certain acts or conduct on the part of a person at a public crossing constitutes a trespass, he has drawn an inference for the jury in violation of the law. Secondly. It was error to instruct the jury 'that a person undertaking to so use the highway at the point where the railroad track crosses it would be as much a trespasser relatively to the railroad company as though he were camping or sleeping on the track at a place other than the crossing.' For it is respectfully submitted that it is the duty of a carrier to exercise ordinary care in approaching a public crossing so as to avoid injuring persons in an apparently helpless condition on said railway crossing, while the law charged by his honor should have been applicable only to a trespasser at some other place on the track than a crossing or traveled place.

"(9) Because his honor, the presiding judge, erred in charging the defendant's ninth request, which is as follows: '(9) If you believe that, after being lawfully ejected from the car, plaintiff was removed, or himself walked to a safe distance from the track, and the car moved on with its passengers, and the plaintiff subsequently came back upon the track at that place or some other place and lay upon the same in an insensible state of intoxication, whether on or off a public crossing, I charge you as matter of law he was a trespasser, and as such the defendant owed him the duty alone not to willfully or wantonly injure him.' For it is respectfully submitted that his honor violated section 26, art. 5, of the Constitution of 1895, prohibiting judges from charging on the facts, for the reason that he thereby drew a conclusion for the jury as to what a trespasser is when he told them as matter of law what would constitute a trespasser; whereas, he should have defined a trespasser, and leave it to the jury to say from the facts and circumstances whether such person was a trespasser. Secondly. Because his honor erred in stating the degree of care that a carrier owes to a person lying down insensible on its track at a public crossing. He should have advised them that the carrier under these circumstances is bound to exercise ordinary care in approaching the public crossing so as to avoid injuring a person in a helpless condition thereon, and it would owe this duty whether it knew the party was there or not.

"(10) Because his honor, the presiding judge, erred in refusing to allow counsel for the plaintiff, in his argument to the jury, to either read or comment upon the order of Judge Watts setting aside a verdict at a former trial, for it is submitted that said order was a part of the record in this case, and plaintiff's attorneys had full right to comment upon and explain to the jury any of the records in said case under proper instructions from the court as to their weight.

"(11) Because his honor, the presiding judge, erred and committed an abuse of discretion in stopping plaintiff's counsel in the midst of his argument to the jury and prohibiting him from making further remarks or comments on the failure of the defendant's attorneys to introduce in evidence the testimony of one of their witnesses, Conductor Grimes, taken at the previous trial, and which the plaintiff's counsel had offered to allow in evidence under the rules applicable to the same. For it is submitted that plaintiff's counsel, so long as he does not abuse or use improper language, had full right to comment upon the withholding of any testimony from the jury by the opposite side."

J. B. Salley, Boykin Wright, and George T. Jackson, for appellant. Croft & Croft, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for actual and punitive damages, alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff through the negligence and wantonness of the defendant. The complaint alleges that on the 22d of September, 1906, the plaintiff became a passenger on the defendant's car at Augusta, Ga., for the purpose of being carried to Langley, S. C.; that, soon after the car had started, the plaintiff became so incapacitated as to be utterly helpless, and was forcibly ejected and left in a dangerous place by the defendant; that the defendant warned its servants to look out for the plaintiff, while operating its other cars over said track; but that they negligently and wantonly failed to keep a proper lookout for the plaintiff, in consequence of which one of its cars ran over his arm, thereby rendering amputation necessary. The defendant denied the allegations of negligence and wantonness, and for a defense alleged: "That, at the time mentioned in the amended complaint, plaintiff was a passenger on a car of the defendant's railroad in Aiken county, S. C., and being guilty of disorderly conduct, and drawing a knife, and therewith threatening the agents of defendant, and cursing, to the terror, annoyance, and vexation of a large number of other passengers on said car, the conductor of said car stopped his train, where such offense was committed, and ejected said plaintiff from said car, using only such force as was necessary to accomplish such removal." The defendant also set up the defense of contributory negligence. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed upon exceptions, which will be reported.

[1] The first question that will be considered is whether there was error, on the part of his honor the presiding judge, in charging the jury that if the plaintiff was injured at a highway crossing, while in a helpless condition of intoxication, the defendant was not bound to keep a lookout, and owed him no duty (except not to injure him willfully or wantonly), unless it knew that he was in a helpless condition.

In the case of Jones v. Railroad, 61 S. C. 556, 39 S. E. 758, the court stated the principle as follows: "Even though the use of the track by the public as a walkway was not for such length of time nor of such character as to give a legal right to so use the track, and even though the evidence fell short of showing any positive consent to such use by the company, yet if there was evidence tending to show knowledge of and acquiescence in such use, without protest, such evidence would tend to show that the railroad company had much reason to expect the presence of persons on the track, who were there, not as bald trespassers, but using it with the knowledge and acquiescence of the (railroad) company. Under such circumstances, it would be the duty of the railroad company to keep a reasonable lookout, or to give warning of the approach of the train, or generally to observe ordinary care, under the circumstances, to avoid injury."

This language was quoted with approval in the case of Sentell v. Railway, 70 S. C. 183, 49 S. E. 215, in which the court held that: "Where a person is sitting on the end of a cross-tie, with his head in his hands, and his feet in a path along the track, which pedestrians had been using as a walkway for more than 20 years, without objection of the railway company, at a point on the track, at which he could have been seen by the engineer, for some distance before reaching him, it is proper to refuse a nonsuit, and to submit to the jury the questions of the relation of the deceased to the company, and whether there was negligence on part of engineer in striking him with his engine, and whether it was duty of engineer to keep a lookout." (Syllabus.)

If, as is alleged, the plaintiff in the present case was on the highway crossing at the time of the injury, then there was even a greater necessity for the defendant to keep a proper lookout than in the cases just mentioned.

The exceptions raising this question are sustained.

[2] Exceptions 10 and 11 cannot be sustained, as it has not been made to appear that there was an abuse of discretion on the part of the presiding judge.

These conclusions practically dispose of all the questions involved.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded to that court for a new trial.

STATE v. KELLY.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 14, 1911.)

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 176*)—REQUISITES—DATE OF OFFENSE.

Act March 2, 1909 (26 St. at Large, p. 64) § 11, imposing a greater penalty for a second or any subsequent offense, does not change the rule that, where time is not of the essence of the offense, it is not necessary to prove the precise day alleged in the indictment, but proof that the offense was committed on any other day before the finding of the indictment sustains a conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 548; Dec. Dig. § 176.*]

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 176*)—REQUISITES—DATE OF OFFENSE.

Where time is made an essential element of an offense by being made descriptive of it, the state must prove it as alleged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 548; Dec. Dig. § 176.*]

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 174*)—ILLEGAL SALES—SEPARATE OFFENSES.

Each sale of whisky is a separate and distinct offense for which accused may be convicted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 194; Dec. Dig. § 174.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 739*)—FORMER JEOPARDY—QUESTION OF FACT.

Where two or more offenses of the same character are alleged in different indictments, the question whether they are the same or different offenses may become a question for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1710; Dec. Dig. § 739.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1163*)—APPEAL.

Where indictments charged sales of whisky on October 15th and on June 23d following, respectively, and the extent of a variance in the proof as to the date alleged in the first indictment was not disclosed, and the record did not show whether the indictments were found at the same or at different terms of court, accused, complaining of a conviction under the first indictment, had the burden of showing that the variance was prejudicial to him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1163.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1163*)—FORMER JEOPARDY—QUESTION OF FACT.

Where indictments charged sales of whisky on October 15th and June 23d following, respectively, and the extent of a variance between the proof as to the date alleged in the first indictment was not shown, and the record did not state whether the two indictments were found at the same or at different terms of court, accused could not complain of a charge that the jury might convict under the first indictment on proof of a sale on any day previous to the filing thereof without showing prejudicial error, which he could not, if the first indictment was found at one term and the other at a subsequent term.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1163.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1211*)—INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 114*)—PUNISHMENT—SECOND OR SUBSEQUENT OFFENSE—STATUTES.

An indictment need not allege that the offense charged is a second or subsequent offense to authorize the court to impose an increased punishment for a second or subsequent offense authorized by Act March 2, 1909 (26 St. at Large, p. 64) § 11, nor is proof of that fact beyond the record of the former conviction before the court, the two indictments having been tried on succeeding days before the same court, essential to justify the imposition of such punishment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1211;* Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 301-307; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Sumter County.

"To be officially reported."

W. P. Kelly was convicted of selling whisky, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John H. Clifton, for appellant. P. H. Stoll, for the State.

HYDRICK, J. This case was submitted at the November term, 1910. The appeal was dismissed without consideration of the merits, because appellant's attorney filed no argument. 71 S. E. 29. At the June term, 1911, appellant's attorney moved the court to reinstate the appeal. Having satisfactorily excused his failure to file an argument, the motion was granted, and he was allowed to file an argument.

The appeal was heard on the following agreed statement of facts: "That the defendant, W. P. Kelly, was tried on June 30, 1910, for selling whisky on October 15, 1909, and was tried on July 1, 1910, for selling whisky on June 23, 1910; the dates of the alleged sales being set out in the indictments, as above. There was a variance as to the date alleged in the indictment alleging October 15, 1909. The defendant was given an alternative sentence in the case tried June 30, 1910, and was sentenced in the case tried July 1, 1910, to one year's imprisonment; this offense being treated as the second or subsequent offense under Acts 1909, p. 64.

It is admitted that the counsel for the defendant contended in each case that, by reason of the act of 1909, the date of sale was material, and that it must be proved, and that the date of sale determined the second or subsequent offense, and not the trial of the offense. The trial judge held to the contrary. It is further agreed that, during the trial, commenced June 30, 1910, the following occurred: 'Mr. Clifton (during argument by the solicitor): We object to what the grand jury did. That is a one-sided investigation. The Court: The fact remains that the grand jury presented him. Mr. Clifton: We object to discussing what the grand jury did in the matter, because the defendant had no opportunity of meeting the witnesses there. We are willing to meet them all before this jury. Solicitor: I say the grand jury have done their duty, and the question is now up to you to decide.' It is agreed that the two cases against the defendant, Kelly, are to be heard on appeal together. It is further agreed that sentence in each case was pronounced on the same day, July 9, 1910, and that there was no allegation in either indictment that the offense therein referred to was a first, second, or subsequent offense, and that this objection was made by defendant's counsel before sentence."

Section 11 of the act of 1909 reads as follows: "Any person who violates any of the provisions of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, be fined in a sum not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five hundred dollars, or imprisoned at hard labor for a period of not less than three months, nor for more than one year; and for the second or any subsequent offense, upon conviction thereof, shall be imprisoned at hard labor for not less than one year nor more than five years."

To prevent confusion, we will dispose of the two cases separately.

Case Tried June 30, 1910.

[1] The first exception assigns error in not charging that, under the act of 1909, it was necessary for the state to allege and prove a particular date, because the act provides for an increase of the punishment for the second or any subsequent offense. That provision of the act does not change the well-settled rule that, where time is not of the essence of the offense charged, it is not necessary to prove the precise day alleged in the indictment, but proof that the offense was committed on any other day before the finding of the bill will be sufficient to sustain a conviction. State v. Anderson, 3 Rich. 172; State v. Prater, 59 S. C. 271, 37 S. E. 933; State v. Green, 61 S. C. 12, 39 S. E. 185.

[2] But, where it would not otherwise be so, time may be made an essential element of the offense by being made descriptive of it; in that event, the state must prove it as alleged. State v. Van Buren, 86 S. C. 297, 68 S. E. 568. But in the administration of the law, and in the application of that rule of evidence, care must always be taken to properly safeguard the right of the citizen that he shall neither be put in jeopardy nor punished twice for the same offense.

[3] In this state, each sale of whisky is a separate and distinct offense for which the guilty party may be convicted and punished. State v. Cassety, 1 Rich. 90; State v. Anderson, 3 Rich. 172; State v. Steedman, 8 Rich. 312.

[4] Therefore, when two or more offenses of the same character are alleged in different indictments, whether they are the same or different offenses may become a question of fact, to be tried by a jury, if demanded. State v. Dewees, 76 S. C. 72, 56 S. E. 674.

[5] It is stated in the record that there was a variance in the proof as to the date alleged in this indictment. But the extent of the variance is not stated. The proof of sales may have varied from the date alleged only one or two days, or as many weeks. The evidence is not before us, and we cannot say that the variance was prejudicial to any right of appellant. The burden is upon him to show that it was. Neither does the record state when the indictments were found—whether at the same or at different terms of court.

[6] The court charged that the jury might convict on proof of a sale on any day previous to the finding of the bill. If the bill in this case was found at the spring term and the other at the summer term, clearly the defendant was not prejudiced by that instruction. It is not only incumbent upon an appellant to show error, but he must also show that he was prejudiced by it. In State v. Hunter, 71 S. E. 823, filed July 3, 1911, the defendant was tried on two indictments at the same time, both of which were found at the same term. One charged him with selling liquor on the 11th and the other on the 15th of the same month. He was convicted on both. There was such a variance in the evidence that it would have been sufficient to sustain a conviction on either indictment. Therefore it was held that both convictions could not be sustained, and that it was proper to impose sentence in only one case.

The second exception complains of error and prejudice in the ruling of the court as to the remarks of the solicitor during his argument. We see nothing in either which could have prejudiced appellant's case.

Case Tried July 1, 1910.

The first and second exceptions in this case make the same point that was disposed of under the first exception in the other case.

[7] The third exception assigns error in imposing the punishment provided by the statute for a second or subsequent offense in this case, when there was no allegation in the indictment that it was a second or subsequent offense, and no proof of that fact. It is not necessary that the indictment should contain such an allegation. State v. Parris, 71 S. E. 808, filed July 3, 1911. The record of the former conviction was before the court, and, the defendant having been convicted for both offenses before the same judge, no further proof was necessary.

Affirmed.

SMITH v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 31, 1911.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 185*)—LIABILITY OF TERMINAL CARRIER—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where the terminal carrier received and delivered a part of a shipment, the presumption was that it received the entire shipment, and, to escape liability, it must rebut the presumption.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 837; Dec. Dig. § 185.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 171*)—SECONDARY EVIDENCE—CONTENTS OF WRITTEN INSTRUMENTS.

The testimony of a consignee, suing a terminal carrier for failure to deliver all the property described in the bill of lading, that in reliance on the bill he paid a draft drawn on him by the shipper, was admissible as against the objections that the draft was the best evidence, since parol evidence of a writing which is only collateral to the issue is admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 460, 528; Dec. Dig. § 171.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 228*)—TERMINAL CARRIER—ESTOPPEL—EVIDENCE.

Where the terminal carrier delivering to the consignee 127 hogs, while the bill of lading called for 157, sought to escape liability for the shortage by proving that the car contained only 127 hogs when received by it, evidence that the consignee in reliance on the bill of lading paid a draft drawn on him by the shipper for 157 hogs, was relevant on the issue of estoppel to deny the bill of lading.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 959; Dec. Dig. § 228.*]

4. CARRIERS (§ 52*)—BILL OF LADING—ESTOPPEL.

A carrier issuing a bill of lading for a specified quantity of freight is estopped to deny the receipt of such freight as against a consignee in good faith relying on the statement of the bill of lading, paying a draft drawn on him by the shipper for the quantity of freight designated in the bill of lading.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 150, 151; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

5. CARRIERS (§ 173*)—CONTRACTS BY INITIAL CARRIER—LIABILITY OF CONNECTING CARRIER.

Where a traffic agreement between initial and connecting carriers made them partners in the carriage of freight or agents of each other, the connecting carrier is estopped from denying the recitals in a bill of lading in any case the initial carrier is estopped.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 781; Dec. Dig. § 173.*]

6. PARTNERSHIP (§ 49*)—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 22*)—TRAFFIC ARRANGEMENTS BETWEEN CARRIERS—EVIDENCE.

A bill of lading issued by an initial carrier for through shipment, which discloses a traffic arrangement between it and the connecting carrier so as to make them partners in the transaction or agents of each other, is inadmissible against the connecting carrier to establish such relation because the bill is only the declaration of the initial carrier that such relation exists.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 67-73; Dec. Dig. § 49.* Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. § 40; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

7. CARRIERS (§ 185*)—INITIAL AND CONNECTING CARRIERS—TRAFFIC ARRANGEMENTS—EVIDENCE.

That a shipment was accepted and forwarded on a through rate does not prove the existence of a traffic arrangement between the initial and connecting carriers such as to make them partners in the transportation of the goods or as agents of each other, but it may be considered in connection with other evidence on the issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 848; Dec. Dig. § 185.*]

8. CARRIERS (§ 173*)—CONNECTING CARRIERS—LIABILITY.

A connecting carrier which has no traffic arrangement with an initial carrier so as to make the carriers partners or agents of each other, is not estopped by the recitals of a bill of lading issued by the initial carrier and it may show that the bill of lading erroneously states the quantity of freight received for transportation, the common law not imposing on the connecting carrier any liability for mistakes of the initial carrier in issuing bills of lading.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 781; Dec. Dig. § 173.*]

9. CARRIERS (§ 172*)—INTRASTATE COMMERCE—STATUTES—APPLICABILITY.

Act May 13, 1903 (24 St. at Large, p. 1), making connecting carriers agents of each other applies only to intrastate shipments.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 99, 743-746; Dec. Dig. § 172.*]

10. CARRIERS (§ 20*)—LOSS OF FREIGHT—STATUTORY PENALTY.

Under the statute authorizing the recovery of a penalty for a carrier's failure to pay loss of freight, one must show that the loss occurred while the freight was in possession of the carrier, and that he is entitled to the full amount of his claim.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 43, 44; Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Abbeville County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Enoch Smith against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Frank B. Gary, for appellant. Wm. N. Graydon, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. On January 28, 1909, M. A. Butler shipped a car load of hogs from Morrison, Tenn., to plaintiff at Columbia, S. C. The car passed over the lines of four connecting carriers, defendant being the last. The receiving carrier, the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway, issued a bill of lading, receipting for 157 hogs. When the car arrived at destination, it contained only 127 hogs. Plaintiff filed a claim with defendant for $150, for the loss of 30 hogs at $5 each, the value stipulated in the bill of lading, in case of loss. Defendant failing to pay the claim, this action was brought to recover the amount, together with $50, the statutory penalty for failure to pay the claim within the time prescribed by the statute.

[1] Having received and delivered part of the shipment, the presumption arose that defendant received the entire shipment. Walker v. Railway, 76 S. C. 308, 56 S. E. 952; Bradley v. Railroad Co., 77 S. C. 317, 57 S. E. 1101. But the presumption may be rebutted. Bradley v. Railway, supra; McMeekin v. Railway, 85 S. C. 381, 67 S. E. 745. Defendant undertook to rebut it, and discharge itself from liability by proving that the car contained only 127 hogs, when received by it, and introduced testimony tending to prove that fact. Plaintiff contended that defendant was estopped to deny the recital in the bill of lading that the car contained 157 hogs.

[2] Over defendant's objection, plaintiff was allowed to testify that, in reliance upon the bill of lading, he paid a draft made on him by Butler for 157 hogs. The contention that this evidence was incompetent, because the draft was the best evidence, cannot be sustained. The contents of the draft were not involved in the testimony. The mention of the draft was merely incidental, as showing the method of payment. But it was competent for plaintiff to say that he paid for 157 hogs, without reference to the mode of payment. Besides, parol evidence of a writing which is only collateral to the issue is admissible. Elrod v. Cochran, 59 S. C. 467, 38 S. E. 122.

[3] The other ground of objection that the evidence was irrelevant is also untenable. It was relevant upon the issue of estoppel.

[4] If defendant had issued the bill of lading, it would have been estopped to deny that the car contained 157 hogs, as against a consignee or transferee of it, who, in good faith relying upon the representation therein contained, had incurred loss or liability. Thomas v. Railroad Co., 85 S. C. 537, 64 S. E. 220, 67 S. E. 908.

[5] If there was a traffic arrangement between defendant and the initial carrier which would make them partners in the carriage of goods, or agents of each other, defendant would be estopped under the same facts which would raise an estoppel, if it had issued the bill of lading itself. Bradford v. Railroad Co., 7 Rich. 207, 62 Am. Dec. 411; 6 Cyc. 478. The act of the agent is the act of the principal. The bill of lading points to such an agreement.

[6] It does not purport to be an agreement only between the receiving carrier and the shipper, but it states that it is made between the receiving carrier and its connecting lines of the first part and the shipper of the second part; and it recites that the receiving carrier "and its connecting lines as common carriers transport live stock only as per above tariff." Throughout the agreement the receiving carrier and its connecting lines are referred to as the party of the first part. There are other features of the contract which point in the same direction. The bill of lading would, therefore, be evidence against the carrier which issued it that its connecting carriers were its agents. But it is no evidence against a connecting carrier, because it is only the declaration of the initial carrier that such relation exists.

[7] Neither does the fact that the shipment was accepted and forwarded on a through rate prove the existence of such relation, though that is a circumstance which may be considered in connection with other evidence upon the point. Bradley v. Railroad Co., supra.

[8] Where no such relation is proved as would entail liability on the connecting carrier for the conduct of the receiving carrier, the former is not estopped by the recitals in a bill of lading issued by the latter. In Lewis v. Railroad Co., 25 S. C. 249, it was held that the initial carrier could not, without special authority, make a contract binding upon the terminal carrier. The common law does not impose liability on a connecting carrier for the mistake of the initial carrier in issuing a bill of lading. Reynolds v. Railway, 81 S. C. 383, 62 S. E. 445.

[9] The act of 1903 (24 St. at Large, p. 1) makes connecting carriers agents of each other, but that act applies only to intrastate shipments. Venning v. Railway, 78 S. C. 42, 58 S. E. 983, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1217, 125 Am. St. Rep. 768. The burden was upon the plaintiff to prove the facts necessary to raise the estoppel. Having failed to prove the necessary relation between the receiving carrier and defendant, it follows that the court erred in charging the jury that if defendant accepted the shipment under the bill of lading, it was estopped to deny the recital therein.

[10] The court also erred in charging that, if plaintiff filed his claim with defendant's agent at Columbia, and defendant failed to pay it within 90 days, plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount of the claim and interest thereon, and $50 as penalty for defendant's failure to pay the claim within the time prescribed. Under the terms of the statute, plaintiff was not entitled to recover the penalty, unless he recovered the full amount of his claim; nor unless the claim was "for loss or damage to property while in the possession of such common carrier." Venning v. Railway, supra; McMeekin v. Railway, supra.

In legal actions, the Supreme Court cannot review the findings of the circuit court unless there is no evidence to support them.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1039*)—HARMLESS ERROR—RULINGS OF MASTER.

Error of the circuit court in overruling the ruling of a master in chancery in an action for damages for delay in transportation that defendant could show under the general denial that the delay was caused by an unusual amount of business was not prejudicial to defendant where the court in fact considered that defense, and sustained the master's finding that it was not sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1039.*]

4. CARRIERS (§ 176*)—FREIGHT—CONNECTING CARRIERS—DELAY IN DELIVERY.

The fact that a part of a delay in delivering freight occurred while it was in the possession of a terminal company at destination, would not relieve the delivering carrier from liability though such carrier charged and collected for delivery at the place of delivery and actually delivered it there, under Act May 13, 1903 (24 St. at Large, p. 1), making connecting carriers agents of each other, and making either liable for all damages for delay in delivery, etc., caused by any of them.

Where it was found, in an action for damages for delay in delivering cotton, that the price tended to decline from the time of the delivery until the cotton was actually sold, and that the loss sustained by plaintiff was greater than that actually proved, error in instructing that the measure of damages was the difference between the market price of cotton on the day the shipment should have been delivered and the day it was delivered was not prejudicial to defendant railroad company.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; Robt. Aldrich, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Actions by the Farmers' & Spinners' Company and by Middleton & Ravenel against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. From judgments for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Mordecai & Gadsden and Rutledge & Haggood, for appellant. Legare & Holman, for respondents.

HYDRICK, J. These actions were brought to recover damages for unreasonable delay in the transportation and delivery of cotton consigned to plaintiffs, who are engaged in the business of buying and selling cotton. The complaint contained the usual allegations in such cases. The answer was a general denial.

[1] It will be observed that these are actions at law, in which this court has no jurisdiction to review the findings of the circuit court, unless there is no evidence to support them, and none of them are questioned on that ground. The issues of law and fact were referred to the master, whose report, in favor of plaintiffs, was confirmed and made the judgment of the court.

The master ruled that, under the general denial, defendant could avail itself of the defense that the delay was caused by a sudden and unusual press of business, arising from exceptional causes, which it could not reasonably be expected to have anticipated. But, having admitted the evidence on that issue he held that it failed to establish the defense. The plaintiffs did not except to the ruling of the master that the defense was available to defendant under the pleadings. The defendant did except to his finding that it was not sustained by the evidence. The circuit court sustained the master's finding, but held, also, that the defense could not avail defendant, because it had not been pleaded.

[2] The ruling of the master, to which no exception was taken, concluded the question, and became the law of these cases whether he was right or wrong. But see Gibson v. R. Co., 88 S. C. 360, 70 S. E. 1030.

[3] However, the error of the circuit court, in overruling the master on that point, was not prejudicial to defendant, because the court did consider the defense on its merits and sustained the master's finding that it was not established by the evidence.

The cotton was consigned to plaintiffs at Charleston. Defendant's freight depot is at Chapel street, about one mile from the wharf of the Charleston Compress, at which point, the master finds it was, and for several years had been, the invariable custom of defendant to deliver cotton, consigned to plaintiffs and others at Charleston. The wharf was reached over the rails of the Charleston Terminal Company, with which defendant had an agreement for the transportation of cotton to the wharf, defendant paying the Terminal Company eight cents per bale out of the freight charges paid by the shippers. In other words, defendant charged and collected a rate for the delivery of the cotton at the Charleston Compress, and actually delivered it there. These findings dispose of the assignment of error in holding that the wharf was the place of delivery.

[4] But, even if part of the delay did occur while the cotton was in the possession of the Terminal Company, the defendant would be liable for such delay, under the act of 1903, without regard to the facts above stated. 24 St. at Large, p. 1; Venning v. R. Co., 78 S. C. 42, 58 S. E. 983, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1217, 125 Am. St. Rep. 768; Reynolds v. Railway, 81 S. C. 383, 62 S. E. 445. There is no force in the contention that the agreement to deliver at the wharf was a separate contract and should have been sued on in a separate action, because the court found that the agreement to deliver at Charleston was, in contemplation of the parties, an agreement to deliver at the wharf in Charleston.

[5] In view of the finding that the price of cotton continued to decline from the time delivery of the consignments in these cases was made, until the cotton was actually sold, and the finding that the loss sustained by plaintiffs was greater than that actually proved, there was no prejudicial error in holding that the measure of damages in these cases was the difference between the market price of cotton on the day the shipments should have been delivered and the day they were delivered. It is not necessary, therefore, to consider whether the rule stated for the measure of damages in these cases is one to be applied in all cases for delay in the delivery of freight.

WARREN et al. v. WILSON.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 6, 1911.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 832*)—REHEARING—GROUNDS—DEFECTS RELATING TO RECORD.

Where a case was reversed and remanded on two different assignments of error, that one assignment of error was sustained, under a misapprehension of the state of the record, cannot change the result or warrant a rehearing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3215-3228; Dec. Dig. § 832.*]

On petition for rehearing. Dismissed.

For former opinion, see 71 S. E. 818.

PER CURIAM. This is a petition for rehearing, one of the grounds being as follows: "Because the Supreme Court overlooked and disregarded a material fact, when it decided that the circuit judge erred in not allowing the plaintiffs to introduce in evidence a written title deed, not signed, to the premises, the subject of the action, from G. H. Warren to G. L. Warren, dated the 22d day of November, 1904, alleged to have been written by the defendant."

Prior to the hearing of the case in the Supreme Court on the merits, plaintiffs' attorneys made a motion to recommit the case, for the purpose of amending the record in certain particulars, one of which was by inserting the statement mentioned in the opinion touching this question. All the proposed amendments were allowed except that which sought a correction of the record, regarding the refusal to allow the introduction in evidence of the unsigned deed. The writer of the opinion was under the erroneous impression that it had been allowed. This error cannot, however, have the effect of changing the conclusion announced in the opinion, as there was another assignment of error, which was sustained, as to which no material question of law or of fact was either overlooked or disregarded. The opinion was not erroneous in any other respect than that hereinbefore mentioned.

It is therefore ordered that the appeal be dismissed, and that the order heretofore granted staying the remittitur be revoked.

HYDRICK, J., did not sit in this case.

ROOKARD v. ATLANTA & C. AIR LINE RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 24, 1911.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 883*)—SET-OFF OF JUDGMENTS—COSTS.

Civ. Code 1902, § 2852, requires every action for death to be for the benefit of decedent's wife or husband and child, and provides that the amount recovered shall be divided among all parties in such shares that they would have been entitled to if decedent had died intestate, and the amount recovered had been personal assets of his estate, and section 2853 makes the administrator, plaintiff in the action, liable to costs upon verdict for defendant or nonsuit out of intestate's property, if any, "and if none, out of the proper goods and chattels of such executor and administrator"; the quoted words being omitted by amendment of 1903 (24 St. at Large, p. 96). Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 330, provides that in an action prosecuted by an administrator, etc., costs shall be recovered as in an action by or against a person prosecuting or defending in his own right, which costs shall be chargeable only upon the estate or party represented, unless the court directs them to be paid by plaintiff or defendant personally for bad faith in the action. Held, in an administrator's action for death by wrongful act, decedent leaving no estate, that judgment for defendant for the costs of an appeal could be deducted from the amount recovered by plaintiff at a subsequent trial.

2. STATUTES (§ 225*)—CONSTRUCTION—RELATED STATUTES.

All sections of a statute relating to the same subject which were re-enacted in the Code should be construed together so as to harmonize them, if possible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 303; Dec. Dig. § 225.*]

3. STATUTES (§ 159*)—REPEAL—CONFLICTING STATUTES.

Where two statutes conflict, the last enacted controls.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 229, 231; Dec. Dig. § 159.*]

4. JUDGMENT (§ 883*)—SET-OFF OF JUDGMENTS—PROCEEDINGS.

Defendant, in a death action by an administrator, need not serve a rule requiring plaintiff to show cause why defendant's judgment for costs on a former appeal should not be set off against plaintiff's judgment on a second trial, upon the widow and children, the parties ultimately entitled to the fund; they being represented by the administrator.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1682; Dec. Dig. § 883.*]

5. EXEMPTIONS (§ 113*)—NATURE OF PROCEEDING—SET-OFF.

Under the Constitution and laws providing that $500 worth of personalty shall be exempt from "attachment, levy and sale under any mesne or final process" issued to the head of a family, a judgment for defendant for the costs of an appeal, upon reversing a judgment for plaintiff in an administrator's action for negligent death, cannot be set off against the interests of intestate's widow and children in a subsequent judgment for plaintiff, an order of set-off being merely another mode of execution, and hence their interests are exempt, they being heads of families, the principle that one seeking equity must do equity not applying, because such persons are not actively invoking the aid of equity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exemptions, Cent. Dig. § 134; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

6. EXEMPTIONS (§ 4*)—CONSTRUCTION—STATUTES.

As a rule, exemption statutes are considered remedial and are liberally construed to advance the remedy and suppress the mischief.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exemptions, Cent. Dig. § 4; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

7. JUDGMENT (§ 883*)—SET-OFF—NATURE OF RIGHT.

Jurisdiction to set off one judgment against another is equitable in its nature and should be exercised to do justice; motions for set-off being addressed to the court's sound discretion to be exercised according to settled rules.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 1669-1688; Dec. Dig. § 883.*]

8. EXEMPTIONS (§ 16*)—PERSONS ENTITLED—HEADS OF FAMILIES.

A judgment for defendant, in an administrator's death action for the costs of an appeal, may be set off pro tanto against the interests of an infant nonresident child and of two infant children born since intestate's death; they not coming within the exemption statutes as heads of families, though the interest of the widow and other children are exempt as heads of families, and any apparent injustice not preventing such set-off.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; W. B. Gruber, Judge. "To be officially reported."

Action by Furman Rookard, as administrator, against the Atlanta & Charlotte Air Line

Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Sanders & De Pass, for appellant. S. G. Finley and H. K. Osborne, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. [1] Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages of defendant for the wrongful death of his intestate, Daniel Brown. He recovered a judgment for $2,000, which was reversed on appeal, and a new trial was granted. 84 S. C. 190, 65 S. E. 1047, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 435, 137 Am. St. Rep. 839. Thereafter defendant entered judgment against plaintiff for $142.75, the costs and disbursements of the appeal. On the second trial, plaintiff recovered judgment for $500. Thereupon defendant obtained a rule requiring plaintiff to show cause why defendant's judgment should not be set off against plaintiff's judgment, in satisfaction thereof, pro tanto. For cause, plaintiff alleged: That his intestate left no property or estate; that he left a widow and five children, for whose benefit the action was brought; that, under the terms of the statute under which the action was brought, the widow and children are entitled to the amount recovered in their own right; that the widow and two of the children are the heads of families residing in this state, and have no property other than their respective interests in this judgment, which are therefore exempt to them, as heads of families, under the Constitution and statutes.

The circuit court held that sections 2852 and 2853, 1 Code 1902, under which the action was brought, express the legislative intent that the amount recovered in such actions shall belong exclusively to the parties mentioned therein, for whose benefit they are brought, without being liable to diminution for costs or any other charges, and dismissed the rule. Section 2852, in so far as it is pertinent to the present inquiry, reads: "Every such action shall be for the benefit of the wife or husband and child, or children of the person whose death shall have been so caused. * * * And the amount so recovered shall be divided among the before-mentioned parties, in such shares as they would have been entitled to if the deceased had died intestate and the amount recovered had been personal assets of his or her estate." Section 2853 provides that: "The executor or administrator, plaintiff in the action, shall be liable to costs, in case there shall be a verdict for the defendant, or nonsuit or discontinuance, out of the goods, chattels and lands of the testator, or intestate, if any, and if none, then out of the proper goods and chattels of such executor and administrator." The words of the section italicized were left out by the amendatory act of 1903 (24 Stat. p. 96), which seems to have been overlooked on circuit.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

We agree with the circuit court that the statute plainly expresses the intent that the amount recovered in such actions shall belong to the persons for whose benefit they are brought; and that, although the statute provides that the action shall be brought in the name of the executor or administrator of the deceased, the amount recovered shall, nevertheless, not be assets of his estate, so as to be liable to the demands of the creditors thereof. We agree, also, that by the terms of section 2853 the decedent's estate is primarily liable for costs in the cases mentioned therein. It does not follow, however, that the amount recovered must, in all cases and under all circumstances, be distributed among the persons entitled thereto without any diminution for costs or other charges; and we do not think the statute expresses any such intent. Nor do we think that conclusion must necessarily be inferred from the provision making the estates of decedents primarily liable for costs in such actions. Such a construction of the statute would, in some cases, work results so inequitable and unjust that nothing short of an unequivocal expression of such an intent would induce the court to adopt it. In cases, such as this, where the decedent left no estate whatever, the necessary costs and expenses of administration, and such as the administrator must necessarily incur in the prosecution of the action, must be paid out of the amount recovered, or not at all. The court would certainly not require the amount recovered to be distributed among the persons entitled without first requiring the payment of the costs and expenses without which nothing could have been recovered. But, aside from this construction of the sections above quoted, ample authority is found in section 330 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902 for the payment of such costs out of the amount collected. That section reads: "In an action prosecuted or defended by an executor, administrator, trustee of an express trust, or a person expressly authorized by statute, costs shall be recovered, as in an action by and against a person prosecuting or defending in his own right; but such costs shall be chargeable only upon or collected of the estate, fund, or party represented, unless the court shall direct the same to be paid by the plaintiff or defendant personally, for mismanagement or bad faith in such action or defense."

[2] All the sections above cited were re-enacted in the codification of 1902, and should therefore be construed together so as to harmonize them, if possible. But there was irreconcilable conflict between the provisions of section 2853 and section 330 prior to the amendment of section 2853, hereinbefore referred to, whereby the words of that section, which made the executor or administrator personally liable for costs in the cases therein mentioned, were omitted; because the one made an executor or administrator personally liable for costs, if there were no assets of his decedent's estate, while the other exempted him from liability, unless he was made so by direction of the court for mismanagement or bad faith.

[3] So long as that conflict existed, the provisions of section 380 prevailed, because they were enacted in 1870, subsequent to the enactment of section 2853, in 1859. Insurance Co. v. Bradley, 83 S. C. 427, 65 S. E. 433. But that conflict was removed by the amendment of 1903, so that now the executor or administrator is not personally liable for costs in such cases, except when made so by direction of court for mismanagement or bad faith under the authority of section 330. Therefore, in cases like this, if such costs and expenses as may be incurred by the executor or administrator in the prosecution of the action cannot be collected out of the estate, fund, or party represented, they must go unpaid. We do not think the Legislature intended any such result.

[4] The contention of respondent that the parties ultimately entitled to the fund should have been brought before the court by service of the rule upon them cannot be sustained. They are represented by the administrator, under the authority of the statute; and, in the absence of any showing of fraud or collusion on his part, it is not necessary that they be otherwise before the court than as represented by him.

[5] It remains to inquire whether the interests of the widow and two of the sons of decedent are exempt to them respectively, as heads of families, under the Constitution and laws of this state, which provide that $500 worth of personal property shall be "exempt from attachment, levy and sale under any mesne or final process, issued from any court, to the head of any family residing in this state." Appellant contends that an order requiring one judgment to be set off against another would not violate the provision of the Constitution above quoted, because it is neither an attachment, levy, or sale of property, under any mesne or final process issued from any court. Upon a strict construction of the Constitution, such an order would not violate its letter; but it would, in many cases, violate its spirit and intent. The words attachment, levy, and sale were used in the Constitution and statutes, because the methods thereby indicated are the ones most usually adopted in the application of a debtor's property to the payment of his debts. An order of set-off is merely another mode of execution whereby the debtor's property is applied to the satisfaction of his debts. We feel quite sure the lawmakers never intended for this benign provision of the law to be set at naught by such a literal construction, and we are not inclined to adopt it.

[6] With few exceptions, the courts have held that exemption laws are remedial in their nature and should receive a liberal construction—such as will advance the remedy and suppress the mischief intended. In the case of Harley v. Weathersbee, 21 S. C. 243, cited and relied upon by appellant, the court does seem to give the exemption provisions of the Constitution and statute the strict construction contended for by appellant. But such a construction was not necessary to the decision in that case; and, in the case of Norton v. Bradham, subsequently decided and reported in the same volume at page 378, the court expressly held that these provisions of the Constitution and laws must be liberally construed, and, in that case, a very liberal construction of them was necessary to the conclusion reached.

[7] The jurisdiction of the court to set off one judgment against another is equitable in its nature, and should be exercised so as to do justice between parties. It is not founded on any statute or fixed rule of court, but grows out of the inherent equitable jurisdiction which the court exercises over suitors in it. Such motions are therefore addressed to the discretion of the court—a discretion which is not arbitrarily or capriciously exercised, but according to settled principles. Ex parte Hiers, 67 S. C. 114, 45 S. E. 146, 100 Am. St. Rep. 713, and cases cited. When it would result inequitably, set-off should be refused. On the other hand, it should be allowed, when justice requires it, unless the court is compelled to refuse it in obedience to some provision of the Constitution or statutes. The judgment in this case does not stand in the place of or represent exempt property, as did the judgments in those cases relied on by respondent, many of which are cited in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Lamm in the case of Caldwell v. Ryan, 210 Mo. 17, 108 S. W. 533, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 494, 124 Am. St. Rep. 717. The motion cannot be refused on that ground. Until the judgment was obtained, there was nothing in which any of the heirs of decedent could claim any exemption. The moment it was obtained, the protecting shield of the Constitution was thrown around it in so far as the heads of families had any interest in it. Appellant contends that, in the effort to recover the judgment—that is, to create or bring into existence something which they could claim as property and in which the heads of families could claim an exemption—an obligation was incurred which justice demands should be satisfied out of the property so brought into existence, and that this may be done, notwithstanding the exemption, in analogy to the principle that he who seeks equity must do equity, a principle which has been held, under some circumstances, to be paramount to the right of exemption. Hallman v. George, 70 S. C. 408, 50 S. E. 24; Small v. Usher, 77 S. C. 112, 57 S. E. 623.

The principle is inapplicable in this case, because the parties against whom it is invoked are not seeking equity. They are not seeking anything. They are passive—simply trying to hold what they have, and some of them have interposed the exemption of the Constitution as a shield against defendant's claim. There is no principle upon which defendant's judgment can be set off against their interests without violating the Constitution, and, as to their interests, the motion was properly refused.

[8] But there is no sound principle on which the set-off can be refused in so far as the interests of those who are not entitled to the protection of the Constitution are affected. Of these, one is not a resident of the state, and two are infants, born since the death of the intestate. Respondent contends that it would be inequitable that their interests alone should be set off and thereby be made to satisfy the whole of defendant's judgment; that, so far as the infants are concerned, the result would be that those who are most entitled to the protection of the humane provisions of the statute under which the action was brought will be wholly deprived of it. That result may be unfortunate; but it cannot be said to be unjust or inequitable, any more than it can be said to be unjust or inequitable for the heads of families to be allowed an exemption when others are not. It is no more unjust than in any other case where a judgment creditor collects the whole of his judgment out of one or more joint debtors, while others equally liable under the judgment escape by reason of the exemption of their property. Suppose the infants were the sole beneficiaries of the judgment, upon what principle could the set-off be refused? Defendant's judgment should have been set off against the interests of those beneficiaries under the judgment who are not heads of families in satisfaction thereof pro tanto.

HARTZ v. SOBEL et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. WILLS (§ 174*)—PARTIAL REVOCATION—ACT CONSTITUTING REVOCATION.

A testatrix, after the execution of her will, cut therefrom two items giving bequests of money, and cut from another item, in which a bequest of money had been given to two of her nephews, the name of one of them, and also cut out the name of the same nephew as an executor, and removed other words, and pluralized letters which showed that there were more legatees than one in the last-mentioned bequest and more executors than one nominated. The will was propounded without such parts which had been cut therefrom. Evidence was introduced to show that the testatrix did not intend to revoke the entire will, but only to revoke the parts eliminated therefrom, and that she retained the instrument, after such cutting, as being her will. Held, that under the statute of this state a revocation of a will pro tanto by canceling, obliterating, or destroying such part is not authorized.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 453; Dec. Dig. § 174.*]

2. WILLS (§ 174*)—REVOCATION—ACT CONSTITUTING REVOCATION.

Under the facts stated in the preceding headnote, if the testatrix did not intend to revoke the entire will, but only the particular legacies and the appointment of the executor, which were cut therefrom, a revocation of the entire will would not result as matter of law from such cutting.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 453; Dec. Dig. § 174.*]

3. WILLS (§ 234*)—PROBATE—WILL PARTLY DESTROYED.

If a will was duly executed, and when propounded for probate it appeared that certain words had been cut from it by the testatrix, with a view to making a pro tanto revocation only as to three bequests of money and the appointment of a certain executor, and it could be shown what such words were, they could be restored by evidence, and the will as originally executed admitted to probate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 563; Dec. Dig. § 234.*]

4. WILLS (§ 234*)—PROBATE—WILL PARTLY DESTROYED.

Under such circumstances, a legatee whose name was thus cut from the will may, when the will is propounded, enter a caveat to its being probated in its incomplete condition, and may plead and prove what were the words removed from the will, and pray that it be probated as originally executed. He is not compelled to merely file a caveat to the probating of the will as propounded, and then in a separate litigation propound the same will with the addition of the missing words and clauses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 563; Dec. Dig. § 234.*]

5. WILLS (§ 376*)—PROBATE—PROCEEDINGS ON APPEAL.

As the person claiming to be a legatee could intervene in the court of ordinary and set up the contentions stated in the preceding headnote, he could do so in the superior court, after the case had been carried thereto by appeal from the court of ordinary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 842; Dec. Dig. § 376.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

6. WILLS (§ 174*)—REVOCATION—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—"MATERIAL."

In Civ. Code 1910, § 3919, providing that the intention to cancel a will will be presumed from the obliteration or canceling of a material portion of the will, "material" does not mean essential, but means important; more or less necessary; having influence or effect; going to the merits; having to do with matter, as distinguished from form.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Judge.

Proceedings by Morris A. Hartz for probate in solemn form of the will of Mrs. Minnie Cave. Sarah Sobel and others filed a caveat. From a judgment for the caveators, the propounder brings error. Reversed.

Morris A. Hartz propounded for probate in solemn form an instrument as the last will and testament of Mrs. Minnie Cave. Certain persons, as heirs at law of the decedent, filed a caveat on the grounds that the decedent did not execute the will propounded; that it was never signed by her and attested by subscribing witnesses; that she revoked the will made by her on March 31, 1908, by mutilating it, with intention to revoke it; and that the mutilation consisted in cutting out of the will and removing and destroying certain portions, namely, item 10, item 11, and certain words and letters in two other items, eliminating her nephew, Sidney L. Hartz, as a legatee and also as an executor. The case was carried to the superior court by appeal. In that court Sidney L. Hartz, claiming to be an heir at law of the decedent, and a beneficiary under the will, filed an intervention, in which he entered a caveat to the petition for the propounding of the will as offered. Attached to this intervention was a copy of the will as it was claimed to have existed before any change was made in it; and it was prayed that it, the will, be admitted to record as originally executed.

The original caveator demurred to this intervention, on the following grounds: (1) The superior court is without jurisdiction to entertain a petition for the probate of a will, and the intervention seeks to probate an alleged will which has never been offered in the court of ordinary, which alone has jurisdiction to entertain a petition for probate. (2) The intervention is not germane to the proceeding, which is a petition for probate in solemn form of another and distinct paper, alleged to be the last will and testament of the decedent. (3) The sole issue is whether or not the paper offered for probate by Morris A. Hartz is the last will and testament of the decedent; and the intervention can not set up for probate any other will than that offered by the propounder. (4) Sidney L. Hartz appears as the caveator in the proceeding of Morris A. Hartz to propound a certain will, and he cannot be both a caveator and a propounder in the same proceeding. The court sustained the demurrer, in so far as the intervention sought to set up another will and place Sidney L. Hartz on the side of the propounder. To this he excepted.

The case then proceeded to trial. The evidence showed the following facts: On March 31, 1908, Mrs. Cave executed a will. She died on August 12, 1909. A few days before her death she stated that she intended that Morris Hartz should manage her affairs; that the conduct of Sidney Hartz was unbearable to her; and that she considered that he had disgraced the family and she would not recognize him in any way whatever. To another witness she stated (referring to a paper which she had in her hand): "This is my will, and I have made all the changes in it I want to do." In speaking of the changes which she had made, she said: "I have one particularly. I have cut Sidney Hartz out." She frequently expressed the desire to have her will opened before she was buried. After she died, search was made for it, and in a desk in her room, near her bed, was found an envelope, tied with a string, and having indorsed on it, "The last will and testament of Mrs. Minnie Cave, to be opened before her burial." The desk was one which was kept locked, and to which the decedent kept the key while she lived. In the same envelope with the will were two slips of paper containing memoranda in reference to the inscription to be placed on the tomb of the decedent and that of her deceased husband.

The will as offered for probate provided, in the first and second items, for the payment of the debts of the testatrix, and her burial. The third, fourth, and fifth items contained bequests to charitable institutions. The sixth item was as follows: "I give and bequeath to my nephew Morris A. Hartz, child of my brother, John Hartz, lately deceased, the sum of five thousand dollars absolutely." (The spaces marked represent holes in the paper, which had been cut out with some sharp instrument.) The seventh, eighth, and ninth items contained specific bequests to relatives. Then came another opening caused by cutting something from the paper. Then followed an item numbered 12, which contained a residuary clause, leaving the residuum of the estate to a brother and sister, and the children of another brother and another sister of the testatrix. The thirteenth item nominated an executor and conferred certain powers upon him. Here again the will had been cut. As offered for probate, it began as follows: "I hereby nominate and appoint as executor of this my last will and testament, my nephew Morris A. Hartz, giving full power and authority, whenever in judgment it may be necessary," etc. Later in the item reference was made more than once to the "executors."

It was proved that the will had been written on a typewriter, and a carbon copy of it as it was when signed had been preserved, which showed that when the will was signed it did not have the parts cut from it, and also showed what it contained at that time. Item 6, as it originally stood, read as follows: "I give and bequeath to my nephews, Morris A. Hartz, and Sidney L. Hartz, children of my brother, John Hartz, lately deceased, each the sum of five thousand dollars absolutely." Item 10 contained a bequest of $1,000 to a friend of the testatrix, and item 11 contained a bequest of $100 to an employé. The thirteenth item began as follows: "I nominate and appoint as executors of this my last will and testament, my nephews, Morris A. Hartz and Sidney L. Hartz, giving them full power and authority, whenever in their judgment it may be necessary," etc.

At the close of the testimony, the presiding judge directed a verdict in favor of the caveators. The propounder moved for a new trial, which was refused, and he excepted.

Miller & Jones and Hall & Fowler, for plaintiff in error. Hardeman, Jones, Callaway & Johnston, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). The testatrix, after executing a will, cut from it with some sharp instrument two items and also certain words. When the will was propounded for probate, there were vacant places where these words had been, but the will as presented was connected and expressed a complete testamentary scheme without the omitted words and items. By witnesses it was shown that a carbon copy of the will, except as to the signature and attestation, had been preserved. From this it appeared that the two items which had been cut out gave two legacies of $1,000 and $100, respectively, but did not affect the general testamentary purpose. The words which were cut from the will eliminated one of the nephews of the testatrix from an item where there was bequeathed to two of her nephews the sum of $5,000 each, and also eliminated him from the clause appointing executors, leaving the bequest and appointment to stand as to the other nephew. The evidence strongly indicated that the testatrix did not intend to cancel or revoke her entire will, but only in the particulars mentioned, and that she preserved it and regarded it as her will in force after she had cut the words from it.

1-3. A will does not confer any present right at the time of its execution. Until the death of the testator, it has been called ambulatory. It has been compared to an undelivered deed or power of attorney, which contains an expression of a purpose which has not gone into effect. In the absence of all statutory regulation, it would be revocable by any act or declaration that the purpose of the testator had changed, and that the paper no longer expressed his testamentary wish. This would, of course, leave wills open to attack by parol to a dangerous extent. To guard against such latitude, statutes have been passed; and acts which will revoke a will must be such as the statute permits.

Revocation may be implied or express. In the former case it results from certain changes in the testator's circumstances, from which the law infers or presumes that he intended a change, either total or partial, in the disposition of his property. An express revocation arises from some act on the part of the testator, done for the purpose of destroying the effect of the will in whole or in part; or from making some other will or codicil differing in whole or in part from the disposition previously made; or a partial revocation may be made by conveying the devised property, and thus withdrawing it from the operation of the will. The English statute of frauds (29 Charles II) contained the following provision: "No devise in writing of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, nor any clause thereof, shall be revocable otherwise than by some other will or codicil in writing, or other writing declaring the same, or by burning, canceling, tearing, or obliterating the same by the testator himself, or in his presence and by his directions and consent." This recognized the power to revoke a will wholly or partially; it having been held that the words "any clause" were not restricted to an entire item or complete dispositive clause. The burning, cancellation, tearing, or obliteration was not obliged to be attested. Under this provision, by the erasure, cancellation, or obliteration of the name of an executor or of a devisee, the will was not entirely revoked, but only partly so, and the remainder of it stood unaffected. 1 Jarman on Wills (5th Am. Ed.) 282 (*129), 291 (*134); Id. (6th Eng. Ed., by Sweet and Sanger) 143 et seq.; Short v. Smith, 4 East, 418 (New Ed. 489); Larkins v. Larkins, 3 Bos. & Pul. 14; Swinton v. Bailey, L. R. 4 App. Cas. 70.

By statute 1 Vict. c. 26, it was enacted that: "No will or codicil, or any part thereof, shall be revoked otherwise than as aforesaid [that is by marriage], or by another will or codicil executed in manner heretofore required, or by some writing declaring an intention to revoke the same, and executed in the manner in which a will is heretofore required to be executed, or by the burning, tearing, or otherwise destroying the same by the testator, or by some person in his presence and by his direction, with the intention of revoking the same." The next section contained the statement that "no obliteration, interlineation, or other alteration, made in any will after the execution thereof, shall be valid or have any effect, except so far as the words or effect of the will before such alteration shall not be apparent, unless such alteration shall be executed in like manner as heretofore is required for the execution of the will," etc. Under this statute, where a testatrix duly executed her will, and some time afterward cut out, with a pair of scissors, the name of the person appointed executor, and stated that she had "cut G. P. out of her will," it was held that the will was only partially revoked, and that it was entitled to probate in the state in which it was found at the death of the testatrix. In the Goods of Leach, 63 L. T. R. (N. S.) 111; Goods of Taylor, Id. 230.

In the United States, where the English common law and the statute of frauds have been adopted, unless altered by statute, the rule as to the total or partial revocation of a will remains in force. In some of the state statutes have been adopted restricting the partial revocation of a will by means of interlineation, obliteration, tearing, or alteration. In some instances partial revocation in this manner is expressly prohibited; in others the statute makes provision for the revocation of a will in its entirety by such means, omitting any reference to revocation of a clause or part of it. Where such statutes have been enacted, it has been held by several courts that a partial revocation by canceling, erasing, obliterating, or tearing the name of a devisee or other words will not operate as a good partial revocation. It has also been held in several cases that, where the words thus sought to be revoked can be ascertained from the face of the will, the attempted revocation of them will be disregarded, and the will be probated as it was executed.

In Minnesota the statute (Gen. St. 1866, c. 47, § 9) provided that: "No will, nor any part thereof, shall be revoked, unless by burning, tearing, canceling, or obliterating same, with the intention of revoking it, by the testator, or by some person in his presence and by his direction; or by some will, codicil, or other writing, signed, attested, and subscribed in the manner provided for the execution of a will." A testator made certain erasures and interlineations in a duly executed will. They were so made that there was no difficulty in reading the will as it was originally written. After he made the alterations, at his request, two persons signed the will as witnesses to "the erasures and interlineations made by the testator." What such erasures and interlineations were the witnesses did not know. It was held that the alterations did not supersede the provisions of the will; that the witnessing of such alterations did not amount to an attestation of the will as altered; and that the alterations did not operate as a revocation of the original will. Penniman's Will, 20 Minn. 245 (Gil. 220) 18 Am. St. Rep. 368.

In Illinois the statute (Rev. St. 1845, c. 109, § 15) provided that: "No will, testament, or codicil shall be revoked, otherwise than by burning, canceling, tearing, or obliterating same by the testator himself, or in his presence, by his direction and consent, or by some other will, testament, or codicil in writing, declaring the same signed by the testator or testatrix, in the presence of two or more witnesses, and by them attested in his or her presence." A testator, after the publication of his will, sent for the executor and custodian of it, and informed him that he (the testator) wished to alter his will so that A. should have a tract of land devised therein to B. The executor, at the instance of the testator, canceled the name of B. by drawing a line through it with a pen, leaving the name still legible, and interlined over it the name of A., so that the devise read to A. but the will, as altered, was never republished or attested by two witnesses in the presence of the testator. It was held that the alteration in favor of A. was inoperative, for want of attestation; and that, when the testator directed the erasure of the name of a devisee and the interlineation of the name of another person, with intent not to revoke the devise itself, but simply to substitute another devisee in place of the original one, which was done by drawing a pen through the original name, but leaving it still legible, and the alteration failed for want of a new attestation, the erasure of the name of the original devisee did not amount to a revocation of the devise to her. Wolf v. Bollinger, 62 Ill. 368. This decision was not based solely on the inability to revoke pro tanto, but the doctrine of dependent relative revocation was invoked.

In Ohio the statute (Rev. St. 1890, § 5953) reads as follows: "A will shall be revoked by the testator tearing, canceling, obliterating, or destroying the same, with the intention of revoking it, by the testator himself, or by some person in his presence, or by his direction," etc. It was held that, under this section, a clause of a will could not be revoked by the testator by drawing ink lines through the words thereof, with an intent to revoke such clause, but with no intent to revoke the whole will. It was said that "in such case, when the words of such clause remain legible, the whole will should be admitted to probate, including such erased clause as a valid part of such will." Giffin v. Brooks, 48 Ohio St. 211, 31 N. E. 743.

In New York the statute (2 Rev. St. [1st Ed.] pt. 2, c. 6, tit. 1, § 42) enacted that: "No will in writing, nor any part thereof, shall be revoked or altered, otherwise than by some other will in writing, or some other writing of the testator declaring such revocation or alteration, and executed with the same formalities with which the will itself was required, by law, to be executed; or unless such will be burnt, torn, canceled, obliterated or destroyed with the intent and for the purpose of revoking the same," etc. The testatrix, after executing her will, obliterated the second and fourth clauses thereof, with the intention to revoke them. The words were still apparent and legible. The surrogate directed the whole will, including these clauses, to be admitted to probate. The Court of Appeals sustained this ruling. Their decision was largely based on the fact that an earlier statute, similar to the English statute of frauds, had been repealed, and another enacted in its stead; that the later statute, in the first clause quoted, dealt with revocation by testamentary writing, and referred expressly to a revocation of the will, or "any part thereof"; that the second clause dealt with a revocation of "such will" by burning, tearing, canceling, obliterating, or destroying, "with the intent and for the purpose of revoking the same"; and that this difference in language indicated a legislative intent to allow a partial revocation in writing, but not by means of burning, tearing, canceling, obliterating, or destroying, which applied only to the whole will. Lovell v. Quitman, 88 N. Y. 377, 42 Am. Rep. 254.

In Alabama the statute (Code 1886, § 1908) provided that, except in cases of marriage and birth of issue, "a will in writing can only be revoked by burning, tearing, canceling, or obliterating the same, with the intention of revoking it," etc. After the execution of a will, the testator erased the name of one of the legatees by drawing a pen through it. Evidence was offered to show that at the time of erasing the name and afterward the testator made declarations to the effect that he intended to revoke the will because he was not satisfied with it. The court of probate excluded these declarations, and charged that if the name of a legatee was erased with the intention to revoke the will only as to him, and not as to other legatees named, this was not a revocation of the will as to them. The Supreme Court held that the declarations of the testator were admissible; that whether he intended to revoke the whole will or only the part of it, making a certain person the legatee, was a question for the jury; that if the erasure was made with the intention to revoke the whole will, and, when explained by the declarations of the testator, was so material as to justify the inference of an intention to revoke the entire instrument, it would be effectual for that purpose; and that, if the intention was only to revoke the will pro tanto, so as to expunge the name of a legatee, the erasure was inoperative for such purpose. Law v. Law, 83 Ala. 432, 3 South. 752.

In Maryland the statute (Code 1878, art. 49, § 5) declared that "no devise in writing of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any clause thereof shall be revocable," except in the manner designated. A testator left 10 children. By his will he directed that his estate should be divided into 10 equal parts or shares, and he gave to all his children life estates in their respective shares, with remainders over to their children, except two named sons, to whom he gave their respective shares absolutely. They were also made executors of the will, and trustees of the other estates. After the execution of the will, the testator erased the names of these two sons, wherever they occurred, by drawing a line through them with his pen, but leaving the names legible. The erasures operated to confer estates in fee simple on all the sons. It was held that the attempted obliterations were inoperative, and that the will should be read as it was originally written and executed. Eschbach v. Collins, 61 Md. 478, 48 Am. Rep. 123.

In Connecticut the statute (Gen. St. 1897, § 542) provided that: "No will or codicil shall be revoked in any other manner except by burning, canceling, tearing, or obliterating it by the testator or by some person in his presence by his direction, or by a later will or codicil." Another statute provided how wills should be executed. A testator executed a will containing two items. By the first, after providing for the payment of his debts, he gave to two named nieces each 10 shares of railroad stock. By the second item he left all the residue of his property to his two brothers, share and share alike. When the will was presented for probate, lines appeared drawn through all of the first item, except the words referring to the payment of the testator's debts, thus striking out the gift of shares of railroad stock to his nieces, and leaving all of his estate to fall into the residuary clause. The words over which these lines were drawn were in no other manner canceled or obliterated, but remained legible. The probate court held that the will should be probated without the stricken words and clauses. The superior court, on appeal, reversed this judgment. The Supreme Court sustained the latter ruling. In doing so they said that "the sole inquiry was, Did this fact operate as a revocation, not, indeed, of the entire will, but of that portion of it?" They held that an erasure of a specific legacy from a will, with the effect of increasing the residuary bequest, was not a sufficient revocation of such legacy, under the statutes above cited; that it was in effect the making of a new testamentary disposition; and that the will should be probated with the stricken words included as part of it. Appeal of Miles, 68 Conn. 237, 36 Atl. 39, 36 L. R. A. 176.

In Schouler on Wills (3d Ed.) § 397, it is said: "This doctrine of partial revocation, even under the restrictions adopted by later English legislation, is not greatly favored in American codes of the present day. Many of our local enactments, it is true, once pursued the language of 29 Car. II, so as to admit of revocation pro tanto; but of late years that language has undergone a change of expression in leading states. Various codes now drop all reference to revocation in part; and the general policy intimates that such changes of disposition require an instrument executed with all the formalities of a will." In 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 642, it is said: "The canceling or obliterating of a particular devise or bequest affects that provision of the will only, and not the whole will. In those jurisdictions where partial revocation is permissible, the result is the revocation of the clause canceled; in other jurisdictions the act is of no effect whatever."

In Massachusetts an early statute permitted a revocation in this manner of a devise of land: "Or any clause thereof." A later revised statute provided that "no will shall be revoked," except in certain specified ways. It contained no reference to a partial revocation. The Supreme Court of that state nevertheless held that an erasure by a testator of a certain clause in his will, with the intention of revoking it only, was a valid revocation of such clause, but not of the whole will; and that the property thereby covered, in the absence of a contrary intention passed under the general residuary clause in the will. This is not in accord with cases already mentioned, and has been considerably criticised.

In the decisions from Maryland and Connecticut above cited, it was argued that where the cancellation or obliteration of a part of a will would not only revoke a legacy, but also operate, like an alteration, to convey to another legatee a new estate or increase that given him by the will, it amounted in effect to an alteration or new gift, and such a change would have to be executed like a new testamentary disposition. In the Maryland case this was applied to an obliteration which it was held would increase a life estate into a fee simple. In the Connecticut case the erasure of a specific legacy had the effect of increasing the residuary bequest. The court gave this illustration of what might be done in the way of transmutation by means of mere erasures: "Suppose the original words were: 'To my son William I give nothing, and give all my estate to my son John.' The will, with no addition, could be made to read: 'To my son William I give all my estate.'" This could be done by merely erasing the words "nothing, and give" and the words "to my son John." The argument advanced in these two cases against permitting erasures or obliterations in a will, which would result in taking an estate from one devisee and giving it to another, is very strong. But candor compels the writer to say that it may be doubted whether the learned judge who wrote the opinion in the Maryland case did not misconstrue the language of Lord Alvanley, in Larkins v. Larkins, 3 Bos. & Pul. 21, supra (which he quoted as an authority for the position taken), when Lord Alvanley's statement is considered as a whole; and this doubt is strengthened by what was said by the Lords, in Swinton v. Bailey, L. R. 4 App. Cas. 70, supra.

In Page on Wills, 284, it is said: "Recent statutes expressly provide that no alteration in the contents of a will shall have any effect, unless executed with the formalities required for the execution of a will, or omit all reference to revocation of a part of a will; but if the words canceled are illegible, and cannot be proved otherwise, the court will necessarily be unable to probate them; and, as it does not appear to be the intention of the testator to revoke the entire will, it must be probated with the canceled parts blank. The only point upon which there seems to be actual conflict of authority in this connection is where the statute omits all reference to revocation of a part of a will, neither expressly permitting nor expressly prohibiting it. The weight of authority seems to be that under such statutes a partial revocation of a will is impossible in law, if the words sought to be revoked are still legible." See, also, notes to Lawson v. Morrison, 2 Hare & Wall. Am. Lead. Cas. (5th Ed.) 487 et seq., and note to Graham v. Burch, 28 Am. St. Rep. 344.

[1] Let us now consider more particularly the law of this state on the subject of revocation of wills. The English statute of frauds was included in the digests of the laws preceding the original Code, and this continued as late as the publication of Cobb's Digest, in 1851, where it will be found on page 1127 et seq. By the act of 1852, the law as to the revocation of wills devising realty was also made applicable to those bequeathing personalty. Acts 1851-52, p. 104. When the first Code (which took effect on January 1, 1863) was adopted, the article on the subject of revocation of wills contained nine sections. By section 2438 it was declared that a will, having no effect until the death of the testator, is necessarily revocable by him at any time before his death. Section 2439 declared that: "A revocation may be either express or resulting. An express revocation is where the maker by writing or acts annuls the instrument. An implied revocation results from the execution of a subsequent inconsistent will." It then dealt with the time when such revocation took effect. Section 2440 declared that an express revocation, by written instrument, must be executed with the same formality as that required for the execution of a will. It also dealt with the effect of destroying a revoking will and the revival of a will by republication. Section 2441 was as follows: "An express revocation may be effected by any destruction or obliteration of the original will, or a duplicate, done by the testator, or by his directions, with an intention to revoke; such intention will be presumed from the obliteration or canceling of a material portion of the will; but if the part canceled be immaterial, such as the seal, no such presumption arises." Section 2442 was as follows: "In all cases of revocation, the intention to revoke is necessary to make it effectual. An express clause of revocation will not operate upon a testamentary paper, where it is manifest that such was not the intention." Sections 2443 and 2444 dealt with inconsistent provisions in a subsequent will and inconsistent clauses in the same will. Section 2445 provided that the marriage of the testator, or the birth of a child to him, subsequently to the making of a will in which no provision was made in contemplation of such an event, should revoke the will. Section 2446 dealt with codicils and the subject of republication. These sections have been included in each subsequent Code, including the last one, which was adopted in 1910, sections 3916, 3924.

It will be seen that no express reference was made to revocation pro tanto, except in the provision that an "implied revocation [by a subsequent will] extends only so far as the inconsistency exists," and that any portion of the first will which can stand consistently with the testamentary scheme and bequests in the last shall remain unrevoked. On the subject of revocation pro tanto by destruction or obliteration, the Code is silent. It has been more than once said that the Code "substantially" adopted the English statute of frauds. But it is evident that there are some changes which must have been intentionally made. In the first place, the reference to revocation of a clause or devise by destruction or obliteration, contained in the English statute, was left out. In the English statute, prior to the Victorian statute of wills, the acts of revocation, other than by writing, were mentioned as "by burning, canceling, tearing, or obliterating." The language of the Code is "by any destruction or obliteration of the original will." These words may be sufficiently broad, in connection with their context, to cover the other terms employed in the English statute, but they do not follow it literally. Again, under the English statute, the erasing or canceling of one or more clauses, although they might be substantial or material in their character, did not generally affect the rest of the will, unless it left the remainder unintelligible, and thus necessarily operated as a revocation of the whole.

[6] Under the Code it is provided that an intention to revoke the will will be presumed from the obliteration or cancellation of a material portion of it. It was argued that the word "material" meant essential. But the language of the Code indicates that it does not use the word in so restricted a meaning. It illustrates what is immaterial in Georgia by reference to the seal. In Black's Law Dictionary the word "material" is defined to mean "important; more or less necessary; having influence or effect; going to the merits; having to do with matter, as distinguished from form."

The question of increasing or diminishing an estate by means of an erasure or obliteration seems not to have been discussed in the earlier English cases. In the Larkins Case, supra, which was decided in 1802, Rooke, J., said: "It is rather extraordinary that this point should now come to be decided for the first time." When the codifiers dealt with the subject of revocation of wills, not only having before them the English statute of frauds, but doubtless investigating also the decisions which had been made on the subject, they formulated the sections cited, which were generally similar to the English statute of frauds, but did not follow its exact terms. While they were codifiers and not legislators, four times the Code, containing these same provisions, has been adopted. We think that the section touching the revocation of a will by obliteration, canceling, or the like, should be construed in harmony with the construction of similar statutes by other courts in reference to the subject now under consideration. And under a proper construction thereof, as embodied in section 3919 of the Civil Code of 1910, the statement that "an express revocation may be effected by any destruction or obliteration of the original will, or a duplicate, done by the testator, or by his direction, with an intention to revoke," dealt with an express revocation of the entire will, and not of a clause or part thereof, by destruction or obliteration. The obliteration or canceling by the testator of a material portion of the will raises a presumption of an intention to revoke the whole.

[2, 3] If, then, our statute does not provide for the revocation of a clause or part of a will by destruction or obliteration of it, the next question which arises is, What shall be the effect of such an obliteration, if actually made, with intent not to revoke the entire will, but only a particular clause or part thereof? The presiding judge expressed his view on this subject in the following part of a charge or opinion which he delivered before directing a verdict: "The intention to revoke, in the opinion of the court, does not mean, in its legal sense, that it is necessary, if there be an intentional obliteration or destruction of some part of the will, that the intention should relate to the destruction or obliteration of the whole will, in order to be effective to destroy and obliterate and revoke the entire will; but if a part of the will material in its character, and, in the opinion of the court, any legacies eliminated from the will by cutting them out physically, so as to obliterate and destroy the continuity of the will, is, to that extent, such a declaration on the part of the testator as shows an intent to revoke, and the intent goes in law, whatever in point of fact may have existed in the mind of the testator, but that, in law, it goes to the revocation of the instrument completely, and not pro tanto." In this view we cannot concur.

Aside from the construction of our Code or similar statutes, it has always been held that revocation involves both act and intent. In Malone's Administrator v. Hobbs, 1 Rob. (Va.) 346, 39 Am. Dec. 363, Baldwin, J., said that "a cancellation or destruction, to effect a revocation of the whole instrument, must be directed against the whole, or an essential part of it." In Brown's Will, 1 B. Mon. (Ky.) 56, 35 Am. Dec. 174, Robertson, C. J., said: "The obliteration or cancellation of a portion of a testamentary paper by the testator himself, is admitted to be an equivocal act, the legal effect of which generally depends on extrinsic proof of the accompanying circumstances indicating the intention, and therefore, although the prima facie import of an act of cancellation may be that it was done animo revocandi, yet that presumption may be repelled by parol proof of facts showing that the animus cancellandi applied only to so much of it as had been actually cancelled." Section 3920 of the Code of 1910 declares that "in all cases of revocation, the intention to revoke is necessary to make it effectual." If the revocation referred to is of the entire will, it must be an intention to revoke the entire will. The statement in section 3919 that "such intention will be presumed from the obliteration or canceling of a material portion of the will" cannot mean a conclusive presumption. If so, it would have been much simpler to state that the obliteration or cancellation of a material portion of the will operated as a cancellation of the will as a whole. If the obliteration or canceling of a material part raises a prima facie presumption of an intention to revoke the whole, and the intention to revoke must exist in all cases to make the revocation effectual, it cannot be held that the testatrix revoked her entire will, whether she intended to do so or not. Parol evidence was admissible to rebut such presumption. In McIntyre v. McIntyre, 120 Ga. 67, 47 S. E. 501, 102 Am. St. Rep. 71, it was held that "joint operation of act and intention is necessary to revoke a will." Dealing with the subject of whether certain erasures and obliterations were made with intent to revoke a will absolutely, or were dependent upon the making of a new will, Chief Justice Simmons said: "The matter finally turns upon the intention of the testator, and no mere presumption can be allowed to defeat this intention when it has been made to appear."

In Burge v. Hamilton, 72 Ga. 568, a will, as offered for probate, was written on 10 pages. Pages 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, and 9, were clearly numbered, and without alteration in the numbering. On page 6, the numbering appeared to have been changed from 5 to 6. On page 8 the numbering appeared to have been altered from 7 to 8. On the last page the numbering at the top of the page had been altered from 11 to 10. At the bottom of this page was the number 11. The entire will was in the handwriting of the testator, and his signature was on each of the pages. Each page contained a separate paragraph of the will. A codicil was executed, in which it was stated that the will was approved, except as altered by the codicil. The latter was written on pages numbered 12, 13, and 14, and was attached to the paper offered for probate. Parol evidence was offered to show that the will was in the same condition when the codicil was executed and attached to it as when it was offered for probate, and that the will was executed as it was offered. The caveators attacked it, among other reasons, because it showed on its face that a part of it was missing. The main question discussed was the admissibility of the evidence. But in the course of his opinion, after citing numerous authorities, Chief Justice Jackson said: "These references to able text-books and cases decided show that by the English law parol evidence is admissible, first, to explain certain ambiguities; * * * and, sixthly, that a will, identified in part, will not be refused probate as to that part because of the uncertainty of other probable parts, the contents of which lost or missing parts are unknown. And these adjudications are not affected by or based upon any statute of Victoria or other modern law, but are constructions of the old law. How do the Georgia statutes and adjudications of this court affect this law? So far from detracting from its force, we think that the laws of this state not only confirm it, but enlarge its scope in many respects." Under this decision, if the parts eliminated could not be shown, and their contents were unknown, but there was an intelligible testamentary paper remaining, the mere possibility that the missing parts might have affected the testamentary scheme as a whole would not prevent the probate of what was left.

We thus reach the question, where it can be shown with certainty what were the words thus eliminated, and the statute does not recognize such elimination as a revocation pro tanto, shall the will be probated without such words, or with them reproduced, so that the will shall stand as it was before the mutilation? Under the statute of Victoria, if the words or clause were entirely absent, the will would be probated without them. The cases already decided show that in the United States, where statutes do not recognize or authorize revocation pro tanto, an effort to cancel, erase, or obliterate certain words or clauses would simply be disregarded, and the will would be probated as if no such effort had been made, if the obliterated words can be ascertained. In each of the cases which has come to our attention, this could be ascertained from the face of the paper. Magnifying glasses and the aid of expert examiners have sometimes been used to aid in deciphering obliterated words. Unless the statute so provides, there seems to be no sound distinction in principle between restoring words thus partly obliterated and words completely obliterated or cut out, if it can be proved what they were. The present English statute makes a distinction. The Georgia statute does not. Of course, this may result in admitting parol evidence of certain words obliterated or removed from the will. But that is not extraordinary. It has been held that, if a testator, by accident or mistake, destroys his will without intention to revoke it, it does not work a revocation. If not, how would the will be proved, save by secondary evidence? If a deed or any other written instrument should, by reason of age or accidental tearing or obliteration, be in such condition that certain words were illegible or entirely missing from it, this would not destroy the whole instrument, but the missing words would be shown by the best evidence obtainable. If the paper were not recorded, they could be proved by parol. See Hayden v. Mitchell, 103 Ga. 431, 434, 30 S. E. 287 (where the contents, of illegible lines of a record were shown by parol). Suppose that the testator should accidentally upset some corrosive substance upon his will, so that certain words should be eaten away, if it could be proved by parol what such words were, it would neither render the whole will void nor require its probate without such words. If, then, an attempted revocation of a word or clause by obliteration is not permissible, under the statute, no sound reason appears why such eliminated words should not be shown by extrinsic evidence, if they can be ascertained, and the will probated as it was before such attempted change was made. In McIntyre v. McIntyre, 120 Ga. 67, 47 S. E. 501, 102 Am. St. Rep. 31, supra, some words were stricken with a pencil and slips of paper were pasted over other words; but it was held that the will as executed originally could be probated, if there was no intention to revoke. To hold that the will must be probated without the words removed from it, when they can be ascertained or proved, would destroy the effect of the previous rulings.

[4] 4, 5. How, then, shall these rulings be made practically effectual? The will is offered for probate with certain words cut from it. The evidence indicates that this was done by the testatrix, with no intention to revoke the entire will, but only certain legacies and the appointment of one of the executors, which were affected by the mutilation. One of the legatees whose name was thus cut out filed a caveat to the probating of the will with some of it omitted, and insisted that it should be probated as it stood before the attempted change. We have held that this should be done, if the words removed can be restored by evidence. Why should this legatee be required to litigate to a conclusion these two propositions separately? Must he obtain a judgment declaring the will propounded not to be the will of the testatrix, when in fact he contends that every word of it is a part of her will? Must he have it rejected because a part of it is omitted when propounded, and then begin a new and distinct proceeding to have the identical paper, plus the omitted words, adjudged to be the will? To employ an extreme illustration, suppose that a will as executed should contain 20 pages of carefully prepared devises and bequests; that in one of the items the testator should say that he did not desire that legacy to be paid until six months after his death; that by some means the word "not" should become obliterated, and the will should be propounded without it. Must the other legatees fight to a conclusion the probate of the will containing legacies in their favor, and including all the other items which they contend were properly parts of the will, and then repropound the same thing with the word "not" restored? Such does not appear to have been the practice adopted in the cases above cited. It is true that when a will is offered for probate and a caveat filed thereto, the general question is devisavit vel non, and an entirely different will cannot be propounded by the caveator in the same proceeding. Where this is not sought to be done, but, in response to the propounding of a will which shows on its face that certain words have been obliterated or cut from it, the effort is to show what such words were, so that the will may be probated in its entirety, if it has not been revoked, the rule has no application. Rules of practice are made for the purpose of having an orderly and systematic trial, so that the truth may be reached. To hold as contended on this point would be to make a technical rule of pleading effective, not to reach a trial on the merits, but to obstruct it and prolong litigation uselessly. The case may be somewhat unique. But where a lady undertakes to cut out a legatee in her will by means of a penknife or pair of scissors the situation produced is unusual.

[5] When the case was appealed from the court of ordinary to the superior court, it was tried de novo. The superior court had like power in the matter as the court of ordinary originally had. Pleadings which could be had in the court of ordinary could be had in the superior court. The point does not appear to have been decided in Georgia. But in Roulette v. Mulherin, 100 Ga. 591, 28 S. E. 291, two distinct papers were offered as the will of the same testator, and the cases thus arising were appealed to the superior court, and there consolidated. It was held that it was not error for the judge to consolidate them, "and in this manner have all the issues disposed of by a judgment binding and conclusive upon all the parties before the court." There is nothing in the Code of 1910, § 3863, or in Godwin v. Godwin, 129 Ga. 67, 58 S. E. 652, in conflict with what is here said; nor is it necessary to discuss the meaning of the words, "without the consent of the testator," used in that section, when considered in connection with reference to the presumption of revocation in the latter part thereof. In the case just cited, there was no contention that the testatrix had altered or revoked her will, or that it had been destroyed, either in her lifetime or after her death. But a petition to probate a copy of the will in one county merely showed that the original had been propounded for probate in another county.

Judgment reversed in each case. All the Justices concur.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 4, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 206*)—REVIEW OF DECISIONS—CERTIORARI.

It is not error for the court to refuse to continue a certiorari case, in order that the justice of the peace may have further time in which to make answer to certain exceptions which have been filed, where it appears that the exceptions were filed at a previous term of the court, and an order ordering the magistrate to reanswer was taken at that time, and that no copy of the exceptions and of the judge's order had ever been served upon the magistrate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Dec. Dig. § 206.*]

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 208*)—REVIEW OF DECISIONS—CERTIORARI.

The judge of the superior court did not err in refusing to sustain the certiorari on account of the alleged improper refusal of the magistrate to continue the case, as, under the testimony submitted on the motion for continuance, only a question of discretion was presented.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 817; Dec. Dig. § 208.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 317*)—HEARSAY—ADMISSIBILITY.

A witness testified as to the conduct of a dog, and referred to this dog as the defendant's dog. The witness further said that he knew that it was the defendant's dog, because he had seen it at another person's house, and that person had told him that it was the defendant's dog. Held, that while, standing alone, this testimony would have been hearsay and inadmissible, still it became competent, when it was supplemented by the testimony of the person at whose house the dog was seen to the effect that the dog which was seen there, and which he had told the other witness was the defendant's dog, was in fact the defendant's dog. Cabaniss v. State, 8 Ga. App. 129 (16), 68 S. E. 849.

1. FISH (§ 13*)—OFFENSES—OBSTRUCTION OF STREAM BY NETS.

Section 603 of the Penal Code of 1910 forbids the putting of an obstruction in any river, creek, or fresh water drain, for the purpose of catching fish, unless at least 10 feet in the case of rivers, and one-third of the main channel in the case of creeks, is left open for the free passage of the fish. The section excepts dams for milling or manufacturing purposes, but this exception does not render lawful the use of a fall trap in the tailrace below the mill wheel, where a milldam runs entirely across the main channel of a creek, except at the small space where the wheel is located.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fish, Cent. Dig. §§ 22-24; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

2. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence was sufficient to authorize the jury to find that, while the creek in question had many prongs or channels, the defendant had unlawfully obstructed the main channel with a dam and fish trap.

Error from Superior Court, Terrell County; W. C. Worrell, Judge.

Dan Eaton was convicted for illegally obstructing a river for purpose of catching fish, and brings error. Affirmed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 159*)—APPEAL—SUFFICIENCY OF BOND.

A liberal construction should be given to appeal bonds; and, where the language of the appeal bond is sufficient to afford ample protection to the appellee in the event he prevails in the suit, the appeal should not be dismissed on the ground that the statute was not complied with in the technical execution of the bond.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 550-578; Dec. Dig. § 159.*]

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; John W. Maddox, Judge.

Action by J. M. Davis against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff before a justice, defendant appeals. Appeal to the superior court, and, from an order dismissing the appeal, it brings error. Reversed.

Maddox, McCamy & Shumate and Geo. A. H. Harris & Son, for plaintiff in error. Eubanks & Mebane, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Davis brought suit in a justice court against the Southern Railway Company to recover damages for the killing of his steer. From an adverse judgment, the railway company entered an appeal to a jury in the superior court.

The appeal bond was as follows: "J. M. Davis v. Southern Railway Company. Justice court of 1569th Dist. G. M., Floyd county, Ga. Suit for killing steer. Judgment for Plff. for $75.00. Now comes the defendant in the above-stated case, and, being dissatisfied with the judgment rendered thereon, and within the time allowed by law, after paying all costs, enters this its appeal to a jury in the superior court of said county, and brings J. G. Early and tenders him as security on the appeal bond. Oct. 16, 1909. Southern Railway Co., by its attorney, Geo. A. Harris, Jr., Principal. [Seal.] J. G. Early, Security. [Seal.]"

The judge of the superior court dismissed the appeal, holding that the above bond was not sufficient, because it did not contain the words "for the eventual condemnation money." The judgment dismissing the appeal is assigned as error.

We think the exception is well taken, and that the appeal should not have been dismissed for this reason. The liability of the security on an appeal bond is fixed by law. The purpose of the bond is to protect the appellee in the event the appellant does not succeed in the appeal and is not able, or for any reason refuses, to pay the judgment against him rendered by the superior court. Under the terms of the bond in this case, if a final judgment had been rendered against the appellant, can it be doubted that the bond would have been sufficient to hold the surety thereon and to compel him to pay the final judgment? The bond stated the amount of the judgment rendered against the appellant in the court below, and the security, when he signed the bond, must have known that he obligated himself to pay as security on the appeal bond, which could have no other meaning, except that as security he obligated himself to pay the final judgment against his principal. In other words, we think that the language of the bond filed in this case and approved by the justice of the peace, "as security on the appeal bond," is equivalent to the words, "as security for the eventual condemnation money."

In the case of Shirley v. Price, 30 Ga. 328, the Supreme Court held that the words "I stand security on the appeal of the above stated case," signed by the security and following a statement of the case and of the judgment entered therein and the appeal entered therefrom, was equivalent to the words, "I stand security for the eventual costs and condemnation money."

In Hays v. Eubanks, 125 Ga. 352, 54 S. E. 174, in discussing the statutory requirements as to appeal bonds, the following significant language is used: "A reasonable intentment and liberal construction has heretofore been uniformly given to appeal bonds, which are not governed by the strict rules applicable to technical pleading, but which are to be held legally sufficient whenever there has been a substantial compliance with statutory requirements on the part of the appellant, and the contemplated protection to which the opposite party is entitled is thereby afforded him."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The appeal bond in the present case was sufficient, to have afforded ample protection to the appellee in the event the appellant did not succeed in its appeal. See Smith v. Jackson, 122 Ga. 857, 50 S. E. 930; Hendrix v. McBurney, 70 Ga. 525; and Seymour v. Howard, 15 Ga. 110. Besides, if the appeal bond in this case had been deficient for the reasons stated, an opportunity should have been afforded for an amendment thereof. Civil Code, 1910, § 5707.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 14*)—SECOND WRIT OF ERROR.

Only one writ of error will lie in favor of the same party to the same judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 48-58; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; J. W. Maddox, Judge.

Action between J. R. Pace and others and George A. H. Harris & Son. From the judgment, Pace brings error. Dismissed.

C. I. Carey, for plaintiff in error. M. B. Eubanks, for defendants in error.

POWELL, J. The defendant in error has moved to dismiss the writ of error, because it is the second writ of error to the same final judgment. The plaintiff in error resists the motion. He candidly admits that before he secured the signature of the judge to the present writ of error he had previously presented to the judge another bill of exceptions, which had been duly certified by the judge (and under the practice in this state the certificate of the judge to the bill of exceptions constitutes the writ of error) and served on opposing counsel, and that owing to the contention of counsel for the defendant in error that certain matters had been incorrectly stated, to the prejudice of the defendant in error, he did not file that bill of exceptions, but presented the one now before us, eliminating the objectionable features, and procured it to be certified, served, and filed. He asserts, however, that this court is without power to discover that this is a second bill of exceptions to the same judgment. He asserts that it is not disclosed on the face of the record that this is not the original bill of exceptions, and that we have no power to ascertain facts dehors the record. However, on examining the record we do find evidence of the presentation, signing, and service of the former bill of exceptions. There is in the record a supplemental certificate of the nature provided for by Civil Code 1910, § 6149. It is duly entitled in the cause, is dated April 8, 1911, and its recitals clearly disclose the existence and service of the prior bill of exceptions sued out by the present plaintiff in error. As the certificate to the present bill of exceptions bears date of April 12, 1911, this cannot be the first writ of error in the case. Besides, this court, following a well-established custom of the Supreme Court, has a way of legally finding out some things which are dehors the record. In matters affecting the jurisdiction of the court, and in a number of similar instances, when the attention of the court is called to the probable existence of some matter resting within the knowledge of the parties or counsel to the case, but not appearing in the record, the court issues a rule requiring parties or counsel to answer under oath whether the alleged or supposed fact is or is not true. If the answers filed present an issue of fact, the court cannot settle that issue; but, if the fact be conceded, the court acts upon the admissions of the parties. So in this case, in view of the frank admissions of counsel for the plaintiff in error the court would have no difficulty in obtaining the facts, even if they did not appear on the face of the record.

Because of the motive which induced the attorney for the plaintiff in error to let his first bill of exceptions go by and to present the second bill to the same judgment, and because we dislike to penalize, as it were, an effort to be extra fair, we are reluctant to dismiss the bill of exceptions on the ground stated; but a dismissal seems to be imperative. When the judge once certifies a bill of exceptions in a case, he cannot thereafter certify another for the same party as to the same judgment. Perry v. Central Railroad, 74 Ga. 411; Marshall v. Livingston, 77 Ga. 21 (5); Scott v. Central Railroad, 77 Ga. 450. We may say, however, that we have also examined the case on its merits, and that, even if we did not dismiss the bill of exceptions, the same substantial end would be reached, for we would have to affirm the judgment anyway.

Writ of error dismissed.

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1111*)—APPEAL—RECORD—PROCEEDINGS ON MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

The final order in the case, to which the exception relates, is as follows: "It appearing that no brief of the evidence has been prepared and filed in the within case, and that no service of this motion was made on the solicitor, it is hereby ordered that the motion for new trial be and the same is hereby dismissed." Nothing in the record contradicts the recitals of facts contained in this order, though the order originally continuing the motion provided that the brief of the evidence should be prepared and presented for approval at the time set for the hearing, and filed in the office of the clerk within 10 days thereafter. Held that, if the brief of evidence had been prepared and presented in time, the fact that it was not lodged in the office of the clerk for filing would not have been ground for dismissal of the motion, but that, as the record nowhere discloses that it was ever prepared or presented, the judgment dismissing the motion on the day set for the hearing will not be reversed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. GAMING (§ 19*)—CONSIDERATION FOR NOTE—LEGALITY.

An agent cannot recover from his principal money which he has advanced for the purchase of cotton futures for the principal; hence, such a transaction cannot be successfully asserted as supplying any part of the consideration of a promissory note given to secure future advances.

2. GAMING (§ 19*)—CONSIDERATION FOR NOTE—LEGALITY.

Where a planter gives to a factor his promissory note for supplies and money to be furnished him for the making of his crops, and the factor furnishes him some money for that purpose, and thereafter, at the direction of the planter, pays out other sums for the purchase of cotton futures for the planter's benefit, the promissory note will be upheld only as to the money advanced for the purpose, other than the purchase of cotton futures.

Error from City Court of Richmond County; W. F. Eve, Judge.

Action by Walker & Walker against R. M. Mixon. From a judgment for plaintiffs defendant brings error. Affirmed on condition.

E. H. Callaway, for plaintiff in error.
Wm. H. Barrett, for defendants in error.

POWELL, J. [1, 2] To state thus much of the facts will be sufficient to illustrate the point which is decided and which, as we see it, controls the case. On March 3, 1908, Mixon gave to Walker & Walker his promissory note for $1,053.33, the $53.33 representing interest. Mixon was a planter and Walker & Walker were factors. This note did not represent any then existing indebtedness, but was given for the purpose of securing advances of money to be made from time to time by Walker & Walker, in order to enable Mixon to make his crops. On the day the note was given, he got $500, and on April 4 he got $250 additional. With the exception of the sums which were paid out by Walker & Walker in the purchase of cotton futures, as will be hereafter explained, nothing further was advanced. At the time this note was given, Mixon had 77 bales of cotton in the warehouse of Walker & Walker, on which they had made advances. They were instructed by Mixon to sell this cotton and buy 100 bales of cotton futures. The sale of the spot cotton somewhat more than paid the amount of Mixon's account, and left a fund to his credit on the account, if we leave the note transaction out of consideration. In keeping up the margins on the futures contract which they bought for Mixon, the Messrs. Walker paid out $900, and the futures contract was closed out with that much loss. The testimony may make some issue as to whether the $500 and the $250 which Mixon drew were advanced to him upon the note of $1,000, or were paid to him out of the proceeds of his spot cotton, but we take the verdict of the jury as settling that in favor of the Messrs. Walker. In their petition the plaintiffs conceded that the full amount of the $1,000 had not been advanced; at least they only claimed $824.01, with interest from the maturity of the note, and this amount the jury allowed them.

As we view this case, it all turns upon the question as to how much the Messrs. Walker can be considered as having lawfully advanced to Mixon upon the $1,000 note. If they had in their hands moneys arising from the proceeds of Mixon's cotton, and he authorized or directed them to expend it in the purchase of cotton futures, and they so spent it, he could not recover it back from them in a direct action, nor could he set off the sum so expended by them by causing it to be credited upon this note. Benton v. Singleton, 114 Ga. 548 (3), 40 S. E. 811; Clarke v. Brown, 77 Ga. 608, 4 Am. St. Rep. 98. On the other hand, the rule is well settled that, "when a broker is privy to such a wagering contract, and brings the parties together for the very purpose of entering the illegal agreement, he is particeps criminis, and cannot recover for services rendered, or losses incurred by himself in forwarding the transaction." Irwin v. Williar, 110 U. S. 499, 4 Sup. Ct. 160, 28 L. Ed. 225, quoted and applied in National Bank v. Cunningham, 75 Ga. 366, in which it was concretely held that, "where a note was given to brokers for money which was to be expended by them in purchasing cotton futures for and on account of the maker, and no money went into his hands, such note was void." See, also, Walters v. Comer, 79 Ga. 796, 5 S. E. 292.

Following this, it was held, in Benson v. Dublin Warehouse Co., 99 Ga. 303, 25 S. E. 645, that "a promissory note given for money which had been advanced by the payee to the maker, to be used 'as margins in speculating in cotton futures,' and which the lender had, in the maker's behalf, in fact 'placed' for this purpose, is void; and its payment cannot, either as against a principal or a surety thereon, be enforced by suit." See, also, Singleton v. Bank of Monticello, 113 Ga. 527, 38 S. E. 947.

Now let us apply these principles of law to the facts of the present case. The note for the $1,000 was given upon no present consideration; the consideration was to consist in advances to be made in the future. At the time the note was given, it was not intended to be a part of any wagering transaction, and therefore was not wholly void, as the note in the Benton Case, supra, was held to be under the particular facts there stated. However, notes made for future advances are not collectible according to the amount stated on their faces, unless those amounts have been actually and lawfully advanced. In other words, if one gives a note for $1,000 to cover advances to be made in the future, and gets under it only $500, the payee of the note can only recover the $500 and the interest. It follows that this note was valid and collectible to the amount of the $750 which was advanced on it for legitimate purposes, and for the interest on the $750. (In passing, it may be said that interest on the entire $1,000 might have been collected if the plaintiffs on the defendant's demand had furnished the entire $1,000 during the course of the year. For, as we understand it, where a note is given to secure advances of money to be made and the money is at the borrower's command as he may need it, interest may be charged on the full amount thus set apart for him from the time the note is given and the money put at his disposal; but in this case the plaintiffs refused to let the defendant have beyond what they had already advanced.)

In order to make the plaintiffs' demand as much as the jury allowed them, it is necessary to add in some of the money (a small amount, it is true, and yet enough to be material) which they paid out for the cotton futures; and this cannot be done. If they had paid this money over to Mixon and he had bought the futures, or perhaps if they had merely placed the money to his credit and had honored his drafts in favor of others of whom the futures were bought, they might recover as to these items, under the doctrine announced in the case of Singleton v. Bank of Monticello; but the fact is they were particeps criminis; they actively officiated in the buying of the futures, and they cannot supply any part of the consideration of this note by showing that they advanced money in any such way. The result is that we affirm the judgment, on condition that the plaintiffs will write off from their judgment all in excess of $750, and the interest thereon, from the date of the note.

It was argued on the part of the defendants in error that the plaintiff in error did not successfully show the illegality of these future contracts; that he did not show that they were not such contracts as contemplated a bona fide purchase and consequent delivery of the cotton. Without reciting all of the facts that appear in the record, we deem it sufficient to say that it is too clear to admit of any doubt that mere speculation and not legitimate dealing was involved in these cotton future transactions. The proof of this element is as clear as it is in any of the cases which we have cited above, and in all of them the illegality of the transaction is either assumed or directly stated.

Judgment affirmed on condition.

HODGE v. ATLANTIC COAST LUMBER CORPORATION.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 31, 1911.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 572*)—RES JUDICATA.

While a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint would not bar another action, in so far as the demurrer went to the insufficiency of the allegations, it would bar a second action between the same parties for the same cause, if the demurrer was based upon the ground that the complaint showed affirmatively that plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 656*)—RES JUDICATA.

An order, in a former action between the same parties for the same cause, sustaining a demurrer to the complaint on the ground that it showed affirmatively that plaintiff was not entitled to recover, precludes the Supreme Court from inquiring on a second trial the nature of the allegations of the complaint demurred to.

An allegation of the complaint, in an action for personal injuries by the accidental breaking of machinery while on defendant's premises, may be amended so as to show that the injuries were not accidental; amendment being the proper remedy.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Georgetown County; Geo. W. Gage, Judge. "To be officially reported."

Action by A. O. Hodge, administrator of the estate of J. J. Hodge, against the Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Willcox & Willcox, Henry E. Davis, and Le Grand G. Walker, for appellant. Legare & Holman and W. E. Parker, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. [1] This appeal presents the following question, Does a judgment dismissing a complaint on a demurrer, based on the ground, among others, that the complaint alleges facts which affirmatively show that plaintiff is not entitled to recover, bar a second action between the same parties for the same cause?

In Duke v. Tel. Co., 71 S. C. 101, 50 S. E. 675, the court ruled that a judgment dismissing a complaint on demurrer, because of the omission of an allegation essential to the cause of action, does not bar a second action in which the necessary allegation is supplied. The reason is that the merits of the case, as disclosed in the second action, were not heard and decided in the first.

But the authorities cited by the court in that case recognize this distinction: That where the complaint is dismissed, not because of the omission of a material allegation, but because of the affirmation therein of facts which show that plaintiff is not entitled to recover, a second action is barred, because the first was necessarily a decision upon the merits. In Gould v. Evansville, etc., R. Co., 91 U. S. 526, 23 L. Ed. 416, the court deduces these conclusions from the authorities: "(1) That a judgment rendered upon demurrer to the declaration or to a material pleading, setting forth the facts, is equally conclusive of the matters confessed by the demurrer as a verdict finding the same facts would be, since the matters in controversy are established in the former case, as well as in the latter, by matter of record; and the rule is that facts thus established can never after be contested between the same parties or those in privity with them. (2) That if judgment is rendered for the defendant on demurrer to the declaration, or to a material pleading in chief, the plaintiff can never after maintain against the same defendant or his privies any similar or concurrent action for the same cause upon the same grounds as were disclosed in the first declaration, for the reason that the judgment upon such a demurrer determines the merits of the cause, and a final judgment deciding the right must put an end to the dispute, else the litigation would be endless (citing cases). Support to these propositions is found everywhere; but it is equally well settled that, if plaintiff fails on demurrer in his first action from the omission of an essential allegation in his declaration which is fully supplied in the second suit, the judgment in the first suit is no bar to the second, although the respective actions were instituted to enforce the same right, for the reason that the merits of the cause, as disclosed in the second declaration, were not heard and decided in the first action." In Black on Judgments, § 707, it is said: "But if the decision was on account of some inherent vice or defect in the case shown by the complaint, rather than for the lack of proper allegations, it is difficult to resist the conclusion that the judgment would be a complete bar to any further suit upon the same transaction or state of facts."

Under these authorities, and especially Duke v. Tel. Co., in so far as the demurrer in the first action was based on grounds of insufficiency of allegation in the complaint, the judgment would not be a bar to this action, in which the deficiency is fully supplied. But if it was based also upon the ground that the complaint showed affirmatively that plaintiff was not entitled to recover, then the judgment is a bar to this action.

[2] It is not necessary for us to consider the allegations of the complaint in the former case to ascertain what is and what is not therein alleged. The order of the court, in that case, sustaining the demurrer on the grounds upon which it was based, precludes any such inquiry. All parties including this court, are bound by the construction put upon the complaint by the court in that case.

[3] We are also bound by the conclusion of the circuit court in this case that the order in the former case sustained all the grounds of demurrer, because there is no appeal from that conclusion. Therefore it is only necessary to look to the grounds of demurrer in the former case to see if any one of them is based upon the ground that the complaint alleges facts which show that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover; for if there is one such ground it is enough to show that the merits of the former case were considered and decided.

[4] The third ground of demurrer was as follows: "The entire complaint shows that the plaintiff's intestate, while a licensee or a trespasser, was injured by a mere accident as a result of the breaking of the machinery of the defendant, while used in the ordinary course of its business, and which could not have been guarded against." Now, clearly, if the complaint shows what is stated in this ground of demurrer, and that it does cannot now be questioned, it shows affirmatively that plaintiff was not entitled to recover; for the law does not impose liability for a mere accident, which could not have been guarded against. That plaintiff's intestate lost his life as the result of such an accident has been conclusively adjudicated. Therefore the court erred in not holding such adjudication to be a bar to this action. Every litigant is entitled to have the merits of his case tried once, but he is entitled to only one such trial.

[5] It must not be inferred that such an allegation is not subject to amendment. Hall v. Woodward, 30 S. C. 564, 9 S. E. 684. But the remedy in such a case is by amendment; for, so long as the allegation remains in the pleading, the plaintiff is bound by it.

The same question is involved and the same judgment will be entered in the case of A. O. Hodge, as administrator of the estate of Howard M. Hodge, against the same defendant.

JENKINS v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 31, 1911.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 134*)—LEASE OF ROAD—ACTIONS—VENUE—RESIDENCE—PLACE OF BUSINESS.

A contract between two railroad companies allowed the second company to operate its trains, in charge of its own servants and conductors, over the tracks of the first, with the added provision that the first company should be liable to the second for any sums which might be recovered against the second because of injuries received by passengers or others while the second was operating its trains over the line of the first. Held, that as a railroad company is bound to operate its railroad, and is liable for injuries caused by those who are allowed to operate it, this contract could not change the liabilities of either company to the public; and hence the lessee company was carrying on its business within the counties in which the line of the lessor company ran, and might be sued therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 433; Dec. Dig. § 134.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 260*)—OPERATION—DUTY TO OPERATE.

The owner of a railroad must operate it, and is liable for injuries caused by those who are allowed to use it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 817-823; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 684*)—CONCLUSIVENESS.

One railroad company leased its line to another, and a passenger injured in a wreck sued the lessor company. A judgment was had for defendant. The passenger then sued the lessee company. Held, that the judgment in the action against the lessor company was a bar.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1207; Dec. Dig. § 684.*]

4. JUDGMENT (§ 713*)—CONCLUSIVENESS—MATTERS CONCLUDED.

A judgment upon the merits is conclusive, not only as to all matters litigated, but as to all matters which might have been litigated and determined.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1241; Dec. Dig. § 713.*]

5. ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL (§ 9*)—PENDENCY OF OTHER ACTION.

Where a passenger was injured while on a train run over leased tracks, the passenger could sue either the lessor or the operating company, and the pendency of an action against one would not prevent him from suing the other, though he could not have a double satisfaction.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action by P. A. H. Jenkins against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. From a judgment overruling a motion to strike out a certain defense and overruling a plea to the jurisdiction, both parties appeal. Reversed.

J. J. McSwain, for plaintiff. P. A. Willcox and L. W. McLemore, for defendant.

HYDRICK, J. The defendant operates a passenger train between Charleston and Greenville. Between Charleston and Columbia, it is run over defendant's own road. Between Columbia and Laurens, it is run over the road of the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad Company, and between Laurens and Greenville it is run over the road of the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company. On September 7, 1908, plaintiff's wife became a passenger on said train at Newberry, for Greenville. The train was wrecked between Newberry and Laurens, and she was injured. The plaintiff brought an action in the circuit court for Laurens county against the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad Company to recover damages resulting to him for her injury. The case was tried on the merits, and the judgment was in favor of the railroad company. Thereafter the plaintiff brought this action, in the circuit court for Greenville county, against this defendant for the same cause. The defendant pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court, alleging that Greenville was not the county of its residence, and praying that the action be dismissed, or, failing in that, that it be transferred to the proper county for trial. The plea to the jurisdiction having been overruled and the motion to transfer refused, defendant answered and pleaded as its second defense the judgment rendered in the action between this plaintiff and the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens in bar of this action. In connection with that plea, defendant alleged that at the time of the injury the train upon which plaintiff's wife was riding was leased to and operated by the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens, and exhibited a copy of the agreement under which the train was operated; and also that, under the terms of their agreement, the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens was and is primarily and solely responsible for any and all damages or injuries arising out of the operation of said train, while on its railroad, and is liable over to this defendant for any sum or sums that may be recovered of it on account of any such injury.

The plaintiff moved upon the record to strike out the second defense. The motion may be regarded as a demurrer to that defense. Numerous grounds are stated in the motion, but in substance they all amount to the same thing—that the judgment in that case is no bar to this action. The court ruled that the former action was not a bar to this action, but refused to strike out the second defense, on the ground that it would be competent for defendant to show that plaintiff had sought to hold another party liable for the same injury. The plaintiff appealed, assigning error in the refusal to strike out the second defense. The defendant also appealed, assigning error in refusing its motion to transfer the cause to the proper county for trial, on the ground that the court in Greenville has no jurisdiction, because defendant is not a resident of that county, and in holding that the judgment pleaded was not a bar to this action.

The ruling that the Laurens judgment was not a bar to this action and the refusal to strike out the plea of that judgment, as a bar, is inconsistent. If it is not a bar, it is irrelevant matter, and should have been stricken out.

[1] There was no error in refusing the motion to transfer the case. The court in Greenville has jurisdiction to try it. Rafeld v. Railway Co., 86 S. C. 324, 68 S. E. 634; Dennis v. Railway Co., 86 S. C. 258, 68 S. E. 465. Under the terms of the contract between defendant and the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens, the train, which was owned and equipped by defendant, manned by its own crew, and run under the direction and control of its own conductor, was operated by defendant.

[2] The proper construction of the contract makes the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens the lessor and defendant the lessee of the right to run defendant's trains over the tracks of the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens. The fact that, by the terms of the contract, the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens is as between it and defendant, primarily liable for all injuries occurring in the operation of said trains, while on its tracks, and liable over to defendant for any and all sums that may be recovered from it on account of such injuries, cannot affect the liability imposed by law upon either or both to the public. The law imposes upon the owner or a railroad the duty of operating it, and in consequence liability for injuries done by those who are allowed to operate it. Harmon v. Railway, 28 S. C. 401, 5 S. E. 835, 13 Am. St. Rep. 686. The defendant was therefore carrying on its business in Greenville county, so as to make it a resident of that county. Tobin v. Railway Co., 47 S. C. 387, 25 S. E. 283, 58 Am. St. Rep. 890.

[3] The question whether the Laurens judgment is a bar to this action is one of interest and importance. In the opinion of the circuit court, refusing a motion for a new trial, in Logan v. Railway, 82 S. C. 522, 64 S. E. 515, the writer of this opinion investigated that question, and undertook to show that the true ground upon which a former judgment, in a case like this, should be allowed to operate as a bar to a second action is not res judicata, or technical estoppel, because the parties are not the same, and there is no such privity between them as is necessary for the application of that doctrine; but that in such cases, on grounds of public policy, the principle of estoppel should be expanded, so as to embrace within the estoppel of a judgment persons who are not, strictly speaking, either parties or privies. It is rested upon the wholesome principle which allows every litigant one opportunity to try his case on the merits, but limits him, in the interest of the public, to one such opportunity. In Logan's Case, and also in Rookard's Case, 84 S. C. 190, 65 S. E. 1047, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 435, 137 Am. St. Rep. 839, it is stated that a judgment on the merits in favor of a lessee railroad company would bar an action against the lessor for the same cause, because the liability of the lessor is predicated upon that of the lessee. In other words, if the operating company—the one that actually does the injury—is held not to be liable, it follows that the lessor, upon whom the law imposes liability only for the acts of the lessee, cannot be liable. Now, with respect to the injuries complained of here, the lessor and lessee, the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens and the defendant, were jointly and severally liable to the plaintiff, and the liability of each is based upon exactly the same acts or omissions. In other words, there is nothing which the defendant did or failed to do in the operation of that train for which the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens would not be liable, because in its operation defendant was the agent of the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens; and there is nothing, with respect to the same matter, which the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens did or failed to do for which the defendant would not be liable, because, in the discharge of its duties to the public as common carrier, defendant is responsible for all the instrumentalities employed by it.

[4] From this it follows that there is no force in the plaintiff's contention that the specifications of negligence against the defendant in this case are different from those charged against the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens in the former action. "The rule is well settled that a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, delivered upon the merits of a cause, is final and conclusive between the parties in a subsequent action upon the same cause, not only as to all matters actually litigated and determined in the former action, but also as to every other ground of recovery or defense which might have been presented and determined therein." 24 A. & E. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 781. "An entire claim arising from a single tort cannot be divided and made the subject of several suits; a judgment upon the merits in respect to any part will be available as a bar in other actions arising from the same cause; the rule being that plaintiff must include in the one action all the various items or elements of his damage, and recover all the compensation he is entitled to for each and all of such items." 23 Cyc. 1178. As the liability of the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens is predicated upon that of the defendant, and as it would be liable for anything for which the defendant is liable, in respect to the matter complained of, the logical conclusion necessarily is that, if the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens is not liable, the defendant is not. Now, as between the plaintiff and the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens, it has been conclusively adjudicated that the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens is not liable. Therefore the defendant is not, and the former judgment is a bar to this action.

[5] This conclusion illustrates the difference between the effect of a pending action and a judgment in that action. The cases above cited show that plaintiff could have sued both companies at the same time for the same cause, and he could have sued them in the same or in different actions; and, if he had sued them separately, neither action could have been pleaded in abatement of the other. And he could have recovered judgment in both, though he could have had but one satisfaction. On the other hand, a judgment against him in either would have been a bar to any further prosecution of the other.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; R. O. Watts, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by P. A. H. Jenkins against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, in which the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad Company petitioned to be made a party defendant. From a judgment refusing the petition, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Lyles & Lyles, for appellant. J. J. McSwain, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. The Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad Company filed a petition in this case setting out the judgment in its favor in an action in the court of common pleas for Laurens county, between plaintiff herein and itself, for the same cause of action as is herein sued on, alleging that, if any one is liable to plaintiff for the injury herein complained of, it is; and that, by the terms of the contract between itself and defendant, it is liable over to defendant for any sum that may be recovered of defendant in this action, and therefore it prays to be made a party defendant.

The decision in the principal case (71 S. E. 1010) shows there was no error in refusing petitioner's motion.

POWELL v. STATE. (No. 3,289.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 4, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1137*)—APPEAL—ESTOPPEL TO ALLEGE ERROR.

Under the special facts appearing in the record, especially as recited in the note of the trial judge qualifying the grounds of the motion for a new trial, the conviction will not be set aside because he informed the jury in the beginning of his charge that the defendant was indicted for killing Owen Folsom, when in fact the indictment charged the killing of J. O. Folsom.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law. Cent. Dig. §§ 3007-3010; Dec. Dig. § 1137.*]

2. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence authorized the verdict rendered, and the exceptions to the charge are not well taken.

Error from Superior Court, Lowndes County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Tom Powell was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

Jas. M. Johnson, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Wilkes, Sol. Gen., and Whitaker & Dukes, for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The indictment charged that the defendant, Tom Powell, did "kill and murder one J. O. Folsom, in the peace of the state, by then and there striking and beating the said J. O. Folsom with a certain stick of wood known as a shingle back, then and there held by him, the said Tom Powell, and then and there giving to him, the said J. O. Folsom, a mortal wound of which the said J. O. Folsom died." Throughout the testimony the witnesses, both for the state and the accused, spoke of the deceased as Owen Folsom, and the initials "J. O." do not appear in the brief of the testimony. The defendant in his statement to the jury spoke of the deceased as "this Owen Folsom." The court opened his charge to the jury in the following language: "The state of Georgia, by this indictment which you will have before you, charged the defendant, Tom Powell, with the offense of murder, alleging that he did, in the county of Lowndes, at some time previous to the return of this indictment into court, unlawfully kill, in the peace of the state, one Owen Folsom, with malice aforethought."

One of the grounds of the motion for a new trial complains that the judge thus instructed the jury that the accused was being held for killing Owen Folsom, when the indictment in fact charged the killing of J. O. Folsom; the movant alleging that there was no proof that J. O. Folsom and Owen Folsom were one and the same person. The judge adds an explanatory note as follows:

"After the witnesses were introduced and the case was argued and the time arrived to charge the jury, counsel for the state and the defendant confronted the court, while the jury occupied the seats to the left. The indictment was in the hands of the attorneys for the prosecution. For the purpose of ascertaining precisely the name of the deceased alleged in the indictment, in order to state the issues in the case to the jury, the court turned to the attorneys in the case, and, in the hearing and presence of the jury inquired as to what was the name of the deceased alleged in the indictment; to which question the attorneys for the prosecution both arose and stated that the name was Owen Folsom. Counsel for the defense made no remonstrance, in fact, he sat without any expression of any kind; and the court, accepting as true the statement of the attorneys, which was undenied, and turning to the jury, stated the issues as appeared in the charge, using the name of Owen Folsom, instead of J. O. Folsom. No question was ever raised, either in the arguments of counsel upon either side or before the court, as to any question as to the identity of J. O. Folsom, as alleged in the indictment, and Owen Folsom referred to by the witnesses. The case was argued to the jury by the attorneys both for the prosecution and the defense. When the defendant took the witness stand to make his statement, with reference to the charges alleged in the indictment against him, which charged him with the killing of J. O. Folsom, he began by referring to this Owen Folsom,' as will appear from his statement incorporated in the record."

[1] Under the facts recited, we do not think that the court committed reversible error in referring to the person alleged to be killed as "Owen Folsom." Of course, the allegata and the proof should correspond in respect to the identity of the person killed, just as it should in respect to all other material matters involved; but where the evidence suggests no actual conflict of identity, and the trial proceeds to verdict without any question being made as to it, slight evidence will be sufficient on this point.

In Mitchum v. State, 11 Ga. 615, the indictment charged the homicide of William R. Morris, and the proof referred merely to the killing of W. R. Morris. The court held that the variance was not fatal; and Judge Nisbet, in discussing the point, said: "It is very clear that there must be a killing before there can be murder; and it is equally clear that the prisoner cannot be convicted of murder, unless he is proven to have slain the person which the indictment charges him to have murdered. On this indictment for the murder of William R. Morris, the plaintiff in error could not be convicted upon proof that he had murdered John Stiles. So vital is this, as a practical rule, that its observance substantially must be insisted upon with strenuousness. It may be conceded that in former times such a variance would have been held decisive, and even now we are not altogether satisfied that we are right in not so holding it. We think, however, whether W. R. Morris, the person slain according to the testimony, was or was not the William R. Morris charged to have been slain in the indictment was a question safely trusted with the jury. W. R., it is true, may represent Wilson R. or Willis R.; but these letters may also represent William R. The jury had the right to consider the question of identity, not alone in the light of the testimony specially referred to, but also in the light of all the attendant circumstances. They were satisfied with the identity, as is evidenced by their verdict, and we will not disturb it on this account."

In Robinson v. State, 68 Ga. 833, it was held: "Where an indictment charged the larceny of a horse belonging to Joel W. Perry, and the evidence was that the horse belonged to 'Colonel Perry,' whom one of the witnesses called his father-in-law, the identity of the owner as charged and as proved was for the jury; and, in the absence of any conflicting testimony as to the ownership or of proof that there was any other Perry in the county, a verdict of guilty will not be set aside as contrary to law, on the ground that the probata and allegata did not agree as to ownership."

In McLain v. State, 71 Ga. 280, which is very close on its facts to the case at bar, the court ruled: "Where an indictment for murder alleged the killing of W. F. Sexton, and the witnesses spoke of the deceased as Freeman Sexton, the question of identity having been submitted to the jury, who found that the deceased, as charged and proved, was the same person, and there being evidence to support such finding this court will not interfere." See, also, Joyce v. State, 82 Tenn. (2 Swan) 667; Stuart v. State, 60 Tenn. (1 Baxt.) 178; Rutherford v. State, 79 Tenn. 31.

It is true that in the present case the court did not submit the question to the jury, but told them directly that the defendant was indicted for killing Owen Folsom; but this statement must be taken in connection with the judge's qualifying note. He was beginning his charge; he did not have the indictment before him; counsel both for the state and the accused were sitting just in front of him, and the Solicitor General had the indictment in his hand. The judge asked the name of the person for whose killing the defendant was indicted; the question being addressed to counsel generally. State's counsel said, "Owen Folsom." The judge looked to the defendant's counsel, and he made no dissent, and we think that the only reasonable and fair construction to put upon his silence under all the circumstances is to construe it as an acquiescence. It was silence at a time when proper respect for the court and the duty of counsel to make objection, if he had any, to the information given by the other attorney demanded that counsel for the accused should speak out, or thereafter forever hold his peace.

Counsel for the plaintiff in error strenuously argues that a new trial should be granted on the point we have just been discussing, because, as he says, the present conviction under the indictment charging the homicide of J. O. Folsom will not bar a subsequent prosecution for the killing of Owen Folsom; that if the state were now to bring a new indictment charging the killing of Owen Folsom, and he should attach a copy of the present indictment to his special plea of autre fois convict, the plea would be demurrable for the variance. All the defendant would have to do in order to avoid liability to demurrer on this ground would be to allege that Owen Folsom and J. O. Folsom were the same person; for in this state the "same transaction test" is the one recognized by the courts.

[2] The errors assigned upon the charge are not well taken, and the requests to charge submitted by the accused were fairly and fully covered in the general charge.

Judgment affirmed.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

William Oldknow was convicted of violating a city ordinance, and brings error. Affirmed.

Hudson Moore, for plaintiff in error. J. L. Mayson, and W. D. Ellis, Jr., for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. William Oldknow was convicted in the recorder's court of the city of Atlanta for a violation of a city ordinance which makes it "the duty of the proprietor, lessee, or other person in charge of every opera house, or theater, or moving picture show, or vaudeville performance, or similar exhibition in the city of Atlanta to require ladies who attend performances in such theater or opera house to remove their hats before the performance begins and to keep them off during the performance." On certiorari the superior court affirmed the judgment of the recorder, and Oldknow excepted.

[1] He challenges the legality of the ordinance in question on various grounds, such as that no authority in law existed for the enactment of such ordinance, that it was discriminatory and class legislation, in that it did not apply to all subjects alike, and that the ordinance, if otherwise valid, was wholly unreasonable, because it imposed a penalty for an offense over which the defendant had no control and was powerless to prevent; in other words, that the ordinance was not within the police power of the city under its charter. He further insists that, conceding the legality of the ordinance, the evidence in this case fails to show a violation of its terms, reasonably construed.

It will hardly be questioned that the city has the power to regulate all classes of exhibitions such as are conducted for the recreation and amusement of the public, and that the police power of the city is properly exercised over places of public resort, although owned and operated by private citizens. 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 116, and cases cited. "Places to which people come in numbers and indiscriminately by invitation or license of the owner and generally for his benefit, such as public conveyances, railroad depots, wharves, inns, restaurants, and theaters, may be said to be affected with public interest. The police power is duly exercised not only for safety and health, but sometimes also for public comfort. So in directing the heating of cars or depots, restricting the number of passengers to be carried in a car, regulating the landing of vessels at wharves, and requiring women attending theatrical performances to remove their hats." Freund on Police Power, § 175.

[3] Generally speaking, it is well settled that the Legislature has the same authority over the theatrical business as over any other lawful private business. Besides the requirement of a license, it is authorized to regulate the conduct of places of public amusement, where the public health, safety, morality, comfort, and tranquility are concerned and the general welfare requires. This is the exercise of police power, which has always been declared by the courts as that inherent and plenary power in the state which enables it to prohibit all things hurtful to the comfort, safety, and welfare of society. The "general welfare clause" contained in the charter of the city of Atlanta confers upon the municipality authority to pass ordinances "for the prevention of disorderly conduct and conduct liable to disturb the peace and tranquility of any citizen," and such as "may seem to [it] proper for the security of the peace, health, order, and good government of said city." City Code, § 33. Under this welfare clause we think the state conferred upon the city the authority to adopt the ordinance in question, provided it is an appropriate measure calculated to promote the comfort, safety, and welfare of the citizens generally, and of their peace, tranquillity, and comfort in places of public amusement.

The plaintiff in error in this case was proprietor of what is known as a "moving picture show" in the city of Atlanta. This character of amusement has become one of the most popular methods of recreation and pleasure, and is resorted to almost universally by all classes of citizens. The business is clearly lawful, as well as entertaining, and sometimes instructive, and the public has the right to resort to these places, and, while there, to be protected in the full enjoyment furnished by this class of entertainment. It is a matter of common knowledge that the style of modern hats worn by ladies, if permitted to be worn by them while the performance is in progress, will prevent those who may be so unfortunate as to sit in the rear of ladies from seeing the stage or from enjoying the spectacular entertainment there presented, which is a most important part of the performance. Nothing more greatly mars the pleasure of an entertainment, or disturbs the comfort of those who may be so unfortunate as to be located behind these obstructions, or more irritably disturbs or interferes with the comfort of the audience attending the theaters or moving picture shows, than these large hats worn by ladies, which in many cases completely obstruct the view of the performance. The spectacular is the principal part of moving picture shows. The evil aimed at by this ordinance, the mischief it was intended to prevent, and the nuisance it was passed to abate, all clearly show that the ordinance in question is within the police power of the city and is authorized by the "general welfare clause" of its charter.

Nor do we think that the ordinance is an unwarranted interference with the right of the citizen to conduct his private business in such manner as he may see proper. All places conducted by private citizens where the public are congregated are protected by public authority, and those located in the city are under police surveillance. This is not an interference with the right of the proprietor to operate his private business, but is simply a requirement that he shall operate it in such manner as not to disturb the public tranquillity, peace, and comfort of those who may be assembled there. The proprietors, or those who operate such establishments, have themselves the right to make any reasonable rules and regulations for the orderly conduct of such places, and, where they cannot effectually do so, it becomes the duty of the municipality to interfere and make such regulations as will secure the orderly conduct of such places and the peaceful and full enjoyment of those who have a right to assemble at such places. Neither is the ordinance unreasonable because it imposes upon the proprietor a burdensome duty which he cannot enforce. If the ordinance is lawful, he can enforce it by simply calling to his aid the police of the city to arrest any lady who refuses to obey the regulation and remove her hat. Besides, it is a matter of common knowledge that the ladies of our country are always amenable to reasonable requests conducing to the comfort of others.

The ordinance is not discriminatory because it does not include men within its operation. Men do not need any regulation on this subject. Public opinion, which demands that the man shall take off his hat in the presence of ladies, is sufficient, and does not need the aid of any police regulation. If it were the fashion for men to wear hats of such description as those worn by ladies in this day and to keep them on in public places, could it be doubted that there would be a loud and vociferous demand on the part of the ladies for the abatement of such a nuisance? But we will not extend the discussion. We hold that the ordinance in question, reasonably construed, is clearly within the police power of the city of Atlanta, that it does not discriminate, that it does not impose on the proprietor of such places any unnecessary or unusual hardship, and that it is in the interest of public order and comfort.

[2] It is contended that the evidence fails to show a violation of the ordinance; that the ladies present did remove their hats during the performance, except two, who sat on the rear seat; and that these two put their hats on preparatory to leaving the house, and just before they left. If this was all the evidence, we do not think it would show a violation of the ordinance, reasonably construed. The purpose of the ordinance is to give to all in the house a full opportunity to see all the performance, and to prevent the shutting off of the view of the stage by the enormous hats worn by the women. The terms of the ordinance are that the hats should be kept removed during the performance. It is not intended to prevent the ladies from replacing their hats inside the house, or while in their seats, if they do so preparatory to leaving, and do in fact leave the house. This is not all the evidence. It is true that only two ladies kept their hats on, but they remained in their seats with their hats on for nearly an hour during the performance. Besides, there is some evidence from which it might have been inferred that there was no attempt to enforce the ordinance until the proprietor discovered the presence of the author of the ordinance, who presumptively reported the violation of the ordinance. While the direct and positive evidence did not show a very flagrant disobedience of the law, there was enough to warrant conviction.

Judgment affirmed.

HOWARD v. CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. (No. 3,386.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 4, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. TORTS (§ 6)—BREACH OF CONTRACT.

Where the result of a contract is to create a relationship as to which the law imposes certain specific duties, a violation of one of these duties may give a cause of action in tort in favor of the party to whom the duty is owing. But ordinarily a breach of contract, as such, gives rise only to an action ex contractu. For a railroad company, at one of its agencies, to accept money from a person under a contract to deliver to another person at another time and place a railroad ticket creates only a contractual relationship between the person first named and the company, and a breach of the contract and a failure to furnish the ticket at the time mentioned does not give rise to an action in tort.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Torts, Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

2. CONTRACTS (§ 177*)—CARRIERS (§ 236*)—PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT—ACTION FOR BREACH.

A father in one city, being desirous that his son in another city should be furnished railroad transportation, went to the office of the railroad company in his own city and made an agreement with the agent, whereby the father deposited with the agent the usual fare, under an agreement that transportation would be furnished at once to the son in the other city through telegraphic means, and the company failed to furnish the transportation to the son. Held, that the father has a right to sue for the breach of the contract; but that he can recover only such damages as were in contemplation of the parties at the time the contract was made.

Error from City Court of Columbus; G. Y. Tigner, Judge.

Action by W. H. Howard against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

D. L. Parmer and Davis & Davis, for plaintiff in error. C. E. Battle and Howell Hollis, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The petition alleged that the defendant company is a corporation existing under the laws of this state, owning and operating certain railway lines for the carriage of passengers, and also certain telegraph lines between the cities of Columbus and Atlanta. The plaintiff was in Columbus and had a 13 year old son in Atlanta, and he desired that the son should come to Columbus without delay. The plaintiff went to the company's office in Columbus and paid to the company's agent $2.77, for which the agent promised to telegraph a "railway ticket" to the son in Atlanta. Petitioner alleges that the defendant company was guilty of certain unreasonable and negligent delay in the delivery of the telegram and the ticket. The son, not having received the ticket, did not come at once, and this caused the father anxiety; he inquired of the railway company's agent at Columbus, and the latter told him that the telegram and ticket had been sent. His anxiety became so great that he went to Atlanta and incurred certain expenses and lost three days from his work. He sued for these expenses; also for mental pain and suffering caused by his anxiety at his son's not coming in response to his sending the ticket by telegraph. Certain demurrers, both general and special, were filed. The court held that damages for the mental pain and suffering could not be recovered. As to the other damages alleged in the petition, the court sustained certain special demurrers on account of the indefiniteness of allegation, and gave the plaintiff opportunity to amend. The plaintiff refused to amend, and the court dismissed the entire petition. The plaintiff excepts.

[1] The petition leaves it somewhat doubtful as to whether the action is brought ex delicto or ex contractu. However, we think that the court properly dismissed it in either event. The plaintiff, in order to sustain his right to sue in tort, cites the Civil Code 1910, § 4403(3), where it is said that a tort may be the violation of some private obligation by which damage accrues to the individual, and upon section 4406, which provides: "Private duties may arise either from statute, or flow from relations created by contract express or implied. The violation of any such specific duty, accompanied with damage, gives a right of action." These sections merely declare the doctrine (well recognized in our decisions) that if the result of a contract is to create a relationship between the parties, and there are certain duties which the law attaches to that relationship, the breach of one of these duties may give rise to an action in tort. For instance, a person makes a contract with a railroad company for transportation over one of its lines; the contract creates the relationship of carrier and passenger; the law attaches to that relationship certain duties, and a neglect of one of these duties gives a cause of action. Likewise, if one person hires himself into the service of another for the performance of labor, the relationship of master and servant is created by the contract. The law imposes upon the master certain duties under that relationship and a breach of one of those duties may give a cause of action. But it is not to be contended that every contract creates such a relationship, or that the breach of every contract gives a cause of action in tort. The duty, for a breach of which an action ex delicto lies, must be a duty imposed by law as to some relationship, general or special, as applied to that class of cases where the alleged duty arises out of a contract. For instance, if one promises to pay another a given sum of money by a named day, the contract creates a duty to pay; but a breach of that duty is not a tort.

The terms of the contract between the plaintiff and the railroad company in this case are not very explicitly alleged, but we think that we understand what the pleader means to say; and, as we understand it, what he charges is that he paid to the defendant's agent in Columbus the price of a ticket from Atlanta to Columbus, with the understanding that the agent at Columbus would cause the ticket to be furnished to the plaintiff's son in Atlanta, by sending a certain telegram from Columbus to Atlanta, so that the son in Atlanta could secure the necessary evidence that his transportation had been paid for. This certainly did not create the relationship of carrier and passenger between the plaintiff and the company, nor do we conceive of any relationship that it created, other than the mere ordinary relationship of promisor and promisee; and we do not think that the transaction was such as to give rise to an action in tort.

[2] 2. We think that the petition did allege a breach of contract, and if legal damages had been alleged a cause of action might have been asserted. The defendant in error contends that if a contract was made the cause of action for the breach of it existed in favor of the son, and not in favor of the father, and relies upon the cases of Aiken v. Sou. Ry. Co., 118 Ga. 118, 44 S. E. 828, 62 L. R. A. 666, 98 Am. St. Rep. 107, and Ga., Carolina & Northern Ry. Co. v. Brown, 120 Ga. 380, 47 S. E. 942. The first headnote in the Aiken Case, which states the substance of what is held in both of these cases, is as follows: "While a husband may make with a railway company a contract for the safe carriage of his wife, the law will not imply such a contract from the mere purchase of an ordinary ticket by the husband for the wife. In such a case the law raises an implied contract for safe carriage in favor of the wife only."

However, the present case is clearly distinguishable from those cases, and it falls squarely within the purview of the decision in the case of Ogles v. Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Ry. Co., 130 Ga. 430, 60 S. E. 1048, 124 Am. St. Rep. 175. The headnote, which states the substance of the ruling in that case, is as follows: "A. paid his own money to a railroad agent, for which the agent agreed to issue a railroad ticket and cause it to be delivered at a distant place to B., the married daughter of A., to be used by B. in traveling over the road of the agent's principal, in coming to the home of A. The agent failed to issue the ticket, or to cause a ticket to be issued and delivered to B. Because of failure to receive the ticket, B. was delayed in making the trip, and suffered injury. Suit was instituted against the railroad company by B., for damages alleged to have resulted from a breach of the contract. Held, that there was no privity of contract between B. and the railroad company, and that the petition was open to general demurrer." In the course of the opinion it is said: "There were but two parties to this agreement, the plaintiff's father and the defendant." It is further said in the opinion: "It is alleged that there was a breach of this contract by failure to issue the ticket, and by failure to furnish the plaintiff with transportation. The effect of such allegations was to allege a breach of the contract between the plaintiff's father and the defendant. Clearly any right of action thereunder for injury arising from breach of this contract was in the plaintiff's father, who made it. Had the contract been so far executed by the defendant as to issue a ticket and deliver it to the plaintiff, the plaintiff, by virtue of holding the ticket, might have been introduced as a party, and for a breach of duty thereafter occurring might recover, under the ruling in Georgia, C. & N. Ry. Co. v. Brown, 120 Ga. 380, 47 S. E. 492, and Aiken v. Southern Ry. Co., 118 Ga. 118, 44 S. E. 828, 62 L. R. A. 666, 98 Am. St. Rep. 107."

Construing the case as an action ex contractu, the damages sued for were too remote. They were not such damages as were naturally in the contemplation of the parties at the time of the making of the contract.

Judgment affirmed.

1. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 3*)—RIGHT TO REMEDY—IMMATERIAL MISTAKE.

Any mistake consisting of some unintentional act or omission and manifestly a mere clerical error, in no sense changing the contract or the relations of the parties thereto, is relievable at law, and there is no necessity to resort to a court of equity for the purpose of reforming the contract.

Russell, J., dissenting.

Error from City Court of Nashville; W. D. Bule, Judge.

Action by J. W. Gaulding against H. O. Baker. From a judgment dismissing the petition, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The petition alleges that, as a buyer and seller of cotton, the plaintiff made a contract with one Harmon C. Baker, by which the latter contracted and sold to him 65 bales of cotton at the average weight of 500 pounds per bale. The contract is made the basis of the action, and a copy thereof is attached to the petition, which seeks to recover $1,452 as the difference between the contract price of the cotton and its market value at the time fixed by the contract for its delivery. It is plainly to be seen that the action depends for its existence wholly upon the contract. The contract provides: "Should either party to this contract fail or refuse to carry out his or their part of same, on the day specified, time being of the essence of this contract, it is understood and agreed that the party of the second part, upon making tender of said cotton and the refusal of said J. W. Gaulding to accept same and settle at the price above contracted for, shall be entitled to liquidated damages in an amount equal to the difference between the price herein contracted for and the actual value of the same grade of cotton in Tifton on the day of such tender of cotton, and should the said party of the second part fail and refuse to deliver said cotton on the day mentioned above for its delivery, it is understood and agreed that the said Harmon C. Baker [the defendant] shall be entitled to liquidated damages in an amount equal to the difference between the actual value of the same grade of cotton in Tifton, Ga., on the date of delivery agreed upon in this contract, and the price herein contracted for."

In that portion of the contract above quoted which it would naturally be supposed would express the plaintiff's right to recover against Baker it is to be seen that the damages are payable instead to Baker himself. It is insisted that it is manifest that this is a palpable mistake, and that it was the intention of the parties in filling in the name of the party in the printed contract to insert Gaulding's name where Harmon's appears. It is contended, on the other hand, that this error, if an error, must be corrected by an equitable proceeding to reform the contract, and that the city court is without jurisdiction to afford such affirmative relief. The lower court took this view of the question and dismissed the petition on demurrer, and this is assigned as error.

Fulwood & Murray, for plaintiff in error.
Denmark & Griffin and Alexander & Gary, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The mistake in the contract was manifestly a lapsus penæ, and no reformation of the contract was necessary. In Thompson v. Hall & Long, 67 Ga. 630, it is held that: "Any mistake consisting of some unintentional act, or omission, or error, is relievable in equity, and also now at law. We scarcely regard this an open question in this court." A suit was brought by Hall & Long on a bond which was on its face payable to Hull & Long instead of to Hall & Long, and it is said in the opinion that "the mistake in making the bond sued on payable to Hull & Long instead of to Hall & Long cannot be doubted, from the whole of the surrounding circumstances," and that "such a mistake is relievable in equity beyond a doubt, and why not at law under our liberal statute, with proper averments?" This case seems to be much in point, and if proof of the mistake made, to wit, the writing of the obligees in the bond as Hull & Long instead of Hall & Long, was permissible in a court of law, it seems clear that it would have been entirely proper to have proved by parol evidence that the insertion of the name of Harmon C. Baker in the place where that of J. W. Gaulding should have been inserted in the contract which is the basis of the suit in this case was simply a clerical error. See, also, the case of Shaver v. McLendon, 26 Ga. 228, where a forthcoming bond was made payable to James B. Shaver instead of to William B. Shaver, and it was held that William B. Shaver might sue at law and show the mistake. So in McCrary v. Caskey, 27 Ga. 54, where a promissory note dated in December was expressed to be payable on the "25th day of December next," and parol evidence was offered to show that the 25th day of December intended was the 25th day of the same December in which the note was made, it was held that this parol evidence ought to have been received. Jackson v. Johnson, 67 Ga. 168, was a suit on an administrator's bond which purported to be for $150, and parol evidence was admitted to show that the bond was intended to be for $150,000; and in this case it was held that "what was the true intention of the parties to the contract is always admissible in case of alleged clerical mistakes," etc.

[2] But we think the error in this case was so manifestly a clerical one that even parol evidence to prove the fact was not necessary. See, also, Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. v. Speer, 32 Ga. 550, 79 Am. Dec. 305. The cardinal rule of construction is to ascertain the intention of the parties. Civil Code 1910, § 4268. And another rule of construction is that "the construction which will uphold a contract in whole and in every part is to be preferred, and the whole contract should be looked to in arriving at the construction of any part." Civil Code 1910, § 4268, par. 3. Bearing in mind these two rules of construction, and considering the contract in its entirety, it is manifest that the insertion of the name of Harmon C. Baker in the contract where that of J. W. Gaulding should have been was a clerical error, and that the name of J. W. Gaulding was intended to be inserted in that place. The contract is made by the two parties Gaulding and Baker, and Gaulding is designated in the contract as "party of the first part," and Baker as "party of the second part," and these parties are so referred to throughout the entire contract, and, in fixing the liability of either party in the event of a breach of the contract, it is recited: "Should the party of the second part [who unquestionably was Harmon C. Baker] fail and refuse to deliver said cotton on the day mentioned above for its delivery, it is understood and agreed that the said Harmon C. Baker shall be entitled to liquidated damages." Of course, it meant that a breach of the contract on the part of Harmon C. Baker, party of the second part, to deliver the cotton as agreed on would entitle the other party to the contract, J. W. Gaulding, to liquidated damages. So manifestly is this a mere clerical error, when we consider the contract as a whole, that it seems to us that it is a mere quibbling technicality to compel a resort to a court of equity to reform the contract and to correct a clerical mistake where the mistake does not change any of the terms of the contract, or the subject-matter of the contract, but is simply an unintentional substitution of the name of one party where, by the contract, the name of the other party should have been inserted, and was intended to be inserted.

It is wholly unreasonable to compel a resort to a court of equity to correct a mistake so palpable, and which does not in any manner affect the validity of the contract or leave in any doubt whatever who were the respective parties thereto and their respective relations to the contract. An examination of the contract will show that there were other clerical mistakes equally serious, if the word "serious" can be applied to mistakes of this trivial character. In one part of the contract Gaulding, who should have been designated as "the party of the first part," is incorrectly designated as "the party of the second part," and so Harmon C. Baker is designated as "party of the first part" when he should have been designated as "party of the second part." These are simply clerical mistakes not affecting the legality of the contract or rendering in the slightest degree doubtful the relations of the parties to each other in the contract, the one as buyer and the other as seller, for it is manifest from the contract, itself, about which there could not be the slightest doubt, that Gaulding was the buyer of the cotton mentioned in the contract, and Baker was the seller. And it follows that if Baker tendered the cotton at the time and place fixed by the contract, and Gaulding refused to accept it, Baker was entitled to the liquidated damages fixed by the contract; and, if Baker neglected or refused to tender it at the time and place fixed by the contract, then Gaulding was entitled to the liquidated damages as fixed by the contract. And, besides, the damages as liquidated by the contract are the measure of damages as fixed by law, flowing from a breach thereof, and an agreement was entirely unnecessary. The contract recites that "the party of the second part," upon making tender of such cotton and the refusal of said J. W. Gaulding to accept the same and settle at the price above contracted for, shall be entitled to liquidated damages in an amount equal to the difference between the price herein contracted for and the actual value of the same grade of cotton in Tifton on the day of such tender of the cotton, and, should the said party of the second part fail and refuse to deliver said cotton on the day mentioned above for its delivery, then "the said Harmon C. Baker [of course it should have been J. W. Gaulding] shall be entitled to liquidated damages in an amount equal to the difference between the actual value of the same grade of cotton in Tifton, Ga., on the date of the delivery agreed upon in this contract, and the price herein contracted for." This is the measure of the damages fixed by the law for the breach of a contract of this character. Wrenn, Whitehurst & Co. v. Deveney, Hood & Co., 74 Ga. 421; Erwin v. Harris, 87 Ga. 336, 13 S. E. 513 (5). Judgment reversed.

RUSSELL, J. (dissenting). The action was brought to recover damages resulting upon the breach of a contract which is pleaded. In my opinion the plaintiff cannot recover upon the contract in its present form, for the reason that the damages consequent upon its breach, if any, are expressly payable to another person expressly named, instead of to the plaintiff, and, even if this condition of the writing is due to mistake, a city court is without jurisdiction to reform or correct the writing. In my opinion, therefore, the lower court did not err in dismissing the petition.

MILLER v. STATE. (No. 3,092.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 4, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HOMICIDE (§§ 122, 301*)—JUSTIFICATION—DEFENSE OF ANOTHER—INSTRUCTIONS.

While a father cannot lawfully kill one merely because he has had unlawful sexual intercourse with his daughter, still he may justify the homicide by showing that it was necessary in order to prevent further acts of fornication. In a prosecution for homicide, where there is evidence such as to authorize the jury to find that the deceased had been maintaining illicit sexual relations with the defendant's minor unmarried daughter, and had threatened to kill the father if he interfered, and that even after the father had become apprised of what had taken place, and was taking guard to prevent the further debauching of his child, the defendant, in company with his daughter, came upon the deceased under such circumstances as to indicate that he was endeavoring to continue the illicit relationship, and would likely seek to do so, notwithstanding the father's protest, an instruction of the court to the jury in the following language was erroneous: "The killing, if necessary, or apparently so to a reasonable mind, in order to protect the daughter at the time of the killing, would be justifiable. The killing must be necessary, or apparently so, to prevent the deceased from accomplishing his purpose then and there." The qualification contained in the words "then and there" rendered the instruction erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 177-181, 633; Dec. Dig. §§ 122, 301.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 169*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—STATEMENT BY DECEASED.

There being evidence that when, just prior to the killing, the accused met the deceased and inquired of him as to his whereabouts on the night before (it appearing that the deceased had attempted to enter the bedroom of the daughter of the accused on the night before), the accused made a movement as if to draw his revolver, with which he was armed, it was error to exclude from the jury testimony to the effect that in a conversation prior to the day of the killing, when a friend had warned the deceased that he had better keep away from the house of the accused, the deceased had replied that he could shoot about as quick as the accused could. This evidence and other similar evidence, which was improperly excluded, tended to show the animus of the deceased at the time of the fatal encounter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 341-350; Dec. Dig. § 169.*]

3. WITNESSES (§ 370*)—CREDIBILITY—COMPETENCY OF EVIDENCE.

While it is generally relevant to prove the state of a witness' feelings toward the parties to a case, still, where a witness had testified on behalf of the defendant, it was improper for the court to allow the state to prove by other persons that this witness had made certain disparaging remarks concerning the defendant as to matters not connected with the case on trial.

Error from Superior Court, Telfair County; J. H. Martin, Judge.

W. A. Miller was convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and brings error. Reversed.

W. L. & Warren Grice, C. A. Glawson, and Eschol Graham, for plaintiff in error. E. D. Graham, Sol. Gen., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. This record discloses one of the saddest and most mournful tragedies which has ever fallen under our observation. An aged father, who was educating at a religious school an only daughter, who was the idol of his old age, was shocked by the discovery that this daughter had been ruined. She was less than 17 years of age. To add to the horror of the situation disclosed to the parent's consciousness was the fact that the debauching of his daughter had been frequently carried on under his own roof, and that the bedroom of his young daughter, which he had believed to be a retreat of innocence, was a den of pollution whose very presence disgraced his home. The aged father was forced to realize that the fair daughter, whose purity and grace might have served to counterbalance his own shortcomings, lived only to bring his gray hairs to the grave in disgrace, and that her very life was but a living death. He slew the man, and for this homicide was convicted and sentenced for voluntary manslaughter. The writ of error protests the judgment refusing a new trial.

[1] Whatever the bent of our natural human sympathies, or however much as individuals we might be surprised at the verdict of a jury which would condemn a father to penal servitude for slaying the seducer of his daughter in a case where there was unimpeached evidence supporting the presumption that nothing but death would discontinue the adulterous relations, still we should not be at all disposed to interfere with the judgment if it was plain that the verdict of guilty was rendered by the jury—as it might have been—because the testimony upon this point in justification of the homicide was disbelieved; this for the reason that there might be no theory deducible from the evidence credited by the jury under which the defendant could be held to be wholly blameless in slaying the deceased. In other words, where a jury, with full cognizance and exact knowledge of the law, reaches a verdict with evidence to support it, this court cannot interfere. But whenever it appears that the verdict of the jury (who must receive the law from the court) may not have been due to disbelief of testimony or to the choice of one view of the evidence in preference to another view, and was likely the result of a misapprehension of the law, directly traceable to the absence of instruction or to erroneous instructions, then a new trial is required. Every defendant who is convicted of crime, where material instructions pertinent to his defense are withheld or erroneously presented, must be presumed to have been injured and deprived of his rights, if evidence which would have authorized his acquittal was submitted upon the trial.

After a very painstaking review of the record in this case, we are of the opinion that the judgment refusing a new trial was error. There is no "unwritten law" in this state in criminal cases. The application of any so-called "unwritten law" in the trial of a criminal case is itself a rape upon justice. However, the right of a parent to protect his child's virtue is plainly written in our law, and, so far from being confined to a present injury, the law lengthens the father's arm to protect his helpless offspring from impending danger; the right of protection is valueless if it exists only for the present, when all the world can see that the danger, though not immediately present, is just ahead and must be prevented, or disaster will ensue. The duty of protection is not performed, unless all is done to render protection effective. A father is not only charged with the duty of protecting his minor child, but is responsible to society for the child's conduct during minority, and entitled, as a matter of law, to control it for the protection of society and of the child alike.

The charge of the trial judge in the present case was in many respects well-nigh perfect, but it failed to submit to the jury the right of a father to protect his minor daughter from continued adulterous relations with the man who had seduced her, if the jury believed that this protection, in the particular circumstances of the case, would be an instance standing upon a like footing of reason and justice with the defense of her life or of his own; and the judge restricted the right of such protection by instructing the jury that the father would only have had the right to kill the deceased if he had reason to believe that the act of fornication was to be committed at the time and place of the killing—"then and there." According to the testimony, two distinct defenses were available to the defendant and were raised by him—the defense of his own person against an apparent attempt on the part of the deceased to shoot him with a pistol, and the defense of his immature child against further defilement at the hands of one whose boastfulness of the ruin he had wrought, though unknown to the father, left little reason for doubt that he would continue the pursuit of the object of his lust, and finally work the irretrievable ruin of the defendant's daughter.

[2] We shall not attempt to recapitulate the several assignments of error contained in the 39 grounds of the amended motion for new trial, because, in so far as the exceptions taken are meritorious, all of them appear to turn upon the doctrine of actual self-defense, or the right of a parent to protect his child; and this is true whether the assignment of error relates to the exclusion or admission of testimony, or the refusal of requisite instructions, or the giving of instructions alleged to be erroneous. The charge of the court upon every feature of the case, so far as the right of the defendant to defend himself is concerned, is not only without error, but is a model presentation of the law as applicable to the case. It is so clear, so full, and so manifestly fair to the defendant as to leave no ground for complaint. We think, however, that the court erred as to this branch of the case in rejecting testimony sought to be adduced by the defendant which tended to show the probable intention of the deceased with reference to the pistol which, according to the testimony in behalf of the defendant, he attempted to draw. These sayings of the deceased, though not communicated to the defendant, were competent for the purpose of illustrating the quo animo of the deceased's act in reaching for his pistol. Previous statements of one who participates in a rencounter may be used for the purpose of comparing what he actually did with what he himself stated he intended to do, in order to enable the jury to determine what his intentions were in the act which he actually did or attempted to do. It was most material to the defendant in this case to corroborate his statement and the testimony to the effect that the deceased attempted to draw a pistol before he fired the fatal shot, and to that end he could show that the deceased had threatened to kill him if he ever interfered with his illicit relations with his daughter. The testimony that he had made such threats was relevant to this very matter, and therefore admissible. For the same reasons the declarations of the deceased as to his improper relations with a woman, easily identifiable by the circumstances as being the defendant's daughter, were admissible.

[3] We think also that the court erred in permitting the state to examine one of the witnesses, over the defendant's objection, as to statements alleged to have been previously made by that witness, tending to discredit the witness by raising the inference that he had been unduly influenced, and laying the foundation for impeaching him by proof of contradictory statements in regard to matters immaterial to the issue on trial. In every judicial investigation, great latitude should be allowed in the inquiry and search for truth, and especially should the right of cross-examination, thorough and sifting, not be abridged; but the scope of inquiry should not be permitted to extend to the introduction of irrelevant testimony, the only reasonable effect of which must be to create prejudice against one of the parties.

In the present case, the witness Parker was introduced by the defense for the purpose of testifying to threats made by the deceased against the life of the defendant, and testified that he had a conversation upon one occasion with the deceased, in which the latter said that he did not like old man Miller, and that if he ever said anything out of the way to him he was going to kill him, or if he ever said anything about his daughter he was going to kill him. This witness was permitted to testify, without objection, that he did not tell the defendant about the conversation until about two months after the killing, and that he at one time lived with the defendant, but moved away, and after the killing moved back to Miller's place. Upon cross-examination, and over the defendant's objection, the witness was interrogated as to certain language which indicated great bias on the part of Parker against the defendant, as the means of discrediting his testimony and impeaching him before the jury. The witness was asked if he had not had a previous conversation with Jim Doughty, in which he stated that he had moved away from old man Miller's place to keep from killing Miller, or to keep Miller from killing him, and that he wanted Miller hung and buried standing on his head, and that he would give the prosecutor $10 to help hang the defendant. The witness Parker denied ever having had such conversation, or that he ever made such statement, and thereupon the state introduced witnesses who swore, for the purpose of impeaching Parker, that he had in their presence a conversation in which he used the language which he denied he had uttered.

It is clear that this testimony was not relevant, and that the prior conversation was not admissible. It would have been competent for the state to show any motive which would tend to discredit the witness in the eyes of the jury. The witness could have been asked as to the state of his feelings toward the defendant, but this could not be shown by hearsay; nor could the witness be impeached by the proof of contradictory statements as to matters immaterial. The court went even further than this, and allowed the state to prove that the witness Parker had made broader statements than those with reference to which he had been interrogated. We think that the witness Parker should at least have been asked, first, the state of his feelings toward the defendant, and, if it was stated that they were good, it then might have been shown that his testimony was procured or influenced by corrupt motives; but it was not competent to go into the details of the conversation.

As to the second branch of the defendant's case, the instructions of the court were defective, in that the jury were not told, as the defendant requested they should be, that if the defendant, having just learned of the seduction of the daughter before he encountered the deceased in the road, and having knowledge that the place where he (the defendant) then sat in his buggy was an accustomed meeting place of the guilty couple, really believed that the purpose of the deceased was to continue his illicit relations with the daughter, and had good reason to believe that nothing but the death of the deceased would prevent the continuance of such relations, he had the right to kill the deceased. And, further, the jury should have been told that it was for them to consider and determine whether, under the evidence in the case, the danger of a repetition of the acts of fornication was sufficiently grave to create an instance standing upon the same footing of reason and justice as the right of actual self-defense.

The judge instructed the jury that "the killing, if necessary, or apparently so, to a reasonable mind, in order to protect the daughter at the time of the killing, would be justifiable. The killing must be necessary, or apparently so, to prevent the decedent from accomplishing his purpose then and there." We think the plaintiff in error justly complains of this charge as too greatly restricting his right to protect his daughter. The error consists in telling the jury that the defendant would only be justifiable in killing the deceased to prevent the sexual intercourse at that time and place. The act of sexual intercourse is very rarely, if ever, voluntarily committed in the presence of a third person, and the cases where participants in the sexual act are detected while in the very act of copulation are so infrequent that to say that one who would have the right to prevent the intercourse can only do so when it is about to be indulged under his eyes would preserve only the shadow of the right and destroy its substance. According to testimony in this case, the deceased had passed the defendant's house in his buggy earlier in the morning. It is easily inferable that he knew that the young girl would go to the commencement at Helena, and he knew the road she would have to travel, and that she would have to pass the point where he stopped his buggy. He perhaps did not know that the father would be accompanying his daughter, for this was unusual. He had been accustomed to meet her there alone. His presence at that particular time and place at least indicated an intention on his part to repeat the illicit act. The numerous notes which passed between the parties, and which are to be found in the record, give evidence that the defendant's daughter was completely under the influence of the young man, and that he was determined to continue his relations with her at any cost, even to the length of taking her father's life if the father detected the criminal intercourse.

Surely section 75 of the Penal Code, which authorizes the jury to justify a homicide if in their opinion, upon their oaths, it stands upon the same footing of reason and justice as the instances of self-defense which are previously enumerated, was not originally inserted into the body of our laws without any purpose or object. The fact that it has been inserted into every succeeding Code, and stands to-day, embracing, by the universality of the word "all," every instance where a homicide has been committed, and where the circumstances of the killing may appeal to the conscience of the jury as placing it in the same category as defense of person, habitation, or property, clearly shows that it is not the legislative intention to treat this law as a dead letter. In the opinion of the writer, this Code section was intended to supply the equity of the criminal law, and cover those cases where the law, by reason of its universality, is deficient. This would seem to have been the opinion of Chief Justice Lumpkin, in the Biggs Case, 29 Ga. 723, 76 Am. Dec. 49, when he asked the question, "What American jury has ever convicted a man for slaying the seducer of his wife or daughter?" But, though a killing cannot be justified, if a wrong, no matter how heinous, has been completed, it is still justifiable to prevent certain wrongs which may be prevented, even if it cost human life to prevent their infliction. One may shoot and kill a burglar, to prevent the burglar from entering his house; it is for the jury to say whether a father endowed with the right to protect his daughter has not an equal right to prevent her continued defilement and disgrace. The principle underlying both instances is the same. The only question which could arise is, Which is the more valuable, the preservation of the chattels within the house, or the protection of its inmates?

Judgment reversed.

THOMPSON v. SLOSS-SHEFFIELD STEEL & IRON CO. (No. 3,017.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 4, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

SALES (§ 359*)—REMEDY OF SELLER—ACTION FOR PRICE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

No error of law is complained of, and the evidence demanded the judgment rendered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 359.*]

Error from City Court of Thomasville; W. H. Hammond, Judge.

Action by the Sloss-Sheffield Steel & Iron Company against C. L. Thompson, doing business as the Thomasville Iron Works. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Roscoe Luke, for plaintiff in error. W. J. Hammond and Theo Titus, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The Sloss-Sheffield Steel & Iron Company brought suit in the city court of Thomasville against C. L. Thompson, doing business as the Thomasville Iron Works, on an account for a car load of pig iron for $464 and interest. A bill of particulars was attached to the petition. The defendant admitted by his plea that he was doing business as the Thomasville Iron Works, but denied that he was indebted to the plaintiff on the account sued on, or for any other amount for the pig iron. On the trial the plaintiff introduced as a witness the defendant, who testified that he was doing business as the Thomasville Iron Works; that he had received the car load of pig iron which had been shipped to him by the plaintiff, under a written contract; and that he had agreed to pay the plaintiff for all the pig iron $16 per ton, with interest thereon. This amounted to $464, according to the bill of particulars, which the defendant admitted. He also admitted that the iron was received by the Thomasville Iron Works, or by him operating as the Thomasville Iron Works, and that it was melted by the iron works; but he stated that the iron was of no value to him, and that neither he nor the Thomasville Iron Works owed the plaintiff anything for the pig iron. This was all the evidence, and the judge, trying the case without the intervention of a jury, found in favor of the plaintiff the principal sum sued for, with the interest due thereon. The defendant filed a motion for a new trial, based upon the general grounds alone, and the refusal of the motion is assigned as error.

In our opinion the evidence demanded the finding. The defendant admitted receiving the iron. He admitted the agreement to pay for the iron the price for which the suit was brought. He admitted that the pig iron was used by him. He did not file any plea of payment or of partial payment, nor did he set up total or partial failure of consideration. His only defense was that the pig iron was of no value to him; that neither he nor the Thomasville Iron Works owed the plaintiff anything therefor. It would be a remarkable situation if, after having admitted the receipt of the goods and the use of them, and the agreement to pay for them as set out in the suit, he should be permitted to escape payment by the simple statement that the iron was of no value to him, and that he owed nothing therefor. This general statement, denying indebtedness, is in the teeth of the facts clearly proving indebtedness, and in fact has no probative value whatever. He certainly owed for the iron, under his admission, unless it was worthless, and he made no plea of total failure of consideration. Having admitted that he received and used the iron, if it was not entirely worthless, he would owe its real value, and his duty was to plead and prove any partial failure of consideration. While the brief of evidence is probably not as explicit and as full as it should have been, yet it is ample, in connection with the pleadings, to show that the defendant owed this account, and that he set up absolutely no defense.

Judgment affirmed.

McALHANY v. MURRAY et al. (DUKES et al., Interveners).

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 11, 1911.)

CORPORATIONS (§ 438*)—ELEMOSYNARY CORPORATIONS—DISSOLUTION—RIGHTS OF MEMBERS TO PROPERTY.

Persons associated as Sons of Temperance, for the purpose of promoting temperance by corporate organization, obtained a charter, in 1854, for a term of 14 years, and thereafter defendants' ancestor conveyed a lot in fee simple to the trustees of the corporation for a consideration; which was paid, and the members acquired property by their own contributions, erected a hall upon the lot for the purpose of holding its meetings, and managed the affairs of the corporation themselves. The corporation continued in possession until 1861, and the survivor of the original trustees continued in possession of the property until the expiration of the charter, and thereafter. Held, in an action of partition between the representatives of persons who were members of the corporation at the time its charter expired and the heirs of the grantor, that, under the general doctrine that on the dissolution of any corporation the corporate assets, both real and personal, should be regarded as belonging to a trust estate in the hands of those who happen to have their custody, to be disposed of by a court of equity according to the equitable rights of creditors and interested persons, and after satisfaction of all the equities the remainder to go to the state, the representatives were entitled to the property to the exclusion of the heirs of the grantor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1769-1771; Dec. Dig. § 438.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Dorchester County; B. H. Moss, Special Judge.

Action for partition by D. L. McAlhany against Louisa Murray, continued after her death against Emory Murray and others as her heirs, in which O. B. Dukes and others intervened. Judgment for plaintiff, and for defendants Murray and others against interveners, and the interveners appeal. Reversed.

Walker S. Utsey, for appellants. R. Lon. Weeks, for respondent McAlhany. Hunter A. Gibbs and J. Otey Reed, for other respondents.

WOODS, J. The question to be decided in this case is whether, upon the dissolution of a corporation created for a benevolent or social purpose, its land reverts to the grantor, or is a corporate asset, to be divided among those who are members of the corporation at the date of dissolution.

The facts are not in dispute, but it is necessary to make a statement of the manner in which the legal issue arose. A charter for 14 years was granted to St. George's Division, Sons of Temperance, by an act of incorporation of December 21, 1854. 12 Stat. 364. The purpose of the corporation is not stated in the charter but it is admitted that it was the promotion of temperance by corporate organization; and that the corporation was therefore a benevolent and social, as distinguished from a trading or business, corporation. On March 25, 1855, James George, by fee-simple deed, conveyed a lot to Andrew Myers, and other persons named in the deed, as "committee or trustees" of the corporation, for the consideration of $10, which was actually paid to him. The society erected on the lot a hall for the purpose of holding its meetings, and it flourished until 1861, when it disbanded, for the reason that most of its members had enlisted in the Confederate Army. Immediately after the war, an effort was made to resuscitate the organization, but it was unsuccessful, and the society has been practically defunct since 1861. The charter expired by its own limitation in 1868, and has never been renewed. The Sons of Temperance were in possession of the property until 1861; and D. L. McAlhany, one of the original trustees to whom the land was conveyed, continued the possession in that capacity until November 2, 1903, when he conveyed by deed to his son, D. L. McAlhany, Jr., the plaintiff in this action, all his right, title, and interest in the property. This deed was intended to convey what D. L. McAlhany supposed to be his interest as one of the three surviving members of the St. George Division of the Sons of Temperance.

James George died some time between 1868 and 1903, leaving a will, by which he devised and bequeathed all of his property to his daughter, Louisa Murray. Mrs. Murray, claiming that the title had reverted to her as the heir and devisee of James George, under a specific clause in the deed, which is not involved in the consideration of this appeal, through her husband, Emory Murray, took possession of the property in 1905. An action was commenced against her for the recovery of the property, in the name of the corporation, which was dismissed by order of the circuit court, on the ground that the corporation was defunct and could not maintain the action, and from the judgment there was no appeal. Thereafter P. L. Horn and J. A. Dukes, two of the three surviving members of the society, commenced an action to recover the property from Louisa Murray. That action was ended by the conveyance by Horn and Dukes of their interest to Mrs. Murray.

The present action for partition was commenced in 1907 by D. L. McAlhany, Jr., as grantee of his father under the deed above recited, against Mrs. Murray, as the owner of the interests of Horn and Dukes. Among other defenses, Mrs. Murray set up the claim that under the specific clause in the deed above referred to the property had reverted to her as heir and devisee of James George. Mrs. Murray died during the pendency of the action, and it was continued in the name of her heirs. The referee to whom the case was referred overruled all the defenses, and reported that the plaintiff was entitled to one-third interest and the defendants to two-thirds interest in the lot. On April 9, 1909, a decree was made, by consent of counsel, confirming the report of the referee and directing a sale of the property and a division of the proceeds, one-third to the plaintiff, McAlhany, and two-thirds to the heirs of Mrs. Murray. On June 7, 1909, an order was made in the case, allowing O. B. Dukes, M. W. Dukes, J. W. Fahey, and Margaret Shieder to intervene in the cause and set up their claim to an interest in the property as heirs of deceased persons who were members of St. George's Division of Sons of Temperance at the date of the dissolution of the corporation. Against this claim the heirs of Mrs. Murray alleged that the property, on dissolution of the corporation in 1868, had reverted by reason of such dissolution to Mrs. Murray, the heir and devisee of James George, the original grantor. The cause was referred to Wm. C. Wolfe, Esq., who held that the Murray heirs were bound by the former decree, and therefore could not avail themselves of the claim of reversion against McAlhany, but sustained the defense against the interveners. The report was confirmed by a decree of Special Judge Moss, with a slight modification not involved here. The interveners appeal, assigning error in the holding of the circuit court that the real property of St. George Division, Sons of Temperance, did not belong, on the dissolution of the corporation, to the persons who were members of it at that time but reverted to the grantor, by whom it was conveyed to the corporation. The statute of 1898, now section 1866, of Civil Code of 1902 will not be discussed or construed, for the reason that the rights of the parties in this case arose before it was enacted.

In many decided cases, dicta will be found expressing recognition of the doctrine that at common law on the dissolution of a corporation its lands revert to the grantor, but we think few cases will be found in which the point was raised and decided, and the doctrine actually applied in the disposition of property by the judgments of courts of last resort. The ancient authority relied on as supporting the doctrine is the following passage from Coke on Littleton, 13 b: "And so if land be given in fee simple to a deane and chapter, or to a major and commonalty, and to their successors, and after such body politique or corporate be dissolved, the donor shall have again the land, and not the lord by escheat. And the reason and cause of this diversity is, for that in the case of a body politique or corporate the fee simple is vested in their politique or incorporate capacity created by the policy of man, and therefore the law doth annex the condition in law to every such gift and grant, that if such body politique or incorporate be dissolved, that the donor or grantee shall re-enter for that the cause of the gift or grant falleth."

The language of Lord Coke makes it clear that the corporations which he had in mind were the religious orders and the municipal organizations of the times. The land of the religious orders was usually acquired by gift, without valuable consideration; and it was not wholly unreasonable that upon dissolution of the order the land should revert to the grantor.

Upon the dissolution of a municipal corporation, distribution of the land among the entire community would have been inconvenient, even if there had been recognition of the right of the individuals constituting a community to an interest in the land.

The older authorities follow Coke in the statement of the rule, as will be seen by reference to 2 Cruise, 493, 2 Bac. 32, 1 Bl. Com. 482, 2 Kyd on Corporations, 516. But with the conception and development of the corporation as a means of bringing together individual resources for the promotion of the innumerable enterprises of modern life came conviction of the injustice and absurdity of the doctrine. Chancellor Kent thus sets out what he calls "most injurious and distressing consequences" of the dissolution of money or trading corporations under the rules laid down by the old authorities: "An absolute and unqualified repeal, at once, of a charter of incorporation of a money or trading institution would be attended with most injurious and distressing consequences. According to the old settled law of the land, where there is no special statute provision to the contrary, upon the civil death of a corporation, all its real estate, remaining unsold, reverts back to the original grantor and his heirs. The debts due to and from the corporation are all extinguished. Neither the stockholders, nor the directors or trustees of the corporation, can recover those debts or be charged with them, in their natural capacity. All the personal estate of the corporation vests in the people, as succeeding to this right and prerogative of the crown at common law." In a note he says: "The rule of the common law has in fact become obsolete and odious. It never has been applied to insolvent or dissolved moneyed corporations in England. The sound doctrine now is, as shown by statutes and judicial decisions, that the capital and debts of banking and other moneyed corporations constitute a trust fund and pledge for the payment of creditors and stockholders, and a court of equity will lay hold of the fund and see that it be duly collected and applied. The death of a corporation no more impairs the obligation of contracts than the death of a private person." 2 Kent Com. 807.

In the leading case of Bacon v. Robertson, 59 U. S. 480, 15 L. Ed. 499, Mr. Justice Campbell for the court says, on the same subject: "For according to the doctrine of the text-writers on this subject, the consequences are visited without any discrimination; the losses are imposed upon those who are not blameworthy; and the benefits are accumulated upon those who are without desert. The effects of a dissolution of a corporation are usually described to be the reversion of the lands to those who had granted them; the extinguishment of the debts, either to or from the corporate body, so that they are not a charge nor a benefit to the members. The instances which support the dictum in reference to the lands consist of the statutes and judgments which followed the suppression of the military and religious orders of knights, and whose lands returned to those who had granted them, and did not fall to the king as an escheat; or of cases of dissolution of monasteries and other ecclesiastical foundations, upon the death of all their members; or of donations to public bodies, such as a mayor and commonalty. But such cases afford no analogy to that before us. The acquisitions of real property by a trading corporation are commonly made by a bargain and sale, for a full consideration, and without conditions in the deed; and no conditions are implied in law in reference to such conveyances. The vendor has no interest in the appropriation of the property to any specific object, nor any reversion, where the succession falls."

Of the American cases criticizing and rejecting the doctrine, we cite only a few of the more recent, in some of which the authorities are reviewed. Shayne v. Evening Post Co., 168 N. Y. 70, 61 N. E. 115, 55 L. R. A. 777, 85 Am. St. Rep. 654; Hopkins v. Crossley, 138 Mich. 561, 101 N. W. 822; Richards v. Northwestern C. & M. Co., 221 Mo. 149, 119 S. W. 953; Huber v. Martin, 127 Wis. 412, 105 N. W. 1031, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 653, 115 Am. St. Rep. 1023; Wilson v. Leary, 120 N. C. 90, 26 S. E. 630, 38 L. R. A. 240, 58 Am. St. Rep. 778; Diamond S. I. Co. v. Husbands, 8 Del. Ch. 205, 68 Atl. 240. The point has never arisen for direct decision in this state, but there are dicta to the effect that the doctrine of Lord Coke is not sound as applied to business or trading corporations.

Judicial discussion and decision, it is true, has been concerned mainly with business or trading corporations, and there are many dicta and some authorities to the effect that business corporations—that is, associations incorporated for private gain—are to be distinguished from eleemosynary associations incorporated for charitable purposes; that the grantor cannot claim a reversion of the land or the state a forfeiture of the personal property of the former, but upon dissolution of the latter reversion of the land and forfeiture of the personal property do take place. Distinctions are also drawn between private corporations conducted mainly for the benefit of their own members, such as Masons, Odd Fellows, temperance societies, and social clubs, and corporations chartered as charities for the benefit of the general public. We are not concerned in this case with public charities, but with the property of a temperance society or lodge conducted by its own members, and acquiring property by their contributions for corporate uses. Nor are we directly concerned with the question whether, upon the dissolution of a division of the Sons of Temperance, its personal property was forfeited to the state.

There are some broad and obvious lines of difference between trading or business corporations and eleemosynary corporations; but there is no such difference as makes reversion to the grantor of corporate real estate, on dissolution of the corporation, unjust and absurd in one case and fair and reasonable in the other. The difference that one kind of corporation issues shares of stock for the capital paid in, and is conducted for the purpose of making money for its shareholders, while the other receives and invests money in buildings and lands or other property for the special benefit of a class, or of the general public, and issues no stock, is no logical basis for holding that the rule of the common law has become obsolete and odious in one case and not in the other. In rapidity of development, in variety of organization and of enterprise, the modern eleemosynary corporation has well-nigh kept pace with the modern business corporation. In its development, it has reached a point entirely out of the view and conception of jurists of Lord Coke's day. Incorporated hospitals, universities, colleges, churches, fraternal societies, and social clubs buy land, construct expensive buildings, and accumulate large endowments. The idea that upon the dissolution of such a corporation the land and buildings go to one who happened to be the person who conveyed the land to the corporation seems clearly as absurd and odious as it is antiquated.

There is hardly any logical ground for rejecting the common-law rule of reversion, when considered with respect to business corporations, that does not apply with equal force, when considered with respect to eleemosynary corporations. Not only is the distinction artificial, but the attempt to apply it must lead to doubt and confusion on the bench, as well as at the bar, because of the practical difficulty of classification. There are many corporations, such as fraternal societies and other like organizations, which have both business and eleemosynary features. Such associations can be placed on one or the other side of the line between business and eleemosynary corporations only on refined distinctions about which, no doubt, courts would differ.

The next important inquiry is whether the doctrine that the personal property of a defunct eleemosynary corporation is forfeited and its land reverts to the grantor has been established by judicial decision in this state. In Elliott v. Morris, Harp. Eq. 281, heard in 1824, the litigation was between the heirs of William Elliott and the devisees under his will. No question was made as to whether there had been a reversion on the dissolution of the Baptist Church to which the land had been conveyed; on the contrary, the reversion was assumed by both parties, and the sole point decided was that the assumed reversion was to the heirs and not to the devisees of the grantor. The question now under consideration was not decided nor discussed.

The only point involved in Attorney General v. Society for the Relief of Elderly Ministers, etc., 10 Rich. Eq. 604, decided in 1859, was whether the General Assembly was prohibited by the Constitution from amending the charter of an existing corporation, so as to allow it to apply its funds to a purpose not within the terms of the original charter. The remark found in the opinion of the court, that on the dissolution of a corporation the real estate would revert to the grantor, and the personal assets would vest in the state, is nothing more than a dictum.

The circuit decree of Judge Kershaw, in St. Philip's Church v. Zion Church, 23 S. C. 297, discusses the common-law rule as laid down by Lord Coke, and holds it to be still in force in this state with respect to eleemosynary corporations. But on appeal the case was decided on other points, and the Supreme Court, speaking through Chief Justice Simpson, expressed its doubt by reserving its final opinion on the question.

It is safe to say, then, that the question is not settled by authority in this state; and we have been able to find no strong, persuasive adjudication elsewhere supporting the contention that the grantor takes the real property of an eleemosynary corporation on dissolution. In the case of the Late Corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter Day Saints v. United States, 136 U. S. 1, 10 Sup. Ct. 792, 34 L. Ed. 478, the doctrine is broadly stated by the court, as one of the grounds of the decision, that, upon the repeal of the charter of the Mormon Church, the Congress of the United States could by legislation require that the church assets be taken as reverted and forfeited property and applied to school purposes. But the archaic common-law doctrine of reverter seems a much weaker support to the judgment of the court than the violation by the church of an act of Congress, which expressly provided that violation of its terms by a corporation should result in forfeiture and escheat to the United States.

In Wilson v. Leary, 120 N. C. 90, 26 S. E. 630, 38 L. R. A. 240, 58 Am. St. Rep. 778, cited above, the question arose upon the dissolution of Oriental Lodge No. 24, I. O. O. F. The Independent Order of Odd Fellows, like other benevolent societies, has its business features, no doubt; but its main purposes as commonly understood are charitable and social. The Supreme Court of North Carolina, ignoring the supposed distinction between business and eleemosynary corporations, repudiates in emphatic language the doctrine of reverter and forfeiture, and holds that there was no reverter. In Hopkins v. Crossley, 138 Mich. 561, 101 N. W. 822, the court held that there was no forfeiture of the funds of the "Old Volunteer Fire Department of Detroit," but that on the dissolution of the corporation the funds should be distributed among the members of the association.

The true modern rule, arising out of the development in importance and variety of corporate organization and enterprise, and the principle which will be found running through nearly all modern judicial thought and expression, is that, on the dissolution of any corporation, the corporate assets, both real and personal, including debts due to the corporation, should be regarded as belonging to a trust estate in the hands of those who happen to have their custody, to be disposed of by the court of equity according to the equitable rights of interested parties. In such distribution the court considers the claims of creditors, and of any other person who may set up claims. In the adjustment of the equities, one who has donated land in whole or in part stands on the same footing as any other contributor to the permanent property of the corporation, and has no higher equity. If such grantor conveyed away his land for a money consideration alone, it is manifest that there is no foundation in equity and justice for any claim that he could make to the lands or any other property of the corporation. When all the equities are satisfied, the remainder of the property, if any, goes to the state, just as the property of the estate of an individual goes to the state, when no one appears who has any just, legal or equitable claim to it.

The following language of Mr. Justice Campbell, in Bacon v. Robertson, supra, asserting such jurisdiction of the courts of equity, was used, after giving the reasons why the old rule of forfeiture to the state and reverter to the grantor was entirely inapplicable to the modern business corporation: "These just views which have afforded to wise chancellors a sufficient motive to enlarge the scope and relax the vigor of the rules of chancery proceeding, so as to bring the civil rights of individuals, in whatever form they may exist, or however complicated or ramified, under the protection of legitimate judicial administration, have been adopted in the United States, not simply for the improvement of methods of proceeding, but also for the adjustment of rights and the assertion of responsibilities among the members of such associations." The reasons for the application of equitable principles to the distribution of the assets by a court of equity are as strong in this case as in that.

Applying the principle of equity jurisdiction to an incorporated volunteer fire company, the Supreme Court of Michigan says, in Hopkins v. Crossley, supra: "The doctrine that upon the dissolution of a corporation its real estate reverts, and its personal property goes to the crown, is a hard doctrine that courts of equity have power to relieve against, and we think that such a rule is not generally applied in this country to corporations in which the members had a pecuniary interest.

The case of Diamond, etc., Co. v. Husbands, 8 Del. Ch. 205, 68 Atl. 240, grew out of the dissolution of a business corporation, but the court discussed the subject in general terms, holding that, even if the person who conveyed to a corporation for a valuable consideration could claim the reversion on dissolution of the corporation, the naked legal title would be held by him as a mere trustee for the equitable owners of the property.

In this case, the record shows a conveyance for a valuable consideration actually paid to the grantor, and it is manifest that he and his heirs have no equitable claim to the land. The property was paid for and the building on it erected by the contributions of the St. George Division, Sons of Temperance, and there is no person before the court having any equitable claim, except those who were members of the order at the date of dissolution. It follows that such persons and their representatives are entitled to the property to the exclusion of the heirs of the grantor.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed.

FULCHER v. MOORE. (No. 3,897.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 4, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)SALES (§ 479)—REMEDIES OF SELLER—ATTACHMENT FOR PURCHASE MONEY—FRIVOLOUS DEFENSE.

M. sold F. a mule, and took a note for $190 for the purchase money, reserving title. The mule proving unsatisfactory, F. brought it back and got a horse from M., for which he agreed to give $20 more. A new note for the purchase money of the horse was drawn and turned over to F. for execution; he agreeing to have it executed by himself and another as security. F. never executed the note, but kept the horse. M. sued out an attachment for the purchase money of the horse. F. defended on the ground that he did not owe for the horse, as he had exchanged the mule for it, and that the plaintiff's only remedy was to attach the mule, which had been returned to him when the trade was rescinded, but offered no evidence. Held, that the defense was palpably frivolous, and that the verdict in the plaintiff's favor is demanded.

HARRELL v. STATE. (No. 3,097.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Aug. 4, 1911.)

*(Syllabus by the Court.)1. NO ERROR—EVIDENCE SUFFICIENT.

No error of law appears, and the verdict is fully supported by the evidence.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)2. WITNESSES (§ 286)—EXAMINATION—RECT EXAMINATION—SCOPE.

Where a witness testified on direct examination in a prosecution for being intoxicated in a place of divine worship that defendant's appearance showed that he was drunk and that he staggered as he went along, there was no error in overruling objections to his testimony on re-direct examination that he could not say whether defendant was drunk or sober only from his appearance, that he did not see him drink any liquor, but that from his appearance he was drunk.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Dec. Dig. § 286.*]

3. WITNESSES (§ 352*)—IMPEACHMENT—COMPETENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for being intoxicated at a place of divine worship, testimony of a witness for defendant that he was 17 years old, introduced to show that the state's principal witness had given to defendant's witness whisky, and was endeavoring to convict defendant to forestall a prosecution against the state's witness for furnishing liquor to a minor, was properly excluded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Dec. Dig. § 852.*]

4. DISTURBANCE OF PUBLIC ASSEMBLAGE (§ 15*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the special presentment charged that defendant "was then and there intoxicated and in a manner under the influence of intoxicating liquor while the people were assembled for the purpose of engaging in divine worship," an instruction that the defendant was "charged with the offense of being intoxicated at a place of divine worship or being in any manner under the influence of intoxicating liquors at a place of divine worship while the people were assembled there for divine worship on the date alleged in a bill of indictment, or special presentment, whatever it is," was not broader than the presentment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Disturbance of Public Assemblage, Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

5. DISTURBANCE OF PUBLIC ASSEMBLAGE (§ 15*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a prosecution for being intoxicated at a place of divine worship, an instruction that if any person shall appear at any church or other place of divine worship intoxicated or in any manner under the influence of intoxicating liquors, while the people are assembled to engage in religious worship, he is guilty of a misdemeanor, was proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Disturbance of Public Assemblage, Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—INSTRUCTIONS ALREADY GIVEN.

In a prosecution for being intoxicated at a place of divine worship, the refusal of a request to charge handed to the judge while the charge was being made, and not before it began, which, while not given literally, was given in substance, was not error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2011; Dec. Dig. § 829.*]

7. DISTURBANCE OF PUBLIC ASSEMBLAGE (§ 15*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a prosecution for being intoxicated at a place of public worship, it was not error to refuse to charge that, to convict, the jury must find that the defendant was drunk on intoxicating liquor, and that if it was beer, morphine, or other narcotics that produced the condition of defendant, they would not be authorized to find him guilty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Disturbance of Public Assemblage, Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 785*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

Though the defendant contended that the witness for the state had sworn willfully and knowingly falsely to material facts, the failure to instruct that if a witness swore willfully and knowingly falsely, his testimony ought to be disregarded entirely, unless corroborated by circumstances or other unimpeached evidence, was not ground for reversal.

Error from City Court of Nashville; W. D. Buie, Judge.

John Harrell was convicted of being intoxicated at a place of divine worship, and he brings error. Affirmed.

The grounds of the motion for a new trial, in addition to the grounds that the verdict was contrary to law and to the evidence, were as follows:

[2] (1) Because the witness George Gray testified, on direct examination: "Q. What was his condition? A. His appearance showed that he was drunk. Q. How did he act? A. He staggered as he went along." And on the redirect examination, over defendant's objection, the court allowed the witness to testify: "Q. What do you say as to his being drunk or sober? A. I could not say, only from his appearance. I did not see him drink any liquor. Q. What do you say as to his appearance? A. From his appearance he was drunk." The questions and answers were objected to before going to jury, by defendant, as follows: The witness was examined fully on the direct examination, and the state has no right to re-examine the witness as if on direct examination, but only in rebuttal of the testimony brought out on cross-examination, because the questions are leading. [Note by the court: This was before the witness was excused from the stand, on his original examination or redirect examination.] The court overruled defendant's objections, and the defendant assigns the ruling as error, because the examination was prejudicial to the interest of the defendant, in that it unduly stressed the testimony of the state, and the ruling was an intimation as to the guilt of the accused. It violated the rules of evidence and the ethics of good practice, and needlessly incumbered the record with superfluous testimony.

[3] (2) It was error for the court to exclude from the consideration of the jury the material testimony of Dan Harrell, a witness for defendant, as follows: "Q. How old are you? A. 17 years." The purpose of the evidence was to show that the state's star witness, John Metts, had given to this minor boy whisky, and the witness was endeavoring to convict the defendant to forestall a prosecution against the witness for the offense of furnishing liquor to a minor.

[4] (3) It was error harmful to defendant for the court to charge as follows: "This is a case of the state against John Harrell charged with the offense of being intoxicated at a place of divine worship, or being in any manner under the influence of intoxicating liquors, at a place of divine worship while the people were assembled there for divine worship, on the date alleged in the bill of indictment, or special presentment, whatever it is." The offense charged in the special presentment being: "John Harrell [did] be and appear at the Dan Griffin schoolhouse, in said county, a place of divine worship. He, the said John Harrell, was then and there intoxicated and in a manner under the influence of intoxicating liquors while the people were assembled for the purpose of engaging in divine worship." The error being: (a) The charge was much broader than the special presentment, in that it instructed the jury that the defendant was charged either with being "intoxicated" or being "in any manner under the influence of intoxicating liquors." (b) The special presentment charged one offense only, to wit: "John Harrell was then and there intoxicated, and in a manner under the influence of intoxicating liquors;" whereas the charge instructed the jury that he was charged with either one of the offenses. (c) Because a person may be under the influence of intoxicating liquor not to such extent as to be discernible, and with perfect propriety attend church or the church grounds while the congregation is assembled for divine worship and violate no criminal statute. (d) Because no person, under the charge, could use liquor for medicinal purposes and attend church if he were "in any manner under the influence of intoxicating liquor." (e) Because it did not state the contention of the state correctly, but much stronger than charged in the special presentment, and authorized the jury to convict the defendant if the influence was "any." (f) Because the court should have correctly stated that the defendant was being tried upon an indictment or special presentment.

[5] (4) It was error for the court to charge: "The particular law in this case is: If any person shall be and appear at any church or other place of divine worship intoxicated, or in any manner under the influence of intoxicating liquors, while the people are assembled for the purpose of engaging in any religious worship, he shall be guilty of misdemeanor;" the error being: (a) The expression "such religious worship" was an opinion of the court that the "Dan Griffin schoolhouse" was per se a place of "religious worship." (b) The charge is also open to the error assigned to the charge, in the third ground of the amended motion, from (a) to (f), inclusive, and especially where the court emphasized this paragraph in his charge by using the expression, "Now, this is the law." (c) Because the court used the expression three times in his charge, and every time in different parts and connections of the charge, to wit, "Or in any manner under the influence of intoxicating liquors," as charged by the court, is error. (e) Because the charge of the court is incorrect as an abstract principle of the law applicable to the case on trial.

[6] (5) It was error for the court to neglect to give in charge the principle that, in order for the defendant to be guilty under the special presentment of the offense as therein charged, the jury must believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant was intoxicated and under the influence of intoxicating liquors, upon the church grounds, as alleged in the special presentment. It was error for the court to refuse to give in charge the written request of the defendant as follows: "Gentlemen of the jury, I charge you that, before you can find the defendant guilty, you must find by the evidence that the defendant was under the influence of intoxicating liquors at the time and place alleged in the special presentment, and while the congregation was assembled for the purpose of divine worship, and it is just as necessary that the state prove the allegations in the presentment that it was intoxicating liquors as it is to prove the defendant was under the influence of such liquors, and the state must prove both allegations beyond a reasonable doubt before you would be authorized to find the defendant guilty." [Note of the judge: The request of charge was handed to me while the charge was being made, and not before the charge began, and the request, while not given literally, was given in substance.]

[7] Second request: "It is alleged in the indictment that the defendant, John Harrell, was intoxicated on spirituous liquors. Now, you must find from the evidence that the defendant was drunk on intoxicating liquors, and nothing else. If it was beer, morphine, or other narcotics that produced the condition of defendant, then you would not be authorized to find the defendant guilty." [Note of the judge: This request was not given, but it was not correct as a whole.] The error being: (a) The charge was so general that it allowed the jury to convict, if they believed the defendant was intoxicated on anything besides liquor. (b) Because there was no proof that he was intoxicated on liquor, and if his condition was as was contended for by the state, it could have been produced by some drug or opiate, and not by liquor. (c) Because nowhere in the charge was the attention of the jury called to the sufficiency of the proof required to authorize the verdict of guilty. (d) Because there was no evidence on which the jury was authorized to find that the defendant was intoxicated on liquor.

[8] (6) It was one of the contentions of the defendant before the jury that the witness John Metts swore willfully and knowingly falsely to material facts in the case, and that the court, having undertaken to charge the law of impeachment, failed to instruct the jury that if a witness swore willfully and knowingly falsely, his testimony ought to be disregarded entirely, unless corroborated by circumstances or other unimpeached evidence. The court charged rules of impeachment not applicable to the evidence and contentions of defendant and neglected to charge the correct and applicable rule as above stated.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Florence County; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by E. Heckheimer against James M. Allen. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. W. Ragadale and R. E. Whiting, for appellant. Willcox & Willcox, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. The complaint alleges that the firm of James Allen & Son, composed of James Allen and his son, James M. Allen, the defendant herein, became indebted to the plaintiff, and on December 7, 1896, gave him their two promissory notes, one for $350, due July 1, 1897, and the other for $546.51, due January 1, 1898, both bearing interest from November 10, 1896, and containing a promise to pay all expenses of collection, including attorney's fees, if not paid at maturity, and prays judgment for the amount due thereon. The defendant denies liability, alleging that the notes were given after the dissolution of the firm of James Allen & Son, of which plaintiff had notice. There was testimony tending to show that the firm was dissolved in May, 1896, and that plaintiff had notice of the dissolution; that, prior to the dissolution, plaintiff held the firm's note for $1,500 which had been reduced by payments to the aggregate amount of the two notes sued on, which were given in renewal of that note, and that the new notes were first signed by James Allen alone; but plaintiff insisted that they should be signed in the firm's name, as the old note was, and that, in compliance with his request, James Allen signed them in the firm name, but told him, when he did so, that the firm had been dissolved, and that he had no authority to sign the firm name. The defendant also testified that the original debt was a private debt of his father, and that the old note was given before he was of age. Upon the evidence, the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff, holding that giving the new notes was not creating a liability of the firm, but merely giving evidence or an acknowledgment of its existence, which one of the former partners could do.

It has frequently been decided in this court that, after dissolution of a partnership, one of the partners cannot, without special authority, bind his former partners by giving a new note, even for a partnership debt, if the party taking it had notice of the dissolution. Martin v. Walton, 1 McCord, 16; Bank v. Humphreys, 1 McCord, 388; Veale v. Hassan, 3 McCord, 278; Loomis v. Pearson, Harp. 470; White v. Union Ins. Co., 1 Nott & McC. 556, 9 Am. Dec. 726; *Chardon v. C. 510, relied on by respondent, was rested upon the ground that plaintiff did not have notice of the dissolution of the partnership when he took the new note. The remark of the writer of the opinion in that case that the consideration of that note was a partnership debt, and that was in itself sufficient to support the plaintiff's demand, was obiter dictum, and is inconsistent with the rule laid down in the cases above cited, and with the authorities elsewhere. 30 Cyc. 658, 668.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Williamsburg County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge.

Action by James Sprunt and another, partners as Alexander Sprunt & Son, against Alexander M. Gordon. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Kelley & Hinds, for appellant. Gilliland & Gilliland, for respondents.

HYDRICK, J. This is an action for damages for breach of contract. Plaintiffs allege that defendant made a written contract with them, whereby he sold and agreed to deliver to them, at Gourdins, S. C., between September 15 and October 31, 1909, 25 bales of cotton, to average 500 pounds per bale, 5 per cent. more or less, and they agreed to pay him for it, on delivery, 10 cents a pound for middling cotton, and 10½ for strict middling; that they were ready and willing to perform, and demanded performance of him, which he failed and refused to do, to their damage $500.

[1] Defendant answered, and afterwards served notice of a demurrer to the complaint for insufficiency, because it is not alleged that plaintiffs tendered defendant the money for the cotton. On plaintiffs' motion, the court ordered defendant to elect whether he would stand on his answer or demurrer. He chose the demurrer, which was overruled, and plaintiffs had judgment on the pleadings. The court erred in requiring defendant to elect. At common law, it was not allowable to plead and demur to the same matter at the same time. Nor does the Code of Procedure of 1902 contemplate the filing of both an answer and a demurrer to the same matter at the same time, except as to two of the grounds of demurrer specified therein, to wit, that the pleading fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action or defense, and that the court is without jurisdiction. Section 164 says that the only pleading on the part of the defendant is either a demurrer or an answer, which clearly indicates that both were not intended to be allowed for the same matter at the same time. It then proceeds to specify the grounds for which a demurrer will lie, and provided, in section 168, that, if the matter enumerated as grounds of demurrer do not appear upon the face of the complaint, the objection may be taken by answer. But section 169 provides that all of the objections specified as grounds of demurrer shall be deemed waived, if not taken either by demurrer or answer, "excepting only the objection to the jurisdiction of the court, and the objection that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." There are sound reasons why a party should not be allowed to demur and answer at the same time. The office of a demurrer is to test the sufficiency of a pleading, and, until the pleadings are in proper form, the case is not ready for trial on the merits. To allow a party to answer and demur at the same time tends to confusion and unnecessary expense in the administration of the law; for neither party can tell whether the case will be disposed of on the issue of law, raised by the demurrer, or on the issues of fact raised by the answer. Therefore they are compelled to come to trial prepared to meet both issues; and they may be put to the unnecessary trouble and expense of having their witnesses at the trial when the case will be disposed of on the issue of law raised by the demurrer. It is therefore the better practice, and the intention of the Legislature, as indicated in the section of the Code above referred to, that the issues of law should be disposed of before the case is set down for trial on the merits. Therefore, when a demurrer is interposed on any of the grounds specified in the code, other than the two above mentioned, and an answer to the merits is also put in at the same time, the court may, in its discretion, require the party to elect upon which he will stand, especially if it appears that such action will promote the orderly disposition of the cause. Stahn v. Catawba Mills, 53 S. C. 519, 31 S. E. 498. Nevertheless, the spirit of the reformed procedure requires that causes be decided on their merits rather than on the technicalities of pleading.

[2] Therefore, when a demurrer is interposed on any ground in good faith, and it is overruled, the party should ordinarily be allowed to answer. Of course, there may be circumstances which would justify the court in refusing to exercise its discretion to allow an answer to be put in after overruling a demurrer, but none such appear in this case.

[3] However, where the statute, expressly or by necessary implication, allows a demurrer and an answer to the same matter at the same time, the court is bound to administer the law as it is written, and it cannot order a party to elect upon which he will stand, and, upon his electing one, strike out the other. There can be no doubt that section 169 of the Code contemplates and authorizes the filing of both a demurrer for an insufficient statement of facts and an answer to the merits at the same time. Prior to the amendment of that section by Act March 2, 1903 (24 St. at Large, p. 180), which requires five days' notice of the grounds of such a demurrer, the practice prevailed of entertaining such a demurrer, when made orally at the trial. Hull v. Young, 29 S. C. 64, 6 S. E. 938; Harvey v. Hackney, 35 S. C. 361, 14 S. E. 822. And it was afterwards regulated by rule 18 of the circuit court, requiring the grounds to be reduced to writing, or taken down by the stenographer, under the direction of the court. In Latimer v. Sullivan, 30 S. C. 111, 8 S. E. 639, it was held that a plaintiff could at the same time reply and demur to a counterclaim set up in the answer on the ground of insufficiency. It necessarily follows that a defendant can, at the same time, answer a complaint and demur to it for insufficiency, or for want of jurisdiction of the court. The latter ground may be taken at any time—even on the argument of an appeal in this court. Ware v. Henderson, 25 S. C. 385.

[4] The demurrer was properly overruled. The allegation that plaintiffs were ready and willing to perform was sufficient, without an allegation that the price of the cotton was tendered. By the terms of the contract, defendant had the right to deliver different grades of cotton, at different prices, and the bales might vary in weight from 475 to 525 pounds. It was, therefore, impossible for plaintiffs to determine, before the cotton was delivered, weighed and graded, what amount to tender. The law does not require impossible things. Appellant relies, upon this point, on the case of Pickett v. Cloud, 1 Bailey, 362, where the court used some language which seems to support his contention that a tender of the price of the cotton was necessary. In that case, however, the contract was to deliver 30 bales of cotton at defendant's ginhouse, on a day certain, for which plaintiff was to pay 12½ cents a pound for 29 bales and 8 cents a pound for one bale. It does not appear in the report of the case whether the cotton had been weighed, so that the plaintiff could tell the amount to tender, but it is probable, and it may be inferred, that it had been. It had been graded, as evidenced by the fact that the price for 29 bales was fixed at 12½ cents and the price for one at 8 cents a pound, and it is not suggested that plaintiff would have had any difficulty in ascertaining the amount to tender, which it would have been impossible for him to do, if the cotton had not been weighed. In that case, the contract stipulated that plaintiff should be at the place on the day specified to receive the cotton and pay for it. Defendant was there and ready to deliver the cotton, but plaintiff did not appear. Twenty days afterwards, and after the price of cotton had gone up, he demanded the delivery of the cotton at a place some miles distant from that specified in the contract. Defendant then refused to deliver at all. It was held that plaintiff could not recover, because he had himself broken the contract by failing to appear at the time and place specified to receive and pay for the cotton, as he had agreed to do. In concluding the opinion, the court said: "The plaintiff having failed to tender the money, and make demand of the cotton at the time and place stipulated in the agreement, the defendant had the right to elect either to enforce the contract against him, or to consider it at an end, and dispose of it on his own account." If the cotton had been weighed and the weights were known to plaintiff, as above suggested, there would have been no difficulty in making the tender; but if it had not, then it is probable that the court used the words "tender the money," not in the restricted sense of tendering the exact amount, but in the broader sense of a tender of performance by appearing at the time and place specified and offering to receive the cotton and pay for it, according to the contract. At any rate, where a tender of the exact amount is impossible, because the party whose duty it is to make the tender does not know and has no means of ascertaining the amount, the law will not require such a tender. In such cases, a general offer to perform and the allegation of readiness and willingness to perform is sufficient.

[5] But, aside from this, it is alleged that defendant refused, after demand, to perform. This was a waiver of his right to insist upon a tender by plaintiffs. Pickett v. Cloud, supra; 28 A. & E. Enc. L. 4 et seq.; 9 Cyc. 723 et seq.; 35 Cyc. 167.

The order requiring defendant to elect is reversed, and the order overruling the demurrer is affirmed.

CORLEY v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 10, 1911.)

CARRIERS (§ 356*)—WRONGFUL EJECTION OF PASSENGER—VALIDATION OF TICKET—MISREPRESENTATIONS OF SELLING AGENT.

Plaintiff, though asking defendant carrier's ticket agent at C. for a round-trip to A., accepted a special round-trip ticket to S., a few miles beyond A., because it was cheaper, and because, when he stated that he did not want it if he had to go to S., the agent told him he would not have to do so, but that the agent at A., as was his custom and duty, would on its presentation to him send it to the agent at S., and have it stamped and returned by him. Held that, notwithstanding stipulations in the ticket signed by plaintiff as to how and where the ticket would have to be validated for return trip, he had a right to rely on the representations of the selling agent; and that it was the duty of the agent at A. to have it validated, as it had been represented that he would; and that, he having refused to forward it for validation on the ground that it had ceased to be the practice for him to do so, it was the conductor's duty to heed plaintiff's explanation, consisting of such facts, why he presented it for return passage unvalidated in accordance with its terms; so that this not having been done, but he having been ejected for refusal to pay fare, he was entitled to damages.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Edgefield County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by P. H. Corley against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Abney & Evans and S. M. Smith, for appellant. Thurmond & Timmerman, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. On June 14, 1907, defendant's agent at Columbia, S. C., sold plaintiff a round-trip ticket to Swannanoa, N. C., with a printed contract on it, which contained, among others, the following provisions: "4th. This ticket shall not be good for return passage unless the holder identifies him or herself by signature on back hereof and otherwise as original purchaser to the satisfaction of the agent of the Southern Railway Company at destination, and when officially signed and stamped by said agent, this ticket shall then be good for return passage of the original purchaser only." "8th. No agent or employé of any line over which the purchaser is entitled to travel by the terms of this ticket has any power to alter, modify, or waive in any manner, any of the conditions named in this contract. In consideration of the reduced rate at which this ticket is sold, I, the original purchaser, hereby agree to be governed by all the conditions as stated above. * * * I will not seek to hold any of such companies liable for damages resulting to me from any statement of any employé thereof, not in accordance with the terms of this contract as expressed upon this ticket." It contained, also, the following notices at different places on the ticket: "This ticket must be signed, witnessed by agent, and stamped at destination before it will be good for return passage. To purchaser: Read the above contract, and take notice that the return portion of this ticket must be stamped and your signature witnessed in the manner prescribed before it will be honored for passage."

This contract was signed by plaintiff, who alleged in his complaint and testified that he bought the ticket and signed it, under the following circumstances: He went to defendant's uptown office in the city of Columbia, and asked the agent for a round-trip ticket to Asheville, N. C. The agent said, if he had come a little earlier, he could have sold him a special round-trip excursion ticket to Swannanoa, N. C., a station about two miles from Asheville on defendant's road to Salisbury, for about two dollars less than the regular round-trip ticket to Asheville, but that was the last day those tickets were on sale, and it was then nearly time for the last train on which they could be used to leave Columbia. But the agent telephoned to the railway station and ascertained that the train was running late, and that plaintiff would have about 20 minutes to catch it, and advised plaintiff to buy that ticket. Plaintiff told him he did not want to go to Swannanoa, and did not want to buy a ticket to that place, if it would put him to any inconvenience. The agent told him it would not be necessary for him to go to Swannanoa; that, while it was usually necessary to have the ticket stamped by the agent at Swannanoa, if he would present it to defendant's agent at Asheville, he would send it to Swannanoa and have it stamped and returned in time for his return trip, and he assured plaintiff that it was the custom and duty of defendant's agent at Asheville to do this. Relying upon this assurance, plaintiff bought the ticket and signed the contract without reading it. On arriving at Asheville, he presented the ticket to the agent there, and requested him to send it to Swannanoa and have it validated, telling him what the agent at Columbia had said. The Asheville agent told plaintiff that had been the custom, but it had been discontinued, and refused to have the ticket validated. On his return trip, plaintiff undertook to use the ticket, notwithstanding it had not been validated. Fearing the gateman would not allow him to pass to the train on presentation of the unstamped ticket, he bought a ticket to Biltmore, a station about two miles from Asheville on the road to Columbia, upon which he was admitted to the train. After passing Biltmore, the conductor demanded his fare, and he presented the unvalidated ticket, which was refused, after he had informed the conductor what had passed between him and the agent at Columbia and of his efforts to get the agent at Asheville to have the ticket validated. As evidence of his good faith and of the truth of his statement, he offered to pay his fare, if the conductor would agree to go with him to the agent at Columbia, and if he confirmed his statement, pay it back, or see that he got it back. This proposition was declined; and, upon plaintiff's refusal to pay his fare, he was ejected. He returned to Swannanoa, had his ticket validated and was carried on it the next day to Columbia.

At the trial, the Columbia agent admitted that what took place between plaintiff and himself was as narrated by plaintiff, except what he said about having the ticket validated for the return trip. As to that, he said he told plaintiff the ticket would have to be validated at Swannanoa; and that plaintiff asked if the Asheville agent could not do it, as it was all on the same line; that he replied, "You will have to see the agent at Asheville about that." The Asheville agent and the conductor who ejected plaintiff both admitted that plaintiff told them what had passed between himself and the Columbia agent, as stated by plaintiff, and the Asheville agent further admitted that it had, before his incumbency as agent, been the custom for the Asheville agent to have round-trip tickets for Swannanoa validated, as plaintiff testified the Columbia agent had told him. It also appeared that Swannanoa was reached on this ticket, either by changing cars at Biltmore or at Asheville. Under the instructions of the court, the jury rendered a verdict for plaintiff for $800.

This court has held, in a number of cases, that when a person signs a contract, like the one here in question, in the absence of fraud, misrepresentation, or mistake, he is conclusively presumed to have known and assented to all of its conditions and stipulations. Smith v. Railway, 88 S. C. 424, 70 S. E. 1057, and cases cited. But it is elementary that no one is bound by a contract which he is induced to make in reliance upon false representations as to material matters of fact. The allegations and evidence in this case raised an issue of such misrepresentation, which was properly submitted to the jury, and, by their verdict, it was resolved in favor of plaintiff. In the Smith Case, supra, the court said: "It is a ticket agent's duty, and therefore within the scope of his authority, to give passengers correct information with regard to their tickets and to provide them, upon payment of the fare, with proper tickets. Therefore a passenger has a right to rely upon the information given him by a ticket agent. The traveling public are not concerned with the management of the affairs of railroad companies. They are not presumed to know the rules and regulations adopted by the companies for the guidance of their agents; nor are they presumed to know the limitations of the authority of the agents of the companies. * * * The weight of reason and the trend of judicial thought is in favor of the doctrine that a passenger has the right to rely upon the statements and assurances of a ticket agent as to the sufficiency of the ticket furnished him as the evidence of his rights as a passenger, and that the carrier is liable for the errors and omissions of such agents resulting in injury to the passenger. [Cases cited.] The foregoing cases also hold that it is the duty of the conductor, in such circumstances, to heed the reasonable explanations of a passenger as to his ticket, or his right to ride, and our own decisions are to the same effect. [Cases cited.] The rule requiring the conductor to heed the reasonable explanations of the passenger, instead of allowing him to demand the payment of fare, on pain of expulsion from the train, works less hardship, inconvenience, and expense on the carrier than the opposite rule would on the passenger; for it is generally an easy matter for the conductor to ascertain whether the explanation of the passenger is true or false, because the stations along the railroads are nearly all connected by telephone or telegraph lines, which the agents of the companies may use with little trouble, and at little or no expense. It is a serious matter to expel a passenger from a train. It subjects him to humiliation, and it is calculated to wound the feelings of any self-respecting passenger. Therefore the law allows punitive damages for the wrongful expulsion of a passenger, and also for compelling him to pay money under threat of wrongful expulsion. [Cases cited.] Consequently the law is that a carrier must be allowed to resort to so harsh and extreme a measure only at the peril of being able to justify it."

Under the circumstances, plaintiff had the right to rely upon the representations of the Columbia agent, and it was the duty of the Asheville agent to have the ticket validated, and the duty of the conductor to heed plaintiff's explanation as to his right to ride on it. As was said in the Smith Case, the defendant will not be heard to say that it manages its business, so that it makes a contract through one of its agents, which it can violate through another with impunity. The verdict establishes the fact that the real contract was that the agent at Asheville should have the ticket validated, and plaintiff had the right to have that contract performed. A carrier has no right to eject a passenger because his ticket is not properly validated, where the omission is due to the fault of its own agents, or to its own fault. Head v. Ga. Pac. R. Co., 79 Ga. 358, 7 S. E. 217, 11 Am. St. Rep. 434; Railway v. Wood, 114 Ga. 140, 39 S. E. 894, 55 L. R. A. 536; Gulf, etc., Ry. Co. v. St. John, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 257, 35 S. W. 501.

TOWN OF CONSTITUTION v. CHESTNUT HILL CEMETERY ASS'N.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 22, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§§ 17, 18*)--DE FACTO INCORPORATION--COLLATERAL ATTACK.

With respect to the incorporation of towns, the Political Code of 1895 provides: "Whenever the qualified voters of any town or village, not incorporated, consisting of not less than twenty-five qualified voters, wish to be incorporated, a petition shall be filed, by at least a majority of the male inhabitants of such town or village, in the superior court of the county in which the inhabitants reside, stating in such petition the proposed boundaries of such town, and the name to be given, if incorporated." It also requires that notice be given in a specified way of the day on which the application will be made, and of the day on which the qualified voters in the proposed boundaries of the town will vote on the question of incorporation. It is further provided that, if a majority of the qualified voters shall vote in favor of incorporation, the managers of the election shall certify the result of the vote to the superior court of the county, and that upon the filing of such certificate the superior court shall by order direct the clerk thereof to issue a specified certificate of incorporation of such town or village. See Political Code 1895, §§ 685 to 687, inclusive (the provisions of which are not embodied in the Civil Code of 1910). A petition by 13 named individuals was filed in the superior court to incorporate the town of Constitution, embracing a specified territory, in which they alleged "that they are a majority of the qualified voters, consisting of more than 25 qualified voters residing" within such territory, that the notices hereinbefore referred to were properly given, that at the election a majority of the qualified voters within the territory named voted in favor of incorporation, and that a certificate so showing had been filed in the superior court, the judge of which granted an order for incorporation as prayed, and the clerk of the court issued a proper certificate, after which officers of the municipality were duly elected and the corporation organized. Held, the municipality became at least a de facto corporation, the legal existence of which could not be collaterally attacked. Dillon on Munc. Corp. (5th Ed.) vol. 1, §§ 66, 67; Id. vol. 2, § 644; Id. vol. 4, §§ 1556, 1560; Constantineau on the De Facto Doctrine, §§ 46-50, 58-68; 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 1135 (7); 28 Cyc. 172 et seq.; 8 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas., note at p. 242; 11 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas., note at p. 1060; 27 L. R. A. (N. S.), note at page 262.

(a) In a proceeding to enjoin the municipal authorities from the enforcement of an ordinance, the legal existence of the corporation could not be assailed on the ground that at the time the election was held, and at the time of the granting of the order of incorporation, there did not reside within the corporate limits 25 qualified voters; nor on the ground that the petition was not filed by a majority of the male inhabitants, as required by the statute; nor on the ground that many of those voting at the election were not qualified voters.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 34-44; Dec. Dig. §§ 17, 18.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 12*)—TERRITORIAL EXTENT.

The petition for incorporation and the notices hereinbefore referred to describe the territory to be incorporated as "including the territory within a radius of one mile from the Southern Railway depot at Constitution," in De Kalb county, Ga., a part of which territory was in De Kalb county and a part in Fulton county. The order for incorporation provided that "said incorporation shall extend one mile in every direction from the present location of the Southern Railway depot at Constitution." Held, that the territory embraced within the corporate limits of the town was that which was included within a radius of one mile from the center of the location of the depot, and the order for incorporation was not void on the ground that the limits of the incorporation were indefinite. Cook v. Johnson, 47 Conn. 175, 36 Am. Rep. 64.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In view of the admissions in the answer of the plaintiff in error in regard to the passage of the ordinance attacked, proof of the existence of the ordinance was unnecessary, and, if the admission of oral evidence regarding the existence of the ordinance was illegal, the error was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4155; Dec. Dig. § 1050.*]

4. ENFORCEMENT OF ORDINANCE—INJUNCTION—BURIALS.

Under the pleadings and evidence the court did not err in granting an interlocutory injunction restraining the enforcement of the ordinance complained of, which was one restricting burials within the corporate limits to the two places prescribed therein, and making penal its violation.

Error from Superior Court, De Kalb County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

Action by the Chestnut Hill Cemetery Association against the Town of Constitution. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

McNAUGHTON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1-3. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 784, 789, 829*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE—REASONABLE DOUBT.

The charge of the court was not subject to the criticisms made upon it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1883-1888, 1846-1849, 1904-1922, 1960, 1967; Dec. Dig. §§ 784, 789, 829.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1156*)—APPEAL—QUESTIONS OF FACT—RULING ON MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—BIAS OF JUROR.

When, in a criminal case, after verdict, an attack is made upon a juror upon the ground that he was not impartial, the trial judge occupies the place of a trier, and his finding that the juror is competent will not be reversed, unless under all the facts the discretion of the judge is manifestly abused. No abuse of discretion appears in this case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3067-3071; Dec. Dig. § 1156.*]

5, 6. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 763, 764*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

The grounds of the motion for new trial complaining of the omission to charge and refusal of the court to charge as requested were without merit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. §§ 763, 764.*]

7. HOMICIDE (§ 250*)—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence was sufficient to support the verdict. (Atkinson, J., dissents from this ruling.)

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide Dec. Dig. § 250.*]

Error from Superior Court, Emanuel County; S. P. Gilbert, Judge.

W. J. McNaughton was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

Dr. W. J. McNaughton and Mrs. Mattie Flanders were jointly indicted for the murder of Fred Flanders, the husband of the last-named defendant. The indictment contained five counts, in the first, fourth, and fifth of which it was alleged that the homicide resulted from arsenic poisoning, arsenious oxide poisoning, and other poisons of like deadly character, the names of which were to the grand jurors unknown, administered directly by the defendants in different ways, and in the second and third, by causing the same kinds of poisons to be administered by other named persons. McNaughton was placed on separate trial, and the jury trying the case returned a verdict of guilty, without recommendation. A motion for new trial was made and overruled, and error was assigned upon the judgment.

The testimony submitted, and the prisoner's statement on the trial were in substance as follows: Fred Flanders died June 4, 1910, after illness continuing from the 18th or 19th of the preceding month, during which Dr. McNaughton attended him as physician. The body was exhumed on the second day after burial, and the stomach taken out by physicians, sealed in a jar, and sent to an analytical chemist, who discovered in it 22.6 milligrams of arsenic, "about one-third or one-fourth of a grain." At the instance of the accused or his counsel, the body was again exhumed, and the liver, heart, and kidneys taken out and examined by the same chemist, and arsenic was found in each of these organs. The total quantity found in stomach, liver, heart, and kidneys was 56 milligrams, "practically seven-eighths of a grain." Dr. Everhart, the chemist, testified that arsenic could not have gotten into these organs without having been administered; that he found in the stomach indications leading him to believe it had been administered as arsenic powder, or arsenic acid, "that is, a white powder"; that, although the appearance of the stomach may have been caused by other things, it was indicative of arsenic poisoning. He counted four little effusions on the lining of the stomach, looking very much like little pimples, and arsenic produces that effect. Arsenic goes through the nervous system, and burns the tissues. That which was found in the stomach seemed to have come through the mouth. In the opinion of the witness the arsenic was administered before death. If administered to a dead body, it would not, in his opinion, have produced the effusions or spots found in the stomach. It is active on living flesh and inactive on dead flesh. On a dead body it is more or less inert. In his opinion, judging from the amount obtained, enough arsenic had been given to Flanders to produce his death. Two physicians (Drs. Houston and Smith, the only other experts examined on the subject) concurred with him in the opinion that the presence of seven-eighths of a grain indicated that a larger quantity had been introduced into the system. Arsenic is carried by the blood into all parts of the body, and is found in the brain, the bones, the marrow, and even in the fingernails; and the full quantity taken into the system is not found after death, for the body throws off the poison as fast as it can. It is eliminated through the kidneys and by the liver, and passes out through the bowels and in the urine, and may be thrown out by vomiting. It manifests itself first usually in vomiting. Vomiting is a revulsion of nature against this irritant, to try to throw it off, and the same kind of revulsion takes place in the bowels, where there is an effort to rid the system of it by purging. In some cases of deaths from arsenic poison no arsenic was found, in some cases as little as one-tenth of a grain; sometimes as much as four or five grains, chiefly in the stomach. "Seven-eighths of a grain must represent the administration of a very much larger dose of arsenic than is used in medicine." The small traces found in certain substances referred to by the authorities, such as sulphate of soda, salts, phosphate of soda, and in the impurities in various chemicals and drugs, would not lead to the finding of as much as seven-eighths of a grain of arsenic in the body. A medicinal dose of arsenic is about one-thirtieth of a grain. The smallest quantity recognized as possibly fatal is about two grains. Authorities differ as to whether two grains might be fatal. Dr. Everhart testified: "They usually suppose that three grains is a fatal dose." Dr. Houston testified that the statement that "probably 10 grains would be likely fatal to most persons, unless prompt and efficient treatment was had," seemed reasonable, though a medical writer had stated that on a search through reported cases no evidence was found as to a smaller fatal dose than 30 grains. Some men are more susceptible to the effects of the poison than are others. There are reported cases of "arsenic fiends" who gradually increase doses until they can take enough to kill several men, but reliable authorities deny that such cases exist.

It was testified that a majority of the deaths from one dose occur within 24 hours, some much sooner; but small doses in excess of a proper dose might be administered from day to day, with the result that the poison would accumulate in the system more rapidly than it could be thrown off, tissue would be destroyed, and kidneys, heart, nervous system, etc., be damaged so that they would be unable to recuperate, and in such cases death might be produced "in a few weeks, or in a week or two." One of the physicians testified that, if a quarter of a grain were given at one time, the last of it would probably be gone from the body in about two weeks; but that, if that quantity were given daily, it would accumulate faster than it could be thrown off. Another testified that if doses sufficient to make one sick, but not to kill, say one-tenth or one-fifth of a grain, were given from day to day, the effect would become cumulative, though the quantity would not. Fatty degeneration of the organs is one of the means by which arsenic produces death; and in this case the chemist found a considerable quantity of fat which had to be filtered. The fatty degeneration, he testified, might be produced by other causes than arsenic. Arsenic in powdered form may be given in water or other liquid. It is soluble, practically tasteless, and has no odor. In a certificate given by the accused as attending physician, dated June 22, 1910, his answer to a question as to the disease of which Fred Flanders died, its origin, history, and symptoms, was as follows: "A complication of liver, kidney, and stomach; about May 19, when I was first consulted, headache, enlargement of the right side; pain in the right shoulder and spine, retention of urine, vomiting, nephritis acute; also mind impaired from urethra." Testimony as to his symptoms during the illness was given by two of his brothers and other witnesses who visited him, none of whom saw him later than six days before his death. So far as appears from the testimony and from the statement of the accused, the only physician present at any time during his illness other than the accused was Dr. Bell, an uncle of the sick man's wife. He died before the trial. It does not appear that he called more than once, or ever gave Flanders any medicine. From the testimony it appears that the sick man had frequent pains and a burning sensation in the stomach and "up in his breast," nausea, and headaches, often vomited, complained that he was nearly blind, and complained that his kidneys and liver were giving him trouble. His face was very red, and he had a number of pimples on his face and arms. He had red spots on the forehead. His complexion was naturally red. He had frequent evacuations from the bowels. The first time his brother, Jordan Flanders, saw him during his illness was on Sunday, May 21st. He vomited continually while the witness was there, complained of burning sensations in his stomach, and that he had nearly died the night before, that his heart exhausted like a steam engine under a heavy load. He complained of blindness. A good number of pimples had broken out on his face and arms. Dr. McNaughton and the sick man's wife were there. The vomiting seemed to bring up nothing but water, a green solution. The doctor or the wife gave him some medicine that day. According to the recollection of the witness, it was a liquid medicine, which was on the bureau in the sick room. The witness left Sunday evening and returned on Wednesday, the 24th. The sick man was in bed, but sat up. He seemed better. He was not so sick in the stomach, but, if he took water or anything else, he vomited. The witness did not see Dr. McNaughton give him medicine that day. The witness went back to see him on Saturday, the 27th, found him very sick, worse than he had seen him before, and with like symptoms. The witness did not think that McNaughton gave him any medicine that day until night. About night McNaughton came in with a little jar, or jar-shaped bottle, like a snuff-jar, containing a white looking powder, which he had got from his apothecary shop in the same house, and said that he wanted Fred to have a teaspoonful of it about every three or four hours during the night. The witness stayed there all night and until the next evening, when the sick man seemed a little better. In the morning Dr. McNaughton came in and gave him a dose of liquid medicine through the mouth. The witness went back Monday evening or night. Fred was very sick then. His complaints were the same. He claimed to have no fever. McNaughton was there and said he had no fever. The witness stayed until two hours by sun the next morning. He did not again see his brother alive. One time he saw Dr. McNaughton give Fred an enema, the white of an egg with white looking powders in it. The doctor said that Fred's stomach would not retain anything, and he had to have something to strengthen him. The last night that the witness was there no medicine was given, and Fred was much better the next morning. "Repeatedly he would say, 'The medicine I take makes me worse,' and they would make the remark, 'The medicine is all right, Fred. You will have to take your medicine,' and he would take it, and in a few minutes he would go to throwing it up." The night the witness gave him medicine he threw up about every 10 minutes during the night. The witness gave him the medicine according to directions, every three or four hours. It looked like a white powder, and whenever it was put in a glass of water it would boil up. He could not say whether the doctor gave any tablets or capsules or anything of that sort. He could not tell what the white medicine was. The doctor's prescription on the bottle nearly covered the other label, which looked as if it was the manufacturer's. He did not notice if there was anything on the other side of the bottle. Fred's bowels moved many times while the witness was there. Dr. McNaughton said he was giving the white medicine to him for his kidneys. On Monday night, the last night the witness stayed with him, another brother was with them, and they did not give him any medicine. The next morning Fred seemed much better, and the doctor said: "I have got more hopes of Fred this morning than I have had at all." The preceding Saturday night the witness gave him three doses as directed. Fred complained that it made him worse, and after 2 o'clock he gave him no more. He was sick through the night and up the next day. He seemed better after dinner. Repeatedly when the witness asked McNaughton what was the matter with his brother the reply was "a complication of troubles." Finally, after being pressed further, he said, "Kidney and liver."

John Allen Flanders, one of the brothers of the deceased, testified that the night he was there Fred vomited and heaved during the first part of the night, and the doctor told him that he had decided not to give any medicine that night, to let his stomach rest. He seemed a great deal better the next morning. Fred frequently called for water, and said he was burning up in his stomach. The witness gave him water every few minutes. The doctor gave some medicine the next morning.

R. A. Wood testified that he was present when Dr. Bell called to see Fred Flanders. Dr. Bell asked what was the trouble, and where did he hurt. Fred said he had no pain, and that he did not seem to be suffering except with sick stomach. He vomited frequently. He told Dr. Bell his kidneys had been out of the ordinary, but had got where they acted again, and that his liver seemed to be giving him a little trouble. Dr. Bell did not give him any medicine. Dr. Bell asked Dr. McNaughton whether he had given Fred a certain medicine, and was told that it had been given; and he advised that a blister be put on the pit of his stomach to stop the vomiting. He told Fred that Fred's kidneys and liver seemed to be a little out of order, but he saw no reason why Fred should not be up in two or three days attending to his business.

J. N. Kitchens testified that Fred Flanders ate supper at his house on Tuesday night, May 17th, and then seemed to be in good health. On the following Thursday he found Fred in bed. Mr. Thompson wanted to know about his ability to swap horses. Fred said he did not know that he felt like it, and Dr. McNaughton said: "No; he is not able. He has just taken a dose of medicine, and he will be mighty sick." He did not vomit while the witness was there.

According to the testimony of the physicians, the symptoms described by the witnesses were usual in cases of arsenic poisoning. Dr. Smith testified that if a man is taken sick and has violent vomiting spells, especially after medicine in the form of a white powder is given to him, and he suffers from about the 17th of May until the 4th of June before he dies, and if spots appear on his face, and he has pains in the stomach and in the region of the esophagus, and he gets better and worse at times until he dies, and if he has also partial blindness or his sight is clouded to some extent, and after his death seven-eighths of a grain of arsenic is found in the organs, the heart, the liver, the kidneys, and the stomach, and there is also found fatty degeneration of the liver, and four red spots are found in the stomach, the deceased not having had fever, so far as known, he (witness) would say that the death was from arsenic poisoning. According to the testimony of this witness and of Dr. Houston, however, the symptoms stated, or some of them, are similar to those of uremic poisoning or acute nephritis. It was also stated that the vomiting could have been caused by calomel or other medicines. Dr. Smith stated that, notwithstanding these symptoms, the deceased might have died from something else than arsenic poisoning, but, taking them in connection with the finding of the arsenic in the stomach, he did not think so.

The undertaker who prepared the body for burial testified that he had used embalming fluid on the face, giving the face a massage, but that none of the fluid was introduced into the body, and that there was no arsenic in the fluid. The formula of the fluid, as furnished by the manufacturer, gave as the ingredients formaldehyde, carbolic acid, alcohol, and water. The witness stated that the lips were closed, and he did not open them. A cloth and cotton with the fluid on it were kept on the face. On cross-examination he stated that he did not think he put any cotton up the nose of the deceased. He did not know whether he dampened cotton with the embalming fluid and put it up the nose or not, and he did not think that he packed cotton inside the mouth. He used absorbent cotton, which would take up a good deal of the fluid. About a quart of the fluid was used by him and others. Another witness testified that he was present when the undertaker used cotton on the face of the deceased. He was there about two hours and when the undertaker left. The mouth was closed, and the undertaker did not rest the cotton on the top of the mouth or the face so that the liquid could soak in, and did not put it on the nose.

Dr. McNaughton in his statement to the jury said that he found that the formula of the embalming fluid used by the undertaker contained 10 per cent. of arsenate of soda, a substance composed of powdered arsenic and soda, and that the undertaker put cotton saturated with this fluid into the mouth and nostrils of the deceased. Dr. Houston testified that, where arsenic in an embalming fluid is introduced into the stomach after death, the bulk of it will remain there, the blood in a dead body being very sluggish and coagulating soon after death; that small quantities might be diffused through the walls of the stomach, but the relative proportions which the chemist testified were found in the stomach and in the heart, lungs, etc., "would speak most certainly against the possible idea that the poisoning was introduced in the form of an embalming fluid into the stomach and had diffused in that way." If cotton or a cloth were saturated with the embalming fluid and placed on a dead man's face or over his open mouth, it might very rapidly get into the stomach. On analysis one would not find as much of it in the liver and in the heart and kidneys as in the stomach. If a cloth were placed over the face and none of the fluid got into the mouth, it would probably take weeks for it to penetrate through the body.

At the time of his death and for more than a year Flanders and his wife were residing in McNaughton's house, and McNaughton boarded with them and had his office there. No one else lived with them. McNaughton was a widower. It appears that there was undue intimacy between McNaughton and the wife, but, so far as appears, the relations between the two men and between husband and wife were entirely harmonious. When taken ill, Flanders was preparing to move away with his wife and go into the sawmill business in Thomas county, and had packed his household goods and loaded them on wagons, with the intention of going through the country with them, but on account of his illness he sent them off under the charge of another person, retaining only trunks and clothes. Several times during the illness McNaughton told others that Flanders was very sick, and that it was doubtful whether he would get well. He said this to Flanders' brother Jordan, and Jordan repeatedly proposed to the doctor and the wife that an additional physician be procured. Once McNaughton replied: "You can have a hundred doctors here if you want it. I know what is the matter with him, and I know what to do for him." And the wife said there was no use in having doctors there and piling up costs on them for nothing. Later it was proposed by the brother that Dr. Smith, of Swainsboro, be consulted. McNaughton promised to get Dr. Smith, but did not comply with the promise. In his statement to the jury McNaughton said that when he went to do so Mrs. Flanders objected. She said it was unnecessary; and this was the reason he did not call Dr. Smith. The brother proposed to take the sick man to his own home, but the doctor and the wife objected, saying it would not do to move him. During the illness the wife and the doctor spent much of the time out of the sick room and in private conversation in other parts of the house. One of the brothers testified: "When they were together, she looked to me like a woman that thought more of him than I ever saw a woman thought of a man. I never saw a man's wife pay more attention to him than she did to McNaughton." Others testified to having seen them kissing, etc., before the illness. It was testified that at the funeral "she did not act like a woman that cared. * * * She made some alarm, but it looked as though it were forced; and on the following morning she went in a buggy with McNaughton to the office of the ordinary of the county in regard to the administration of the husband's estate, and was cheerful and laughing." The value of the estate was several thousand dollars in addition to life insurance amounting to $3,000, of which she was sole beneficiary, and which had been procured in the preceding March, on a certificate of McNaughton as to the good health of the insured. Mrs. Durden testified that on the day following the burial McNaughton and the widow came to her and wanted her to take charge of his house and board them, but she declined to do so. McNaughton went to Thomas county and assisted in disposing of the property there for the widow. Afterwards he went to Augusta, and while there he was arrested at the home of his brother upon the charge of having murdered Flanders. In his statement to the jury he said that threats contained in an anonymous letter, and rumors of an intention to lynch him, caused him to go to see his brother in Augusta. He had no one in the county to discuss the situation with. He expected to return to the county and demand an investigation; and while in Augusta he rode on the streets with others. Mrs. Flanders remained at his house after the funeral, with her father and sister, until she went with them on their return to Bartow county. The accused denied that there was anything improper in his relations with Mrs. Flanders. He further stated to the jury that about May 18 or 19, 1910, Flanders called on him for treatment. Before that time Flanders had worked hard and often overtaxed his strength, and would come home wet to his knees, tired, and worn out, and he worried about his business. When feeling bad, he would undertake to physic himself, taking salts occasionally, and occasionally he would see a patent medicine recommended and he would think that he had the symptoms it was recommended for, and he would buy it and take it. When he called on McNaughton for treatment at the time mentioned, he told McNaughton that he had taken epsom salts almost every night for two weeks, and said he had been having sudden intense headaches, which would after a while wear off; that he had a bad spell about three weeks before, while in Thomasville, and took a remedy which seemed to relieve him, but he did not tell what it was. He complained of his right side, right shoulder, and spine, and his mind seemed bad, his tongue was heavily coated. He was constipated, his kidneys not acting, his temperature was 98. The statement of the accused continued as follows: "I then gave calomel, 10 grains, 'pto filin' [podophyllin?] two-thirds of a grain, and sodium 10 grains. Not being able to move his bowels with medicine, I gave him an enema of soap and water. * * * After this I was able to keep the bowels fairly open with sal hepatica and sal laxative. The medicine that Mr. Jordan spoke of was sal laxative. At what I thought to be the proper time I gave him another dose of calomel. * * * It was prepared in Dublin. * * * I then prescribed fringe tree alternative [alterative?], a medicine prepared by Nelson, Baker & Co., of Detroit, Mich. After then Dr. Bell was called in in consultation. He made an examination and diagnosed the case, and agreed with me that he was suffering with or from uremia or uremic poison. He not only examined Mr. Flanders, but questioned him closely as to his condition. After then I went over my treatment, and he said I was doing all that could be done, and that I was giving him the correct medicine. * * * I did not give Mr. Flanders any arsenic, because I didn't think that he needed it, and, if he obtained any from the medicine that I gave him, it was because of that ingredient in the medicine, and not being chemically pure contained arsenic. I find that plaster of paris with which these jars were sealed [the jars in which the stomach and other organs were placed] were sealed with plaster of paris around the glass stopper contained arsenic in appreciable quantities. I find that sodium phosphate, according to the United States Dispensatory * * * in commerce, contains arsenic in dangerous quantities. I gave him laxatives to keep his bowels open. One of the ingredients in such laxative is sodium phosphate, 24 grains. I also gave him fringe tree alternative [alterative?], prepared by Messrs. Nelson, Baker & Co., and highly recommended in cases of stomach and liver trouble. I find that it contains sodium phosphate. I also find in Wilcox on Materia Medica and Pharmacy * * * that calomel contains what is known as impurities of calomel, and denominated as chloride of mercury and arsenic. As I do not deal directly with the manufacturers of calomel, it may be that some of these medicines were not chemically pure, and therefore contained arsenic in appreciable quantities. I did not know this, but I do know that each medicine given was highly recommended for the symptoms that Mr. Flanders had. As a part of the treatment as suggested by Dr. Bell, I applied poultices and counter-irritants to Mr. Flanders' stomach, hoping thereby to allay the vomiting; and on Friday morning, before Mr. Flanders died about 2:45 Saturday morning, he asked his wife for some milk, and she gave him some milk and bread. He drank part of the milk and ate a little of the bread; and, when I left to attend a call, it had remained on his stomach without his having vomited it up. This was the last thing in the shape of food or medicine that Mr. Flanders took, except when I went into him and found he was very weak, and found that possibly his heart had gone back on him. I used certain restoratives as I could to bring over the threatened end."

Dr. Everhart testified that sodium phosphate as used in medicine is not the commercial kind, or raw material, referred to in the dispensatory from which the accused read in his statement to the jury, but it is refined, and arsenic is not a part of it, and would not get in it except by accident or from the use of impure materials in manufacture. He had never seen or heard of any that had arsenic in it.

The motion for new trial contained the general grounds, and others complaining of the charge of the court to the jury, and refusal to charge; and another setting up incompetency of certain jurors brought to the attention of the court after verdict, all of which sufficiently appear in the opinion.

A. L. Franklin and Saffold & Larsen, for plaintiff in error. R. R. Arnold, Alfred Herrington, Sol. Gen., and H. A. Hall, Atty. Gen., for the State.

ATKINSON, J. [1] 1. The fourth ground of the amended motion for new trial complained of the charge of the court "as follows: 'To warrant a conviction upon circumstantial evidence, the proven facts must not only be consistent with the hypothesis of guilt, but must exclude every other reasonable hypothesis save that of the guilt of the accused. If both theories—that is, the theory of guilt and the theory of innocence—are consistent with the proven facts, then you should give the benefit of the doubt to the defendant and acquit him,' thereby laying down, movant contends, as a final test of when a conviction could be had under circumstantial evidence, the test that, if both theories are of equal consistency, then and only then should the jury give the benefit of the doubt to the defendant, and thereby taking away from the jury the correct law of circumstantial evidence as above charged. In the first part of the charge of the court quoted; and this statement as to the two theories is not the law in a case like the one at bar, where the conviction depended upon circumstantial evidence, the law of circumstantial evidence going one step further than the doctrine of reasonable doubt, to wit, the theory of guilt must not only be consistent, but the evidence must exclude every other reasonable hypothesis, the law being that the evidence should be perfectly consistent with guilt, and the jury would not be authorized to convict unless the evidence went further and excluded every other reasonable hypothesis; and said charge is error, further, because, in order for the defendant to be acquitted under circumstantial testimony, it is not necessary that the evidence be consistent with the theory of innocence in order for the defendant to be acquitted, or to receive the benefit of the doctrine of reasonable doubt, the law being that the burden is on the state to establish the guilt of the defendant to the exclusion of every other reasonable hypothesis, and whether or not the circumstances proven are consistent with the innocence of the party makes no difference, if said circumstances are not to the exclusion of every other reasonable hypothesis, the defendant could not be convicted, no matter how consistent the evidence might be, or how inconsistent it might be with the theory of innocence. Said charge is further error for the reason that it lays down the rule that the evidence required to acquit, and before a defendant should have the benefit of the reasonable doubt, must establish a theory consistent with the defendant's innocence, the true theory being that the evidence must establish a theory consistent with the defendant's guilt and to the exclusion of every other reasonable hypothesis, and it makes no difference whether or not the theory of innocence is established by the evidence as consistent as the theory of guilt, if the evidence fails to exclude every other reasonable hypothesis, save that of the guilt of the accused; and said charge is error because it qualifies the law of circumstantial evidence." The first part of the charge excepted to is a literal reproduction of section 984 of the Penal Code of 1895. The remainder of the charge excepted to was not subject to the criticisms made upon it.

[2] 2. The fifth ground of the amended motion for new trial complained of the charge "as follows: 'Mathematical certainty is not required and cannot be attained in a legal investigation. Moral and reasonable certainty is all that the law requires. Whenever you are convinced beyond a reasonable doubt, or to a moral and reasonable certainty, that this defendant is guilty, you would be authorized to so find. In the absence of such a degree of conviction on your part, you would not be authorized to find him guilty, but should return a verdict of not guilty which would fully acquit and discharge him.' The error in said charge, movant contends, being that it does not give the law of this case, this case depending entirely on circumstantial evidence, the court saying whenever you are convinced beyond a reasonable doubt, or to a moral and reasonable certainty, that this defendant is guilty, you would be authorized to so find, when the law of this case is not dependent upon the doctrine of reasonable doubt; but is dependent upon the law of circumstantial evidence, and the charge places this case on the doctrine of reasonable doubt, and is therefore error. The charge should have gone one step further and said that in this case, before they would be authorized to convict, that the evidence should exclude every other reasonable hypothesis save the guilt of the accused, this charge of the court placing the conviction or acquittal upon the doctrine of reasonable doubt, which does not apply to cases where the conviction is dependent solely upon circumstantial evidence. This is especial error because of the court having nowhere charged the law of circumstantial evidence." The charge excepted to applies the principle of sections

986 and 987 of the Penal Code, which were codified from the decision rendered in the case of John v. State, 33 Ga. 258, that being a case dependent upon purely circumstantial evidence. Section 986 of the Code declares "moral and reasonable certainty is all that can be expected in legal investigation," while 987 declares, "whether dependent upon positive or circumstantial evidence, the true question in criminal cases is, not whether it be possible that the conclusion at which the testimony points may be false, but whether there is sufficient testimony to satisfy the mind and conscience beyond a reasonable doubt." In view of the law as thus stated, it does not affect the ruling in the case that all the evidence relied upon for a conviction was circumstantial. In Giles v. State, 6 Ga. 276, it was said: "On the trial of criminal cases, moral, and not mathematical or metaphysical, certainty is all that the law requires, or that is attainable. The doubts of a jury to justify an acquittal should be reasonable, and not a mere vague conjecture or possibility of the innocence of the accused." Also: "Direct and irrefragible evidence cannot and need not be always produced in criminal cases. All that is necessary is that the jury, whether the proof be positive or presumptive, be satisfied of the defendant's guilt." In Smith v. State, 63 Ga. 168, the following charge was approved: "Before you can convict, you must believe that the prisoner is guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. This doubt must be a reasonable one, not a fanciful doubt. A mathematical certainty is not required. A reasonable and moral conviction of guilt is all that the law requires." This was also a case which depended upon circumstantial evidence. As stated in the first division of the opinion, the judge in the present case had already charged the section of the Code relative to circumstantial evidence, and the criticisms upon the excerpt from the charge contained in the fifth ground of the amended motion were not sufficient to require the grant of a new trial.

[3] 3. In the sixth to the twelfth grounds of the amended motion for new trial, both inclusive, complaint was made of the charge, the substance of the criticisms being that the court erred in charging on reasonable doubt without going one step further and in immediate connection therewith charging also the law of circumstantial evidence, that, "to warrant a conviction on circumstantial evidence, the proven facts must not only be consistent with the hypothesis of guilt, but must exclude every other reasonable hypothesis save that of the guilt of the accused." There was no other criticism of the charge in these grounds of the motion for new trial. The judge having elsewhere charged the law of circumstantial evidence as applicable to the entire case, the failure to recharge it in immediate connection with the law of reasonable doubt, as complained of in the excerpts from the charge contained in these grounds of the motion, was not misleading, or cause for the grant of a new trial.

[4] 4. The fourteenth ground of the amended motion for new trial complained that certain jurors were biased and prejudiced against the accused. On the hearing of the motion for new trial evidence was submitted by affidavits pro and con as to the qualification of the jurors. The evidence so submitted authorized the judge to find, as he did, in favor of the competency of the jurors. Accordingly there was no error in overruling that ground of the motion for new trial which complained of the partiality of the jurors. See Wall v. State, 126 Ga. 549, 55 S. E. 484, and citations; McCrimmon v. State, 126 Ga. 560, 55 S. E. 481.

[5] 5. The thirteenth ground of the amended motion complained that the judge in his entire charge failed to charge the law of circumstantial evidence, and thereby committed error, because the case was one that depended entirely upon circumstantial evidence. But, as we have already seen, the judge did charge the Code section on that subject, and the criticism is not borne out by the record.

[6] 6. The fifteenth ground of the amended motion for new trial complained that the judge refused, upon written request, timely presented, to charge the jury: "I charge you that if you find from the evidence or statement of the accused that calomel or other medicine was administered to the deceased by the defendant in the court [course?] of his treatment of the deceased, and that it was possible for that medicine to contain arsenic, and that fact was known to the defendant, and that the quantity of arsenic found in the organs of deceased after death was about the quantity of arsenic which was possible to be in the medicine so administered by the defendant, then your verdict should be for the defendant, and you should acquit him, or, if you have a reasonable doubt as to this fact, you should acquit him." There was no error in refusing this request. There might be other objections to it, but it would invade the province of the jury for the judge to instruct them as requested, relative to the effect of the evidence before them. If the jury should find as outlined in the request, such finding would not necessarily call for a verdict of not guilty.

[7] 7. The general grounds complained that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict. All the other members of the court are of the opinion that the evidence was sufficient; but the writer is of the contrary opinion for the following reasons: The defendant entered upon the trial of the case with the presumption of innocence in his favor. The burden was not upon him to prove his innocence, but it was upon the state to prove his guilt to a moral and reasonable certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt. This could be done by circumstantial as well as by direct evidence; but, where conviction depended entirely upon circumstantial evidence, the evidence upon every material allegation of the indictment should be not only consistent with the hypothesis of guilt, but should be so conclusive as to exclude every other reasonable hypothesis save that of the guilt of the accused. Bell v. State, 93 Ga. 557, 19 S. E. 244; Williams v. State, 113 Ga. 721, 39 S. E. 487. The defendant was a practicing physician, and, aside from the evidence as to intimacy between himself and the wife of the deceased, there was no more in the case to point to a homicide than there would be in any case where a physician treated a sick patient who afterwards died. Though there were counts in the indictment to support any evidence that might be adduced on the trial, the evidence was not sufficient to a moral and reasonable certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt to show that death was produced by poisoning. There was no direct evidence that death was produced by poisoning. The presumption is that he died a natural death, the burden being on the state to show the contrary. There was direct evidence of seven-eighths of a grain of arsenic being found in his remains, but no direct evidence that that killed him. Two grains of arsenic, according to the evidence, is the minimum fatal dose. Whether the deceased ever had more arsenic in his system was a matter by no means certain, and whether he ever had as much as two grains at one time was a mere matter of opinion. The evidence fails to disclose the nature and character of the illness of the deceased which caused him to invoke the services of a doctor. The death might have resulted from that illness. It was at least incumbent upon the state to make some explanation with reference to this. If the evidence had been sufficient to show to a moral and reasonable certainty, and beyond a reasonable doubt, that the deceased came to his death by arsenic poisoning, it was still incumbent upon the state to show in like manner that it was administered by the defendant, or by his direction, with felonious intent. In order to do this, the state again relied upon circumstantial evidence, which, in order to convict, is required to be so conclusive as to be not only consistent with the guilt of the defendant, but to exclude every other reasonable hypothesis save that of his guilt. There was evidence that arsenic is administered in a powder, and is tasteless and odorless, and that it would produce certain symptoms, and that the defendant administered from time to time powder medicines, without taste or odor and which produce symptoms of arsenic poisoning, but there was no direct evidence that the medicine so administered was in fact arsenic, while it was testified that the symptoms might result from other causes. It was explained by the prisoner's statement that the medicines which had been administered by him were calomel, sal hepatica, sal laxative, and "fringe tree alternative" (alterative). If arsenic was administered to the deceased, the evidence is not to any degree of certainty that it was administered by the doctor. The deceased was sick for some two weeks, and different people had nursed him, and they might have administered arsenic to him by mistake or design, or he might have taken it himself during the absence of his attendants. The evidence does not purport to show that he was under the watch of an attendant at all times, but showed affirmatively that different people attended him at different times, and no one attended him at all times. If it were said that there was an inducement for the doctor to poison the deceased in order to get rid of him, so that he might have intimate relations with the wife of the deceased, it might also be said that the same inducement was open to the wife in order that she might have relations with the doctor. There was no evidence of a conspiracy between the wife and the doctor to kill the deceased, and, if the deceased was killed in the manner alleged, it was possible and just as plausible that the wife might have committed the murder as that the doctor did, and that she might have done so without his knowledge or participation in any manner. Had the law cast the burden upon the defendant to prove his innocence, rather than upon the state to prove his guilt, it might be that the defense would have failed to support the burden, but, it being incumbent on the state to prove the guilt of the defendant, the theory of guilt is not borne out by the evidence.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except BECK, J., absent, and ATKINSON, J., dissenting.

(136 Ga. 687)

BUTTS COUNTY v. WRIGHT.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 18, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. COUNTIES (§ 200*)—PRESENTATION OF CLAIMS—TIME.

"All claims against counties must be presented for payment within twelve months after they accrue or become payable, or the same are barred, unless held by minors or other persons laboring under disabilities, who are allowed twelve months after the removal of such disability." Civil Code 1910, § 411.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. § 315; Dec. Dig. § 200.*]

2. COUNTIES (§§ 197, 203*)—PRESENTATION OF CLAIMS—CLAIMS WHICH MUST BE PRESENTED—"CLAIM AGAINST THE COUNTY."

If a person, who seeks to recover money from a county on the ground that the county officers illegally borrowed it from him, but that it was used for specified legitimate current expenses of a given year, has no claim against the county for money, he is not entitled to any recovery. If he has a claim for money against the county on that ground, whether he seeks to assert it by a suit for money had and received, or to set up that, under the circumstances, the law implied a contract to pay him what had thus been received and used for county purposes, in either event it is a "claim against the county," and falls within the requirement of the statute quoted in the first headnote. Maddox v. County of Randolph, 65 Ga. 217.

(a) The suit was not brought within 12 months after the accrual of the right of action, and cannot be urged as a substitute for or equivalent of the presentation of a claim.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. §§ 197, 203.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1202-1211; vol. 8, p. 7604.]

3. CLAIMS AGAINST COUNTIES—PRESENTATION—NECESSITY.

In the case at bar it did not appear that the claim had been presented in accordance with the statute, and therefore, if it would otherwise have been legal, it was barred.

4. COUNTIES (§ 203*)—PRESENTATION OF CLAIMS—SUFFICIENCY.

As the county officers had no legal authority to borrow money and give notes for its future payment, the doing of these acts would not suffice as equivalent to a presentation of the claims required by the statute. The giving of the notes was an illegal promise to pay in the future. The presentation required by the statute contemplates present legal action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

5. COUNTIES (§ 197*)—CLAIMS—PRESENTATION—NECESSITY.

The suit was to recover money which it was claimed had been borrowed and used to pay warrants. While there was a general averment of subrogation, there were no such allegations as to show equitable ownership or assignment of the warrants, so as to make the suit in its essence one on such warrants and to render presentation of the claims unnecessary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 197.*]

6. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 46*)—DETERMINATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS.

As this ruling controls the case, it is unnecessary to discuss any constitutional questions which may be involved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 43-45; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

7. DEMURRER—RULINGS.

Under the preceding rulings, it was erroneous to refuse to dismiss the case on the grounds of the demurrer which set up that the plaintiff's claims were not presented within the time required by law.

Holden, J., dissenting.

Error from Superior Court, Butts County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action by B. A. Wright, as administrator, against Butts County. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

W. Ernest Watkins, for plaintiff in error. Jno. R. L. Smith, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except BECK, J., absent, and HOLDEN, J., dissenting.

HOLDEN, J. (dissenting). 1. Where one loans to a county money which is used by it in the discharge of its legally incurred liabilities for current expenses, while no action can be maintained against the county by the lender on the loan contract, the lender has a right of action against the county to recover the money thus used by it, in the form of an action for money had and received. *Butts County v. (Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 15, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1135*)—AFFIRMANCE—ERROR NOT SHOWN.

The assignments of error are to the overruling of the motion for re-reference to the auditor, to the refusal of the judge to approve exceptions of fact to the auditor's report, to the overruling of exceptions of law thereto, and to the decree based on the report of the auditor. In the brief of counsel for plaintiffs in error, filed in this court, the assignment upon the refusal to re-refer the cause is expressly withdrawn. We have most carefully studied the entire record, and thoroughly considered all of the exceptions, and are entirely satisfied that the trial judge did not commit error in declining to approve the exceptions of fact, or in overruling the exceptions of law, or in sustaining the auditor in his rulings as to evidence, or in rendering a decree in accordance with the findings of the auditor.

CARTER v. WALDEN et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 18, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 432*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—DEED—CONSIDERATION.

A deed reciting a valuable consideration only may be shown by parol to be without any consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1981-1989; Dec. Dig. § 432.*]

2. WILLS (§ 88*)—WILL OR DEED.

An instrument purporting to convey a tract of land to the grantees therein contained the following language: "Jacob Carter [the grantor] is to hold a lifetime lease on said 245 acres of land, more or less [the property conveyed]. Said lease to expire at the death of the party of the first part" (the grantor). Held, that the writing was not a will, but a deed, with a reservation of a life estate in the grantor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 208-217; Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

3. DEEDS (§ 70*)—CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 84*)—VALIDITY—FRAUD—LACHES.

The petition made, among other allegations, substantially the following: The plaintiff, who was the owner of a tract of land, intending to make a will devising the land to certain persons, made known such intention to another, and the latter prepared a deed conveying the land to such persons, and informed the owner that the writing was a will, and not a deed. The owner was entirely ignorant of the forms necessary to constitute a deed or a will, and did not know the effect of the language of said instrument, or else he would not have signed the same; and petitioner signed the same, verily believing that he was thereby executing a will, and not a deed. The writing was never delivered to any of the grantees as a deed, but was left in the custody of one of the grantees, to be held as the owner's will. The instrument executed was in form a deed conveying the land to the grantees therein named, with a reservation of a life estate in the maker, and was without any consideration whatever. Held: (a) Clear proof of the allegations made would entitle the plaintiff to a decree canceling the instrument. (b) The instrument having been made March 9, 1898, the plaintiff was not guilty of such laches as would bar his right to have the writing canceled; the suit for this purpose having been brought February 15, 1910, a few months after he discovered the character of the writing, and it appearing that he has always remained in possession of the property, and there being involved no question as to the rights of third parties or innocent purchasers. (c) The petition was not subject to general de-murrer, or to any of the grounds of special demurrer.

CENTRAL GEORGIA BRICK CO. v. CAROLINA PORTLAND CEMENT CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 18, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SALES (§§ 62, 418*)—CONTRACT—DELIVERY—BREACH BY SELLER—DAMAGES.

A written contract for the sale of 400,000 hard brick, to be shipped from Macon, Ga., to Charleston, S. C., at the price of $7.15 per 1,000, f. o. b. cars at Charleston, the shipments to be made one car each day, beginning February 16th, unless prevented by causes beyond the control of the seller, such as strikes, railroad wrecks, and floods, is an entire contract, though the subject-matter is divisible. Under such a contract the seller is not entitled to demand payment upon delivery of each car load of brick, but only upon delivery of the whole. Erwin v. Harris, 87 Ga. 333, 13 S. E. 513; Henderson Elevator Co. v. North Georgia Milling Co., 126 Ga. 279, 55 S. E. 50; Shinn v. Bodine, 60 Pa. 182, 100 Am. Dec. 560; Catlin v. Tobias, 28 N. Y. 217, 84 Am. Dec. 183; Mount v. Lyon, 49 N. Y. 552; Kenigberger v. Wingate, 31 Tex. 42, 98 Am. Dec. 512; McGeehee v. Hill, 1 Ala. 140.

(a) Accordingly, where the seller delivered one car load of brick on February 15th, and by reason of floods failed to deliver any more until April, when on the 14th of that month it delivered one car, and on the 19th another, but refused thereafter to deliver any more unless the purchaser would, before delivery, pay a draft for the value of each car attached to a bill of lading, it committed a breach of the contract, which gave the purchaser the right to recover as damages the difference between the contract price and the price which the purchaser was compelled to pay in the market at the place of delivery, in order to obtain brick of the same quality; it appearing that the purchaser bought the brick to be used in the erection of a certain building, that the seller knew the purpose for which the brick were to be used, and that the price paid was the market price at the place of delivery.

WILLIS et al. v. BONNER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 19, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. WITNESSES (§ 149*)—COMPETENCY—TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEDENT.

Decie Thomas and the administrator of Emma Martin brought suit against Anna Bonner and her husband, Clarence Bonner, to recover a tract of land and the mesne profits thereof. Anna Bonner, who was in possession of the land and claimed to be the owner thereof, died pending the suit intestate, leaving as her sole heir at law the other defendant, her husband. Anna Bonner was stricken as a party defendant, and the suit proceeded "against the other defendant, Clarence Bonner, as her only heir at law." Held, it appearing that the suit at the time of the trial was against Clarence Bonner as the sole heir at law of his wife, who died intestate, in the absence of evidence that she left debts which are unpaid, he was her "personal representative," and the court did not err in ruling that Decie Thomas was incompetent to testify to any communication or transaction between her and Anna Bonner. *Civ. CRAWFORD et al. v. ATLANTIC COAST LUMBER CORPORATION.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 6, 1911.)

1. INJUNCTION (§ 252*)—INJUNCTION BONDS—RIGHT OF RECOVERY.

Where defendant is enjoined from interfering with plaintiff's property, and the order deprives defendant of his right to use his property, defendant may recover on the injunction bond any damages suffered from such deprivation.

2. INJUNCTION (§ 252*)—UNDEXTAKINGS.

In a suit on an undertaking given by plaintiff on the issuance of an injunction restraining defendant from cutting timber, defendant was not entitled to recover damages sustained from the issuance of the injunction in excess of the amount fixed in the undertaking.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 586-598; Dec. Dig. § 252*.]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 907*)—OBJECTIONS—PRESENTATION BELOW.

Where there were no pleadings showing the amount of damages claimed in a proceeding upon an injunction undertaking, nor plaintiff's defense to the claim for damages, so that plaintiff could make any argument at trial appropriate to the claim set up, and the master found against him in an amount less than the undertaking, though not referring to any defense made on the ground that the amount allowed defendant could not exceed the amount of the undertakings, it could not be inferred on appeal that that objection was not made below, so as to prevent it from being raised on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 907*.]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Berkeley County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Suit by S. L. Crawford and others against the Atlantic Coast Lumber Corporation. From a decree in part for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Modified, as stated.

Legare & Holman, for appellants. Willcox & Willcox, for respondent.

WOODS, J. This action for injunction arose out of differences as to rights acquired by the defendant under a contract for the sale of standing timber. The plaintiffs obtained a temporary order of injunction, restraining the defendant from cutting any timber on 954 acres of the land described in the agreement, on the ground that the conveyance did not cover timber growing in the bays and branches. The undertaking given under this order was conditioned that the plaintiffs would pay the "sum of $300, being such damages as the defendant may suffer by reason of an injunction granted by an order of his honor, Judge Charles G. Dantzler, on 28th day of April, 1906." Upon motion before him, Judge Ernest Gary made an order on 15th June, 1906, dissolving the injunction ordered by Judge Dantzler. The plaintiffs appealed from this order, and obtained an order from Hon. Y. J. POPE, Chief Justice, enjoining the defendant from cutting the timber described in the complaint pending the appeal. Under this order the plaintiffs gave another undertaking, conditioned for the payment of $200, "being such damages as the defendant may suffer by reason of an order granted by his honor, Y. J. POPE, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of South Carolina, restraining and enjoining the defendant from committing any further acts of trespass and in cutting timber described in the complaint." The Supreme Court reversed the order of Judge Gary, and thus restored the order of injunction made by Judge Dantzler.

Upon hearing the case on the merits, Judge Klugh sustained the contention of the plaintiffs, and made a decree permanently enjoining the defendant from cutting any timber in the bays and branches, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for the sum of $820, the value of the timber cut in the bays and branches. On appeal from this decree the Supreme Court reversed the judgment of the circuit court on this point, holding that the timber on all the land was embraced in the contract of sale, but adjudged, further, that the contract conveyed only timber measuring at the time of the sale 9 inches in diameter 20 feet from the butt. Thereafter an order was made by Judge Memminger, referring the cause to the master "to take testimony relevant thereto, and to assess and report the damage, if any, which the plaintiffs have sustained on account of the cutting by the defendant of any of the timber on the lands of the plaintiffs, which defendant was not under its contract entitled to cut, and to assess and report the damage, if any, which the defendant has sustained by reason of the issuing of the injunctions in this case, with leave to report any special matter." The master reported that the plaintiffs had been damaged $68.83 by reason of the cutting by the defendant of timber under the size contemplated by the contract, and that the defendant had been damaged $529.13 by reason of the loss of trees, which it had rightfully cut, and which it was enjoined from removing. Upon hearing argument upon exceptions filed by both parties to this report, the circuit court found the entire damages suffered by the defendant to be $3,677.81, and, after deducting $68.83, the damages found by the master in favor of the plaintiff, decreed that the defendant should have judgment for the remainder, $3,608.98. From this decree plaintiffs appealed.

[1] The unsoundness of the first point raised by the exceptions is made obvious by the statement of it. The contention is that, since the injunction was sustained in part, the defendant could recover no damages on account of it. Stated more specifically, the proposition is that when a party is properly enjoined from interfering with or injuring the property of the plaintiff, and by the same order at the instance of the plaintiff is deprived of the right of using his own property, he has no redress under an undertaking which provides expressly for any damages he may suffer by reason of the injunction. It is obvious that a defendant can suffer no damages from being enjoined from violating the rights of another, and it is equally obvious that the losses which resulted from not being allowed to exercise his own rights are damages suffered by reason of the injunction. 2 High on Injunctions, § 1867.

[2] The second point made by the exceptions is well taken. The court was without power to give judgment in favor of the defendant for an amount in excess of the undertakings. The remedy of injunction invoked by the plaintiff, the protection against damage afforded by the undertaking, and the power of the court to ascertain the damages by reference, or otherwise, are all statutory, and are all interdependent; and it follows that the damages must be sought by the defendant in the same cause by enforcement of the undertaking, and that they are limited by the undertaking. It was expressly so held in Batson v. Paris Mountain Water Co., 73 S. C. 368, 53 S. E. 500, and in Meyers v. Block, 120 U. S. 206, 7 Sup. Ct. 525, 30 L. Ed. 642. The decisions of the courts of other states have been to the same effect whenever the question has arisen under similar statutes.

[3] The defendant's contention, however, is that the point is not available to the plaintiffs, because it was not taken in the circuit court. The general and well-recognized rule relied on is not applicable here. We pass by the argument which might be made that the court, in undertaking to give judgment for defendant in excess of that which the statute empowered it to give, went beyond its jurisdiction, because this court cannot infer from the record that the point was not made in the circuit court that the judgment against the plaintiffs could not exceed the sum of the undertakings. There were no pleadings setting out the items and amount of damages claimed, and the defenses to the claim; hence it was open to the plaintiffs to make any defense in evidence and in argument appropriate to the claims set up. There is nothing, therefore, in the record to show that this defense was not argued before the master. It is true that the master's report does not refer to it, and that it is not specifically mentioned in the exceptions to his report. But the absence of such references is not convincing that the point was not made, because on other grounds the master found against the plaintiffs a net amount less than the sum of the two undertakings, thus making references to the point in the exceptions inappropriate.

A mere inspection of the papers is sufficient to show that the undertaking given under the order of the Chief Justice was intended to supplement the undertaking given under the order of Judge Dantzler; and the defendant is therefore entitled to the protection of both undertakings. We do not understand that there is any serious contention that the defendants were damaged less than $500, the sum of the two undertakings, and the evidence on that subject will not be recited. It is enough to say that the evidence shows beyond all doubt that the defendant was prevented from using much timber, which belonged to it under the contract, which it had cut, and which was lost by reason of the injunction, that the operation of its mill plant was so interfered with by the injunction against using its own timber that a heavy loss was incurred on that account, and that these losses, after deducting plaintiff's damages of $68.83, far exceeded $500, the sum of the two undertakings.

The judgment of this court is that the defendant is entitled to judgment against the plaintiffs and the sureties on their undertakings for the sum of $500, and that the judgment of the circuit court be modified accordingly.

WINOKER v. WARFIELD et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 22, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

RAILROADS (§ 282*)—TORTS OF SERVANT—LIABILITY OF MASTER—PETITION.

A railway company is liable for a tort committed by its agent in the business of the company and within the scope of the agent's employment. Applying this doctrine to the allegations of the petition, it was not open to general demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 282.*]

Error from Superior Court, Liberty County; P. E. Seabrook, Judge.

Action by Samuel Winoker against S. D. Warfield and another, as receivers of the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company. The petition was dismissed on general demurrer, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

In a suit brought by Winoker against the receivers of the Seaboard Air Line Railway, the substance of the petition here material was: The petitioner went to the freight warehouse of the railway company at Dorchester, a station on the railway line, for the purpose of paying the freight charges due by him to the defendants on a lot of goods shipped to him over the line of the company to Dorchester. When he arrived at the warehouse, the station agent in charge thereof, and to whom he intended to pay such freight charges, was busy delivering freight to another person, and, while waiting for the agent to finish the business in which he was then engaged, the petitioner seated himself upon the steps of the platform in front of the warehouse, and entered into a conversation with a section foreman of the company. During this conversation the petitioner informed the section foreman that a short time previously petitioner had, with the consent of the railway officials, taken the place, for a few days, of the company's agent at Way's station on the company's line, and had, during the temporary absence of the agent at that station, performed his duties, including the selling of tickets to passengers. At this point in the conversation, one Walter Belk, "in the employment of said receivers as special agent," who was standing near by, "without petitioner having addressed a word to [him], * * * said to petitioner that he [Belk] had told petitioner that petitioner must never come around any of the railroad offices again, and that, if he [Belk] ever caught petitioner in any of the railroad offices selling tickets, he [Belk] would kick petitioner out of them, and the said Belk then cursed petitioner [applying to him a vile name], * * * and ordered petitioner to get down off of the steps whereon petitioner was sitting." Petitioner obeyed, whereupon Belk caught his shirt near the collar, again applying to him a vile name, and ordered him to leave the grounds of the railway company, at the same time pulling him across the tracks towards the edge of the company's right of way. "To this treatment petitioner protested, and told said Belk that he had no right to put him off the company's grounds, as he was there on business with the agent, and [that Belk] had no right to curse petitioner. The said Belk refused to desist, but continued his hold on petitioner, and endeavored to pull petitioner across the remaining tracks of said railroad towards the edge of said right of way, and repeatedly called petitioner [a vile name], * * * until finally petitioner replied to him by saying, 'You are another' [applying to Belk the same vile name], * * * whereupon the said Belk knocked petitioner down," violently beating him, and inflicting serious wounds upon his head. "Petitioner says that, for some time previous to and at the time the said Walter Belk cursed, abused, and beat petitioner as aforesaid, the said Belk was in the employment of and a servant of said receivers, occupying the position known as special agent of said receivers in the conduct of the business of said railway, and that the duties of said special agent were, generally, to investigate, detect, and report any delinquencies or wrongdoing by the agents or servants of said receivers, relative to the business of said railway, and to investigate, detect, and to take such steps as were legal to prevent and to punish any wrong committed by any one against said railway or its property, and that at the time the said Belk assaulted and beat petitioner, as aforesaid, he [Belk] was actually on duty for said receivers, as special agent, as aforesaid, the particular duty that called said Belk to said Dorchester station at said time being to investigate, detect, and take necessary action to apprehend the party who had opened and left open a switch on the line of said railway at a point known as Limerick, a short distance from said Dorchester station, and that at the time said Belk assaulted and beat petitioner, as aforesaid, the said Belk was acting upon the claim that your petitioner was an intruder and a trespasser on the property of said railway, and acted in the line of his duty as said special agent to eject petitioner from said property." The character and the extent of the wounds inflicted by Belk on petitioner were set forth in detail, as well as his physician's bill incurred by reason thereof, and also the pain and suffering he endured on account of the wounds inflicted by Belk, and the damages he had thereby sustained. The petition was dismissed on general demurrer, and the petitioner excepted.

A. S. Way and W. T. Burkhalter, for plaintiff in error. Anderson & Cann and Thos. T. Walsh, Jr., for defendants in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The doctrine that a principal is liable for a tort committed by his agent in the business of the principal and within the scope of the agent's employment, is so well settled that no citation of authority is needed for its support. The question is: Did the allegations of the petition now under consideration make out a case of liability against the defendants under the doctrine stated? The petition showed that the plaintiff had a right to be at the defendants' warehouse for the purpose of paying a freight bill due by him, and that while there Belk, an agent of the defendants, unlawfully assaulted and beat him, but not in the presence of the agent who had charge of the freight warehouse and to whom the plaintiff intended to pay freight charges. According to the petition, Belk was the "special agent" of the defendants, and as such it was his duty, among others, generally to investigate, detect, and to take such steps as were legal to prevent, any wrong from being committed against the property of the railway company, and at the time he unlawfully assaulted and beat the plaintiff, while the latter was at the defendants' freight warehouse for the purpose of paying a freight bill, Belk was, in the language of the petition, "acting upon the claim that your petitioner was an intruder and a trespasser on the property of said railway, and acted in the line of his duty as said special agent to eject petitioner from said property." When the plaintiff informed the section foreman of the railway company that he (the plaintiff), a short time previously, had temporarily acted as the agent of the company with the consent of its officials, and as such agent had sold tickets to passengers, Belk interrupted the conversation between the plaintiff and the section foreman, and said to the plaintiff that he (Belk) had told him never to come around any of the railroad offices again, and that if he (Belk) ever caught plaintiff in any of the railroad offices selling tickets he would kick plaintiff out of them, and, cursing plaintiff, ordered him to leave the grounds of the railway company, at the same time making the assault upon him. From these allegations it may be fairly inferred that the general duties of Belk were of a detective character, and that in his opinion it was to the interest of the company and for the protection of its property that the plaintiff should be ejected therefrom, and that Belk, acting in his capacity as special agent for the receivers of the company, and in the line of his duty as a detective, undertook to eject the plaintiff from the premises of the railway company as an intruder thereon. It follows, therefore, that the petition was sufficient to withstand a general demurrer, and to entitle the plaintiff to go to the jury, in order that they might, under the evidence to be submitted, pass upon the question whether Belk was acting in the business of the railway company and within the scope of his employment when he committed the alleged assault and battery. Judgment reversed.

LATSON v. WELLS, Warden.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 17, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 83*)—PROHIBITION AGAINST SLAVERY—STATUTES.

Pen. Code 1910, § 715, providing that, "if any person shall contract with another to perform for him services of any kind, with intent to procure money or other thing of value thereby, and not to perform the service contracted for, to the loss and damage of the hirer, or, after having so contracted, shall procure from the hirer money, or other thing of value, with intent not to perform such service, to the loss and damage of the hirer, he shall be deemed a common cheat and swindler," and, upon conviction, shall be punished as for a misdemeanor, is not in conflict with the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, providing: "Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

2. STATUTES (§ 64*)—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 43*)—PARTIAL INVALIDITY—WHO MAY RAISE CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS.

Pen. Code 1910, § 716, is as follows: "Satisfactory proof of the contract, the procuring thereon of money or other thing of value, the failure to perform the services so contracted for, or failure to return the money so advanced with interest thereon at the time said labor was to be performed, without good and sufficient cause, and loss or damage to the hirer, shall be deemed presumptive evidence of the intent referred to in the preceding section." The provisions of this section, and those of the section referred to in the preceding note, are the provisions, respectively, of the first and second sections of the act of 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 90). The third and only other section of that act provides for a repeal of conflicting laws. The title of the act is as follows: "An act to make it illegal for any person to procure money, or other thing of value, on a contract to perform services, with intent to defraud, and to fix the punishment therefor, and for other purposes." Held:

(a) The main legislative intent and purpose being to make the acts referred to in the first section a crime and to provide for its punishment, the second section, simply providing that proof of specified acts "shall be deemed presumptive evidence of the intent referred to," is not essential to the carrying out of such legislative intent and purpose. This rule of evidence, if eliminated from the act, would not affect the main legislative scheme and purpose; and, if the second section of the act is unconstitutional, the whole act would not be void, and the provisions of the first section would be constitutional and valid.

(b) Where one pleads guilty to accusations in a city court charging him with violating the first section of the act (embodied in Pen. Code 1910, § 715, above quoted), he cannot subsequently be released from custody even if the provisions of the second section of the act (embodied in Penal Code of 1910, § 716) are unconstitutional; the rule of evidence prescribed in the latter section not having been used against him.

Error from Superior Court, Dooly County; U. V. Whipple, Judge.

Habeas corpus by Mrs. Lawrence Latson to obtain discharge of her husband from the chain gang. Judgment remanding the prisoner, and relator brings error. Affirmed.

R. N. Holtzclaw, for plaintiff in error. W. F. George, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. Lawrence Latson was arraigned in the city court of Vienna on two accusations, each of which charged a violation of Pen. Code 1910, § 715. He pleaded guilty and was sentenced to pay a fine or serve 12 months on the chain gang in each case. While he was in the custody of the defendant in error as warden or superintendent of the chain gang of Dooly county, his wife applied for a writ of habeas corpus. Upon the trial of the case the statements in the application for the writ and the defendant's answer thereto were admitted to be true. To the judgment of the court remanding Lawrence Latson to the custody of the defendant in error and refusing to order his release the plaintiff in error excepted.

[1] 1. Pen. Code 1910, § 715, under which the accusations against Latson were drawn and which he was charged with violating, is as follows: "If any person shall contract with another to perform for him services of any kind, with intent to procure money or other thing of value thereby, and not to perform the service contracted for, to the loss and damage of the hirer, or, after having so contracted, shall procure from the hirer money, or other thing of value, with intent not to perform such service, to the loss and damage of the hirer, he shall be deemed a common cheat and swindler, and upon conviction shall be punished as for a misdemeanor." The plaintiff in error contends that the provisions of this section are unconstitutional because of being in violation of the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, providing: "Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction." The act under review does not seek to punish one for the mere breach of a contract, or the mere failure to pay a debt. The provisions of the act are aimed at the fraudulent practices therein referred to. It is the intent to defraud and the actual defrauding of another by virtue of such intent being carried out that the act makes a crime. The section above quoted is not susceptible of the construction that it seeks to punish one because of a failure to perform a contractual obligation, or to pay a debt, but the gist of the crime referred to in the act is the fraudulent intent with which one obtains "money or other thing of value" from another, who is defrauded by the former by reason of the carrying out of such intent. We fail to see any constitutional objection to a statute making it a crime for one willfully and knowingly to defraud another. If one knowingly and willfully defrauds another "of money or other thing of value," as set forth in the statute above quoted, it is no less a wrong than if he defrauds him in some other way. We have several statutes making fraudulent practices whereby one defrauds another a crime. See Pen. Code 1910, § 703 et seq. The legislative department of the government is not without authority to make an act of fraud, whereby another sustains loss because of the commission of the fraud, a crime. The mere fact that the party committing the fraud after its commission is left under an obligation to the party defrauded to pay him a debt, or to perform a contract made with him, which were involved in the transaction in which the fraud was committed, does not make the act denouncing the fraud unconstitutional on the ground that it seeks to punish one for failure to pay a debt, or to perform a contract. Banks v. State, 124 Ga. 15, 52 S. E. 74, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1007; Townsend v. State, 124 Ga. 69, 52 S. E. 293; Lamar v. State, 120 Ga. 312, 47 S. E. 958; Lamar v. Prosser, 121 Ga. 153, 48 S. E. 977; Mulkey v. State, 1 Ga. App. 521, 57 S. E. 1022. In the case of Bailey v. State, 158 Ala. 18, 24, 48 South. 498, 499, the court in a decision involving an act similar to the one above referred to said: "In Ex parte Riley, 94 Ala. 82, 83, 10 South. 528, 529, it was said: 'As the intent is the design, purpose, resolve, or determination in the mind of the accused, it can rarely be proved by direct evidence, but must be ascertained by means of inferences from the facts and circumstances developed by the proof. In the absence, however, of evidence from which such inferences may be drawn, the jury are not justified in indulging in mere unsupported conjectures, speculations, or suspicions as to the intentions which were not disclosed by any visible or tangible act, expression, or circumstance.' It is no doubt true that the difficulty in proving the intent made patent by that decision, suggested the amendment of 1903 (Gen. Acts 1903, p. 345) to the statute, which provides that the refusal or failure of a person who enters into such contract to perform such act or service, or refund such money, or pay for such property, without just cause, shall be prima facie evidence of the intent to injure or defraud his employer."

Counsel for the plaintiff in error rely on the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U. S. 219, 31 Sup. Ct. 145, 55 L. Ed. —. In that case the court had under consideration the Alabama statute referred to in the case from which we have just quoted, and which, as stated, is similar to the Georgia statute, and summarized it as follows on page 227 of 219 U. S., on page 146 of 31 Sup. Ct. (55 L. Ed. —): "The section of the Code as it stood before the amendments provided that any person who with intent to injure or defraud his employer entered into a written contract for service and thereby obtained from his employer money or other personal property, and with like intent and without just cause, and without refunding the money or paying for the property refused to perform the service, should be punished as if he had stolen it." This section of the Alabama Code (section 4730, Code 1896) was amended by the Legislature of that state in 1903 and 1907, by which amendments there was added thereto a provision that "the refusal or failure of any person, who enters into such contract, to perform such act or service or to cultivate such land, or refund such money, or pay for such property without just cause shall be prima facie evidence of the intent to injure his employer or landlord or defraud him." Our interpretation of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States is that it only decides that the above quoted provisions of the Alabama law, contained in the amendments of 1903 and 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 636) to section 4730 of the Code of Alabama of 1896, are unconstitutional. In the concluding portion of the opinion on page 245 of 219 U. S., on page 153 of 31 Sup. Ct. (55 L. Ed. —), Mr. Justice Hughes states: "The act of Congress deprives of effect all legislative measures of any state through which directly or indirectly the prohibited thing, to wit, compulsory service to secure the payment of a debt, may be established or maintained; and we conclude that section 4730, as amended, of the Code of Alabama, in so far as it makes the refusal or failure to perform the act or service, without refunding the money or paying for the property received, prima facie evidence of the commission of the crime which the section defines, is in conflict with the thirteenth amendment and the legislation authorized by that amendment, and is therefore invalid." We do not understand that the Supreme Court of the United States decided, or intended to decide, that the provisions in section 4730 of the Code of Alabama of 1896, as this section stood before the amendments thereto of 1903 and 1907, which provisions are similar to those in Penal Code 1910, § 715, of this state, were unconstitutional. We have been requested to review and overrule the decisions in the cases of Lamar v. State, Banks v. State, and Lamar v. Prosser, supra. Under the view we take of the case, as expounded in the subsequent division of the opinion, the question as to whether or not these decisions should be overruled in so far as they hold the provisions of Pen. Code 1910, § 716, are constitutional, is not one for decision under the record before us. In so far as these decisions hold the provisions of Pen. Code 1910, § 715, constitutional, we decline to overrule them.

[2] 2. It is contended that Pen. Code 1910, § 716, which immediately follows the section set out in the first division of the opinion, violates the provision of the Constitution above quoted, and that the two sections, when construed together, make section 715 also unconstitutional. Section 716 is as follows: "Satisfactory proof of the contract, the procuring thereon of money or other thing of value, the failure to perform the services so contracted for, or failure to return the money so advanced with interest thereon at the time said labor was to be performed, without good and sufficient cause, and loss or damage to the hirer, shall be deemed presumptive evidence of the intent referred to in the preceding section." These two sections of the Code are sections 1 and 2 of the act of 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 90). The third and only other section of the act merely provides for a repeal of all conflicting laws. We deem it unnecessary to decide the question as to whether or not the second section of the act—embodied in section 716 of the Penal Code of 1910—is unconstitutional. The main purpose of this enactment was to make certain acts enumerated in the first section—embodied in section 715 of the Penal Code of 1910—constitute a crime, the chief ingredient of which was the intent referred to in that section. This section alone provides what shall constitute a crime and fixes the punishment therefor. The title to the act is as follows: "An act to make it illegal for any person to procure money, or other thing of value, on a contract to perform services with intent to defraud, and to fix the punishment therefor, and for other purposes."

(136 Ga. 619)

It will be seen that nothing is said in the title with reference to what is contained in the second section of the act. The main legislative intent and purpose being to make the act referred to in the first section a crime and to provide for its punishment, the second section, simply providing that proof of specified acts "shall be deemed presumptive evidence of the intent referred to," is not essential to the carrying out of such legislative intent and purpose. This rule of evidence, if eliminated from the act, would not affect the main legislative scheme and purpose; and, if the second section of the act is unconstitutional, the whole act would not be void, and the provisions of the first section would be constitutional and valid. Deadwyler v. Karow, 131 Ga. 227, 62 S. E. 172, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 197. Hence we deem it unnecessary to decide whether or not the second section of the act is unconstitutional. Courts will not decide upon the constitutionality of an act at the instance of a party, unless it is put in operation against him. In this case the rule of evidence embodied in the second section of the act was not used against Latson, for the reason that he pleaded guilty to the accusations against him charging him with the violation of the provisions of the first section of the act. If he had been put on trial before a jury, and the rule of evidence referred to in the second section of the act had been given in charge to the jury as the law, or if he had been tried before the judge without a jury, the right would have existed to have brought into question in a proper way the constitutionality of the second section of the act. But he pleaded guilty to violating the first section of the act, and if the second section of the act, relating to a rule of evidence made applicable to the trial of one charged with the offense denominated by the first section, was unconstitutional, he cannot be released from custody because of the unconstitutionality of the provision relating to this rule of evidence. He cannot properly contend that he pleaded guilty because, if he had gone to trial, an unconstitutional act relating to a rule of evidence would have been used against him, for the reason that, if the enactment relating to such rule of evidence is unconstitutional, it is presumed the court trying him would have so declared and would not have allowed it to be used against him on his trial. We make no decision on the question as to whether or not the second section of the act is constitutional. The court committed no error in refusing to release Latson from the custody of the defendant in error.

Judgment affirmed.

STATE v. WESTERN & A. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 15, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TAXATION (§ 148*)—RAILROADS—INCOME TAX.

The income tax referred to in section 11 of the act to lease the Western & Atlantic Railroad (Acts 1889, p. 362), viz., "That said lessee or lessees shall be required to pay all taxes and assessments upon the property of this state in the state of Tennessee, and in Georgia upon all property owned or controlled by them, not received from the state, and such further taxes upon their income as is now paid by the Central Railroad & Banking Company," is a tax levied in the exercise of sovereignty, and not a contractual obligation springing primarily from the contract of lease executed pursuant to the act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 148.*]

2. ACTION (§ 35*)—STATUTORY REMEDIES—COLLECTION OF TAXES.

When the statute undertakes to provide adequate remedies, and those given do not embrace an action at law, a common-law action for the recovery of the tax as a debt will not lie.

(a) The statute provides adequate remedies for the collection of taxes imposed upon railroad companies.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Cent. Dig. §§ 273-294; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

3. TAXATION (§ 586*)—ENFORCEMENT—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT—ASSESSMENT.

An assessment made in the manner prescribed by the statute is indispensable in proceedings to enforce the collection of taxes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 1192-1195; Dec. Dig. § 586.*]

4. RAILROADS (§ 134*)—ACTIONS—INDEFINITE ALLEGATIONS—BREACH OF LEASE.

As the petition assigned no specific breach of the lease contract, it is not maintainable as an action for the recovery of damages for breach of contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 134.*]

5. DISCOVERY (§ 20*)—IN EQUITY—FAILURE OF MAIN PURPOSE OF BILL—RETENTION FOR DISCOVERY.

Where discovery is merely incidental to the relief prayed, the petition will not be retained for decree, where it discloses that the plaintiff is not entitled to the relief in aid of which discovery is prayed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Discovery, Cent. Dig. § 27; Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by the State of Georgia against the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company. The petition was dismissed on general demurrer, and the State brings error. Affirmed.

The state of Georgia owns a railroad known as the Western & Atlantic Railroad, extending from Atlanta, Ga., to Chattanooga, Tenn. In November, 1889 (Acts 1889, p. 362), an act was passed by the General Assembly providing for its lease. It was stipulated that the Governor should advertise for bids, and no bids for less than a stated minimum would be received. Among other features it was provided, in section 7, that all improvements and betterments were to be made at the expense of the lessee, and that all attachments to the realty should be considered permanent, and the road be kept in the condition of first-class roads in Georgia. The Governor was empowered to appoint a board of examiners to ascertain and report the condition of the road. It was made the duty of the lessee to file with the Governor an annual report of the condition of the road, which report was to set forth the improvements to the physical property, rolling stock purchased, income from passengers and freight, operating expenses, amount of freight transported and rates charged for the same, and all other facts necessary to furnishing complete information of the condition and operation of the railroad for each year. Section 9 provides for the observance by the lessee of the rules of the railroad commission, and further provides that "said lessee company shall have the exemptions, privileges, immunities, rights and guaranties, and shall be subject to the same laws, liabilities, disabilities, and public burdens on other railroad companies in this state, and no more, in all cases where this act is silent and has made no provisions on the subject." Section 10 is to the effect that the lessees forfeit six months' rental, as damages, if in default for the payment of the monthly rental for 20 days, and that, if the lessee fails to comply with the lease contract, the Governor, at his option, may declare the lease forfeited and take immediate possession. Section 11 is as follows: "That said lessee or lessees shall be required to pay all taxes and assessments upon the property of this state in the state of Tennessee, and in Georgia upon all property owned or controlled by them, not received from the state, and such further taxes upon their income as is now paid by the Central Railroad & Banking Company, and shall not sublet said road, or any part thereof, to any other company, corporation or party: Provided, the lessee may sublet any property not needed for railroad purposes: Provided, that, in the opinion of the Attorney General, that can be done without invalidating the state's title thereto; and all improvements put on said property by the lessees or their tenants shall belong to the state at the expiration of said lease." It was further provided that the lessee shall become a body corporate under the name of the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company during the continuance of the lease, and that, if the lessee be a corporation, it shall operate the road as the "Western & Atlantic Railroad Company."

On July 16, 1890, a contract of lease was entered into between the state and the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railway Company, in pursuance of the leasing act, wherein the lessee agreed to pay a monthly rental of $35,001 for the leased property for the term of 29 years from December 29, 1890. In June, 1909, the state of Georgia, by its Attorney General and special counsel appointed by the Governor, filed its petition against the lessee, wherein it was alleged that at the time of the lease the equipment of the road was inadequate, which was known to both parties to the contract, and it was in the contemplation of both parties that the lessee would be obliged, for its own interest, to improve the roadbed and structures and add to the movable equipment. By its contract charter the lessee undertook and agreed to make to the state each year a full statement of all property owned or controlled by it not received from the state, and to pay to the state thereon a tax equal in rate to the ad valorem taxes paid by other persons and corporations. From the beginning of the lease the lessee has owned or controlled property and has used and employed the same in the operation of the road; but, in violation of its contract, it has never disclosed to the state either the fact of the existence of such property or the value thereof, and has not paid any sum on this account, except that it has for some four or five years past made partial payments on certain real estate and tracks and other fixtures, which it claims it owned in Georgia and not upon the right of way of said railroad, though the location and identity of said property is not known to the state. When these facts were discovered by the Governor he requested information in reference thereto; but, notwithstanding the express covenant to furnish all information necessary for a full understanding of the condition and operations of the road, the lessee has failed and refused to furnish such information. Neither the state nor its officers know the value or character and amount of said property, but it charges that it amounts to $1,500,000, or other large sum, and has at all times during the lease been that much. The lessee knows and has full records touching these matters; and the state has no means of ascertaining the same, except by resort to the equitable powers of the court and a discovery from defendant. Some of the property is used in the conduct of local business, and other property is used in operating through trains over its entire system, treating the Western & Atlantic Railroad as an integral part thereof.

The petition then proceeds to set forth what is claimed to be an equitable basis for ascertaining the amount of property subject to an ad valorem tax. The state tax rate for each of the years 1891 to 1908 was alleged, and that certain amounts for each of said years were due as taxes from the defendant to the state because of property used in local traffic, and certain other amounts because of property used in through traffic. It was further alleged that by its charter contract the lessee expressly agreed to make to the state each year a full statement of all its operations and expenditures, and to pay to the state, in addition to its ad valorem taxes, such further tax upon its income as is paid by the Central Railroad & Banking Company, to wit, one-half of 1 per cent. upon its annual net income. The lessee has never complied with this covenant. It has made certain annual statements purporting to so comply, but the same have not been properly made. The petition then proceeds to state what is claimed to be the true rule of calculation for ascertaining the net income, and wherein the lessee had departed therefrom. It was further alleged that the lessee, in violation of the contract, has made subleases and to parties unknown to the state, and collected from them large sums of money. Some of these subleases were in violation of the contract and some not, but the state has no knowledge and no means of knowledge as to which were and which were not, and how much the lessee derived from them, respectively, and how much was accounted for in the lessee's annual statements. There are many other matters in which the state believes the lessee's accounts have not been kept and rendered according to the contract, but the facts are not so known as to enable the state to allege the same, though they would be so known if the lessee had furnished the reports required by the contract, and many other particulars wherein the lessee has violated the lease contract. As to the things complained of the facts are peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant; and, though bound by express contract to furnish said knowledge, defendant has failed and refused to do so, notwithstanding repeated requests for said information and repeated promises to furnish the same. The state has no adequate information nor means of procuring the same, except by resort to the knowledge and conscience of defendant and to records kept by it under its other name and in another state.

An interlocutory decree was prayed, requiring the defendant to make a full statement and accounting from the beginning of the lease, in compliance with its contract as set forth in section 7 of the lease act, and all other things necessary to give full information touching the condition and operation of the property, and that the same be decreed to be made as a specific compliance with its contract, and that the state be not bound thereby as by an answer in an equitable suit for discovery. But if the state has mistaken its rights and remedies, and is not entitled to such interlocutory decree, and if the court has no adequate power so to order, then the state will and does ask for such other decree as will accomplish the object of furnishing said information; and if no such order can be granted, and the court should so hold, the state will and does ask leave to search the conscience of defendant and its officers and for complete discovery. The petition thereupon propounded 29 interrogatories, covering in great detail all the various matters touched upon in the petition, for all the years from the beginning of the lease. The petition prayed for judgment for ad valorem taxes for $100,000 and interest, for judgment on account of "so-called income tax" of $100,000, also "that the court will further inquire, upon equitable principles, into all and singular the breaches of said contract of lease, and if any there shall appear to have been made as hereinbefore alleged, or as may be set up hereafter by amendment or by supplemental action, in the light of the information sought by the defendant by the interrogatories propounded, and shall give judgment thereon in favor of the plaintiff according to whatever may be the true measure of damage that may appear legal and equitable, when the facts sought from the defendant by the aforesaid interrogatories shall have been elicited," and for general relief.

The lessee demurred generally and specially, and the court dismissed the petition on general demurrer.

Jno. C. Hart, Atty. Gen., and Alexander & Candler, for the State. Claude Warren and Tye, Peeples & Jordan, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The predicate of this action is the eleventh section of the leasing act of 1889, which provides "that said lessee or lessees shall be required to pay all taxes and assessments upon the property of this state in the state of Tennessee, and in Georgia upon all property owned or controlled by them, not received from the state, and such further taxes upon their income as is now paid by the Central Railroad & Banking Company." The ultimate result sought to be obtained is the collection of taxes alleged to be due to the state under this section. In view of the demurrer challenging the right of the state to collect taxes by civil action, it becomes necessary to determine whether the taxes referred to in this section is a tax in the strict sense of the word, or simply a contractual obligation. In approaching a solution of this question, it should be kept constantly in mind that the lessee's rights and obligations are not primarily founded in the contract of lease, but in the act of the Legislature authorizing it. That act defined the terms upon which the state road was to be leased, and the contract was executed agreeably to it. The state declared in the legislative enactment its policy with regard to the public burdens to be imposed on the lessee, and the contract of lease executed pursuant to the act was a guaranty that no greater public burdens would be exacted. W. & A. R. R. Co. v. State, 54 Ga. 429. It becomes then a question of legislative intention as to the nature of the taxes mentioned in section 11. In this section the Legislature was dealing with public burdens. It had already been provided, in another section of the act, that the lessee was to pay a monthly rental, the minimum of which was fixed. It was therefore important for the state, in order to receive the greatest possible benefit from competitive bidding, to declare what public burdens would be exacted of the lessee. If the state clearly defined these burdens, and limited itself to exact no more, this element of certainty respecting the burdens of sovereignty which the lessee was to bear tended to increase the rental value. In proportion as the burdens were more onerous, it is reasonable to infer that the rental price would be depressed. The matter of rent and the matter of taxes were treated in the act as standing on distinct and different footings. They were dealt with in separate sections. The money which the state receives as monthly rental is the state's income derived from the ownership of the leased property; the money which the state receives in the public coffers in the exercise of sovereignty is the taxpayer's tribute to that sovereignty. The requirement to pay the ad valorem tax on property not received from the state, but used in the operation of the road, referred to a tax in its strict sense. Is there any difference in the quality of the income tax required of the lessee in the same sentence of the section?

One of the arguments advanced to support the theory that the requirement of a per centum of the lessee's annual income is not the exaction of a tax is that it was beyond the constitutional power of the Legislature to levy an income tax. The Constitution of this state provides that "all taxation shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects, and ad valorem on all property subject to be taxed within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, and shall be levied and collected under general laws." Civil Code 1910, § 8553. It is our opinion that this provision has no reference to the levying of a tax upon public property. The ordinary meaning of taxation is a charge levied by the sovereign power upon the property of its citizen. It is not a charge upon its own property. People v. McCreery, 34 Cal. 432, 456. The general rule is that public property is not subject to taxation. "This immunity rests upon the most fundamental principles of government, being necessary that the functions of government be not unduly impeded, and that the government be not forced into the inconsistency of taxing itself in order to raise money to pay over to itself." Penick v. Foster, 129 Ga. 217, 58 S. E. 773, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1159; Georgia Fire Ins. Co. v. Cedartown, 134 Ga. 87, 67 S. E. 410. The quoted provision of the Constitution relates to the collection of taxes from property other than public, and has no application to the impressment of a tax upon the public property of the state. The case presented is not that of a perpetual leaseholder, where the tenant is the virtual owner of the property, entitled to its use forever and subject to pay taxes thereon as owner, as was the case in Wells v. Savannah, 87 Ga. 397, 13 S. E. 442. In making the lease the state reserved the right of forfeiture on broken conditions subsequent, and imposed terms and conditions indicating that no estate was intended to be conveyed to the lessee, but that the lessee was to have only a usufructuary interest during the lease period. The power of the Legislature to impose taxes is inherent, and is only circumscribed by the organic law. When the Legislature authorized the contract which permitted the lessee to have possession of the state's property for a term of years, it was within the constitutional sphere of legislative action either to expressly preserve the status of public property with reference to immunity from taxation or to stipulate that the lessee should pay a specific tax. The latter course was adopted, and a specific tax, to wit, a tax upon the lessee's income (such as was paid by the Central Railroad & Banking Company), was levied.

[2] 2. Having reached the conclusion that the covenant in the lease contract, binding the lessee to pay such taxes upon the lessee's income as was paid by the Central Railroad & Banking Company at the time of the lease, is a covenant between the state and the lessee, fixing and limiting the character and amount of the tax to be exacted by the state as a sovereign, in contradistinction to an obligation in the nature of a debt springing from and supported by the contract, we will next consider the right of the state to enforce collection of it, and also of the ad valorem tax alleged to be in default, in a civil action. There are two lines of authority on this proposition. Some courts hold that taxes are in the nature of a debt due by the citizen to the state, enforceable by an action of assumpsit, and that the common-law right of the state to collect a tax by a civil action is not surrendered by the Legislature in furnishing specific remedies, unless expressly so stated in the statute. On the other hand, the weight of authority is to the point that when the statute undertakes to provide remedies, and those given do not embrace an action at law, a common-law action for the recovery of the tax as a debt will not lie. 1 Cooley on Taxation, 17; Burroughs on Taxation, 254. It was a rule at common law that, where a statute creates a right and provides a particular remedy for its enforcement, the remedy is generally exclusive of all common-law remedies. When this rule is considered in connection with the genius and spirit of our American institutions, its application to the collection of taxes, where adequate statutory remedy is provided, cannot be doubted. A most distinctive feature of the Constitution of the United States and of this state is the division of the powers of government into three separate departments, executive, legislative, and judicial. It was designed and intended that one department should not usurp the ordinary functions of the others, but that all three should act in harmonious relation. So, when the Legislature authorizes a tax for governmental purposes and provides an adequate remedy for its collection by administrative officers, the necessary intentment is that the collection of the tax is exclusively confided to that administrative department of the government. And it has been held by this court that when the statute undertakes to provide remedies for the collection of taxes, and those given do not embrace an action at law, a common-law action for the recovery of taxes as a debt will not lie. Du Bignon v. Brunswick, 106 Ga. 317, 32 S. E. 102; State v. S. W. R., 70 Ga. 33.

However, it is contended that the petition presents equitable features, and that in equity an action may be maintained by the state to collect its revenue. It would be idle to enter into a discussion of possible differentiation between an action in which the equitable powers of the court are invoked and one only seeking purely legal relief. Whatever equitable relief is asked in the petition is predicated upon the erroneous construction of the lease act that the provision for the payment of taxes upon the income of the leased property is a debt arising from the contract executed pursuant to the act, and not a tax. The General Assembly has enacted an elaborate scheme for the assessment of the property of railroad companies and the collection of any tax lawfully levied. Provision is also made for the collection of back taxes from delinquent or defaulting railroad companies, and whatever infirmity may have been in the original statute with reference to assessment without opportunity of the delinquent taxpayer to be heard, as pointed out by the Supreme Court of the United States in Central of Georgia Railway v. Wright, 207 U. S. 127, 28 Sup. Ct. 47, 52 L. Ed. 134, has been relieved and cured by the amendment of 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 25). The amendment relates to the remedy, and does not impair any right of the taxpayer. It only supplied a defect in the existing law. The law as amended is applicable to the collection of back taxes without regard to the time of their accrual, if within the statute of limitations. Du Bignon v. Brunswick, 106 Ga. 317, 32 S. E. 102.

[3] 3. Another insuperable objection to this effort to collect a tax by civil action in the nature of an action of debt is that there has been no assessment. An assessment is indispensable in proceedings to enforce the collection of taxes. Until an assessment of a per centum tax is made the amount of the tax is not fixed. Tax proceedings are in invitum, and to be valid the statute must be followed, and no tax on property can be collected until it has been assessed. Hawkins v. Jonesboro, 63 Ga. 527. Should the Legislature pass a tax law which inadvertently omits the mention of a return, but requires payment of the tax to be made to a particular officer, it means by necessary implication that the return is to be made to the officer who makes the assessment of the tax. Smith v. Goldsmith, 63 Ga. 736. But, as already indicated, the Legislature of this state has provided for an assessment by a particular officer; and the rule is well grounded and followed in this state that, where the statute provides for an assessment by a ministerial officer, the assessment must be made by him, and not by the courts. Bohler v. Verdery, 92 Ga. 719, 19 S. E. 36; Norris v. Coley, 100 Ga. 553, 28 S. E. 222.

[4] 4. The petition contains a very general allegation suggestive that a recovery of damages for breach of contract is sought. There is, however, no distinct allegation of any breach of the contract. It is alleged that the lessee had "made divers contracts of sublease unknown to the state, and that the lessee has collected from said sublessees from time to time large sums of money. Some of these subleases it is believed and charged were in violation of the contract, and some were not; but the state has no knowledge or means of knowledge as to which of said subleases were in violation of the contract and which were not, and how much it derived from the respective contracts, nor how much thereof was accounted for in the annual statements touching the income tax." It is a fundamental rule of pleading that in order for a plaintiff to recover damages for a breach of contract, the specific breach must be alleged, and the general allegation that the lessee had perhaps breached the contract by making unauthorized subleases is too vague to support the petition as one claiming damages for breach of contract.

[5] 5. As the suit is not maintainable for the collection of taxes, it cannot be retained as one for the discovery of the property claimed to be subject to taxation. Furthermore, as the petition contains no sufficient averments of a breach of contract to support a decree for damages, it cannot be maintained for the discovery of possible breaches. These conclusions result from the well-settled rule that, where discovery is merely incidental to the relief prayed, the suit cannot be maintained when the plaintiff is not entitled to the relief prayed. Everson v. Equitable Life Insurance Co. (C. C.) 68 Fed. 258; Hurricane Telephone Co. v. Mohler, 51 W. Va. 1, 41 S. E. 421.

UNION & MECHANICS' CLUB v. CITY OF ATLANTA.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 19, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 50)—CLUBS WHICH MAY KEEP LIQUORS.

Clubs and associations authorized by the tax act of 1909 (Civil Code 1910, § 933) to keep or permit to be kept in their club rooms intoxicating liquors, are such as are organized for the entertainment and comfort of their members, and not for gain, and which have a fixed place of meeting, a definite organization, with a continuing existence, in contradistinction to an ephemeral gathering for a particular occasion, with no idea of permanency in the fellowship or constituency of its members.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 51; Dec. Dig. § 50.*]

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 50*)—TAXATION—NATURE OF TAX.

The tax imposed is not an occupation or business tax, but is laid solely in the exercise of the police power of the state, and is not a license for the sale or for the keeping on hand of intoxicating liquors in any place prohibited by law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 51; Dec. Dig. § 50.*]

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 10*)—MUNICIPAL REGULATION.

In the absence of a clear delegation of power by the Legislature to impose and collect a tax on social clubs as a condition precedent to a license permitting them to keep on hand intoxicating liquors, a municipal corporation cannot exact such a tax, the city of Atlanta has no such power in its charter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 7-12; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

4. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 11*)—MUNICIPAL REGULATION—POWERS.

Inasmuch as the state, by the enactment of the general prohibition act, has made penal the sale of intoxicating liquors and the keeping on hand of such liquors at any public place or place of business, it is within the power of the city of Atlanta, under its general welfare clause, to establish reasonable rules and regulations designed to regulate social clubs, so as to prevent their conduct in any other manner than as bona fide social clubs and to prevent any violation of the prohibition act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

5. INJUNCTION (§ 85*)—INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 10*)—ENFORCEMENT OF INVALID ORDINANCE.

The ordinance of the city of Atlanta, imposing a tax as a condition precedent to the issuance of a license to a social club, permitting it to keep on hand intoxicating liquor, is an effort to collect a tax not authorized by its charter, and is therefore void, and its enforcement will be enjoined.

A "place of business," as used in the prohibition act (Pen. Code 1910, § 426), is a place where a calling for the purpose of gain or profit is conducted.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by the Union & Mechanics' Club against the City of Atlanta. From an order refusing to continue an injunction pendente lite, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

On January 19, 1911, the following ordinance was adopted by the mayor and general council of the city of Atlanta:

"Sec. 2. That any firm, person, or corporation desiring to operate, maintain, and to have or open up any club wherein lockers are provided for the use of members, fees charged either for membership or for use of lockers or for other purposes, having a clubhouse, club-room, parlors, or other general places of meeting, shall file a petition with the mayor and general council, asking for license therefor, and such petition shall give the name of the club, the name of the president, secretary or manager in charge thereof, its location, the number of members, and the amount of entrance fees paid or to be paid, dues and charges for lockers or locker service, and such other information as will put the general council in full possession of the facts surrounding such club or proposed club, by which it can decide whether the same is a bona fide social or locker club.

"Sec. 3. That any club already licensed or hereafter licensed shall, when demand is made by any member of the general council or of the police department, at the club-room or place of meeting, exhibit the roll of membership upon which only bona fide members of the club shall be written. Said club, its officers, and employees shall at all times comply with this requirement, and shall keep said roll of membership at the club-room or place of meeting where same can at any time be produced when said demand is made.

"Sec. 4. That any social or locker club licensed as herein provided, charging membership dues and having or operating, in connection with the club, lockers or locker service or serving meals or lunches therein, or having any service such as billiards, cigars, etc., from which revenue is derived, shall pay to the city of Atlanta the sum of three hundred dollars per annum as a license or registration fee, same to be paid as other business licenses are collected.

"Sec. 5. That any person, firm, or corporation, their agents or employees, who shall maintain, operate, or carry on, or take part in the maintenance or operation of any club in violation of the provisions of this ordinance, or without securing the permit or license therefor as herein provided, or without paying the license therefor as fixed in the preceding section, shall, on conviction in the recorder's court, be punished by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or sentenced to work on the public works for not exceeding thirty days, either or both penalties to be inflicted in the discretion of the recorder.

"Sec. 6. That any club, officer, or employes thereof, who shall refuse to admit any member of the general council or of the department of police therein on demand, who shall refuse to exhibit the roll of membership provided for in this ordinance, or who shall not permit an inspection of such club-room or meeting-place on demand, shall be deemed guilty of an offense, and on conviction in the recorder's court shall be punished as provided in section five of this ordinance.

"Sec. 7. That no license or permit shall be granted to any club or similar organization unless it appears that the same is a bona fide social or locker club, and not instituted or operated, with or without charter, for the purpose of providing a place wherein intoxicating liquors, beers, wines, etc., may be furnished under the form of a club, or in or at which there is now operated or maintained a bona fide social or locker club as herein provided for, and any person or persons, either by themselves or others, who shall undertake, with or without charter, to operate a club or like organization for the purpose of supplying liquors, wines, beers, etc., through the form of a club, without having, maintaining, or operating a bona fide social or locker club, shall be deemed guilty of an offense and on conviction in the recorder's court shall be punished as provided in section five of this ordinance.

"Sec. 8. That no license or permit shall be issued to any club, either with or without charter, unless it appears that same is operated, maintained, or proposed to be operated as a bona fide social or locker club, having a bona fide membership, club-house, room, or place of meeting maintained as a social club at which meals, lunches, etc., are served, lockers are maintained for the bona fide use of members only, charges made therefor, and not as a cloak or subterfuge for the sale of intoxicants, having a membership whose dues or entrance fees are sufficient to provide for the maintenance of such organization and the expenses thereof, and operated and maintained in an orderly manner, [and] comply with all the laws of the state and the ordinances of the city."

On February 23, 1911, a license was issued by the city under the terms of this ordinance, upon the payment of the tax therein provided, to the Union & Mechanics' Club, a corporation organized as a fraternal and social club. After getting the license the club equipped a club room and provided it with facilities as a locker club. The city, through its committee on police, made an investigation of the books and system of running the club, and recommended the revocation of the club's license. This recommendation of the committee on police was adopted, and the license to operate the club was revoked, and the Union & Mechanics' Club was notified to cease business, or they would be prosecuted if they proceeded to operate the club after the revocation of their license. Whereupon the club filed its petition, alleging that the ordinance was void as being unreasonable and without authority of the mayor and general council of the city of Atlanta to adopt, and praying that the city be restrained from interfering with the club, its officers and employes, in conducting and maintaining the club. On the rule to show cause the city presented its demurrer and answer, and after hearing evidence the court revoked the restraining order and refused an injunction. The plaintiff excepted.

Green, Tilson & McKinney and Moore & Branch, for plaintiff in error. J. L. Mayson and W. D. Ellis, Jr., for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The general prohibition act not only makes it a misdemeanor to sell and barter, either directly or indirectly, intoxicating liquors, but also makes it a misdemeanor for a person to keep such liquors at any public place or at his place of business. Penal Code 1910, § 426. The tax act of 1909 imposed a specific tax of $500 "upon every social or fraternal club, corporation, association, or organization of any kind of persons who shall keep or permit to be kept in any room or place (or any place connected therewith directly or indirectly) in which the members of such club, corporation, organization, or association assemble or frequent, any intoxicating liquors, or spirituous or malt liquors of any kind: Provided, that nothing in this section shall be construed to license or permit the keeping of any intoxicating, spirituous, or malt liquors in any place now prohibited by law, or which may hereafter be so prohibited." Civil Code 1910, § 933. In the tax act the Legislature was dealing with social or fraternal clubs, associations organized not for the purpose of trade and profit or for carrying on a business. The proviso in the act distinctly disclaims any permission to depart from the general policy of the prohibition act. Under the doctrine of noscitur a sociis, all organizations or clubs which permit lockers for the storing of intoxicating liquors must be of a social or fraternal character. The legislative conception of a fraternal club is one organized for the entertainment and comfort of its members—a definite organization with a continuing existence, in contradistinction to an ephemeral gathering for a particular occasion, with no idea of permanency in the fellowship and association of its constituency. The club contemplated is a voluntary association of individuals organized for fraternal and social purposes, and not for gain, and provided with a place of rendezvous for its members.

[2] The proviso of the tax act is in effect a legislative construction of the prohibition act that the habitat of a social or fraternal club is not to be regarded as a public place or a place of business, since it is declared in the act that the placing of a tax on clubs of this kind shall not be construed to license or permit the keeping of intoxicating liquors in any place prohibited by law. It was within the sphere of legislative action to define the meaning of a public place and place of business, and to classify the place or location of a social or fraternal club, where the members are accustomed to frequent, as not being comprehended within the terms "public place" or "place of business," and the Legislature exercised its powers of classification by putting a tax on social clubs. Miller v. Shropshire, 124 Ga. 829, 53 S. E. 335. A place of business, as used in the prohibition act, is a place where a calling for the purpose of gain or profit is conducted. Not only was it made penal to give away liquors to induce trade at any place of business, but the general prohibition act also made it a criminal offense to "manufacture or keep on hand at their place of business" any such liquor. Therefore the specific tax laid by the state upon social and fraternal clubs was imposed, not as a tax upon any business or occupation, but in the exercise of its police power in regulating the storage and use of intoxicating liquors. The exaction of a tax on locker clubs is not a permission to such clubs to do a blind tiger business or to evade the liquor laws prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquor. Sales of intoxicating or malt or other drinks, which if drunk to excess will produce intoxication, cannot be legally made at such clubs, since such sales are denounced as criminal by the general prohibition act. The authority to store intoxicating liquor in the club room for the use of club members does not embrace permission to sell it or to use it in any way prohibited by law.

[3] The charter of the city of Atlanta contains a general welfare clause of very ample powers. Under the welfare clause the city may establish suitable ordinances for administering the government of the city, the maintenance of peace and order, the preservation of the health of its inhabitants, and for the performance of the general duties required of it in its charter. Where the state has established its policy to regulate under the police powers particular conditions, it is within the power of a municipal corporation, under its general welfare clause, to establish any reasonable ordinance designed to enforce this general policy. The state law prohibits a dealer from pursuing his ordinary calling upon the Sabbath day, and it was held that it was competent for the city of Atlanta by ordinance to compel all dealers to keep the door of their houses of business shut on the Sabbath day; the design of the ordinance tending to prevent the violation of the state laws, as well as preserving the public respect for the Lord's day. Karwisch v. Atlanta, 44 Ga. 204. Where the sale of liquor was forbidden in a county in which a municipality was situated, it was held to be within the police power, under the general welfare clause, to inhibit the keeping of intoxicating liquors for illegal sale, and the keeping of places to conduct such sale. Bagwell v. Town of Lawrenceville, 94 Ga. 654, 21 S. E. 903; Reese v. City of Newnan, 120 Ga. 198, 47 S. E. 560; Tucker v. City of Moultrie, 122 Ga. 160, 50 S. E. 61. While the city may, under its general welfare clause, establish ordinances intended to aid in the regulation of those matters included in the police power as manifested by the general policy of the state in the trend of its legislation, yet a city cannot, solely in the exercise of its police power, impose a tax for revenue, and a license when imposed for revenue is not a police regulation and cannot be upheld under the power of taxation. The city has no power to impose a tax upon a locker club as a business or avocation tax, because a social club authorized to keep intoxicating liquor on storage is not conducting a business within the purview of the general taxing act. The Legislature may confer upon a municipality the power to collect a license tax; but, in the absence of such express authority, the city cannot by ordinance require of a social or fraternal club the payment of a license tax as a permit or condition precedent to the exercise of the privileges of a social club. Walker v. McNelly, 121 Ga. 114, 48 S. E. 718.

[4, 5] While the ordinance requiring a license or permit of a social club contains some regulatory features, these are so inseparably connected with the provision for obtaining a license that they become incidental to the main purpose of the ordinance, which is to require a license tax as a condition precedent to the opening and maintaining a social club. As we have pointed out, the city of Atlanta has no express charter power to require a license tax of a social club as a condition precedent to its keeping on hand intoxicating liquors, and such power is not to be implied under the general welfare clause. Treating the ordinance as one requiring a license tax from a social club as a permit or prerequisite to its keeping on hand intoxicating liquors, it is ultra vires and void. It is not to be understood, however, that the city is without authority to adopt a reasonable ordinance regulative of social clubs under the police power contained in its general welfare clause. The policy of the state, as disclosed in the general prohibition act, is to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquor and the keeping of intoxicating liquor at a public place or at a place of business; and in aid of that policy the city may establish reasonable rules and regulations tending to enforce that general policy by regulating such clubs so as to prevent all but bona fide social clubs (such as are properly licensed by the state) from keeping or permitting to be kept any intoxicating liquors in their club rooms. But as the ordinance in question imposes a privilege tax which the city has no right to exact, and makes the payment of the tax a condition precedent to the issuance of a license, the city should be enjoined from forcing the closing of the club room under penalty of a prosecution under the void ordinance.

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1151*)—APPEAL—DISCRETION OF COURT—CONTINUANCE.

The only grounds of the motion for a new trial were that the court erred in refusing the motion of the plaintiff in error for a continuance and the general grounds that the verdict was contrary to law and evidence and without evidence to support it. The motion for a continuance was one addressed to the discretion of the court. It appearing that the court did not abuse his discretion in refusing the motion for a continuance, and the evidence being sufficient to support the verdict, the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial is affirmed.

ETHRIDGE v. CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 17, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

CARRIERS (§ 43*)—DUTY TO ACCEPT SHIPMENT.

By a long and continuous custom of receiving and transporting cordwood left at a point along the main line of its track, not at a regular station, or side or spur track, a common carrier may obligate itself to continue the custom until it has given reasonable notice that it will be discontinued.

(a) Where such custom has been discontinued without reasonable notice given of an intention to do so, the carrier is liable for special damage incurred by a shipper in cutting and cording wood for shipment in reliance upon such custom, upon a refusal by the carrier to transport such wood.

(b) In order to recover such damage, it is not obligatory on the shipper to actually deliver the wood thus prepared for transportation at the point on the track where the carrier had been accustomed to receive it, when he has offered to do so, and been notified by the carrier that it will not receive for shipment the wood when so delivered.

Error from Superior Court, Jones County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action by D. V. Ethridge against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Johnson & Johnson, for plaintiff in error. Ellis & Jordan, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. The plaintiff in error sued the defendant in error for damages, making the following allegations: "The Central of Georgia Railway Company is a corporation under the laws of Georgia, a common carrier of freights, doing business in said county previous to and during the years 1906 and 1907 and up to now, and having an office and resident agent therein. That up to the — day of March, 1907, the defendant company had for many years previous established a continuous custom of receiving for shipment and of shipping cordwood, placed on its right of way in said county, to such points as the shippers desired, the privilege of so placing said wood being extended by said defendant company to all persons, as well as to petitioner, who had prior to said time, to wit, March, 1907, shipped many cars of such wood by such defendant company's railway, which wood had by him been placed on the right of way in said county at points convenient to where the wood was cut, to wit, near the 175th and 177th mileposts on said road. Petitioner, relying on such continuous custom and on its course of past dealings with said company, cut and corded during the months of August, September, and October, 1906, in said county, immediately adjacent to the right of way of such railway," a specified number of cords of wood near the mileposts above mentioned, "with the purpose and intent of hauling the same to the right of way of said company and shipping the same over said railroad to the city of Macon, a station on said railway." That the value of said pine wood on the — day of March, 1907, was and is now $326, and of the said oak wood $120, making a total of $446. That after said wood had been cut, and while plaintiff was engaged in hauling and piling it on the said defendant company's right of way near the 175th milepost in said county, he was ordered by said defendant company's agent then and there in said Jones county to stop hauling and piling wood on the said right of way, denying to petitioner the right to place said wood, saying that the defendant company would transport no more cordwood except the same be placed at its regular stations or spur tracks, and that said defendant company would not receive it for transportation nor would it transport cordwood from other places than regular stations or spur tracks. Petitioner further shows that said wood so cut is so situated that to deliver it to the said railroad at a station or spur track will cost more than it is worth, and that there is no possible way to get it to market without greater cost than its value, except that it be transported by such railroad, though it could be delivered to the said defendant company at the aforesaid point on its right of way for 25 cents per cord, which facts were well known to the said defendant company, and that, by reason of the said defendant company refusing to so allow petitioner to place the wood on its right of way to be by it so transported, the same has proven to the petitioner a total loss, to wit, in the sum of $448, which the said defendant company should be required to pay to your petitioner; and he prays that he may have a judgment against said defendant for said sum." The plaintiff amended the petition as follows: "Now comes the plaintiff in the above-stated case, and by leave of the court first had and obtained amends his declaration by adding after the word 'transported' in the tenth line of paragraph 5 of said declaration, the words, 'and in not giving to petitioner reasonable notice that the custom of allowing wood to be placed upon their right of way for transportation, not at a spur track, side track, or station would be discontinued.'" To the order of the court sustaining the defendant's general demurrer and dismissing the petition the plaintiff excepted.

There can be no question that a railroad company as a common carrier has no right to refuse to receive for transportation at a station where it is accustomed to receive for shipment goods of a certain class goods belonging to that class when properly tendered for shipment at the warehouse or other place at such station established by custom for receiving for shipment such goods. Railroad companies as common carriers have the right to establish reasonable rules and regulations as to the time when and the places at which they will receive goods for transportation. It would hardly be expected that they would establish a custom of receiving for shipment large quantities of cordwood at a station in warehouses wherein they receive and discharge their ordinary shipments. Cordwood being bulky and shipped for the most part in car load lots, and frequently in train lots, and being liable to deteriorate but little, if any, in value by exposure to the weather for a short time, it would hardly be expected that common carriers receiving such property for shipment would by contract, or by an established custom, receive it at their regular stations in warehouses used for receiving and discharging other shipments. They would naturally be expected to receive and load, or have loaded, for transportation shipments of this character at points along their side or spur tracks or the main line. In 4 Elliott on Railroads, § 1411, it is said: "Goods are usually delivered to railroad companies at established stations, and they may refuse to receive them at unusual places. But the delivery may be sufficient although made at an unusual place to an authorized agent, or, under some circumstances, even if made at a place not an established station but where the company has habitually received freight." Also see section 413 of same volume. In 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 184, the following text is employed: "Custom of Carrier to Receive Goods at Place Other Than Depot.—But such a deposit may amount to a delivery when there is proof of a constant and habitual practice and usage on the part of the carrier to receive goods for transportation when they are deposited for it in a particular place. Proof of such a practice is sufficient to show a public offer by the carrier to receive in that way, and to constitute an agreement between it and the shippers by which goods, when so deposited, shall be considered as having been delivered to it without other formality." Also see 1 Hutchinson on Carriers, §§ 115, 118, 122; Moore on Carriers, 98, 136; Schouler's Bailments & Carriers, § 386; Van Zile on Bailments & Carriers, §§ 431, 432; Montgomery, etc., Ry. Co. v. Kolb, 73 Ala. 396, 49 Am. Rep. 54. In Van Zile on Bailments & Carriers, § 440, the author thus comments: "Has freight by the long uninterrupted usage of the carrier with the particular shipper or with the public been received and shipped when left at the particular place by the roadside, or on the platform or dock, or when delivered to the captain or mate? If these questions can be affirmatively answered according to the proofs, then, as we have seen, the delivery is sufficient." Where a railroad company has by a long and continuous custom received for the public cordwood for shipment at a point on the main line not at any station or spur or side track, it should give reasonable notice of a discontinuance of the custom. Durden v. So. Ry. Co., 2 Ga. App. 66, 58 S. E. 299; 4 Dec. Digest, "Carriers," §§ 39, 41. And where such custom has existed, and no notice of an intention to discontinue it has been given, and an individual who has been accustomed to carry cordwood there for shipment in reliance on the custom incurs expense in having cut and corded wood to be hauled to that point for shipment, without notice that the railroad company will not receive it for shipment at such point, he has a right of action to recover any special damage he may sustain upon the refusal of the company to receive the wood at that point for shipment. Durden v. So. Ry., supra; Wilson v. Atlanta, etc., Ry. Co., 82 Ga. 386, 390, 9 S. E. 1076; Atlantic, etc., Ry. Co. v. Howard Supply Co., 125 Ga. 478, 54 S. E. 530; W. & A. R. Co. v. Haig, 136 Ga. 494, 71 S. E. 792. In Georgia, Southern & Fla. Ry. Co. v. Marchman, 121 Ga. 235, 48 S. E. 961, it was ruled: "As a general rule, a railway company is not bound to receive freight except at stations; but it may as a result of custom, or as a consequence of an express contract, become obligated to receive freight at a point on its line of railway where there is no station, depot, platform, cars, or agent."

It was not necessary that the plaintiff should haul and deposit on the right of way the wood he had cut; in order for him to have a right of action because of the company's refusal to receive it. Moore on Carriers, 117; Houston, etc., R. Co. v. Campbell, 91 Tex. 551, 45 S. W. 2, 43 L. R. A. 225 (7). The plaintiff alleged that he had hauled and deposited on the right of way of the defendant company a part of the wood he had cut and corded for the purpose of having it shipped by the defendant company. It would have been a useless expense to have deposited the rest of the wood on the right of way, if the company would not receive it there. The refusal to receive the wood was based solely on the ground that it was not deposited at "regular stations or spur tracks" of the defendant company. The court erred in sustaining the general demurrer and dismissing the petition.

BUTTS COUNTY et al. v. JACKSON BANKING CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 19, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. STARE DECISIA.

The principles decided when this case was formerly before this court (129 Ga. 801, 60 S. E. 149, 15 L. R. A. [N. S.] 567, 121 Am. St. Rep. 244) are controlling. The findings of fact by the auditor are not such as to differentiate it from those upon which that decision was predicated.

2. COUNTIES (§ 192*)—TAXATION—LEVY.

County authorities, levying taxes, must by order "specify the per cent. levied for each specific purpose," and taxes raised for any specific purpose must be used for such purpose, and none other. Civil Code 1910, §§ 514, 516.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 192*]

3. COUNTIES (§§ 161, 195*)—SPECIAL FUNDS—APPLICATION.

Where there is in the hands of the treasurer, at the end of the year, a fund raised by taxes levied for that year for a particular purpose, and the fund is insufficient to pay warrants duly drawn thereon to pay the legitimate current expenses of the county for that year, the fund does not, after that year, become a general fund, but must be used toward the payment of such warrants.

Warrants entitled to participate equally in the distribution of such fund, in the custody of the court for distribution, should be paid therefrom ratably, in such proportion as the amount of each bears to the amount of the fund in hand.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. §§ 161, 195*]

4. COUNTIES (§§ 160, 195*)—GENERAL FUNDS—WHAT ARE.

When, out of a fund raised by taxation for a specific purpose, all demands and indebtedness properly chargeable against that particular fund have been paid or deducted, and there remains a surplus from such fund in the hands of the treasurer, the same then becomes a general fund which may be lawfully applied to the payment of balances due on warrants drawn against other specific funds not sufficient for their payment, or to any other legitimate liability against the county. *Tate v. HUDGINS v. STATE

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 18, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 131*)—INDICTMENT—DESCRIPTION OF DECEASED.

There was no error in overruling a demurrer to a special presentment charging the crime of murder, on the ground that the name of the decedent was stated as "E. Barksdale," without giving his Christian name in full.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 131* Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 275.]

2. SPECIAL PRESENTMENT—DEMURRER.

The general demurrer to the special presentment was without merit.

3. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 8*)—PRESENTMENT—INDORSEMENTS—NAME OF PROSECUTOR.

Where the grand jury returned a special presentment charging the crime of murder, there was no error in overruling a plea in abatement based on the ground that such presentment was "the outcome" of a prosecution instituted by a named person, who swore out a warrant against the defendant, that the latter waived a committing trial, and that the special presentment did not have the name of such person indorsed upon it as prosecutor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 43, 46; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

4. HOMICIDE (§ 340*)—WRIT OF ERROR—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

The charge of the court on the subject of involuntary manslaughter, and the direction to the jury that if they had a reasonable doubt that the defendant was guilty of murder they should acquit him, notwithstanding they might consider that, under some view of the evidence and the law, he might be guilty of some lesser grade of homicide, was inaccurate; but, in the light of the evidence and statement of the accused and the entire charge of the court, such inaccuracy is not sufficient to require the grant of a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 340.*]

5. RULING ON MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

Many of the other grounds of the motion for a new trial are plainly without merit, and none of them are such as to require a reversal.

CHANDLER v. SAME.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 15, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 100*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—FELLOW SERVANTS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The provision of the railroad employer's liability act of August 16, 1909, embodied in Civ. Code 1910, § 2785, applied to the case of an employé who joined the relief department of a railroad company prior to the passage of such act, and agreed that the acceptance by him from such department of benefits "for injury" (to which department he and other members contributed, as well as the railroad company) should operate as a release and satisfaction of all claims against the company, and that the bringing of a suit for damages should forfeit all rights to benefits, but who was injured by reason of the negligence of a coemployé after the passage of the act, and who accepted certain benefits from the relief department.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 156*)—MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 11*)—IMPAIRING OBLIGATION OF CONTRACT—EMPLOYER'S LIABILITY ACT.

As applied to such a case, the provision of the act referred to in the preceding headnote, to the effect that the acceptance of benefits should not release the employing railroad company from liability, but, in case of recovery, the employer might set off any sum it had contributed or paid to any relief or benefit which may have been paid to the injured employé on account of the injury, is not violative of article 1, § 3, par. 2, of the Constitution of this state, which provides that no law impairing the obligation of contracts shall be passed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Dec. Dig. § 156.* Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 297*)—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—EMPLOYER'S LIABILITY ACT.

The above-mentioned act is not violative of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, on the ground that it abridged the privilege of the railroad company to contract, or deprived it or its relief department of the liberty of contract without due process of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Dec. Dig. § 297.*]

Certified Questions from Court of Appeals.

Action by Turner Washington against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and others, and action by A. L. Chandler against the same defendants. Heard on questions certified from the Court of Appeals. Questions answered.

The Court of Appeals certified to the Supreme Court the following questions:

"(1) A railway company prior to the year 1909, with the co-operation of certain of its employes, organized what is called the 'relief department,' for the payment to such of its employes as became members (or to their families) monetary benefits in case of illness, accidental injury, or death, and for that purpose a fund known as the relief fund was raised, said relief fund under the regulations adopted consisting of 'contributions from members, income derived from investments and from interest paid by the company, and advances by the company when necessary to pay benefits as they become due.' The contributions of the members were certain stipulated sums deducted from their wages each month by the company. The company had general charge of the relief department, guaranteed the fulfilling of its obligations, and paid the operating expenses thereof, holding the moneys of the relief fund in trust for the department, and paying interest thereon at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum. The company also agreed that 'if the amount contributed by the members of the relief fund, with interest and other income, shall not be sufficient to pay the benefits as they become due, the company shall advance from its own funds whatever sums may be necessary for this purpose, reimbursing itself if and when the contributions of members with interest and other income are sufficient therefor.' An employé of the company in becoming a member made the following agreement as a part of his application: 'In consideration of the amounts paid and to be paid by said company for the maintenance of said re-relief department, and of the guaranty by said company of the payment of said benefits, the acceptance by me of benefits for injury shall operate as a release and satisfaction of all claims against said company; * * * and, further, if any suit shall be brought against said company, or [any] other company associated therewith as aforesaid, for damages arising from or growing out of injury or death occurring to me, the benefits otherwise payable, and all obligations of said relief department and of said company created by my membership in said relief fund, shall thereupon be forfeited without any declaration or other act by said relief department or said company.' Each member agreed to be bound by the regulations, one of which provided that 'in case of injury to a member he may elect to accept the benefits in pursuance of these regulations, or to prosecute such claims as he may have at law against the company or any companies associated therewith in the administration of their relief departments.' (A full copy of the application, contract, and regulations is incorporated in the record herewith transmitted, to which reference may be had for further details if necessary.) An employé of the railway company in question made application and became a member of the relief department in 1906, and in December, 1909, was hurt through the negligence of another employé of the railway company, who stood to him in the relation of fellow servant. The injured employé brought suit against the company and the fellow servant. It appears that he had accepted a certain portion of the benefits due him from the relief department on account of his injury, and that the railway company had contributed a certain part of the money so paid him. Did the fact that he had accepted these benefits operate to release the defendants, or do the provisions of the act of August 16, 1909, embodied in Civ. Code 1910, § 2785, apply, so that thereunder the defendant was entitled merely to diminish the amount of the plaintiff's recovery by a set-off of the sum it had contributed to the benefit paid to the plaintiff?

"(2) If it be held that the statute referred to in the preceding question is applicable as indicated therein, then is said statute unconstitutional as being violative of article 1, § 3, par. 2, Const. Ga. (Civ. Code 1910, § 6389), which provides that no law impairing the obligation of contracts shall be passed, and that, as applied to the case at bar, the facts of which are indicated in the preceding question, it impairs the obligation of the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, whereby the plaintiff agreed, in becoming a member of the relief department, that acceptance of the benefits in case of injury should release the defendant from all liability on account of said injury?

"(3) If it be held that the statute referred to in the first question is applicable to the state of facts presented and therein indicated, is the statute violative of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, on the alleged ground that it abridges the privileges of the railway company to contract, or on the alleged ground that it deprived the railway company and its relief department of their liberty without due process of law, in that it deprives them of the liberty to make the contract in question?"

The foregoing certified questions were certified in the case of Washington. The same questions were certified in the case of Chandler, except that it was stated that the employé became a member of the relief department in July, 1909, and was injured in October, 1909, after the passage of the act of August 16th.

Osborne & Lawrence, Crawley & Crawley, R. L. Berner, and Jno. S. Walker, for plaintiffs in error. P. W. Meldrim, Shelby Myrick, Bennet, Twitty & Reese, and Wilson, Bennett & Lambdin, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. These two cases were argued together. Three questions are raised: (1) Does the fourth section of the act of 1909, embodied in Civ. Code 1910, § 2785, apply to the character of relief arrangement or agreement and the state of facts described in the first question of the Court of Appeals? (2) If so, is that section unconstitutional as violating the clause of the Constitution of this state which declares that no law impairing the obligation of a contract shall be passed? Civ. Code 1910, § 6389. (3) If such statute is applicable, is it violative of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, on the ground that it abridges the privilege of the railway company to contract? We will take up these questions in the order stated.

[1] 1. Does section 2785 of the Civil Code of 1910 apply to the facts of this case stated in the first question of the Court of Appeals? That section reads as follows: "Any contract, rule, regulation, or device whatsoever, the purpose or intent of which shall be to enable any common carrier to exempt itself from any liability created by the three preceding sections, shall, to that extent, be void: Provided, that in any action brought against any such common carrier, under or by virtue of any of said sections, such common carrier may set off therein any sum it has contributed or paid to any insurance, relief, benefit, or indemnity that may have been paid to the injured employé, or, in the event of death, to the person or persons entitled thereto on account of the injury or death for which said action is brought." The three preceding sections contain, in brief, the following provisions: Section 2782 provides that every common carrier by railroad shall be liable in damages for a personal injury to any of its employes resulting in whole or in part from negligence of its officers, agents, or employes, or from defects or insufficiency in its engines, cars, machinery, road, works, or other equipment, due to its negligence. It declares who may sue in case of death; and that there should be no recovery, if the injured person brought about his injury by the failure to use ordinary care, or if he could have avoided the consequences of defendant's negligence by the use of ordinary care. It also deals with the question of presumption. Section 2783 applies the doctrine of comparative negligence and diminution of damages to the case of an injured employe. Section 2784 declares that the doctrine of assumption of risks of employment shall not apply where the violation by the common carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of the employes contributed to the injury or death.

It was contended that section 2785, when considered together with the other sections mentioned, did not cover a case like the one stated in the question propounded to us. We cannot acquiesce in this contention. The main purpose of the act was to enlarge the liability of common carriers by railroad for damages to employes, and to declare that certain things which previously would have prevented a recovery should not thereafter do so. One of these was the character of arrangement here involved.

A glance at the legislation in this state on the subject of recoveries for injuries to the persons of railroad employes will throw light on the legislative intent. Under the act of 1856, as codified in section 2980 of the Code of 1863, it was declared: "If the person injured is himself an employe of the company and the damage was caused by another employe, and without fault or negligence on the part of the person injured, his employment by the company shall be no bar to the recovery." This made a change in the common-law rule. Thereafter contracts were made by which railroad employes assumed the risks of their employment. It was held that they were binding, except as against damages resulting from criminal negligence. By the act of 1876 the definition of criminal negligence, as applied to employes of railroads, was greatly enlarged. Acts 1876, p. 111; Penal Code 1895, § 115. By the act of 1895 (Acts 1895, p. 97; Civ. Code 1895, § 2613), it was declared: "All contracts between master and servant, made in consideration of employment, whereby the master is exempted from liability to the servant arising from the negligence of the master or his servants, as such liability is now fixed by law, shall be null and void, as against public policy." Here, then, prior to the act of 1909, was a prohibition against contracts whereby the master was exempted from liability to the servant arising from the negligence of the master or his other servants. But a new arrangement was made, which was called a relief department. The employes of the railroad company who became members had certain amounts deducted from their wages to go to the relief fund. The company had general charge of the department, paid amounts for the maintenance of the relief department, and guaranteed the payment of the benefits provided to be paid. There was no direct agreement to release the company from liability for negligence; but, if an injured employe took the benefits arising in part from his own contributions and those of his coemployes, he forfeited any right to hold the company liable. If he sued the company, he forfeited any claim for benefits or relief. It is unnecessary to discuss the merits or demerits of this system. Suffice it to say that under its operation the employe was put upon his election. Whichever way he elected, he released or forfeited something.

In this state of the law, it was held that such an agreement was not illegal. Petty v. Brunswick & Western Ry. Co., 109 Ga. 666, 35 S. E. 82. There was no intimation that the Legislature could not change the law. They did change it, and passed the act of 1909, which is quoted above. If that act was not intended to apply to the situation here involved, it is difficult to say what was intended. If it only dealt with a direct contract to relieve an employer from liability, it added nothing to the law as it already stood, and was mere surplusage. If there were any doubt as to the effect of the general words in the beginning of the section, the statement as to setting off any sum contributed or paid by the common carrier to any "insurance, relief, benefit, or indemnity" shows clearly that such arrangements were included in the legislative intent. In 2 Lewis' Sutherland, Statutory Construction (2d Ed.) § 347, pp. 663, 664, it is said: "The inquiry, where any uncertainty exists, always is as to what the Legislature intended, and, when that is ascertained, it controls." And in the same volume, on page 672, it is said: "The exception of a particular thing from the operation of the general words of a statute shows that in the opinion of the lawmaker the thing excepted would be within the general words had not the exception been made."

To the first question propounded by the Court of Appeals we answer that the act of 1909 applies to the present case; so that acceptance of benefits did not operate to release the defendant company, but entitled it to diminish any recovery which might be had as in the act provided.

[2] 2. The second question is whether, as applied to the state of facts set out in the first question, the act of 1909 is violative of article 1, § 3, par. 2, of the Constitution of the state, which provides that no law impairing the obligation of contracts shall be passed. The question is an important one. The Constitution of the United States contains a similar declaration to that contained in the state Constitution, though the latter only is here invoked. The federal employers' liability act of 1906 (Act April 22, 1906, c. 149, 35 Stat. 65 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1909, p. 1171]) contains a clause like that in the legislative act of 1909, which is under consideration. Other states have enacted similar laws. As both a theoretical and a practical question, it is one of great interest. The injured employé became a member of the relief department of the railway company in 1906. The act of the Legislature under discussion was approved August 16, 1909. The employé was injured in December, 1909. Thereafter he accepted a certain portion of the benefits due him from the relief department. The railway company had contributed a part of the money from which such benefit payments were made.

In Boston & Maine R. Co. v. County Com'rs, 79 Me. 386, 10 Atl. 113, although the charter of a railroad company provided that it should not be altered, amended, or repealed, it was held that an act requiring the expense of building and maintaining a highway where it crossed a track at grade should be borne by the railroad company was a legitimate exercise of the police power, and was constitutional. Emery, J., said: "This power of the Legislature to impose uncompensated duties, and even burdens, upon individuals and corporations for the general safety, is fundamental. It is the 'police power.' Its proper exercise is the highest duty of government. The state may in some cases forego the right to taxation, but it can never relieve itself of the duty of providing for the safety of its citizens. This duty and consequent power override all statute or contract exemptions. The state cannot free any person or corporation from subjection to this power. All personal as well as property rights must be held subject to the police power of the state. * * * This important power must be extensive enough to protect the most retiring citizen in the most obscure walks, and to control the greatest and wealthiest corporations. Its exercise must become wider, more varied and frequent, with the progress of society." In Coates v. Mayor, etc., of New York, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 585, interments of the dead were made in a certain part of the city of New York by persons having a right under grants of, or titles to, land held in trust for the sole purpose of interment, some of which land had been used for that purpose for more than a century, and to some of which certain fees for interment were incident and belonged to the person interring. A further right was also claimed by individual vault owners, in whose behalf some of the interments were made. It was held that an act which authorized the city to make by-laws for regulating, or, if found necessary, preventing, the interment of the dead, was not unconstitutional, either as impairing the obligation of contracts, or taking private property for public use without compensation. In Lindenmuller v. People, 33 Barb. (N. Y.) 548, 577, an act of the Legislature of New York prohibiting exhibitions of dramatic performances on Sunday was held to be constitutional, as against a claim that the plaintiff in error had leased certain property with a view to its occupancy for the purpose of a Sunday theater. It was added that "the contract with the performers, if one exists, for their service on the Sabbath, stands upon the same footing." In City of New York v. Herdja, 68 App. Div. 370, 74 N. Y. Supp. 104, an act amending the law regulating the construction of tenement houses was upheld as against a contention that plans and specifications had previously been filed and a contract for the construction of the building had been made. In People v. Hawley, 3 Mich. 330, a manufacturer of malt liquors in Michigan entered into a written contract with a firm at Chicago, Ill., whereby he agreed to sell and forward to the firm all quantities of malt liquors which they might need in their business for five years thereafter. Nineteen days later an act was passed by the Legislature of Michigan prohibiting the manufacture of intoxicating beverages and the traffic in them. Upon being indicted, the manufacturer set up that the law impaired the obligation of his contract. The Supreme Court of the state held the law valid, and declared that in the exercise of its police powers the state may prohibit the exercise of any trade or employment which is found to be hazardous or injurious to its citizens, and that, "where the exercise of such power operates to prevent the performance of a contract previously made, the same principle applies, and the law is not within the prohibition of the Constitution of the United States." While the clause of the Constitution of the United States inhibiting any state from passing a law impairing the obligation of a contract is not invoked in this case, it is substantially the same as that contained in our state Constitution, and the construction given to the former will throw light on the proper construction of the latter. In New York, etc., Railroad Co. v. Bristol, 151 U. S. 556, 14 Sup. Ct. 437, 38 L. Ed. 260, a law requiring the removal of grade crossings on a railroad was attacked as unconstitutional. It was contended, among other things, that the company could not meet the expense entailed upon it thereunder, and have any income left to pay its fixed charges, interest, and dividends on preferred stock, and that it impaired the obligation of the contracts made by the company with the holders of its bonds and preferred stock by making it impossible for the company to pay the interest on the bonds and dividends on such stock, as it had agreed to do, and also maintain and operate the railroad efficiently. The law was held to be constitutional. In the opinion of the court, delivered by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, it was said (page 567 of 151 U. S., page 440 of 14 Sup. Ct. 438 L.

Ed. 269)): "It is likewise thoroughly established in this court that the inhibitions of the Constitution of the United States upon the impairment of the obligation of contracts, or the deprivation of property without due process, or of the equal protection of the laws, by the states, are not violated by the legitimate exercise of the legislative power in securing the public safety, health, and morals. The governmental power of self-protection cannot be contracted away, nor can the exercise of rights granted nor the use of property be withdrawn from the implied liability to governmental regulation in particulars essential to the preservation of the community from injury." See, also, Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. State, 47 Neb. 549, 66 N. W. 624, 41 L. R. A. 481, 53 Am. St. Rep. 557; Chicago, etc., Railroad v. Nebraska, 170 U. S. 57, 18 Sup. Ct. 513, 42 L. Ed. 948; Beer Company v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 24 L. Ed. 989; Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S. 659, 24 L. Ed. 1036; Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 228, 17 Sup. Ct. 581, 41 L. Ed. 979; Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 5 Sup. Ct. 357, 28 L. Ed. 923; New Orleans Gas Co. v. Louisiana Light Co., 115 U. S. 650, 672, 6 Sup. Ct. 252, 29 L. Ed. 516; Gillam v. Sioux City, etc., R. Co., 26 Minn. 268, 3 N. W. 358. In some of the cases cited, the contract set up arose from the charter of the corporation. In the Dartmouth College Case, in the absence of a reservation of a right to alter or withdraw franchises, a charter was held to constitute a contract with the state. In that case, however, it was not held that the police power of the state was destroyed; and in cases cited above the rule that such power may be legitimately exercised, although to some extent it may interfere with the manner of enjoying or using the grants contained in the charter, is asserted. In New Orleans Gas Co. v. Louisiana Light Co., 115 U. S. 650, 6 Sup. Ct. 252, 29 L. Ed. 516, supra, a legislative grant of an exclusive right to supply gas to a municipality and its inhabitants, through pipes and mains laid in the public streets, and upon condition of the performance of service by the grantee, after performance by the grantee, was held to be a contract within the protection of the Constitution of the United States against state legislation impairing the obligation of contracts. Nevertheless in the opinion Mr. Justice Harlan said (page 672 of 115 U. S., page 264 of 6 Sup. Ct. [29 L. Ed. 516]): "The constitutional prohibition upon state laws impairing the obligation of contracts does not restrict the power of the state to protect the public health, the public morals, or the public safety, as the one or the other may be involved in the execution of such contracts. Rights and privileges arising from contracts with a state are subject to regulations for the protection of the public health, the public morals, and the public safety, in the same sense, and to the same extent, as are all contracts and all property, whether owned by natural persons or corporations." In Manigault v. Springs, 189 U. S. 473, 26 Sup. Ct. 127, 50 L. Ed. 274, riparian owners of land entered into an agreement to remove a dam obstructing a creek and to allow the creek to remain open and unobstructed. Later the Legislature of South Carolina passed an act reciting the necessity for draining the lowlands of the Santee river, and authorizing the defendants by name to erect and maintain a dam across the creek. It was held by the Supreme Court of the United States that such an act for the draining and reclamation of swamps and the erection of dams, levees, and dikes for that purpose was a legitimate exercise of the police power, and was not unconstitutional as impairing the obligation of the previous contract between the parties.

In this state, since the Code of 1863, a law has existed which reserves the right to withdraw corporate franchises, and later a constitutional prohibition against the grant of irrevocable franchises has been added. Code 1863, § 1636; Code 1910, §§ 6389, 6390. So that the question of irrevocable grants by the state after 1863 does not arise. But authorities on that subject are useful in dealing with the principle involved where such contracts could be made. It will be seen that the clause of the Constitution of the United States inhibiting the states from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts is not violated by the legitimate exercise of legislative power in securing the public safety, health, and morals, and that the governmental power of protection of the people cannot be contracted away. This is true of contracts between a state and a corporation or individual, and also of a municipality as to its legislative or discretionary governmental power. Macon Consolidated Street R. Co. v. Mayor and Council, 112 Ga. 782, 38 S. E. 60. "Neither can private individuals and corporations, by entering into contracts among themselves, invoke the contract clause of the Constitution for the protection of those contracts to the extent of withdrawing the exercise of rights granted, or the use of property involved, from the implied liability to governmental regulation in particulars essential to the preservation of the community from injury." 9 Enc. U. S. S. C. R. 499, and citations.

The expression "police power" is sometimes used in a very broad sense, including all legislation and almost every function of civil government. At other times it is used in a somewhat more restricted sense. The Legislature cannot arbitrarily prohibit either the making or the carrying out of all contracts under the claim of exercising police power. Thus it is clear that the Legislature could not declare that debtors could satisfy promissory notes by paying less than the amount called for by them, or that such notes should bear a greater or less rate of interest than that included in them, if valid when the contract was made. Other illustrations of contracts beyond the reach of interference by the Legislature might be given. At the other extreme stand such contracts as those involved in the liquor and lottery cases above cited. Between these two extremes lies a legal territory where cases must be determined as they arise. No inflexible line can be drawn in advance as a test for the determination of what is a legitimate exercise of the police power of the state which does not conflict with the contract clause of the Constitution, and what is an arbitrary interference with the obligation of contracts or with the liberty of contract.

In Iowa a statute was passed which made railway companies liable to employes for damages in consequence of the negligence of its agents or other employes, and declared that no contract which restricted such liability should be legal or binding. By amendment it was added that no contract of insurance relief, benefit, or indemnity in case of injury or death entered into prior to the injury, and no acceptance of any such relief, insurance, benefit, or indemnity by the person injured, his widow, heirs, or legal representatives after the injury, should constitute any bar or defense to any cause of action brought under the provisions of the act. This act was attacked on the ground that it violated the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, in that it impaired the liberty of contract. In Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. McGuire, 219 U. S. 549, 31 Sup. Ct. 259, 55 L. Ed. —, the constitutionality of the act was upheld. In the syllabus it was said: "A state has power to prohibit contracts limiting liability for injuries made in advance of the injury received, and to provide that the subsequent acceptance of benefits under such contracts shall not constitute satisfaction of the claim for injuries received after the contract. Such a statute does not impair the liberty of contract guaranteed by the fourteenth amendment." In the opinion Mr. Justice Hughes said: "In dealing with the relation of employer and employed, the Legislature has necessarily a wide field of discretion in order that there may be suitable protection of health and safety, and that peace and good order may be promoted through regulations designed to insure wholesome conditions of work and freedom from oppression. * * * The power to prohibit contracts, in any case where it exists, necessarily implies legislative control over the transaction, despite the action of the parties. * * * If the Legislature may prohibit the acceptance of the promise as a substitution for the statutory liability, it should also be able to prevent the like substitution of its performance." Pages 570, 572, of 219 U. S., pages 263, 264, of 31 Sup. Ct. (55 L. Ed. —). The power to enact such law was thus distinctly treated as based upon the fact that it was a legitimate exercise of the police power in the protection and promotion of health, safety, and good order. It was analogized to laws prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, limiting employment in underground mines and smelters to eight hours a day, prohibiting contracts of options to sell or buy grain or other commodity at a future time, and prohibiting the employment of women in laundries more than 10 hours a day. Page 568 of 219 U. S., page 263 of Sup. Ct. (55 L. Ed. —). It is true that in the case cited the employé became a member of the relief department of the railroad after the passage of the act, and that the contention was that the statute conflicted with the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and not with the clause in reference to the impairment of the obligation of contracts. But "it has been held that the right to make contracts is embraced in the conception of liberty as guaranteed by the Constitution." Page 566 of 219 U. S., page 262 of 31 Sup. Ct. (55 L. Ed. —). If so, it cannot be arbitrarily destroyed by state legislation. Nevertheless it was held that the statute then under review was a legitimate exercise of the police power of the state, looking to the preservation of the safety of a considerable class of the public, who could be legitimately dealt with as a class, and that the constitutional guaranty of liberty to contract did not prevent the exercise of such police power. See, also, Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Mottley, 219 U. S. 467, 484, 31 Sup. Ct. 265, 55 L. Ed. —, and citations; Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Miller, 221 U. S. 408, 31 Sup. Ct. 534, 536, 55 L. Ed. —.

Statutes changing, as to railroad companies, the general rule which exempts the master from liability to a servant for injuries caused by the fault or negligence of a fellow servant, have been upheld by various courts. The peculiar nature of the business conducted, the conferring on railroad companies of the power of eminent domain, the dangers incident to such employment, the number of people engaged in it, and the necessity for the state to protect them have all been advanced as reasons for making a classification as to such employes, and enacting laws looking to their safety. Georgia Railroad & Banking Co. v. Miller, 90 Ga. 571, 16 S. E. 939, and citations; Florida East Coast R. Co. v. Lassiter, 58 Fla. 234, 50 South. 428, 19 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 192, and note. It is not easy to see how a statute like the one under consideration can be held to be the legitimate exercise of the police power of the state looking to the public safety and welfare, or the safety of a class of the public which may be dealt with as such, and therefore valid as against a claim that it interferes with the constitutional right to contract, and yet be declared void because it affects the future operation of the contract by preventing "the like substitution of its performance" in the language of Mr. Justice Hughes. If it is a legitimate exercise of the police power for public safety in the one case, it should be so held in the other.

The theory on which agreements of the general character of that here involved have been sustained, in the absence of legislation like that contained in the act of 1909, is that the contract does not itself agree to relieve the railroad company from the legal consequences of its negligence, or that of its servants; and that the release of the company arises only upon the acceptance of benefits, which is optional with the employé after he has been injured. For this reason it has been held that such contracts did not violate statutes prohibiting contracts exempting a master from liability to a servant arising from the negligence of the master or his other servants. Thus in Petty v. Brunswick Railway Co., 109 Ga. 666, 671, 35 S. E. 82, 84, in the opinion of the court referring to the argument that the benefit agreement violated a statute of the character mentioned, it was said: "As should be readily apparent, the weakness of this position lies in the fact that it is based upon an entire misconception of the meaning and effect of the contract thus assailed. It did not, as claimed, in any of its terms or conditions stipulate that the defendant company should be absolved from the legal consequences of its own negligence or that of its servants. On the contrary, it merely provided an additional remedy to that given by law to an employé who might suffer injury by reason of the negligence, actual or imputable, of his master. The latter remedy was left intact, undisturbed, and unimpaired, and the injured employé might or might not, at his option, take advantage thereof." In Ringle v. Penn. R. R., 164 Pa. 529, 30 Atl. 492, 44 Am. St. Rep. 628, a case often cited on the subject, it was held that "In such a case it is not the signing of the release, but the acceptance of benefits after the accident, that constitutes the release."

If this view is sound when urged for the purpose of sustaining benefit or relief agreements, it must be equally sound when urged against them, under a changed condition of the law. Thus, under these rulings, at the time the plaintiff in the present case was injured, there was no contract releasing the railroad company from damages arising from the result of its own negligence or that of its other servants, nor any fixed contract that the company should be so released; and, if a contract releasing the company was made, it resulted from the acceptance of certain benefits, and became a definite contract of release only at that time, though springing from the former contract. In the meantime the Legislature declared that no such contract of release should be valid, and that acceptance of benefits from a relief department of a railroad should not destroy a plaintiff's right of action, but that the amount of the payments or contributions of the company through such department could be set off in its favor, if it were liable in damages. The plaintiff's right of action against the railroad company for the injury to his person arose after the passage of the act of 1909, and the liability of the railroad company is to be determined by that act. It gave him a right to recover for an injury arising from the negligence of the coemployé, although he might himself have been guilty of some negligence, and declared that he should not be debarred by the doctrine of assumption of risks of employment, as therein stated. This was different from what would have been the status had he been injured before its passage. It also contained the clause under discussion. Before any contract of release by accepting benefits from a fund arising from a common contribution had been made, the act of 1909 was adopted. We have endeavored to show that the act was a legitimate exercise of the police power of the state for the preservation of the safety and welfare of a considerable class of the public. If the benefit agreement should be held to prevent such exercise of the police power of the state from being effective, the power of the state to preserve and protect the safety and welfare of its citizens could be much curtailed by contract. Under such a construction, although a police law might be on its passage, and about to take effect, prohibiting a certain thing from being done, parties might enter into an agreement, not making a present settlement, or a contract now fixing liability, but reserving the right to do such thing, or to elect to do it, after the passage of the act, and in spite of its provisions. This would subordinate the police power of the sovereign state to the operation of contracts, not the reverse, as the authorities declare. The second question of the Court of Appeals is answered in the negative.

[3] 8. The contention that the act of 1909 is violative of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States is practically covered by what has already been said. It is only necessary here to again cite the case of Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. McGuire, 219 U. S. 549, 31 Sup. Ct. 259 (55 L. Ed. —); Mobile, etc., R. Co. v. Turnipseed, 219 U. S. 35, 31 Sup. Ct. 136, 55 L. Ed. —; Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Melton, 218 U. S. 36, 30 Sup. Ct. 676, 54 L. Ed. 921. The third question of the Court of Appeals is answered in the negative. WHITE et al. v. CITY OF FORSYTH et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 15, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 979*)—PARTIES (§ 95*)—MUNICIPAL TAXES—COLLECTION—AMENDMENT AS TO PARTIES.

A municipality and its ministerial officer charged with the collection of municipal taxes are proper parties defendant to a suit to enjoin the collection of city taxes. The municipality should be declared against in its corporate name; but a petition to enjoin the collection of municipal taxes, wherein the ministerial officer of the municipality charged with the enforcement of the tax is made a party defendant and the municipality is also attempted to be made a party, but its corporate name is incorrectly given, is amendable by making the municipality a party in its true corporate name.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 2120-2123; Dec. Dig. § 979; Parties, Cent. Dig. §§ 160-166; Dec. Dig. § 95.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 979*)—TAXES—COLLECTION—PARTIES.

In a suit to enjoin the collection of municipal taxes, on the ground that the act of the General Assembly authorizing the tax and extending the territorial limits of the municipality so as to embrace the plaintiffs' property upon which the tax is levied is unconstitutional and void, the municipality is a necessary party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 979.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 980*)—TAXES—COLLECTION—IRREGULARITIES IN EXECUTION.

A municipality delegated with the power of collecting its taxes by execution should pursue the statutory direction as to form, if any is given. Where the statute prescribes that a certain official shall issue the execution, an omission to state that the execution issues in the name of the municipality, or, if the corporate name of the municipality is incorrectly given, such omission or error will not render the execution void if it can be gathered from the whole writ that it is issued pursuant to statutory authority, such omission or error will be treated as a harmless irregularity. In order to call into question the legal sufficiency of a tax execution issued by a municipality, the fi. fa. must be set out literally or in substance.

Error from Superior Court, Monroe County; Robt. T. Daniel, Judge.

Action by Joseph White and others against the City of Forsyth and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

Robt. L. Berner and Fletcher & Zellner, for plaintiffs in error. Willingham & Willingham and Bloodworth & Bloodworth, for defendants in error.

EVANS, P. J. Joe White and several others, in behalf of themselves and such others as might desire to become parties plaintiff, filed their petition, alleging that the corporate limits of the municipality of Forsyth embraced the territory within a radius of one-half mile of the courthouse by virtue of the act of February 1, 1866 (Acts 1866, p. 279); that by the act approved August 19, 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 649), the limits of the city were extended an additional one-half mile, so as to include all the territory within a radius of one mile from the courthouse; that the act of 1907 was amended by the act approved August 14, 1909 (Acts 1909, p. 897), by striking therefrom section 3, and substituting in lieu thereof a provision that when as many as five property owners on any street shall file their petition to the mayor and aldermen of the city of Forsyth, asking that the water mains, sewers, or electric lines be extended on their street, it shall be the duty of the mayor and aldermen, within one year after the filing of their petition, to extend the water mains, sewers, or electric lines, and the failure to extend in the time given shall exempt the petitioners and others on the street from taxation for the support of water mains, sewers, or electric lines, as the case may be, until the petition is granted, provided petitioners obligate themselves to become users thereof for at least one year under the regulations imposed by the mayor and aldermen; that the municipality of Forsyth has assessed taxes upon petitioner's property located within the territory annexed by the act of 1907, and has issued executions against petitioners and placed them in the hands of the city marshal for collection; that the city marshal has levied such tax executions and is advertising the property of petitioners for sale for the purpose of enforcing the collection of the tax; and that the tax is illegal, because the act of 1907 extending the territorial limits of the city, and the act of 1909, are unconstitutional for certain specified reasons. The "City of Forsyth" and the marshal were named as parties defendant, and the prayer was to enjoin the defendants from proceeding with the enforcement and collection of the tax fi. fas.; that the fi. fas. be decreed to be illegal and void; that the corporate limits of the city of Forsyth be decreed to extend only one-half mile from the courthouse as a center, for general relief, and for process against the "City of Forsyth and J. W. Mays, Marshal of said City."

A rule nisi was issued; and upon the hearing for interlocutory injunction the mayor and aldermen of the city of Forsyth demurred to the petition on the grounds that the suit is brought against "The City of Forsyth" and not against "The Mayor and Aldermen of the City of Forsyth," the corporate name of the municipality, as provided by the acts of 1902, p. 427; that there is no proper defendant, nor is there any cause of action set forth; and that the petitioners have an adequate common-law remedy. Subject to its demurrer the city of Forsyth filed its answer. The plaintiffs then moved to amend their petition by striking the words

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes.

"The City of Forsyth" wherever it may appear in the petition, and substituting therefor "The Mayor and Aldermen of the City of Forsyth," and praying that the mayor and aldermen of the city of Forsyth be made a party defendant, and that the case proceed against the municipal corporation and its marshal, J. W. Mays, and that the fi. fas. described in the petition be decreed to be void for the reason that they are issued in the name of the "City of Forsyth," instead of "The Mayor and Aldermen of the City of Forsyth." This amendment was disallowed. The plaintiffs then further moved to amend by striking the words "its marshal" from the first line of the prayer, and the words "marshal of said city" from the prayer for process. This amendment was also disallowed. The case then proceeded to a hearing, and, after the submission of evidence, the court refused the injunction. The plaintiffs excepted to the refusal of the injunction, and to the disallowance of the amendments.

[1] 1. In a suit against a municipality to restrain the collection of taxes, the officers of the municipality attempting to enforce the collection of the tax and the municipal corporation are proper parties; and, if the municipal corporation is not named originally a party defendant, it is competent by amendment to make it a party in its proper corporate name. Gelders v. City of Fitzgerald, 135 Ga. 400, 69 S. E. 569. The petitioners sought to declare against the municipality in the first instance, but its correct corporate name was not given, and in effect the city was not a party to the action. The suit, however, was not a nullity, because the ministerial officer of the city was a proper party, and the city could be made a party by amendment. Civ. Code 1910, § 5687. If the marshal had not been a party, the suit would have been against the "City of Forsyth," and, as a corporation can be sued only in its corporate capacity and by its corporate name, the suit would have been a nullity, and there would have been nothing to amend by. Town of East Rome v. City of Rome, 129 Ga. 290, 58 S. E. 854. But the marshal was a property party to the suit, and the petition was amendable by adding the city as a party defendant.

[2] 2. Indeed, according to the case made by the petition, the city was not only a proper, but was a necessary, party. Petitioners not only sought to enjoin the collection of specific fi. fas., but also prayed for a decree invalidating them and the acts of the Legislature by authority of which they were issued. The marshal is not the general representative of a municipality, and a decree against him would only bind him as to the particular fi. fas. which he was attempting to enforce. The petition is filed by the plaintiffs in behalf of themselves and other taxpayers similarly situated, and the litigation is primarily directed against the municipality. It is a fundamental rule of equity that all persons interested in the subject-matter of a suit should be made parties thereto. The municipality of Forsyth is vitally interested in the attack on the constitutionality of the legislative enactments which enlarged its territory and its source of municipal revenue. Where an injunction will affect property rights or interests of a municipal corporation, such municipal corporation must be made a party defendant, and not merely the particular officer sought to be enjoined. 10 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 914; 22 Cyc. 914. The acting marshal might resign, die, or the office might otherwise become vacant; and, if he alone was a party to the decree, his successors would not be bound. The plaintiffs are also interested in having the municipality a party defendant, since, if the attacks made upon the constitutionality of the various acts amendatory of the charter of the municipality are good, they will not be put to the necessity of bringing other suits to restrain the collection of taxes for each year the tax is sought to be enforced. The municipality is a necessary party defendant to this cause; and, as the court erroneously refused an amendment to make it a party, the judgment denying the interlocutory injunction must be reversed and the case remanded for another hearing after the municipality of Forsyth has been duly made a party defendant in its corporate name.

[3] 3. By section 20 of the act approved December 18, 1902 (Acts 1902, p. 427), authority was given to the mayor and aldermen of the city of Forsyth to enforce by execution the collection of taxes, the executions to be issued by the clerk of the city, attested in the name of the mayor. The allegation in the rejected amendment was that the tax fi. fas. "were void for the reason that they are issued in the name of 'The City of Forsyth,' instead of 'The Mayor and Aldermen of the City of Forsyth.'" Nowhere in the record is there any allegation giving the substance of the fi. fas. or a copy of them. The averment of the amendment is insufficient to show the invalidity of the fi. fas. Where the statute prescribes that a certain official shall issue the execution, an omission to state that the execution issues in the name of the municipality, or an error in giving the corporate name of the municipality, will not render the execution void if it can be gathered from the whole writ that it is issued pursuant to the statutory authority. 1 Freeman on Executions, § 39. This allegation is insufficient as a challenge that the execution did not show upon its face that the statute was not complied with; and an informality or irregularity not going to the essence of the writ will not be regarded as vitiating the process. Black on Tax Titles, § 202.

SLAPPEY v. SUMNER et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 13, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. WITNESSES (§ 359*)—TRIAL (§ 252*)—IMPEACHMENT OF WITNESS—INSTRUCTIONS ON EVIDENCE IMPROPERLY ADMITTED.

After a witness has testified on the trial of a case, an indictment, without more, previously found, charging him with embezzlement, is inadmissible in evidence for the purpose of impeaching him. See, in this connection, McCray v. State, 134 Ga. 416, 68 S. E. 62; Killian v. Georgia Railroad & Banking Co., 97 Ga. 727 (2), 25 S. E. 334; Gardner v. State, 81 Ga. 144 (2), 7 S. E. 144.

(a) After admitting the indictment, it was error for the court to instruct the jury that it could be considered in passing upon the credibility of the witness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1161, 1162; Dec. Dig. § 359;* Trial, Cent. Dig. § 598; Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

2. WITNESSES (§ 406*)—IMPEACHMENT—RELEVANCY OF EVIDENCE.

Upon the trial of an action instituted against an administrator for the purpose of establishing the fact that the plaintiff was an heir at law of the defendant's intestate and to recover her distributive share of the estate, though as a witness for the plaintiff the plaintiff's husband had testified as to friendly relations with the intestate, and that during the last years of his life the intestate had lived at the home of the witness, it was error to admit in evidence, over the objection that it was irrelevant, an execution in favor of the administrator of the deceased against plaintiff's husband.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1276-1279; Dec. Dig. § 406.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 251*)—INSTRUCTIONS—RULES OF EVIDENCE.

The provisions of Civil Code 1895, § 5193 (Code 1910, § 5780), as to the admissibility of admissions of privies in blood, etc., and the inadmissibility of their declarations after title has passed out of them, had no relevancy to the case on trial, and should not have been given in charge to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 587-595; Dec. Dig. § 251.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 234*)—INSTRUCTIONS—RULES OF EVIDENCE.

There was evidence tending to show that the intestate had made admissions to the effect that the plaintiff was one of his heirs at law. The court instructed the jury: "If any admissions have been testified to before you as having been made as to any matters material to the issues in this case, I charge you that admissions should be scanned with care and are to be considered, if at all, by you in determining the truth or falsity of the issue to which such admissions may or may not relate." The use of the words "if at all" might have had a tendency to mislead the jury into the belief that they might have arbitrarily declined to consider the admissions, and it would have been better to have omitted them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 234.*]

5. NEW TRIAL (§ 157*)—PROCEEDINGS TO PRODUCE—QUESTIONS CONSIDERED.

Certain grounds of the motion for new trial with respect to newly discovered evidence and the alleged disqualification of certain jurors need not be considered, as a new trial must be granted on other grounds, and the questions presented will not likely arise on another trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 314-318; Dec. Dig. § 157.*]

6. WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence did not demand the verdict.

MERCER et al. v. MORGAN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 15, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MORTGAGES (§ 32*)—ABSOLUTE DEED OR MORTGAGE—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

A deed absolute in form may be shown to have been made to secure a debt, where the maker remains in possession of the land conveyed. Civil Code 1910, § 3258.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 232*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS—NOTICE—POSSESSION.

Actual possession of land is notice to the world of the right or title of the occupant. Possession of land by the husband with the wife is presumptively his possession, but the presumption may be rebutted. Civil Code 1910, § 4523.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 540-562; Dec. Dig. § 232.*]

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 232*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS—NOTICE—POSSESSION.

A purchaser cannot in all cases rely blindly on the presumption of the husband's possession, if there are other facts putting him on inquiry. Bates v. Harris, 112 Ga. 32, 37 S. E. 106.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 540-562; Dec. Dig. § 232.*]

4. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 243*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS—NOTICE—POSSESSION.

Suit to recover land was brought against a husband and wife, who were both alleged to be in possession, and the defendants answered that the wife alone was in possession. The plaintiff claimed title under a deed from the wife to the husband, a conveyance from the husband to a third person, and one from such third person to the plaintiff. He testified that the husband and wife lived together on the land, and that, before buying, he made inquiries of the wife, and was informed that he could buy it, and it would be all right. The wife testified that the plaintiff made no inquiry of her, but informed her that he had bought the place and had come to see her about it, and that she responded that the person to whom she had made the deed had done her "a shabby trick, because they promised it [to me] for a home as long as I lived." Held that, under such pleadings and evidence, it was error to reject testimony of the wife tending to show that she had been in actual possession for about 20 years, and was so at the time the plaintiff bought the land, that the deed was made by her to secure a debt of her husband, that the amount of it had been tendered to the grantee, and that she never consented for the plaintiff to buy the property from the grantee or any one else.

(a) It is not held that the witness could testify in mere general terms or as to her conclusions, but that she could testify to the facts on the subjects mentioned in the preceding head-note.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 606-608; Dec. Dig. § 243.*]

5. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 239*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS—TITLE ACQUIRED.

If a wife made a fee-simple deed to secure a debt of her husband, it would not be declared void as against a bona fide purchaser from the grantee for value and without notice; and this is true, although the amount of the debt secured by the deed may have been tendered to the grantee therein before he conveyed the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 583-600; Dec. Dig. § 239.*]

INJUNCTION (§ 153*)—RECEIVERS (§ 42*)—APPOINTMENT—PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION—CONDITIONS.

Under the pleadings and the evidence there was no abuse of discretion in granting an interlocutory injunction, nor in appointing a receiver, it being provided that such appointment was to become effective only upon the failure of the defendants to give bond "conditioned to pay the plaintiff his eventual condemnation money in case said property or any part thereof is found subject to the plaintiff's judgment," especially in view of the fact that it appears from the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error that he "offered to consent to the granting" of the injunction, and in view of the offer in his plea as to the giving of a bond.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. MACON RY. & LIGHT CO. (No. 2,991.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. June 7, 1911. Rehearing Denied Sept. 11, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INDEMNITY (§ 14*)—CONCLUSIVENESS OF FORMER ADJUDICATION.

Where one of the parties to a pending action claims that a third person is liable over to him in the event he loses in the suit, and vouches that person by notifying him of the pendency of the suit and giving him opportunity to appear therein, the judgment in that suit is conclusive on the person vouched as to the correctness of the judgment, but is not conclusive of the fact that there is such a relationship between the person vouched and the person vouching as that a right of action over exists.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indemnity, Cent. Dig. § 41; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

2. INDEMNITY (§ 13*)—CONTRIBUTION (§ 1*)—NATURE OF OBLIGATION.

A right of action over against some third person for contribution or indemnity in favor of the party cast in a prior suit may arise from relationships either contractual or noncontractual.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indemnity, Cent. Dig. §§ 29-35; Dec. Dig. § 13.* Contribution, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

3. INDEMNITY (§ 13*)—IMPLIED CONTRACT—LIABILITY OVER FOR TORT.

Generally speaking, one of two or more joint wrongdoers has no right of action over against those connected with him in the tort for either contribution or indemnity where he alone has been compelled to satisfy the damages resulting from the tort. In some cases two or more persons may be liable as joint wrongdoers, so far as concerns a person injured by a tort, and yet as among themselves the tort may not be joint; and in some cases of this kind a right of action over may exist in favor of the one who has been compelled to pay the damages as against another who as between them was the sole author of the wrong.

(a) Ordinarily, if one person is compelled to pay damages because of negligence imputed to him as the result of a tort committed by another, he may maintain an action over for indemnity against the person whose wrong has thus been imputed to him; but this is subject to the proviso that no personal negligence of his own has joined in causing the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indemnity, Cent. Dig. §§ 29-35; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

4. CONTRIBUTION (§ 5*)—INDEMNITY (§ 13*)—COMMON LIABILITY—JOINT WRONGDOERS.

The negligence of two persons may be truly concurrent, even as among themselves, though the negligence of the one began antecedently to the negligence of the other, and may, in a greater or less degree, have induced it; and in such cases no right of contribution or indemnity exists between the wrongdoers. Where two separate persons owe to a third person the same concurrent duty as to a particular thing, and by reason of the negligent failure of each and both of them to perform that duty, the third person is injured and he sues only one of those who owed him the duty (basing his right of action solely upon the tortious state of affairs brought about by this joint and common neglect of duty), and recovers damages, no action over arises in favor of the person thus subjected to the sole liability against the other person who owed the same duty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contribution, Dec. Dig. § 5; Indemnity, Cent. Dig. §§ 29-35; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

5. INDEMNITY (§ 14*)—CONCLUSIVENESS—MATTERS CONCLUDED.

Where a right of action over against a third person is asserted by the defendant in a prior tort action who has been compelled by the judgment thereon to pay damages, the plaintiff in the second action is estopped from showing that the causes alleged in the prior action were not the true causes of the damage. The only theory on which the second suit in such a case can proceed is that the judgment in the first case was based on a correct finding of the facts, and that that state of facts, taken in connection with the relationship of the parties to the second suit as to that state of facts, is such as to give an action over in favor of the one as against the other.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indemnity, Cent. Dig. § 14; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodges, Judge.

Action by the Central of Georgia Railway Company against the Macon Railway & Light Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Minor, who was an employé of the Central of Georgia Railway Company, was killed through an electric shock which he received while attempting to unload coal from a chute into a locomotive tender. The apron of the chute was to be lowered by a steel cable which Minor caught hold of. An electric wire leading to an arc lamp had been fastened upon the chute. This wire sagged against the cable, and the insulation had become worn or was originally inadequate, so that the current leaked from the electric wire to the cable, and when Minor, standing on the engine tender, reached and touched the cable to lower the apron of the chute, he completed the circuit, and was killed. His widow sued the railway company on account of the homicide, and recovered a judgment, which, on review, was sustained by this court. See Central of Ga. Ry. Co. v. Minor, 2 Ga. App.

804, 59 S. E. 81, where a somewhat fuller report of the facts is given. As disclosed by the opinion in that case, "whether the wires were unsafely located in the beginning, whether the railroad company by ordinary care could have discovered this fact, whether an inspection, reasonable under all the circumstances, would have disclosed the probability of danger, were the questions involved; and as to these things there was evidence pro and con." While that suit was pending the railway company furnished a copy of the plaintiff's petition to the Macon Railway & Light Company, and requested them in writing to defend the action on the ground that, if any liability existed, the railway company had a right of action over against the light company. The present action was brought by the railway company against the light company to recover the amount of the judgment it was forced to pay, together with costs and expenses incurred in connection with the defense of the suit. On the trial it appeared that, while the arc lamp and the wires leading thereto were located on the railway company's property and were used by it for the lighting of its switchyards, they were erected by the light company and belonged to it. The contract between the two companies was in evidence, and provided, so far as is here material, that the light company would furnish the lamps and the current for the lighting agreed on at a specified price. The railway company's agent designated the places where the lights were to be placed, and the light company's employes placed them there. The railway company's agent made some protest against the placing of the light wires on the coal chute, but, after some assurance from one of the electricians of the light company as to the safety of so doing, allowed it. The evidence authorized a finding that the wires were negligently placed upon the coal chute; also that there had been negligence in inspecting them, and in allowing the insulation to become worn; also, that the light company had allowed its circuit to become "grounded" in some other place whereby contact with the wire was rendered especially dangerous. The record of the former suit was introduced in evidence and the touching of the light company regularly shown. The court granted a nonsuit, and on exception to this judgment the case reaches this court.

R. C. Jordan, for plaintiff in error. Guerry, Hall & Roberts, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] Codifying a common-law doctrine, Civ. Code 1910, § 5821, declares: "Where a defendant may have a remedy over against another, and vouches him into court by giving him notice of the pendency of the suit, the judgment rendered therein will be conclusive upon the party vouched, as to the amount and right of the plaintiff to recover." The steps necessary to vouch the present defendant were regularly taken, and the judgment against the present plaintiff was duly rendered against it as defendant in the former suit, so in the present case the sole question is, "Does the present plaintiff have a remedy over against the present defendant?" The former judgment does not answer this question.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[2] 2. The right of one who has had a judgment rendered against him to maintain an action over against a third person may arise from relations contractual or noncontractual existing between the two. The duty to indemnify may arise from some express or implied agreement to indemnify, or may arise by operation of law, independently of contract. The natural, legal, and proximate result of a tort committed by A. may be to subject B. to legal liability and to a necessity to respond in damages to some third person, say C., and in some such cases B., when subjected to liability by C., may recover from A. the amount of the damage which has thus been caused to him. Familiar examples of contractual right of action over are to be found in cases where the loser in the first action holds the warranty of a third person or holds his agreement to indemnify.

The present case proceeds ex delicto. The petition alleges no warranty or contract for indemnity, but bases the right of the railroad company to recover over against the light company exclusively upon acts of negligence—negligent installation of the wires, negligent failure to insulate them properly, negligent failure to make adequate inspections, the negligent allowing of the electric circuit to become grounded. Hence we must determine whether through one or more of these alleged torts there arose in favor of the railway company a right of action over against the light company on the theory that the loss, which the railway incurred through its employé's widow establishing liability against it on account of her husband's death, can be considered as damages naturally, legally, and proximately flowing to the railway company from the light company's wrongful acts. To state it somewhat differently, was the railway company in the first suit subjected to liability, not for its own immediate wrong, but solely because of the wrong of the light company?

[3] 3. In approaching the consideration of the questions just proposed, it is well to notice at the out-set a doctrine too well settled to admit of doubt or to require the citation of authority. It is the general rule that, where a person has been damaged by the concurrent negligence of two or more joint wrongdoers, he may sue either one or more, or all of them, and that, if he sues only one or only a part of them, those so subjected to liability can claim no contribution from those not sued; and in such cases it is unquestionable that no right of action over ordinarily exists. But there may be cases in which a person who has suffered loss or damage may have the right to sue two persons as if they were joint wrongdoers, without their being, as among themselves, joint wrongdoers. A's servant, B., negligently injures C. in the performance of A's work. From C's standpoint, A. and B. are joint wrongdoers, but as among themselves B. is the wrongdoer and A. is subjected to liability merely by the doctrine of respondent superior; so that, if C. sues A. alone and compels him to pay the damage, A., in turn, may compel B. to indemnify him for the loss. So in this class of cases it is always relevant to inquire, "Whose wrong really caused the damage?" For, if it is a joint wrong as between those whom the person originally damaged might have held liable, no right of contribution or indemnity survives to the one whom the person damaged has subjected to the sole liability. Thus, although, as stated above, a master may sometimes have a right of action over against a servant because of whose negligent act he has been subjected to liability to a third person, this is not the case where the master's own negligence has concurred with that of his servant in creating the liability. Generally speaking, a right of action over in such cases exists only where the negligence of him who has been compelled to satisfy the damages is imputed or constructive only, and the negligence of him against whom the remedy over is asserted was actual or more immediately causal.

[4] 4. The very able argument of counsel for the plaintiff in error and the examination of the many cases cited on his excellent brief have convinced us that the widow of the decedent, Minor, could have sued the light company in the first instance, and have recovered for the homicide. That company was using for its purposes a dangerous current of electricity at a place where the decedent and other employés of the railway company were expected to be, and from this fact arose the duty upon the light company of exercising due care to prevent the current's escaping and doing damage. The breach of this duty resulting in the homicide would have given the widow a right of action against the light company. But the fact that the light company owed the decedent this duty, and that a breach of this duty caused the damage, does not necessitate the holding that its wrong alone is to be considered as the proximate cause of the injury, either as between the decedent's widow and the two companies involved in the case, or as between the two companies themselves. After carefully considering the facts of the case in the light of numerous authorities on the general question, the case looks thus to us: When the light company installed these dangerous appliances in the defendant's switchyards, they became the instrumentalities of two businesses, the light company's business of furnishing light and the railway company's business of making up and operating trains. The decedent who was employed to work in these yards sustained such a relationship to this matter which primarily and contractually concerned only the two companies as that the law imposed upon both companies a joint and several duty owing to him to see that these wires should be kept in reasonably safe condition. As to him, the light company had no right to install these dangerous wires or to maintain them, and the railroad company had no right to allow them to be installed and maintained as a part of its plant, except on the condition, applicable alike to each of the companies, that reasonable care would be taken to safeguard the decedent from injury through them. The judgment in the former case was as against the plaintiff, in the present case, a conclusive finding of one or more of the following facts: That it allowed the wires to be installed in a negligent manner in the first instance; that it was neglectful in allowing them to remain where they were, after the insulation had worn away; that it was neglectful as to inspection; and that one or more of these things was the proximate cause of the homicide. The railway company does not sue the light company in the present case for the breach of any contract on its part to install the wires in a proper manner, or to maintain them or to inspect them, but sues because that company was guilty of substantially the same tortious delinquency as it itself had committed. Thus viewed, the case seems to be on all fours with the case of Union Stockyards Co. v. C., B. & Q. R. Co., 196 U. S. 217, 25 Sup. Ct. 228, 49 L. Ed. 453. In that case the Circuit Court of Appeals certified to the United States Supreme Court the following question: "Is a railroad company which delivers a car in bad order to a terminal company—that is, under contract to deliver it to its ultimate destination on its premises for a fixed compensation, to be paid to it by the railroad company—liable to the terminal company for the damages which the latter has been compelled to pay to one of its employes on account of injuries he sustained while in the customary discharge of his duty of operating the car, by reason of the defect in it, in a case in which the defect is discoverable upon reasonable inspection?" Accompanying the question and for the purpose of illustrating, it was a statement of the facts as follows: "The plaintiff, the stockyards company, is a corporation which owns stockyards at South Omaha, Neb., railroad tracks appurtenant thereto, and motive power to operate cars for the purpose of switching them to their ultimate destinations in its yards from a transfer track which connects its tracks with the railways of the defendant, the Burlington Company. The Burlington Company is a railroad corporation engaged in the business of a common carrier of freight and passengers. The defendant places the cars destined for points in the plaintiff's yards on the transfer track adjacent to the premises of the plaintiff, and the latter hauls them to their points of destination in its yards for a fixed compensation, which is paid to it by the defendant. The plaintiff receives no part of the charge to the shipper for the transportation of the cars, but the defendant contracts with the shipper to deliver the cars to their places of ultimate destination in the plaintiff's yards, and receives from the shipper the compensation therefor. The defendant delivered to the plaintiff upon the transfer track a refrigerator car of the Hammond Packing Company, used by the defendant to transport the meats of that company, to be delivered to that company by the plaintiff in its stockyards. This car was in bad order, in that the nut above the wheel upon the brake staff was not fastened to the staff, although it covered the top of the staff, and rested on the wheel as though it was fastened thereto, and this defect was discoverable upon reasonable inspection. The plaintiff undertook to deliver the car to the Hammond Company, and send Edward Goodwin, one of its servants, upon it for that purpose, who, by reason of this defect, was thrown from the car and injured while he was in the discharge of his duty. He sued the plaintiff and recovered a judgment in one of the district courts of Nebraska for the damages which he sustained by his fall, on the ground that it was caused by the negligence of the stockyards company in the discharge of its duty of inspection to its employé. This judgment was subsequently affirmed by the Supreme Court of Nebraska (Union Stockyards Co. v. Goodwin, 57 Neb. 138, 77 N. W. 357), and was paid by the plaintiff." The Supreme Court, conceding for the sake of the argument that the injured employé could have sued either company or both of them, said: "The case then stands in this wise: The railroad company and the terminal company have been guilty of a like neglect of duty in failing to properly inspect the car before putting it in use by those who might be injured thereby. We do not perceive that because the duty of inspection was first required from the railroad company that the case is thereby brought within the class which hold the one primarily responsible, as the real cause of the injury, liable to another less culpable, who may have been held to respond for damages for the injury inflicted. It is not like the case of the one who creates a nuisance in the public streets, or who furnishes a defective dock, or the case of the gas company, where it created the condition of unsafety by its own wrongful act, or the case of the defective boiler, which blew out because it would not stand the pressure warranted by the manufacturer. In all these cases the wrongful act of the one held finally liable created the unsafe or dangerous condition from which the injury resulted. The principal and moving cause, resulting in the injury sustained was the act of the first wrongdoer, and the other has been held liable to third persons for failing to discover or correct the defect caused by the positive act of the other. In the present case the negligence of the parties has been of the same character. Both the railroad company and the terminal company failed by proper inspection to discover the defective brake. The terminal company because of its fault has been held liable to one sustaining an injury thereby. We do not think the case comes within that exceptional class which permits one wrongdoer who has been mulcted in damages to recover indemnity or contribution from another. For the reasons stated, the question propounded will be answered in the negative." In the course of the opinion the cases of Washington Gaslight Co. v. District of Columbia, 161 U. S. 316, 16 Sup. Ct. 564, 40 L. Ed. 712, Oceanic Steam Nav. Co. v. Compania Transatlantica Espanola, 134 N. Y. 461, 31 N. E. 987, 30 Am. St. Rep. 685, Gray v. Boston Gas Light Co., 114 Mass. 149, 19 Am. Rep. 324, and Boston Woven Hose Co. v. Kendall, 178 Mass. 232, 59 N. E. 657, 51 L. R. A. 781, 86 Am. St. Rep. 478, are distinguished from cases such as the one then before that court, and such as the one now before this court.

[5] 5. Counsel for the plaintiff in error stresses the fact that it appears from the testimony that the probable cause of the homicide in this case was the fact that at some point on the light company's lines outside of the railroad yards the wire has become grounded, and that but for this fact the touching of the wire against the cable at the coal chute would not have done any harm, that electricity is harmless until a circuit is completed, and that, unless the wire had been grounded elsewhere, the fact that the body of the deceased employe supplied the connection between the cable and ground would not have completed the circuit. Concede that this is so, and still the right of an action over is not established. The present plaintiff was not mulcted in damages in the former case because of the grounding of the wire elsewhere. If that fact existed and was an act of negligence and was the sole proximate cause of the injury, then the situation is simply that the jury in the first case by reason of the full facts being undisclosed held the wrong person liable. Of course, the very nature of the right of an action over in such cases requires that the second action shall proceed in the theory that the jury found correctly in the first case as to the facts giving rise to the cause of action therein asserted. If the jury made a mistake in saying that the railway company's negligence as to the erection, maintenance, and inspection of the wires was the direct and proximate cause of the decedent's death, and held that company liable when it should not have been held liable, then the error of the jury, and not the act of the present defendant, has caused the present plaintiff the loss sued for, namely, the amount expended in paying off the judgment in the former suit. But, even if this were not true, still under the theory of fact here presented the light company's negligence in allowing the wire to become grounded elsewhere would not have caused the homicide in this case. If the negligence for which the jury held the present plaintiff liable had not concurred with it, if the wire had not been allowed to sag and come in contact with the wire cable, if the proper inspection had been made as to the portion of the wire located in the railway yards. Hence, in this view of the case the negligence was truly concurring, and there can be no action over for contribution or indemnity.

We have read a great many cases bearing more or less directly on the general question presented, and, after considering them all, we cannot escape the conclusion that the case is squarely within the doctrine of the case of Union Stockyards Co. v. C., B. & Q. R. Co., supra; and while, of course, that decision is not absolutely binding on us, still it is very persuasive authority.

Judgment affirmed.

TAGGART et al. v. TAGGART.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 11, 1911.)

1. SLAVES (§ 25*)—SLAVE MARRIAGE—LEGITIMACY OF ISSUE.

Whether the issue of a slave marriage is legitimate depends on whether there was a moral marriage between its natural parents in slavery, and whether the father recognized the issue as his son after the enactment of the statute of December 21, 1865 (13 St. at Large, p. 291).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Slaves, Cent. Dig. § 115; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 404*)—FINDINGS—CONSTRUCTION.

A finding in a partition action involving the legitimacy of a child of a slave marriage that the testimony of a certain witness, "eliminating the part thereof founded upon hearsay," is not sufficient to establish a moral marriage, did not involve a ruling that reputation was incompetent to prove marriage or pedigree; it not appearing what part of the testimony was excluded as hearsay.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 404.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 928*)—PRESUMPTIONS—ACTION OF TRIAL COURT.

Where a part of a witness' testimony was inadmissible as hearsay, and it cannot be determined from the record on appeal what part of the testimony was excluded as hearsay, the decree merely reciting the elimination of a part thereof as hearsay, it must be presumed that the part excluded was inadmissible.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Abbeville County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge. "To be officially reported."

Action by Bessie Taggart and others against Reese Taggart. From the judgment, plaintiff Lonnie Salles and defendant appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. N. Graydon and E. L. Richardson, for plaintiffs. Wm. P. Greene, for defendant.

HYDRICK, J. This action was brought to partition a tract of land, owned by Wash Taggart, deceased, among his heirs. The defendant, Reese Taggart, claims to be the sole owner of the land under an agreement, which he alleges his father made with him, whereby his father agreed to devise the land to him, subject to the support of his mother for life, if he would live with him and help him pay for it, which he alleges he did.

[1] The only other question is whether Lonnie Salles is an heir of Wash Taggart. She is the daughter of Tom Taggart, deceased, who, it is alleged, was the son of Wash Taggart by Caroline Foster. Whether Tom was the legitimate son of Wash and Caroline depends upon whether there was a moral marriage between them during slavery time, and whether Wash recognized Tom as his son after the passage of the act of December 21, 1865 (13 St. at Large, p. 291). Watson v. Ellerbe, 77 S. C. 232, 57 S. E. 855. The master, to whom the issues of law and fact were referred, reported that the defendant, Reese Taggart, had failed to establish the agreement under which he claims the land, and that the evidence failed to establish a moral marriage between Wash and Caroline previous to the birth of Tom. He therefore recommended that the land be partitioned between the plaintiffs, except Lonnie Salles, and the defendant, Reese Taggart. This report was confirmed by the circuit court. The exceptions of Lonnie Salles and Reese Taggart which raise questions of fact are overruled. A careful consideration of the evidence fails to convince us that the preponderance of it is against the findings of the circuit court.

[2, 3] One of the exceptions of Lonnie Salles raises a question of law, to wit, that the court erred in excluding certain testimony as hearsay. The part of the decree upon which this exception is based reads as follows: "Certainly the testimony of Mary H. Taggart taken at the last reference, eliminating the part thereof founded upon hearsay, is not sufficient to establish a moral marriage." Appellant contends that hearsay—that is, reputation—is competent to prove marriage, pedigree, etc. It does not appear that the circuit court held otherwise. It cannot be said, from the sentence above quoted from the decree, just what part of the testimony of Mary H. Taggart the circuit court eliminated as hearsay. But there was a part of her testimony which was inadmissible, even under the exception to the rule against hearsay evidence, under which that kind of evidence is admitted to prove marriage, pedigree, etc. We must assume, therefore, that the court excluded only what was inadmissible. But, even if all her testimony is admitted, we cannot say that, when its own inconsistencies are considered, and when it is taken in connection with the other testimony in the case, it makes the evidence preponderate in favor of a moral marriage between Wash and Caroline before the birth of Tom.

SENECA CO. v. CRENSHAW.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 6, 1911.)

1. SALES (§ 363*)—ACTION FOR PRICE—OWNERSHIP OF DEBT—EVIDENCE—CORPORATIONS—CHANGE OF NAME.

No question for the jury as to whom defendant's debt for goods sold him belongs is raised by the fact that the seller contracted in one corporate name, and the action is brought by plaintiff in another corporate name; there being in evidence the charter, and its amendments showing that the name of a corporation had been changed from that in which the sale was made to that in which the action was brought.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 363.*]

2. SALES (§ 113*)—RESCISSION—RETURN OF GOODS.

The contract for sale of goods by plaintiff to defendant having provided that the order should not be subject to countermand, reshipment of the goods by defendant to plaintiff would not affect his liability for the price, in the absence of proof that plaintiff accepted or agreed to accept them.

Agency cannot be proved merely by one's declaration that he was agent.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—HARMLESS ERROR.

Any error in admitting an irregular deposition was harmless, there having otherwise been complete documentary proof of plaintiff's case, and no evidence of a defense.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lancaster County; Ernest Moore, Special Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by the Seneca Company against E. L. Crenshaw. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. Harry Foster, for appellant. R. B. Allison, for respondent.

WOODS, J. In this action on a written contract for the sale of goods the presiding judge directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, the seller, for $36 and interest thereon.

[1] The exception assigning error in not submitting to the jury as an issue of fact whether the debt was due to the Seneca Chemical & Stock Food Company, and not the plaintiff, the Seneca Company, is without merit. The contract was made and the goods sold under the former corporate name, but the charter and its amendment were introduced showing that the corporate name had been changed to that in which the action was brought.

[2] The contract provided that the order for the goods should not be subject to countermand, and therefore reshipment of the goods by the defendant to the plaintiff would not affect the obligation of the contract, as there was no proof that the plaintiff had accepted or agreed to accept the goods. The testimony offered by the defendant that a man claiming to be the agent of the plaintiff had told him that the goods had been accepted by the plaintiff and put back in stock was properly excluded by the court, for there was no evidence whatever that the person named was an agent of the plaintiff. Agency cannot be proved by the mere declaration of the person claiming to be agent. General Electric Co. v. Southern Ry., 72 S. C. 251, 51 S. E. 695, 110 Am. St. Rep. 600.

[3, 4] The position taken that the deposition of E. C. Stacy, the vice president and manager of the plaintiff corporation, should have been excluded, even if sustained, would not be material. The contract of sale was in writing and its execution admitted by the defendant, the bill of lading was introduced showing shipment of the goods to the defendant, and there was in evidence a letter of defendant in which he wrote, "I am to-day shipping your goods back, as I cannot handle them." This documentary evidence made out a complete case of sale and delivery of goods to the defendant at a specified price. As there was no evidence of any defense, the presiding judge was required by the law to direct a verdict for the plaintiff. It is therefore evident that consideration of the alleged irregularity in the deposition would be of no practical consequence.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

A requested charge that, even if plaintiff was negligent in doing a certain thing, he could recover if it be found that was not, but the letting off of steam was, the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, was objectionable, as assuming that the letting off of steam was negligent, and was the negligence of defendant, and not of plaintiff's fellow servant, when those matters were questions of fact.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 185*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—FELLOW SERVANTS OR VICE PRINCIPAL—TEST.

The test of whether a servant by whose act a coservant was injured was a fellow servant or a representative of the master, is the character of act being performed by him, whether or not it was the performance of some duty which the master owed the injured servant, performance of which duty the master intrusted to the offending servant.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 190*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—VICE PRINCIPAL.

If as testimony that the manager of a saw-mill the general representative of the master assured an employé that it would be all right for him to adjust the mill, as the machinery would not run that day tends to show the master assumed the special obligation to keep the place of labor safe by not starting the machinery, the starting thereof, injuring such employé, by the direction of a person who was intrusted by the master with the authority to require an act to be done which would start the machinery, was the act of the master, and such person was the representative of the master in that particular act.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Clarendon County; J. C. Klugh, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Walker F. Hunter against the D. W. Alderman & Sons Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

L. D. Jennings, for appellant. Charlton Du Rant and Davis & Weinberg, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The plaintiff was employed in June, 1906, as a saw filer in the defendant's large sawmill at Alcolu. On the morning of June 2d, plaintiff inquired of Robert Alderman, the manager, if the mill would run that day, and on being informed that it would not he went into the saw pit to adjust the mill. The valve in the pipe between the boiler and the engine having been opened, the blowing of the whistle at the noon hour caused the saw to move and cut the plaintiff. For the injury so received this action was brought, and on the trial the verdict was in favor of the defendant.

There was no doubt that the injuries were caused by the negligence of some one. The issues on the trial were: Was there any negligence of the defendant operating as a proximate cause of the injury? Was the injury due solely to the negligence of the plaintiff, or to the negligence of a fellow servant? Was the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence? On the part of the plaintiff there was evidence that he was charged with the duty of adjusting the mill as well as felling the saws, that he went into the pit after notifying the manager that he wished to adjust the mill and receiving his assurance that the mill would not run, and that he was employed in that work in the saw pit, a very dangerous place, when the saws were started without warning, in consequence of the blowing of the whistle by Simon Wither-spoon, the fireman. That the fireman was a fellow servant of the plaintiff was not in dispute, but plaintiff undertook to prove that he blew the whistle in obedience to the order of D. G. Hankinson, and that Hankinson was the representative of the master. The plaintiff admitted that there was a safety device called a "tightener," and that, if he had raised it before going into the pit, the saws would not have moved when the engine started; but he and others testified that the raising of the tightener would have interfered in some degree with the adjustment of the mill. On the part of the defendant, Robert Alderman, the manager, admitted that he had told the plaintiff that the mill would not run that day, but denied that the plaintiff was charged with the work of adjusting the mill. There was evidence that the tightener was provided for the express purpose of disconnecting the saws from the engine so that work could be done on the saws and in the saw pit without danger of injury.

[1] There was no evidence whatever tending to prove negligence in the employment of incompetent servants, and the circuit court was right in so charging the jury. Plaintiff's counsel contend that there was such evidence of negligence on the part of the negro fireman who blew the whistle as to warrant the inference of incompetency. The fireman was a witness for the plaintiff, and testified that, contrary to the order of the manager, he opened the valve in order to blow the whistle and thus started the machinery without notice to employes working around the mill. Assuming this to be an act of negligence on his part, the general rule is that a single act of negligence by a servant does not tend to show that the servant was incompetent. Much less is it to be regarded evidence that the master knew or ought to have known at the time of the accident that the offending servant was incompetent. Galveston, etc., R. Co. v. Davis, 92 Tex. 372, 48 S. W. 570; Bank v. Chandler, 144 Ala. 286, 39 South. 822, 113 Am. St. Rep. 39; Smith v. Chicago, etc., Ry., 236 Ill. 369, 86 N. E. 150; Spring Valley Co. v. Pating, 86 Fed. 433, 30 C. C. A. 168; 26 Cyc. 1297; 2 Thompson on Negligence, 1064.

[2] The following instruction to which exception is taken has been approved in numerous cases: "If the plaintiff, Mr. Hunter, while in the discharge of his duty to the defendant had the choice of two ways of performing it, one entirely safe, and the other obviously and greatly dangerous, and adopted the dangerous way and as a result was injured, he was guilty of negligence, which will bar a recovery by him in this action based on the defendant's negligence, and he cannot relieve himself of the consequences of such contributory negligence by showing that it was customary to perform the duty in the dangerous way." Stephens v. Southern Ry., 82 S. C. 542, 64 S. E. 601; Lyon v. Charleston & W. C. Ry. Co., 84 S. C. 364, 66 S. E. 282; Lowe v. Southern Ry. Co., 85 S. C. 363, 67 S. E. 460, 137 Am. St. Rep. 904; Dover v. Lockhart Mills, 86 S. C. 229, 68 S. E. 525; Lewis v. Gallivan Building Co., 87 S. C. 210, 69 S. E. 212.

[3] There was no error in refusing to charge the request that, even if the plaintiff was negligent in not raising the tightener before going into the saw pit, he could nevertheless recover if the jury should find that not to have been the proximate cause of the injury, and that the letting off of the steam was the proximate cause. The request was not sound because it assumed that the letting off of the steam was negligent, and was the negligence of the defendant and not of a fellow servant.

[4] The only point of difficulty is whether the circuit judge erred in charging the jury that Hankinson at whose instance the fireman opened the valve and blew the whistle was a fellow servant of the plaintiff. The following rule stated in Brabham v. Telegraph Co., 71 S. C. 53, 50 S. E. 716, has been followed in many cases: "In determining who are fellow servants the test or rule in this state is not whether the servants are of different grade, rank, or authority, one of them having power to control and direct the services of another, but the test is in the character of the act being performed by the offending servant, whether it was the performance of some duty which the master owed to the injured servant, the performance of which duty the master intrusted to the offending servant."

[5] Applying this rule, we think there was some evidence for the consideration of the jury on the issue whether Hankinson was a fellow servant or the representative of the master in directing the fireman to blow the whistle. He testified that he was foreman of a gang of laborers with authority to employ and discharge, that he did not employ the fireman, but was allowed to direct him to the extent of telling him when to blow the whistle so as not to work the laborers over time, and that on this occasion he did direct the fireman to blow the whistle. The testimony of the plaintiff that the manager who was the general representative of the defendant had assured him that it would be all right for him to adjust the mill as the machinery would not run that day tended to show a special obligation assumed by the master with respect to the safety of the place of labor. If it be true that the master assumed this special obligation to keep the place of labor safe by not starting the machinery, and it was started by the direction of a person who was intrusted by the master with the authority to require an act to be done which would start the machinery, such act would be the act of the master and such person the representative of the master in that particular act.

There was evidence tending to show that Hankinson was not the representative of the master, but a mere fellow servant; but the considerations above set out show that there was also evidence tending to show that he was the representative of the master. In charging the jury that they could draw no other inference from the evidence than that Hankinson was a fellow servant of the plaintiff we think the circuit court erred, but we express no opinion as to what conclusion the jury should draw from the conflicting evidence on the subject.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the cause be remanded to that court for a new trial.

"To be officially reported."

Action by J. M. Montgomery against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ryals, Grace & Anderson and J. H. Lesesne, for appellant. Davis & Weinberg, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The statute law of this state provides: "Before licensing any insurance company to do business in this state, the insurance commissioner shall require each such company to deposit with him an approved bond or approved securities, in the discretion of the commissioner, as follows: * * * Each fire, or accident, or casualty, or surety insurance company, or any company not herein specified, ten thousand dollars. * * * If a bond be given, it shall be conditioned to pay any judgment entered up against any such company in any court of competent jurisdiction in this state, and such judgment shall be a lien upon the bond or securities. In case a bond is given, the judgment creditor shall have the right to bring suit on said bond for satisfaction of the judgment in the county in which the judgment is received." Act March 1, 1909 (26 Stat. 7) § 13. On June 20, 1910, the plaintiff recovered a judgment for $1,045.43 against the Florida Home Insurance Company on a fire insurance policy issued by that company. The execution having been returned nulla bona, the plaintiff brought this action under the statute above quoted, and recovered judgment against the defendant as surety on the statutory bond of the Florida Home Insurance Company, filed with the insurance commissioner.

[1] The first exception assigns error in requiring the defendant to go to trial on the call of the case. There was no abuse of discretion in disregarding a telegram from counsel in Atlanta merely stating that it was impossible for them to get to the trial. The defendant was represented by counsel of the Manning bar quite capable of taking care of its interests, and it was not for the absent counsel, but for the court, to determine whether the circumstances were such as to excuse their absence. It is true that defendant's counsel was given short notice of demand for the production of certain original letters, but the notice related to letters which the defendant ought to have procured and placed in the hands of its counsel before the call of the case for trial. Aside from that, there is no intimation against the correctness of the copies introduced by plaintiff. The circuit judge overruled a demurrer to the complaint, and sustained a demurrer to special defenses set up in the answer. The defendant offered no testimony, and at the conclusion of the evidence the presiding judge directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the amount claimed. The questions raised will be considered without special reference to the pleadings.

[2] The defendant first contended that there was no valid judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the Florida Home Insurance Company on the ground that the Florida Company had not been served according to law. The judgment roll showed service of the summons and complaint on B. C. Wallace as agent of the insurance company at Sumter, S. C. Under section 155 of the Code of Procedure of 1902, service on any agent of a defendant corporation is sufficient. Section 17 of the act of 1910 (26 Stat. 775), requiring foreign insurance companies to appoint as agent the state insurance commissioner to accept service on their behalf, contains no intimation of an intention to repeal the provision of section 155 of the Code of Procedure above recited.

[3] The position taken by defendant's counsel that it was incumbent on the plaintiff to prove in this action that Wallace was the agent of the Florida Home Insurance Company when the summons in the suit against the company was served upon him is without foundation. The judgment was valid on its face, and was itself evidence that the court on the hearing of the case in which it was rendered had passed on the sufficiency of the service of the summons. "The judgment of a domestic court having general and superior jurisdiction is always to be presumed regular and valid and founded upon jurisdiction properly and duly acquired, until the contrary is definitely made to appear in some permissible manner." Black on Judgments, 329; Ex parte Pearson, 79 S. C. 302, 60 S. E. 706; Voorhees v. Jackson, 10 Pet. 449, 9 L. Ed. 490. The judgment against the Florida Home Insurance Company, being regular on its face and not subject to collateral attack, and not having been set aside by a direct proceeding instituted for that purpose, stood as a valid judgment before the court when this suit was instituted, and when it was tried. When introduced in evidence unsatisfied, the judgment against the Florida Home Insurance Company established the liability of the defendant as surety, for its bond was conditioned as required by the statute to pay "on demand the full and just sum of any judgment entered up against said Florida Home Insurance Company in any court of competent jurisdiction in this state."

[4] There is nothing in the objection that the action should have been brought in the name of the insurance commissioner, for the reason that the statute expressly provides that the judgment creditor shall have the right to bring suit on the bond. There was no issue for the jury on the evidence offered, and the circuit court properly directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount claimed.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

"To be officially reported."

Action by G. Frank Bamberg against C. Harrison and another. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. M. Graham and J. E. Davis, for appellant. J. E. Tobin and R. A. Ellis, for respondents.

WOODS, J. On February 10, 1909, the plaintiff, G. Frank Bamberg, sold a horse to the defendant C. Harrison, taking as security for the purchase money a mortgage on the horse. On March 10, 1909, the mortgage was mailed to W. B. Causey, clerk and ex-officio register for Hampton county, to be recorded. Causey died on April 12, 1909, and J. L. Thames, probate judge, under the requirements of the statute, took charge of the clerk's office the next day. The mortgage had not then been recorded, and was not among the papers on file for record, but was handed to Thames by a brother of the deceased clerk and recorded on April 25, 1909. The deputy clerk indorsed on the paper "Recorded the 16th March, 1909," for the reason that the deceased, Causey, had marked on the paper "3-16," thereby indicating that the paper had reached him for filing on March 16th. In the meantime before the recording of the paper the defendant J. L. Ellis on February 22, 1909, took a bill of sale or mortgage on the same horse, and on March 16th purchased him for valuable consideration.

In this action of claim and delivery Ellis claims the horse as a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice. The question whether he had actual notice of the Bamberg mortgage was submitted to the jury and decided in his favor. The circuit judge charged the jury, in effect, that a mortgagee is not protected against a subsequent purchaser or creditor for value without actual notice of the mortgage by the mere fact that the mortgagee had lodged his paper for record within the time allowed by law for the recording of papers; that, on the contrary, the subsequent purchaser or creditor without notice is protected if the mortgage has not been actually recorded. The question made by the appeal, then, is whether under a statute which requires a mortgage to be recorded before it can operate as constructive notice a mere delivery of the mortgage to the recording officer can operate as constructive notice to subsequent creditors and purchasers. The courts of highest resort are in direct conflict on the question, as will be seen by reference to the cases collated in notes in 96 Am. St. Rep. 398, and 4 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 561. But in this state the rule is firmly established that the purchaser of mortgaged property in the absence of express notice may safely rely on the record and is not bound by the neglect or errors of the recording officer. Building & L. Ass'n v. McCartha, 43 S. C. 72, 20 S. E. 807; Burris v. Owen, 76 S. C. 481, 57 S. E. 542. A cogent reason for preferring this rule is that one who files a paper for record always has it in his power to examine the records and satisfy himself that his paper has been duly and accurately recorded, while it is impossible for a prospective purchaser or creditor to anticipate and inquire about and ascertain the innumerable forms which the negligence or mistakes of the officer may assume.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

A mortgage given by a purchaser before his deed was delivered and registered is subject to a purchase-money mortgage executed and registered at the time of the delivery and registration of the deed, though the first mortgage was first registered, for the purchaser had no title when he executed the first mortgage, and as the delivery of the deed and execution of the purchase-money mortgage were concurrent the title did not rest in the purchaser for any appreciable length of time, but passed immediately under the purchase-money mortgage, for "concurrent acts" are in law but one act.

Action by C. L. Hinton against G. W. Hicks and another. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

W. A. Worth, for appellant. Wm. I. Halstead, for appellees.

BROWN, J. The plaintiff's evidence tends to prove these facts: In November, 1907, D. E. Williams and W. T. Stafford agreed to sell to G. W. Hicks the tract of land described in the pleadings. A deed was prepared by Williams and Stafford for the purpose of conveying to Hicks the said lands, and the mortgage to secure the purchase price was also prepared. Both instruments were dated November 8, 1907. The evidence shows that Stafford was out of the state at the time the contract to sell was made, and Williams held the deed until Stafford's return, when on December 2, 1907, they both signed and acknowledged the deed, and Hicks, having previously acknowledged the mortgage for the purchase money, delivered the mortgage and note to Williams, who, on the same day of acknowledgment, to wit, December 2, 1907, placed the deed and mortgage in an envelope and mailed them together to the register of deeds for registration. The mortgage given by Hicks was for the purpose of securing the purchase money of the lands. On the 19th day of November, 1907, G. W. Hicks executed and delivered to Willie Hicks a mortgage, wherein he attempted to convey the lands contracted to be conveyed to him by Williams and Stafford to secure the payment of $300 alleged to be due Willie Hicks. This latter mortgage was recorded on the 23d of November, 1907, before G. W. Hicks had acquired any title whatever in the lands. Hicks failing to pay the note given to Williams and Stafford to secure the purchase price, these mortgagees made sale, and conveyed the property to the plaintiff in this action. Willie Hicks also foreclosed under his mortgage because of the nonpayment of the indebtedness therein mentioned, and made deed, as mortgagee, to the defendant Etheridge.

Under this evidence his honor ruled that plaintiff could not recover, presumably on the ground that the mortgage to Williams and Stafford to secure the purchase money was recorded after the mortgage given by G. W. Hicks to Willie Hicks, and that therefore the latter took precedence. In this there is error. The question appears to be well settled by adjudications of this court. The execution and registration of the deed to the purchaser and of the mortgage for the purchase money were not only intended to be, but in law were, concurrent acts, and concurrent acts are one act. The title was not in G. W. Hicks when the mortgage to Willie Hicks was registered. It vested in G. W. Hicks but for a moment, possibly, when the vendor's deed was filed for registration, but passed simultaneously into the purchase-money mortgagees, as that mortgage was filed at the same moment. As said by Justice Reade in Bunting v. Jones, 78 N. C. 243 (a similar case): "The title did vest, but it did not rest in Jones, but like the borealis race, that flits ere you can point its place." Appeal from Superior Court, Bertie County; Carter, Judge.

Action by Claude Grant against John W. Mitchell. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. New trial.

The plaintiff introduced evidence tending to prove the allegations of his complaint, and evidence to the contrary was introduced by the defendant. In support of the contention that an improper relationship existed between the wife of the plaintiff and the defendant, the plaintiff introduced J. N. Vann, who, after testifying that he knew the handwriting of the defendant, and to facts from which the court found that secondary evidence was admissible, testified as follows: "I read the whole batch of letters given me by Asa Rice, and can give the substance of them. There were 10 or a dozen, or maybe 15 of them. They were written to plaintiff's wife, and were what I would call love letters, and were couched in very passionate terms. They were written by the defendant." The defendant in apt time objected to all of the above testimony. Objection overruled, and defendant excepted. The defendant offered the wife of the plaintiff as a witness to rebut the evidence of the plaintiff. She was held to be incompetent, and the defendant excepted. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appealed.

Martin, Winborne & Winborne, J. R. Mitchell, and John H. Kerr, for appellant. Peebles & Harris and Winston & Matthews, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. [1] The wife of the plaintiff was not a competent witness under Revisal 1905, § 1636, which reads as follows: "In any trial or inquiry in any suit, action or proceeding in any court, or before any person having, by law or consent of parties, authority to examine witnesses or hear evidence, the husband or wife of any party thereto, or of any person in whose behalf any such suit, action or proceeding is brought, prosecuted, opposed or defended, shall, except as herein stated, be competent and compellable to give evidence, as any other witness on behalf of any party to such suit, action or proceeding. Nothing herein shall render any husband or wife competent or compellable to give evidence for or against the other, in any criminal action or proceeding (except to prove the fact of marriage in case of bigamy), or in any action or proceeding in consequence of adultery, or in any action or proceeding for divorce on account of adultery (except to prove the fact of marriage), or in any action or proceeding for or on account of criminal conversation. No husband or wife shall be compellable to disclose any confidential communications made by one to the other during their marriage."

[2] The wife was incompetent as a witness for or against the husband at common law. The statute removes this disability in certain actions, but specifies those actions in which she cannot testify, and as to the one under consideration, "on account of criminal conversation," says: "Nothing herein shall render any husband or wife competent or compellable to give evidence for or against the other in any action or proceeding on account of criminal conversation." The rule denying the right to the wife to be heard when her character is so seriously assailed seems cruel, but we cannot permit this consideration to induce us to refuse to give effect to the legislative act. She was offered as a witness against the husband in an action on account of criminal conversation, and this the statute says cannot be done. The case of Broom v. Broom, 130 N. C. 563, 41 S. E. 673, which was an action for divorce, is not an authority for the plaintiff. In that case the wife was a party, and the decision is upon the ground that she was not testifying "for or against" her husband, but in her own defense.

[3] The objection to the evidence of the witness Vann is well taken. He was introduced to testify to the contents of 10, 12, or 15 letters, and, instead of telling what was in the letters, he gives the impression made on his mind in one sentence: "They were what I would call love letters, and were couched in very passionate terms." Evidence of the contents of a paper, which has been lost, of conversations, and of the testimony of a deceased witness on a former trial, rest on the same principle. It is not required that the words used should be repeated, but the witness must be able to state the substance of what was written or said, and not its effect. "In attempting to supply the loss of the testimony of a deceased witness, the secondary evidence ought manifestly to be as full, and as nearly the same as that for which it is offered as a substitute, as possible. The very words which the deceased witness spoke would be the best, and were formerly supposed to be necessary (see King v. Joliffe, 4 Term Rep. 290), but that strictness, having made the rule impracticable, has long since been abandoned. The secondary witness may now give the substance, but not the mere effect, of the former testimony. To allow him to state the latter only would be to permit him to decide upon the effect of the testimony, instead of submitting it to the jury to whom it properly belongs." Jones v. Ward, 48 N. C. 26, 64 Am. Dec. 590. "Upon the death of a witness who has been examined in a judicial proceeding, such examination is admissible as secondary evidence in a subsequent trial between the same parties. Here it is required that the secondary evidence should be full, because it is offered as a substitute. The testimony of the deceased witness should be placed before the new, as the law required it to be placed before the former, triers. Both are entitled not only to the truth, but to the whole truth. The copy must be ascertained to be faithful before it is admitted as a representative of the original. Besides, to receive an avowedly imperfect account of what had been formerly testified in lieu of the former testimony itself would be to encourage the party to offer partial instead of full secondary evidence. He would be interested to seek out such witnesses as remembered only those portions of the former testimony as made in his favor." Ingram v. Watkins, 18 N. C. 444. The principle here announced has been approved many times in this court. Wright v. Stowe, 49 N. C. 518; Bule v. Carver, 73 N. C. 265; Paine v. Roberts, 82 N. C. 452; Carpenter v. Tucker, 98 N. C. 317, 3 S. E. 831. The purpose of the rule is to place before the jurors, as near as possible, the substitute for the original, and let them pass on its effect. If it were otherwise, the opinion of an adverse witness would be evidence, or the jury might hear the parts of a writing prejudicial to a party, when in the same writing there are expressions, qualifying what is testified to, of which the jurors would have no knowledge.

[4] The letter of the defendant to the wife of the plaintiff was competent, as was also the evidence of witnesses as to the conduct of the defendant and conversations with him.

We find no error in the charge of his honor, or in his refusal to give certain instructions prayed for by the defendant. There must be a new trial.

New trial.

STATE v. VAUGHAN.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Sept. 18, 1911.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 539*)—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS—CAUTION TO DEFENDANT.

Where the record shows that defendant, who was without counsel at his preliminary examination, was not cautioned by the justice before the examination commenced, as required by Revisal 1905, § 3194, that he was at liberty to refuse to answer any question that may be put to him, and that his refusal to answer could not be used to his prejudice, but was "sworn" with other witnesses at the preliminary examination, and on his request to testify was examined as a witness, the admission in evidence at the trial of declarations then made by defendant is reversible error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1230; Dec. Dig. § 539.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 235*)—PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION—CAUTION AS TO RIGHTS.

Where defendant at his preliminary examination is represented by attorney and is placed upon the stand as a witness in his own behalf, no caution as to his rights is necessary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 235.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Hertford County; J. S. Adams, Judge.

Lonnie Vaughan was convicted of larceny, and he appeals. New trial.

Winborne & Winborne, for appellant. The Attorney General and J. C. Little, for the State.

BROWN, J. The insufficiency of the evidence to convict was strongly urged by counsel for defendant; but, as there is to be another trial, it is unnecessary to pass on the exception.

[1] The second exception is to the ruling of the court admitting declarations of the defendant before the justice of the peace upon a preliminary examination, upon the ground that it did not appear that the defendant was duly cautioned in accordance with the statute. Revisal 1905, § 3194. It appears in the record that the justice "swore" the defendant along with all the other witnesses at the preliminary hearing, and then asked the defendant if he desired to be a witness. Defendant said he did and was examined. The defendant is a young, ignorant negro, and was not represented by counsel before the justice. We think both the letter and spirit of the statute requires that the defendant should have been advised of his rights by the justice to the effect that he was not required to testify; that he was at liberty to refuse to answer any question put to him; and that his refusal to answer shall not be used to his prejudice. State v. Parker, 132 N. C. 1018, 43 S. E. 830; State v. Simpson, 133 N. C. 677, 45 S. E. 567.

[2] When the defendant is represented by counsel and placed upon the stand as a witness in his own behalf, no caution is necessary. In this case the prisoner was not advised of his rights, but was practically invited by the justice to take the stand.

BUTLER v. CENTRAL GEORGIA BRICK CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 15, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 259, 260*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—PLEADING.

In a suit for damages against the Central Georgia Brick Company, a corporation, for the homicide of her husband, the petition of Mattie B. Butler, as amended, alleged, among other things: Aaron Butler was an employé of defendant, engaged with other employés in loading certain railroad flat cars with brick, and shoving the loaded cars out of the way along the track to give place on the railway track for other empty cars to be loaded. Bradley Ward, an officer of the corporation, was foreman of all of these employés; not being engaged in the work himself, but it being his duty to direct and supervise it, he having also authority to employ and discharge employés working under him. One car had been loaded, and the plaintiff's husband, with other employés, under express direction of Bradley Ward, who was then supervising the work, undertook to push the loaded car away. While so engaged, in full view and speaking distance of Bradley Ward, and before the loaded car was out of the way, Ward negligently directed other employés to move an empty car from the rear to the place for loading, knowing that the plaintiff's husband was in a position so that he could not see and did not know the second car was moving onto him, and negligently failed to notify him of the approach of the empty car, which, being pushed by the other employés of defendant, under direction of Ward, crushed and killed the plaintiff's husband. Held:

(a) That, though it was alleged that the plaintiff's husband and Bradley Ward were engaged in serving the same corporation relative to loading cars, the allegations were not of such character as to charge that they were fellow servants.

(b) Nor were the allegations of such character as to show that the danger was as obvious to the plaintiff's husband as it was to the master.

(c) Accordingly it was erroneous to dismiss the petition on demurrer, which complained that: (1) "The sole negligence alleged is the failure to give warning to said Aaron Butler, and Bradley Ward is shown to have been simply fellow servant with said Aaron Butler, because at the time of the alleged injury with respect to the corporation he was simply engaged with Aaron Butler in the same work, and his part in the particular work in which Aaron Butler was injured was not different in his relation to the master from that of the others engaged in that work." (2) "And because under the allegations in the petition as amended it is not shown that the damage was not as obvious to said Butler as to the others."

(a) By the terms of the order the judge only sustained the general demurrer, and does not appear to have ruled upon any of the grounds of the special demurrer.

Error from Superior Court, Liberty County; P. E. Seabrook, Judge.

Action by Katie R. Parker against the Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Mrs. Katie R. Parker instituted suit for damages against the Georgia Coast & Piedmont Railroad Company for the homicide of her husband. The defendant filed general and special demurrers, and afterwards the plaintiff offered an amendment, which was allowed and made a part of the record. The defendant renewed its general demurrer to the petition as amended, and after argument had the demurrer was sustained and the petition dismissed, and the plaintiff excepted. The petition as amended, in substance, alleged the following: In the incorporated town of Ludowici the railroad track of the defendant runs east and west, and crosses at right angles the track of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. At a point about 100 yards east of the intersection a side track of the Atlantic Coast Line connects with the main line of the defendant, by means of which cars are shifted from one railroad to the other. About 4 o'clock in the afternoon a passenger train was standing about 300 yards east of the intersection of the main lines of the two railroads, and 200 yards east of the intersection of defendant's main line with the side track first mentioned, on another of defendant's side tracks which ran parallel to its main line. At the same time a freight train, consisting of an engine and cars at either end of the engine, was standing on the side track which connected the two railroads. The passenger train was due to leave, but was still receiving passengers intending to leave Ludowici. Plaintiff's husband contemplated departure on the passenger train, and for that purpose he walked from his house eastwardly along defendant's main line track in the direction of the standing passenger train. Plaintiff was at a house near the railroad track, intending to leave there and meet her husband at the train. Her husband was intent on catching the train, and also looking ahead at a slight angle toward the house from which plaintiff intended to leave. The wind was blowing from the direction in which the husband was going, so he could not hear an approaching train from behind him. He saw the freight train standing on the side track, but did not think that it would at that time run out on the main line and endanger pedestrians walking along the main line for the purpose of reaching the passenger train; but after he had passed the point of intersection of the side track (on which the freight train was standing) with defendant's main line, the freight train, without warning and without his knowledge, and without ringing the bell, blowing the whistle, or giving other signals (as the rules of the defendant required), backed out upon the main line and proceeded "to back" in the direction of the passenger train, and, though plaintiff's husband was in plain view of defendant's agents and servants who were operating the freight train on the main track, they ran over and killed him. The railroad track was the usual and necessary way for pedestrians to reach the train, and the husband was walking along the track in accordance with a long-continued custom and license by defendant.

The specific grounds of negligence were:

(a) That the engineer who was engaged in operating the engine did not ring a bell, blow a whistle, or give other warning at the time the engine was set in motion, which warning, according to the rules of the company and long-established custom, should have been given, and on the giving of which petitioner's husband had the right to and did rely, and which, if given, would have apprised plaintiff's husband of the moving of the engine, and would have enabled him to have left the track in safety. (b) The engineer operating the engine, after the engine was set in motion, did not give warning to petitioner's husband of the approach of the engine and cars, after it became apparent to him, in the exercise of ordinary care, or should have become apparent to him, had ordinary care been exercised by him, that plaintiff's husband was not aware of the approaching train; and after it was apparent to the engineer, in the exercise of ordinary care, that plaintiff's husband would not get off the track without warning, the engineer did not blow the whistle, ring the bell, or give other warning, but negligently, carelessly, and with recklessness amounting to wantonness, ran down petitioner's husband and killed him. (c) The engineer, after seeing the position of peril in which petitioner's husband was placed, did not slacken the speed of his engine, did not have the same under control, but negligently permitted the cars attached to the engine to overtake petitioner's husband and run him down and kill him, when in the exercise of ordinary care the speed of the engine could have been checked, the engine could have been under proper control, and no harm would have resulted. (d) Defendant company violated its rules in not having a watchman, flagman, or lookout on the front of the cars as they were backing towards plaintiff's husband, to give signals to the engineer, and also to give warning to parties then and there using the track of the defendant as a passageway toward the passenger train.

The grounds of demurrer were: (1) That the petition set forth no cause of action against the defendant, and set forth no facts on which a recovery could legally be based. (2) That the allegations were not sufficiently definite or certain, nor sufficiently full and explicit as to the manner in which the alleged acquiescence and permission of the defendant was manifested with respect to persons walking along its roadbed and between its tracks, nor as to the permission or assent of the defendant to such use of its tracks or roadbed by pedestrians, nor as to the alleged license by which it is claimed that pedestrians were entitled to the use of said roadbed; that said petition was defective in failing to state whether such consent, license, acquiescence, or permission was manifested by acts or by words, and, if by words, in failing to state whether the same were oral, as coming from some authorized representative of the defendant, or were in writing, and, if in writing, in failing to state what the writing was and the language thereof; that the petition was further defective in failing to state any facts showing any custom or license, acquiescence, or permission in respect to the matters alleged. (3) That the petition was further defective in not setting out the rules of the company referred to, or designating them with sufficient certainly to enable the defendant to determine what rules were referred to.

Upon the hearing the judge passed the following order: "Upon consideration of defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's amended petition, and of the argument of counsel thereon, it is considered, ordered, and adjudged that the general demurrer be and the same is hereby sustained, and the petition dismissed."

MERRITT et al. v. JONES et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 15, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 384*)—SALES UNDER ORDER OF COURT—OPERATION AND EFFECT.

The sale of realty by an administrator at public sale, who is duly authorized to sell by an order of the court of ordinary, to an innocent purchaser, divests the title of the heirs at law of the intestate, although there may be irregularities in the sale. Civ. Code 1895, § 3463 (Civ. Code 1910, § 4039).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1569; Dec. Dig. § 384.*]

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 347*)—SALES UNDER ORDER OF COURT—SUFFICIENCY OF ORDER.

Where the application by an administrator for an order to sell lands for the purpose of paying the debts and making distribution among the heirs of the intestate set forth that the intestate "owned at the time of her death two tracts of land, one lying in Worth county, known as the home place, where the deceased resided at the time of her death, containing 50 acres, and another tract of improved land, containing 202½ acres, lying in the county of Randolph," and an order was duly granted to sell "the lands belonging to said estate (for the purpose of paying the debts and distribution among the heirs) lying in said county, of the home place, and a tract of land lying in Randolph county, the one in Worth county containing 50 acres, and the one in Randolph county, improved, containing 202½ acres, more or less," such order was legal authority to the administrator to sell an improved lot of land in Randolph county of a given number belonging to the intestate at the time of her death, where it appeared that such lot was the only land owned by the intestate at the time of her death in Randolph county. Hall v. Davis, 122 Ga. 252, 50 S. E. 106, and cases cited.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 1445; Dec. Dig. § 347.*]

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 388*)—SALES UNDER ORDER OF COURT—EFFECT OF IRREGULARITY.

The action was to recover a lot of land No. 158 in the Fifth district of Randolph county. The plaintiffs and the defendants claimed under a common grantor, Mary F. Freeman. The plaintiffs claimed as the heirs at law of Mary

F. Freeman, and under a deed made to them by John M. Freeman, also an heir at law of Mary F. Freeman. The defendants claimed through a deed made by the administrator of Mary F. Freeman. The application of the administrator to sell, and the order authorizing him to sell, set forth the facts stated in the next preceding headnote. The advertisement of the administrator's sale described the land as "lot of land No. 157, Fifth district of Randolph county, Georgia, containing 202½ acres, more or less." At the sale the administrator made public the announcement that he was going to sell the "old Trippe place." Pridden was the purchaser at the administrator's sale at the price of $750, and the administrator, as such, executed to him a warranty deed for the purpose of conveying the property sold at the administrator's sale, and describing the land as lot No. 158 in the Fifth district of Randolph county. Pridden subsequently conveyed the land by warranty deed to Mrs. Trippe, in consideration of $750, describing the land by the number last above mentioned. Mrs. Trippe in turn conveyed the land by such number by warranty deed to William Jones for a consideration of $800. Thereafter Jones died intestate, leaving the defendants as his only heirs at law, and no administration was ever had upon his estate. There was nothing tending to show that the purchaser at the administrator's sale, or those holding under him, had notice of any irregularity as to the advertisement of the administrator's sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1573-1582; Dec. Dig. § 388.*]

4. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 388*)—SALES UNDER ORDER OF COURT—EFFECT OF IRREGULARITY.

The facts above stated were shown by competent evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. § 388.*]

5. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 388*)—SALES UNDER ORDER OF COURT—EFFECT OF IRREGULARITY.

It follows, upon the application of the legal principles above announced to the facts stated in the third headnote, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover, and that the verdict in favor of the defendants was demanded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. § 388.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1029*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

In view of the foregoing, it is unnecessary to deal specifically with the assignments of error upon the allowance of the amendment to the defendant's answer, upon the charge of the court, or to the rulings on the admission of evidence.

KING et al. v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 19, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. USURY (§ 149)—CRIMINAL LAW (§ 5*)—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§§ 82, 258, 87*)—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS—STATUTES—ACTS PROHIBITED.

The act of 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 83), embodied in Civ. Code 1910, §§ 3444, 3445, providing, among other things, that it shall be a crime "to reserve, charge, or take, for any loan or advance of money or forbearance to enforce the collection of any sum of money, any rate of interest greater than five per cent. per month, either directly or indirectly, by way of commission for advances, discount, exchange, the purchase of salary or wages, by notarial or other fees, or by any contract, or contrivance, or device whatever," does not make unlawful a transaction wherein there is a charge by way of commission for advances, discount, exchange, or fees, or the purchase of salary or wages, save where connected with a loan and directly or indirectly constituting all or a part of a reservation, charge, or taking for a loan or advance of money, or forbearance to enforce the collection of a sum of money, a rate of interest greater than 5 per cent. per month.

(a) The Legislature has the power to fix the maximum rate of interest which may be exacted for the use of money, and to make penal the exaction of a greater rate of interest than 5 per cent. per month.

(b) The act in question does not violate article 1, § 1, par. 2, article 1, § 1, par. 3, or article 1, § 5, par. 2 of the Constitution of this state, nor does it violate the ninth or fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The act does not violate article 1, § 4, par. 1, of the Constitution of this state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Usury, Cent. Dig. § 441; Dec. Dig. § 149;* Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3, 4; Dec. Dig. § 5;* Constitutional Law, Dec. Dig. §§ 82, 258, 87.*]

2. USURY (§ 149*)—STATUTES (§ 76*)—GENERAL AND SPECIAL LAWS—ACTS PROHIBITED.

The act in question does not prohibit the sale and assignment of "chooses in action arising ex contractu."

(a) The fact that "there existed at the time of the passage of this act general laws having uniform operation throughout the state, fixing the rate of interest that might be charged, and providing penalties for the violation of these general laws," does not cause the act to be in conflict with the provisions of article 1, § 4, par. 1, of the Constitution of this state, that no special law shall be enacted in any case for which provision has been made by an existing general law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Usury, Cent. Dig. § 441; Dec. Dig. § 149;* Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 77½-78½; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

3. STATUTES (§§ 107, 118*)—SUBJECTS AND TITLES—USURY LAWS.

The act does not refer to more than one subject-matter, and does not contain matter different from that expressed in its title; and therefore does not violate article 3, § 7, par. 8, of the Constitution of this state, providing: "No law or ordinance shall pass which refers to more than one subject-matter, or contains matter different from what is expressed in the title thereof," the title of the act being as follows: "An act to make it a misdemeanor to charge any rate of interest greater than 5 per cent. per month, either directly or indirectly, and for other purposes."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Dec. Dig. §§ 107, 118.*]

Certified Questions from Court of Appeals.

R. D. King and others were indicted for a violation of the statute prohibiting the taking of interest above 5 per cent. a month. On questions certified by the Court of Appeals. Questions answered.

The Court of Appeals certified the following questions:

"In the foregoing case an act of the General Assembly of this state, to wit, an act approved August 15, 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 83), entitled 'An act to make it a misdemeanor to charge any rate of interest greater than 5 per cent. per month, either directly or indirectly, and for other purposes,' is attacked as being unconstitutional; and a decision of the following constitutional questions involved is necessary to a proper determination of the case:

"First. Is said act unconstitutional, null, and void upon the following alleged ground: 'Said act denies to the defendants [who have been indicted for a violation of it by charging and reserving from a named person a sum of money greater than 5 per cent. per month as interest for a loan of money] the impartial and complete protection guaranteed under article 1, § 1, par. 2 (Civ. Code 1895, § 5699), of the Constitution of this state, and denies to the defendants the rights reserved and retained in the ninth amendment (Civ. Code 1895, § 6022) of the Constitution of the United States, for that all persons are guaranteed the right to sell, own, and buy every species of property not evil in itself, and whose use is not hurtful to the public health and public morals. The aforesaid act denies the impartial and complete protection to persons owning and desiring to sell accounts for salary and wages. And for that all persons are guaranteed the right to contract and receive for their services such price as may be agreed upon between the contracting parties. The act in question seeks to deny this impartial and complete right by limiting the compensation that may be contracted for for services rendered, for that the statutes of this state fix notarial fees. The act aforesaid denies to the notary rendering services in cases where money is loaned the impartial and complete protection of this general law fixing notarial fees.'

"Second. Is said act unconstitutional, null, and void upon the following alleged ground: 'Said act is in violation of article 1, § 1, par. 3 (Civ. Code 1895, § 5700), of the Constitution of this state, and is in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States (Civ. Code 1895, § 6030), in that it deprives the defendants of their liberty and property without due process of law, and in that it denies to these defendants the equal protection of the laws.'

"Third. Is said act unconstitutional, null, and void for the following alleged reason: 'Said act is in conflict with article 1, § 4,

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

par. 1 (Civ. Code 1895, § 5732), of the Constitution of this state, in that it is a special act concerning matters for which provision has been made by existing general laws. For illustration, there existed at the time of the passage of this act general laws having uniform operation throughout the state, fixing the rate of interest that might be charged, and providing penalties for the violation of these general laws. There also existed at the time of the passage of this act general laws permitting the selling and assignment of choses in action arising ex contractu, and the aforesaid act is a special act in conflict with these general laws.'

"Fourth. Is said act unconstitutional, null, and void for the following alleged reason: 'Said act is in violation of article 1, § 5, par. 2 (Civ. Code 1895, § 5735), of the Constitution of this state. The people of this state have always enjoyed the inherent right to sell, buy, and own and assign every species of property not evil in itself and not hurtful to the public health or public morals, and not destructive of the public peace. The aforesaid act seeks to deprive the defendants of this inherent right.'

"Fifth. Is said act unconstitutional, null, and void for the following alleged reason: 'The aforesaid act is in violation of article 3, § 7, par. 8, of the Constitution of this state (Civ. Code 1895, § 5771), in that it refers to more than one subject-matter, and in that it contains matter in the body of the act different from what is expressed in the title thereof. The title of the act only prohibits the charging of a greater rate of interest than 5 per cent. per month. The body of the act seeks to prohibit the charging of commission, the charging of exchange, the sale or purchase of accounts for salary or wages, and the charging of notarial fees.'

Rosser & Brandon, Candler, Thomson & Hirsch, R. B. Blackburn, Lamar Hill, and J. D. Kilpatrick, for plaintiffs in error. C. D. Hill, Sol. Gen., D. K. Johnston, Jno. L. Hopkins & Sons, H. W. Dorsey, Sol. Gen., and Ogburn, Dorsey & Shelton, for the State.

HOLDEN, J. [1] 1. The title to the act attacked as unconstitutional is as follows: "An act to make it a misdemeanor to charge any rate of interest greater than five per cent. per month, either directly or indirectly, and for other purposes." Section 1 of the act, omitting an exception with respect to licensed pawnbrokers, which is hereinafter set out, is as follows: "Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the state of Georgia, that it shall be a misdemeanor, punishable under section 1039 of the Penal Code of this state, for any person, company, or corporation to reserve, charge or take for any loan or advance of money or forbearance to enforce the collection of any sum of money, any rate of interest greater than 5 per cent. per month, either directly or indirectly, by way of commission for advances, discount, exchange, the purchase of salary or wages, by notarial or other fees, or by any contract, or contrivance, or device whatever; save and except only * * * [an exception with reference to licensed pawnbrokers]." Section 2 is as follows: "Be it further enacted, that this statute shall not be construed as repealing or impairing the usury laws now existing, but as being cumulative thereof." Section 3 repeals conflicting laws. This act was designed to prohibit, and does prohibit, transactions "for any loan or advance of money or forbearance to enforce the collection of any sum of money," where the rate of interest reserved, charged, or taken is greater than 5 per cent. per month. Under the act a transaction really involving usury amounting to a charge for the use of money of interest in excess of 5 per cent. per month would involve a crime on the part of the one reserving, charging, or taking the usury, where there was a charge "by way of commission for advances, discount, or exchange," or a charge of fees referred to in the act, or the purchase of salary or wages, where such charges or purchase are connected with a loan and directly or indirectly constitute all or a part of a reservation, charge, or taking, for a loan or advance of money, or forbearance to enforce the collection of a sum of money, a rate of interest greater than 5 per cent. per month. It has often been held that the purchase of property by one with the right of the seller to rebuy at an advanced price, if a bona fide transaction, is valid; but where the transaction was put in the shape of a sale, with a right of the seller to rebuy at an advanced price, as a cover for usury, the court would declare the deed made by the seller void for usury, at his instance. See Rogers v. Blouenstein, 124 Ga. 501, 52 S. E. 617, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 213. If the language "by way of commission for advances, discount, exchange, the purchase of salary or wages, by notarial or other fees," had been omitted from the act, a transaction really involving an exaction of interest exceeding 5 per cent. per month in the ways specified would none the less have been unlawful under the act. The General Assembly perhaps considered that a common evil existed in the covering up of usury by making the charges referred to in the act and in purchases of the kind referred to therein, and thought it best, by way of emphasis, to enumerate these methods in the act itself. In the act, after the language above quoted, follow these words: "Or by any contract, or contrivance, or device whatever." The usury against which the act was aimed was not usury confined to the transactions specifically mentioned, but extends to any exaction of usury exceeding 5 per cent. per month by "any contract, contrivance, or device whatever," by which either directly or indirectly the statute is sought to be evaded. In re Berger, 193 Mo. 16, 90 S. W. 759, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 530, 112 Am. St. Rep. 472. This construction of the act must be placed upon it if any meaning is given the language in the act, "or by any contract, contrivance, or device whatever." There is a statute fixing the amount of fees to be charged by notaries public for official acts, and the act does not prohibit a bona fide charge and collection of or contract for such fees. The act does not prohibit a transaction wherein there is a bona fide charge of "other fees," or a bona fide charge "by way of commission for advances, discount, or exchange," or a bona fide "purchase of salary or wages," except when it directly or indirectly becomes a part of the usury prohibited.

[2] The right to purchase the salary or wages of another, and the right of the latter to sell the same, and the right to make the charges referred to, are not affected by any of the provisions of the act except as stated. The act never intended to interfere with the right of the citizen to make a bona fide contract for such purchases or sales or charges, save as a part of a usurious transaction, and there is nothing in the act authorizing a construction that the right to make such contracts is thereby impaired. The Legislature has the power to prohibit usury from being charged, directly or indirectly, through any scheme or device. This act deals with such a situation where the charge exceeds 5 per cent. per month.

[1a] Under the common law it was unlawful for a lender to make any charge for the use of money. In many, if not all, of the states there is a law fixing the rate of interest which may lawfully be charged. The right to do this is a matter which cannot now be questioned as being unconstitutional. In the case of Griffith v. Connecticut, 218 U. S. 563, 569, 31 Sup. Ct. 132, 133 (54 L. Ed. 1151), Mr. Justice White stated: "It is elementary that the subject of the maximum amount to be charged by persons or corporations subject to the jurisdiction of a state for the use of money loaned within the jurisdiction of the state is one within the police power of such state." In the case of State v. Sherman, 18 Wyo. 169, 105 Pac. 299, 301, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 898, 901, it was said: "It is too late to question the right of the Legislature to enact laws regulating the rate of interest that may be legally taken for the loan or forbearance of money, and to prescribe penalties for their violation." In the case of Ornstein v. Cary, 126 Wis. 135 on page 138, 105 N. W. 792 on page 793, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 174 on page 176, the court said: "This power has been exercised for the protection of the borrower, upon the ground 'that the lender and the borrower * * * do not occupy the same relations of equality that parties do in contracting with each other in regard to the loan or sale of other kinds of property, and that the borrower's necessities deprive him of freedom in contracting, and place him at the mercy of the lender.' Prentice, Pol. Powers, p. 43. It is upon this theory that the state is deemed to have enacted usury laws in the exercise of the police power in protection of the public interest, and for the promotion of the general welfare." In this connection, see M. & T. Trust Co. v. Krumseig, 172 U. S. 351, 19 Sup. Ct. 179, 43 L. Ed. 474. The right to fix the maximum rate of interest to be charged being clearly within the police power of the Legislature, it has the power to enact such laws as will prevent a violation of the provisions of the laws against usury. The enactment of a law against usury, with no penalty to be suffered by the party violating the law, would be merely advisory, and amount to no more than a recommendation to the public. Under the laws of this state the legal rate of interest is 7 per cent. per annum, unless there is a written agreement to pay more, when 8 per cent. may be exacted. It is also provided that, when a charge of more than 8 per cent. is provided for in a written contract, only 7 per cent. can be collected; and, where a conveyance of property is made as a part of a usurious transaction, the title is voidable at the instance of the one transferring it. If the Legislature in the exercise of the police power has the right to prevent a recovery of more than 7 per cent. interest where a charge of more than 8 per cent. is provided for in a written contract, and to give to a party undertaking to transfer title to property as a part of a usurious transaction the right to have the same declared void, we see no reason why it cannot go further and make penal the violation of the law controlling the interest rate, especially where a crime is committed only when the amount of interest charged exceeds 5 per cent. per month. Interest to the amount of 5 per cent. per month certainly ought to satisfy the greediest of money lenders, and it cannot be said that it is an unreasonable exercise of the police power to make criminal the charging of a greater rate. It is to be presumed that the Legislature investigated the matter in regard to which it legislated, and found that the existing laws in reference to usury were insufficient to prevent oppression and unreasonable exaction of interest, and that a law making it a crime to exact interest exceeding 5 per cent. per month was necessary to prevent such oppression and exaction. A large discretion is vested in the Legislature in deciding what the interests of the public require and what measures are needed to promote its welfare. In re Berger, 193 Mo. 16, 90 S. W. 759, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 530, 112 Am. St. Rep. 472, it was ruled: "Making the taking of more than 2 per cent. interest a month for the loan or forbearance of money a crime is not beyond the legitimate powers of the Legislature." In the case of State ex rel. v. Cary, supra, it was ruled: "(1) The Legislature may restrict the exaction of sums in connection with a loan of money for commissions, examinations, and renewals, without unconstitutionally impairing personal liberty or freedom of contract."

2. Imprisonment may be imposed for violation of a statute forbidding the taking of usury or excessive sums in connection with a loan by way of commissions or compensation for views or appraisals. All property, and indeed all rights of natural persons, or corporations, are subject to the exercise of the police power of the state. The right to contract is not such an absolute right as to render it immune from the reasonable exercise of the police power. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. State, 135 Ga. 545, 557, 558, 69 S. E. 725.

The Legislature, in the exercise of the police power, having the right to make penal the exaction of interest exceeding 5 per cent. per month, had the right to make provisions in regard to different classes of persons making such exactions of interest, provided no unreasonable distinctions are made in making such provisions and all members of each class are dealt with in the same manner. The act provides "that regularly licensed pawnbrokers, where personal property is taken in their actual physical possession and stored by them, may charge, in addition to said rate of interest, not exceeding twenty-five cents at the time said property is first taken possession of by them, for the storage of said property." This exception does not make the act violative of the "equal-protection" clauses of the state and federal Constitutions. State v. Hurlburt, 82 Conn. 232, 72 Atl. 1079; Griffith v. Connecticut, 218 U. S. 563, 31 Sup. Ct. 132, 54 L. Ed. 1151. The pawnbrokers referred to in the language above quoted from the act, who are excepted from the operation of the general provisions of the act, are such as are "regularly licensed" to do the business of pawnbrokers. The business done by pawnbrokers is different from that done by other persons exacting interest for the use of money. It cannot be said that the classification is arbitrary and without legislative discretion.

The act is not class legislation because there is a general law (hereinbefore referred to) defining what constitutes usury, and this act only makes penal the exaction of interest exceeding 5 per cent. per month. Having passed a general law defining usury and providing for forfeitures and penalties for exacting it, the Legislature had the further right to denounce a certain class of usurers and to make penal the exaction of interest exceeding 5 per cent. per month. The law making the exaction of more than 8 per cent. interest usury is a general law; and so is the law we are considering, making it penal to increase the exaction to above 5 per cent. per month a general law. It is not unconstitutional on the ground of being class legislation because the act of the usurers therein referred to in exacting interest in excess of 5 per cent. per month is made penal, whereas the act of an usurer exacting less than this amount but more than 8 per cent. per annum is not penal. The Legislature had the right to make this distinction, and the provision of the act in question cannot be said to make an arbitrary selection, but it makes a classification upon a reasonable basis of subjects. In re Berger, supra, it was ruled: "Making it a crime to take usurious interest only when it is above a certain amount is not unconstitutional class legislation." In Griffith v. Connecticut, supra (pages 563, 564 of 218 U. S.; 31 Sup. Ct. 132, 54 L. Ed. 1151), the ruling made by the Supreme Court of the United States is as follows: Fixing maximum rates of interest on money loaned within the state by persons subject to its jurisdiction is clearly within the police power of the state, and the details are within legislative discretion if not unreasonably and arbitrarily exercised. Classification, on a reasonable basis of subjects, within the police power, is within legislative discretion, and a reasonable selection which is not merely arbitrary and without real difference does not deny equal protection of the laws within the meaning of the fourteenth amendment. The statute of Connecticut of 1907, limiting interest on loans, is not unconstitutional as denying equal protection of the laws because it excepts loans made by national and state banks and trust companies and bona fide mortgages on real and personal property. The classification is a reasonable one. The contract clause of the federal Constitution does not give validity to contracts that are properly prohibited by statute. In this connection, see Wyoming v. Sherman, 18 Wyo. 169, 105 Pac. 299, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 898; State v. Griffith, 83 Conn. 1, 74 Atl. 1068.

The act is not subject to the criticism that it only makes guilty of a crime that class of persons who exact interest exceeding 5 per cent. per month "by way of commissions for advances, discount, exchange, the purchase of salary or wages, by notarial or other fees." It makes penal the exaction of such interest by any person, directly or indirectly, "by any contract, or contrivance, or device whatever," and the exaction of such interest is a penal offense, though it is done in ways other than those specified in the preceding sentence. The act does not violate any of the provisions of either the state or federal Constitutions referred to in the first, second, and fourth questions propounded, and in headnote 1 (b) of this decision; and our answer to these questions is in the negative.

[2] 2. The act is not in conflict with article 1, § 4, par. 1 (Civ. Code 1910, § 6391), of the Constitution of this state, providing: "Laws of a general nature shall have uniform operation throughout the state, and no special law shall be enacted in any case for which provision has been made by an existing general law. No general law affecting private rights shall be varied in any particular case by special legislation, except with the free consent, in writing, of all persons to be affected thereby; and no person under legal disability to contract is capable of such consent," because at the time it was passed there was a general law fixing the maximum rate of interest that could be charged and providing for a violation of this law, and a general law permitting the sale and assignment of choses in action arising ex contractu. The act does not interfere with the sale and assignment of any chose in action, except as hereinbefore shown. The law fixing the maximum rate of interest that can be lawfully charged is a general law. It is not a good objection to it that it makes penal the exaction of interest exceeding 5 per cent. per month when there was in existence a general law making the charging of more than 8 per cent. interest per annum usury, and providing forfeitures and civil penalties for a violation of it. The act we are passing on, while it deals with a certain class of usurers, is a general law. As far as concerns this class, it has general operation throughout the state, and has application to no limited territory, and applies to all persons in the state who violate it. The fact that there are certain usurers to whom it does not apply does not make the act a special law. The Legislature had the right to fix the amount of usury the exaction of which would constitute a crime, and to leave in force an existing general law providing that the exaction of a less amount, but more than 8 per cent. per annum, would be usury and subject the offender to certain forfeitures and civil penalties, but not to a criminal prosecution. In re Berger, 193 Mo. 16, 90 S. W. 759, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 530, 534, 112 Am. St. Rep. 472; State v. Sherman, 18 Wyo. 169, 105 Pac. 299, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 898, 908. The answer to the third question propounded is in the negative.

[3] 3. The act does not refer to more than one subject-matter, and does not contain matter different from that expressed in its title; and therefore does not violate article 3, § 7, par. 8 (Civ. Code 1910, § 6437), providing: "No law or ordinance shall pass which refers to more than one subject-matter, or contains matter different from what is expressed in the title thereof." The charges and sales referred to in the fifth question copied in the statement of facts are not prohibited by the act, save where they are connected with a loan and directly or indirectly constitute all or a part of a charge for the loan of money, or forbearance to enforce the collection of money, in excess of 5 per cent. per annum. The fifth question propounded is answered in the negative.

OATS v. JONES et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 19, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 243*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—EVIDENCE AS TO PURCHASE IN GOOD FAITH.

A husband conveyed land to his wife, and the deed was recorded. Thereafter they lived on the place together for some time, when the wife moved away, leaving the husband in possession. Some years after making the deed to the wife, he made deeds to secure debts which he incurred. After she left he sold the land and a mule, and made a conveyance to a person who paid $100 cash and agreed to take up a debt of the husband of $568, which was done through a third person, who advanced the money, took a conveyance from the husband and also a conveyance from the holder of the security deed, and made a bond for title to the purchaser. In a suit in ejectment to recover the land, brought by the wife, the purchaser, besides the general issue of not guilty, pleaded estoppel by reason of the plaintiff's disclaiming right or title and inducing the defendant to purchase from the husband bona fide, for value, and without notice, and that the wife was a mere volunteer, and not a bona fide purchaser for value. The evidence was conflicting as to whether the purchaser had notice of the deed held by the wife before his purchase. Held, there was no error in admitting in evidence the deed from the husband to the person who advanced the money for the purchaser, and the bond for title from such person to the purchaser, along with the other evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 606-608; Dec. Dig. § 243.*]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 243*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—EVIDENCE AS TO PURCHASE IN GOOD FAITH.

Nor was there error in admitting in evidence deeds showing a conveyance by the husband to another, to secure his indebtedness, and a conveyance by such creditor to the person who advanced the money for the purchaser to take up the debt, under the agreement of purchase.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 606-608; Dec. Dig. § 243.*]

3. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 192*)—REMEDIES—PERSONS ENTITLED TO ASSEET INVALIDITY—PLEADINGS AND EVIDENCE.

The pleadings and evidence did not authorize the submission of a question as to whether the deed to the wife was made generally for the purpose of defrauding his creditors and evading the payment of his debts, as a defense to one who claimed as a subsequent purchaser from the husband. In that capacity he was not concerned with any purpose to defraud creditors, who became such after the conveyance to the wife, except in so far as he may have succeeded to the right of a creditor sought to be defrauded. Such issue was not raised by the pleadings, but a claim to perfect title was asserted by the purchaser.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Dec. Dig. § 192.*]

4. ESTOPPEL (§ 120*)—EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a suit of the character stated above, where the evidence was conflicting as to whether or not the purchaser had notice of the deed to the wife, it was error to charge: "If it should appear to you from the testimony that the plaintiff in this case induced, by her acts or words, the defendant to purchase the property in question, then she would be estopped from claiming the property as against him, although he may have had notice of the deed in her." It was too broad a statement to declare generally that estoppel would result from "acts or words" inducing action, without regard to notice or knowledge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Dec. Dig. § 120.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 280*)—INSTRUCTIONS—SCOPE OF EXCEPTIONS.

Except as herein indicated, the rulings assigned as error were not subject to the grounds of complaint urged against them.

(a) A general exception to a charge, without more, does not raise the question whether, assuming it to be a correct statement of a principle of law, it is applicable to the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 691-698; Dec. Dig. § 280.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 706*)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—RECORD.

The only exception being to the overruling of a motion for a new trial, and the brief of evidence being brought up by specification as part of the record, there is no merit in a motion to dismiss the writ of error because the certificate of the judge to the bill of exceptions states that it is true, "and specifies all of the record material to a clear understanding of the errors complained of," but does not expressly state that it contains or specifies all of the evidence material, etc.

(a) Nor was there any merit in the ground of a motion to dismiss the writ of error because the judge's charge as a whole was not brought to this court.

JONES v. RAGAN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 16, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 50*)—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACTS.

On January 9, 1890, Jones executed and delivered to Mrs. Mary Laramore a bond to make her a title to lot of land 37 in the Fourteenth district of Lee county, upon the payment of her note given for the purchase price of the land, due January 9, 1896, or earlier than that date in the event Jones, or his heirs or assigns, should, prior to the maturity of the note, finish sawing and hewing the timber from such lot of land and lot 36 in the same district. On the same date the parties to the bond for title executed the following instrument: "Georgia, Lee County. This agreement, between Mary Laramore, of the one part, and D. C. Jones, of the other part, both of said state and county, made this Jan'y. 9th, 1890, witnesseth:

That the said Mary Laramore, for and in consideration of the sum of $2.50 per acre, to be paid as hereinafter agreed, does hereby sell and convey unto the said D. C. Jones, his heirs and assigns, all the timber suitable for sawing or hewing on 160 acres of land, more or less, of lot of land No. 36, and 100 acres, more or less, of lot of land No. 37, being all of the timbered land on said lots of land, the same being in the Fourteenth district of Lee county, Georgia; and it is further agreed that the said Jones is to credit the amount due for said timber on a certain promissory note given in favor of said Jones by said Laramore, and bearing even date with this agreement, for the sum of $510, due on the 9th day of January, 1896, six months from date, or whenever the said Jones should finish sawing or hewing said timber as aforesaid, by said Jones, in the event it is done sooner, and without interest; and should the number of acres from which the timber is sawed and hewed as aforesaid by said Jones, his heirs or assigns, at the price per acre aforesaid, be more than enough to cover said amount of said note, then the overplus to be paid to the said Mary Laramore, and the same to be due and payable monthly, at the end of each month, as fast as so hewed and sawed, and at the price aforesaid; and if said Jones, his heirs or assigns, fails to use the timber as aforesaid by the expiration of said six years from this date, then and in that event the said D. C. Jones, his heirs and assigns, are to be due said Laramore for whatever number of acres of timber thus sold that may not then be paid for, and not hewed and sawed. In testimony whereof we have hereunto set our hands and seals, this the 9th day of Jan'y., 1890. [Signed] Mary Laramore. D. C. Jones. Signed, sealed, and delivered in presence of J. V. Covin. H. L. Long."

On the following day H. L. Long made an affidavit, before the clerk of the superior court of Lee county, that he signed the same as a witness and also saw the other witness sign. The instrument was recorded in the clerk's office of Lee superior court on the date of such affidavit. Held:

In the trial of an action involving the contract exhibited by the foregoing instruments, the court properly instructed the jury to the effect that if, upon the date of the execution of such instruments, there were a sufficient number of acres of timber suitable for sawing and hewing on the lots 36 and 37 to amount at $2.50 to the sum of $510, the principal of the note, then Jones at the maturity of the note was bound to execute to Mrs. Laramore, if in life, and, if not, then to her heirs at law, a deed to the lot No. 37.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Dec. Dig. § 50.*]

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§§ 87, 115, 135*)—AUTHORITY OF EXECUTOR—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

After the death of Mrs. Laramore, prior to the maturity of the note, the administrator of her estate was not authorized, merely by virtue of his office as administrator, to make a private contract with Jones, whereby the contract above referred to between Mrs. Laramore and Jones was rescinded, and the bond for title and possession of the land surrendered to Jones, and the note of Mrs. Laramore surrendered to the administrator, and certain other indebtedness of Mrs. Laramore to Jones and a debt of the administrator to Jones were canceled.

(a) Such agreement for rescission entered into by the administrator clearly was not embraced in the provisions of either section 3429 or section 3430 of the Civil Code of 1895 (Civ. Code 1910, §§ 4005, 4006). But, even if it was, a valid compromise could not be made by the administrator without an order of the ordinary having first been granted to make it. Nor was such contract of rescission authorized by the Civil Code of 1895, § 3428 (Civ. Code 1910, § 4004), as that section authorizes administrators "to compromise all contested or doubtful claims for or against the estates * * * that they represent." In the present case neither the right of Jones to collect the note for the purchase price of lot 37, if it had not been paid, nor the right of the heirs at law of Mrs. Laramore to require Jones to execute to them a deed to such lot, constituted a contested or doubtful claim. See Maynard v. Cleveland, 76 Ga. 52, 69 et seq.

(b) Accordingly the court properly struck, on motion of the plaintiff below, the amendment to the defendant's answer, setting up the contract of rescission in the thirteenth paragraph of that answer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. §§ 87, 115, 135.*]

3. HARMLESS ERROR—EFFECT OF VERDICT.

Many of the assignments of error in the motion for a new trial, upon certain instructions of the court to the jury, and upon the admission and rejection of evidence relating to the matter of mesne profits and damages, were eliminated by the verdict of the jury, which did not find any mesne profits or damages.

4. CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—NO ERROR.

Under the construction of the contract between Jones and Mrs. Laramore, as applied by the trial court, and as approved by the preceding notes, the judge did not err in any of the other rulings complained of in the motion for a new trial.

5. CONTINUANCE (§ 30*)—GROUNDS—SURPRISE—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Upon the allowance of an amendment to the petition, it was not an abuse of discretion for the trial court to overrule a motion for continuance upon the ground of surprise, where it was not shown how the moving party was surprised, and that he was less prepared to go on with the trial than he would have been if the amendment had not been allowed. Cradock v. Kelly, 129 Ga. 818 (4), 60 S. E. 193.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Continuance, Cent. Dig. §§ 99-112; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078*)—REVIEW—ABANDONMENT OF ASSIGNMENTS.

Assignments of error in the bill of exceptions, which are not referred to in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error, will be considered as abandoned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4256-4261; Dec. Dig. § 1078.*]

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078*)—REVIEW—ABANDONMENT OF ASSIGNMENTS.

Exceptions pendente lite, though duly allowed and ordered filed as a part of the record, upon which no error was originally assigned in the main bill of exceptions, and upon which counsel made no assignment before the argument of the case, will not be considered by this court. Shaw v. Jones, Newton & Co., 183 Ga. 446, 66 S. E. 240, and citations; Runnals v. Aycock, 78 Ga. 553, 3 S. E. 657.

8. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—REFUSAL OF NEW TRIAL.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and the court did not err in refusing to grant a new trial.

DIVORCE (§§ 218, 286*)—APPEAL AND ERROR—ACTION FOR ALIMONY—RECORD ON WRIT OF ERROR—SCOPE OF REVIEW.

The authority of the court to modify or revoke an order granting temporary alimony is not confined to a change of condition occurring subsequently to the grant of the order. Jennison v. Jennison, 136 Ga. 202, 71 S. E. 244. Hence, on an application for the revocation of an order of temporary alimony, where the judge certifies that "no showing of any kind (except a showing for continuance by the applicant in the action for permanent alimony), but what was passed on in the original trial of the petition for temporary alimony," was made, it was not erroneous for the court to act upon such evidence; and where that evidence is not set out in the record, it cannot be said that the court abused its discretion in vacating the former order allowing temporary alimony "until further ordered by the court."

HAPP BROS. CO. v. HUNTER MFG. & COMMISSION CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 17, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 148*)—PLEADING—ANTICIPATION OF DEFENSE.

It appears from the copy of the contracts attached to the petition that they were signed by L. Miller as the salesman, and by Happ Bros. Company, who gave the orders. Both the plaintiff and the defendant were corporations, and the petition alleged that the contracts were signed by the lawfully authorized officers and agents of the respective parties. It therefore appears from the petition that the plaintiff, who was the seller, and the defendant, who was the buyer, signed the contracts. Consequently, under the allegations of the petition, the contracts did not fall within the statute of frauds, and they were not unilateral.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. §§ 353, 354; Dec. Dig. § 148.*]

2. SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION—EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE.

The allegations of the petition sufficiently explained the meaning of the contracts, in order to allow such meaning to be proved by competent aliunde evidence. In this connection, see Borum v. Swift & Co., 125 Ga. 198, 53 S. E. 608.

The petition contained two counts, in each of which the writings were interpreted, and their breach alleged. The only difference in the counts related to the measure of damages. In the first count it was alleged that the goods were manufactured and tendered to the defendant, and, upon its refusal to accept in terms of the alleged contract, they were held by the plaintiff subject to the order of the defendant, and it was sought to recover the contract price. The same allegations relative to tender of the goods and breach were alleged in the second count; but there were further allegations stating a market price at the time and place specified in the alleged contract for delivery, which was less than the contract price, and it was sought to recover the difference between the two as damages. In each of the counts it was alleged that before the time for delivery of any of the goods the defendant "wholly repudiated said contracts and notified plaintiff it would not accept and pay for" any of the goods. There was no express allegation that the plaintiff did anything in recognition of the contract prior to the time of the alleged repudiation. The only allegation bearing upon this point was contained in a paragraph of the first count, wherein it was alleged that plaintiff "furnished said sample cards according to said contract," one of the contracts requiring shipment of "6 sample cards as soon as possible." With this exception nothing was alleged relative to any communication from the plaintiff to the defendant, pointing to a recognition of the contracts, until the time at which the goods were specified to be delivered, when tender was made by the plaintiff, which, according to the allegations, was subsequent to the time of the repudiation by defendant. However, it was alleged that the goods were made to special order, and that they were manufactured by the plaintiff for the defendant in pursuance of the order, though there was no allegation that they were so manufactured before the repudiation. The defendant demurred to the petition, on the grounds: (a) That the petition stated no cause of action; (b) that the contracts were unilateral and without consideration; (c) that the contracts were for the sale of goods to the amount of $50 or more, and the pleadings showed affirmatively that the contracts were not in writing and were void under the statute of frauds; (d) that the petition did not set forth the proper measure of damages in either count. The judge overruled the demurrer, and the defendant excepted.

ALLEN et al. v. CLARE et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 16, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. FORMER DECISION CONTROLLING.

In so far as the rulings made in Hearn v. Clare, 131 Ga. 374, 62 S. E. 187, apply to the present case, they are controlling.

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 568*)—RECEIVERSHIP—RIGHTS OF STOCKHOLDERS.

Where, upon an equitable petition filed against a corporation by some of its stockholders, its assets were put in the hands of receivers for winding up and distribution, and various creditors filed claims, and the case was referred to an auditor, who made a report thereon, and, after the allowance of a specified time for stockholders who were not parties to present their claims, a final decree was entered providing for the payment of debts which were allowed, and stating that from the balance of the funds, after paying the costs and expenses, there was left a sufficient amount to pay each stockholder $3.40 per share, which they were allowed to receive upon filing their certificates with the receivers, stockholders who so filed their certificates and received the amounts thus decreed to be due to them could not thereafter, by mere petition or intervention in the main case, seek to set aside the judgments, orders, and decrees under which they had received their dividends, and prevent the discharge of the receivers; nor could they do so, whether they acted as claiming to be quasi parties under the allowance to file their certificates and receive the dividends due them, or sought to become actual parties by order of court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 568.*]

3. RECEIVERS (§ 203*)—REVOCATION OF ORDER OF REFERENCE OF ACCOUNT—POWER OF JUDGE.

While it is common practice for the judge to refer complicated accounts or reports of a receiver to an auditor, he is not in all cases compelled to do so; and if an order of reference has improvidently been granted in such case, it does not stand as res adjudicata, so as to render the judge incapable of revoking the reference and withdrawing the consideration of the receiver's report from the auditor. This is true, although the judge who granted the order of revocation was not the same judge who presided when the order of reference was made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Receivers, Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

4. PROCEEDING IN RECEIVERSHIP—DISMISSAL.

The facts set out in the present proceedings are numerous and complicated. Without reciting them in detail, or holding that each ground of the demurrer which was sustained by the court was well taken, in view of the nature of the case, the finding of an auditor in regard to the claims of creditors, the granting of the final decree, the determination and distribution of a dividend thereunder, and the payment of the debts and expenses of litigation by the receivers, and in view of the nature of the proceedings sought to be instituted by the present plaintiffs in error, and their laches in taking action, there was no error in dismissing such proceeding.

MANOR v. CITY OF BAINBRIDGE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 22, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§§ 10, 112*)—VALIDITY OF REGULATIONS.

Under the general welfare clause in the charter of the city of Bainbridge the municipal authorities have the right to pass an ordinance prohibiting and making penal the sale of what is commonly known as "near beer" within the city limits, except within a prescribed territory therein, provided the provisions of the ordinance prescribing such territory are not unreasonable. Badkins v. Robinson, 53 Ga. 613; Sanders v. Elberton, 50 Ga. 176; Campbell v. Thomasville, 6 Ga. App. 212, 64 S. E. 815; Cassidy v. Macon, 133 Ga. 689, 66 S. E. 941.

(a) The ordinance of the city of Bainbridge prescribing the territory within which "near beer" may be sold, and making it unlawful to sell "near beer" without such territory in the city limits, does not appear to be unreasonable.

(b) The ordinance passed December 5, 1910, making it unlawful to sell "near beer" after January 1, 1911, in the city limits, except within a designated territory therein, is not shown to be unreasonable merely by proof that in the designated territory every suitable building for the sale of "near beer" was occupied at the time of the passage of the ordinance and at the time of the hearing for an interlocutory injunction in January, 1911, and that it would be impossible to procure one in which to carry on the sale of "near beer" at any reasonable price.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. §§ 10, 112.*]

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 112*)—POLICE POWER—VALIDITY OF REGULATIONS.

The fact that one sold "near beer" during 1909 and 1910 under a license from the municipal authorities at a certain place, and that he made valuable improvements at such place for the purpose of operating there a "near beer saloon," did not make invalid a municipal ordinance, passed in December, 1910, whereby it was made unlawful after that year to sell "near beer" in the city limits, except within specified territory, which did not embrace the place above referred to; nor did such facts make unlawful the refusal of the city authorities to grant such person a license to sell "near beer" during the year 1911 at the place named.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 112.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 594*)—ORDINANCES—CONSTRUCTION.

An ordinance making penal the violation of the provisions of another ordinance applies to the latter ordinance as amended by a subsequent ordinance, though there is no provision in either of the ordinances, or in the amendment, specially providing that it shall so apply.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 594.*]

4. INJUNCTION (§ 152*)—INTERLOCUTORY INJUNCTION—MATTERS CONSIDERED.

On the hearing of an application for an interlocutory injunction, a demurrer and answer may be presented by the defendant and considered by the judge hearing the application, and evidence may be offered by the defendant to show that the plaintiff is not entitled to the relief sought, though the demurrer and plea have not been filed in the office of the clerk of the superior court in which the case is pending. See, in this connection, Hogan v. State, 133 Ga. 875, 67 S. E. 288.

LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. v. ROGERS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 17, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 394*)—OPERATION—ACCIDENT AT CROSSING—PLEADING.

A petition by a father against a railroad company for the recovery of damages for killing his minor child is not open to general demurrer, in which petition it is alleged that the plaintiff's minor child of the age of six years was killed by a freight train while attempting to cross the railroad track at a point in a populous community where the public was accustomed at all times, day and night, to cross, and such travel of the public was so constant, open, and uninterrupted as to attract the attention of the defendant and its servants in operating trains; that the killing was the result of the negligence of the defendant, (1) in that the crew in charge of the train had a clear view of his minor child for a distance of six hundred feet before striking him, yet nevertheless continued to run the train at a reckless rate of speed, to wit, 60 miles per hour; (2) that notwithstanding the locality where the child was on the track was populous and well traveled, to the defendant's knowledge, yet the crew in charge of the train failed, as ordinary care required, to keep a proper lookout ahead to discover the presence of persons upon the track; and (3) that the engineer and crew of the train, after discovering the presence of the child and its peril on the track, negligently failed to stop the train or adopt measures to save the child's life, but maintained the reckless speed of 60 miles per hour until after the child was stricken.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1331-1338; Dec. Dig. § 394.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 401*)—OPERATION—ACCIDENT AT CROSSING—CARE REQUIRED.

Where the law imposes a duty upon a railroad company to exercise ordinary care in the operation of its trains, and notwithstanding the exercise of such care an injury results to one who is upon the track, the company is not liable.

An instruction that "the law imposes upon the railroad company a duty to keep a lookout, and also a duty to run the train at such speed as it could by the exercise of ordinary care have prevented the injury," was not an accurate statement of the law. Its effect tended to impress the jury that the ordinary care, the exercise of which would exonerate the company, is such care as would prevent the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 401.*]

3. TRIAL (§§ 140, 236*)—INSTRUCTIONS—QUESTIONS FOR JURY—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

In formulating rules for the jury's guidance in determining what weight they should give to the testimony of conflicting witnesses, after instructing them that they may take into consideration the witness' interest or want of interest, his bias, and his opportunity to know the facts about which he testifies, an instruction that the jury may believe that witness who has the best means of knowing the facts about which he testifies, and the least inducement to swear falsely, without a qualification that if the witnesses be of equal credibility, tends to mislead the jury into supposing that the court intends that such witness is to be believed in preference to other witnesses. The credibility of witnesses is for the jury, and must be determined solely by them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 334, 335, 531-533; Dec. Dig. §§ 140, 236.*]

4. REVIEW OF CHARGES—NO ERROR.

Other charges complained of were not open to the criticisms made against them.

Error from Superior Court, Bartow County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by H. B. Rogers against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Reversed.

Neel & Neel and D. W. Blair, for plaintiff in error. Colquitt & Conyers, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. [1] 1. H. B. Rogers sued the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company for damages alleged to have been sustained because of the wrongful death of the plaintiff's minor child. The defendant demurred to the sufficiency of the petition, which is described in the first headnote. The court overruled the demurrer, and his ruling is in accord with the decisions in Crawford v. Southern Railroad Co., 106 Ga. 870, 33 S. E. 826, and Shaw v. Georgia Railroad, 127 Ga. 8, 55 S. E. 960.

[2] 2. The court charged the jury that "if the child was at a place where those in charge of the railroad train had reason to suspect or believe that some one might be on the track, or dangerously near thereto, then the law imposes upon the railroad company a duty to keep a lookout and also a duty to run the train at such speed as it could by the exercise of ordinary care have prevented the injury; or, if by the exercise of ordinary care it could have prevented the injury, it would be liable." This excerpt is criticised as putting too great a burden on the company, in that it requires that it should have exercised such an ordinary care as would have prevented the injury. A railroad company is bound to exercise ordinary care in the operation of its trains, and the exercise of such care relieves it of liability for damages for injuries to persons other than passengers. The effect of the court's charge was that the company must exercise ordinary care to the extent of preventing the injury; whereas, if the company exercises ordinary care in the operation of its train at the particular time and place, it meets all the requirements of the law, and, if injury results notwithstanding ordinary care has been exercised, the company is not liable.

[3] 3. Exception is taken to the following instruction: "Then, gentlemen, in determining what weight you will give the evidence of the witnesses, any of them and all of them, you may look to them as they appear upon the stand, take their manner of testifying, their interest or want of interest in the case, their feeling, prejudice, bias, relationship to the parties and to the case, or anything of the kind that may appear from the evidence, and you may believe that witness or those witnesses who have the best means of knowing the facts about which they testify, and the least inducement to swear falsely; and with these rules determine what the truth of the evidence is, and let your verdict speak the truth as you may find it." In passing upon the credibility of a witness the jury may very properly take into consideration his feeling, interest, or want of interest, prejudice, bias, and opportunity of knowing the facts about which he testifies; yet there is no rule of law requiring the jury to believe that witness who has the best means of knowing the facts about which he testifies and the least inducement to swear falsely. As was remarked by Simmons, C. J., in Hudson v. Best, 104 Ga. 131, 30 S. E. 688: "Such a witness may for other reasons be entirely unworthy of belief; and certainly it would not then be the duty of the jury to believe him." The credibility of the witness is a question solely for the jury, and they should not be instructed that the testimony of a witness should be preferred because of his opportunity for knowing the facts and because he has the least inducement to falsify. In this case the plaintiff introduced an eyewitness to the casualty, upon whose testimony he largely depended for a recovery. He was accompanying the child which was killed, and according to the record apparently had no interest in the case. The company largely relied upon its employes. Under such circumstances, we think the charge was harmful. Southern Mutual Insurance Co. v. Hudson, 113 Ga. 434, 38 S. E. 964.

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 198*)—JUDGMENT FOR YEAR'S SUPPORT—VALIDITY.

A judgment setting apart a year's support is not void because the appraisers' return was not filed within 30 days of their appointment.

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 200*)—JUDGMENT FOR YEAR'S SUPPORT—VALIDITY.

As against creditors whose debts are not secured by the loan deed, a judgment of a year's support, assigning the widow and minor children of a decedent a specifically described tract of land, subject to a loan deed for a stated amount, is not void on the ground that the title to the land was not in the decedent.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by Mrs. G. W. Whatley against O. L. Watters and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Loundes Calhoun, for plaintiff in error.
Evins & Spence, for defendants in error.

EVANS, P. J. Mrs. Cynthia L. Watters, widow of John C. Watters, in behalf of herself and her minor children, applied to the court of ordinary of Fulton county to have a 12 months' support set apart out of the estate of her deceased husband, reciting in her application that there was no administration on his estate. On January 1, 1907, the ordinary passed an order appointing five appraisers to assign a year's support to the applicant and her minor children, and directing them to make a return of their actings and doings within 30 days. The appraisers made their return on November 25, 1907, wherein they set apart to the applicant and her minor children a specifically described tract of land containing 50 acres, more or less, and reciting that "on said property there is now a loan deed for about $650." This return was filed in the ordinary's office on December 2, 1907. On December 11, 1907, the ordinary passed an order directing that citation be issued and published according to law. At the January term, 1908, the ordinary passed an order reciting that the return of the appraisers had been duly filed in his office, and that citation had been duly issued and published as required by law, and that, no objection being made thereto, the return of the appraisers was approved and ordered to be recorded. On May 24, 1910, Mrs. G. W. Whatley filed her petition to the ordinary, representing that she was a creditor of John C. Watters, and praying that the judgment allowing his widow and minor children a 12 months' support out of his estate be declared void, for the reasons that the appraisers did not file their return within 30 days, as directed by the statute, and, further, that a 12 months' support cannot be set apart in land incumbered by a loan deed; these alleged defects being apparent on the face of the record. On demurrer the ordinary struck the petition to set aside the judgment granting a 12 months' support, as being insufficient in law. Whereupon Mrs. Whatley sued out a writ of certiorari to the superior court, and on the hearing of the case the certiorari was overruled and the judgment of the ordinary affirmed. To this judgment Mrs. Whatley excepts.

[1] 1. No fraud or collusion is alleged, and the plaintiff in error grounds her case solely upon the contention that the judgment allowing the 12 months' support is void in law, for the reasons assigned in her petition to vacate it. A judgment approving the return of the appraisers setting aside a 12 months' support, where all the proceedings are regular, is binding upon the creditors of the decedent. Reynolds v. Norvell, 129 Ga. 512, 59 S. E. 299. The statute prescribes that the appraisers appointed to assign a year's support to the widow and minor children out of the decedent's estate shall make a return to the ordinary within 30 days of their appointment. Civ. Code, 1910, § 4043. This provision as to the time within which the appraisers may make their return is directory; and, if they should fail to make their return within the statutory period, the ordinary could compel them to act, or appoint new appraisers. The widow's right to a year's support is not affected by the appraisers' dereliction of duty for which she is not responsible. After the ordinary receives a belated return and cites interested parties by publication as prescribed by the statute to show cause why the return should not be approved and made the judgment of the court, and such return is duly approved, it is too late for a creditor to object that the return was not made within 30 days of the appointment of the appraisers. Goss v. Greenaway, 70 Ga. 130. In the case just cited the widow filed her application for a year's support four years after the death of her husband, during which time she lived upon the land and made use of her deceased husband's personality; and the court held that, though these facts might furnish ground to defeat her application before the ordinary, yet, where the year's support had been formally set aside, it was too late to attack it.

[2] 2. The statute declares that the appraisers shall assign a year's support "either in property or money" from the estate of the decedent. Civ. Code 1910, § 4041. A year's support may be set apart in a bond for title. Winn v. Lunsford, 130 Ga. 436, 61 S. E. 9. The appraisers set apart the land, subject to a loan deed. It does not appear who was the creditor secured by the loan deed. The plaintiff in error was not that creditor. The year's support judgment took effect upon all the interest which the decedent had in the property after the satisfaction of the loan deed. That interest was an equitable estate; but an equitable estate is property, and a widow is not to be denied a year's support solely because her late husband's estate was equitable in character. Let it be borne in mind, however, that we are not holding that a widow's right to a year's support in land is superior to the claim of her husband's creditor who holds the title to the land. There is no antagonism between the year's support and the creditor who is secured by the loan deed. If the decedent's equity is property subject to be applied to the payment of the unsecured debts of the decedent, certainly it is property which may be assigned to his widow and minor children as a year's support. Judgment affirmed.

1. INJUNCTION (§ 59*)—SUBJECTS OF RELIEF—BREACH OF CONTRACT.

Where a manufacturer of patterns and a merchant contract that the former will furnish certain patterns during a series of years, according to stated deliveries, and that the latter will constantly keep on hand and sell such patterns, and none other, and will make monthly payments of accrued indebtedness, and stipulate that "failure or neglect by either party to perform any provision of this order will, at the option of the other, release the other party from all obligations hereunder," and where the manufacturer refuses to furnish patterns unless the merchant pays up past-due indebtedness, the manufacturer is not entitled to enjoin the merchant from selling the patterns of another manufacturer within the period specified in their contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 114-116; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

2. INJUNCTION (§ 60*)—SUBJECTS OF RELIEF—BREACH OF CONTRACT.

"Generally an injunction will not issue to restrain the breach of a contract for personal services, unless they are of a peculiar merit or character, and cannot be performed by others." Civil Code 1910, § 5496. The evidence did not show that the defendants' services, as stipulated in the contract, were of such peculiar merit or character as to take the case out of the general rule enunciated in the Code section.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 117-119; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

Error from Superior Court, Wilcox County; U. V. Whipple, Judge.

Action by the Butterick Publishing Company against Paxson Bros. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

M. B. Cannon, for plaintiff in error. Hal Lawson, for defendants in error.

EVANS, P. J. The Butterick Publishing Company and Paxson Bros. entered into a written contract whereby the former contracted to sell the latter a certain quantity of patterns, and the latter engaged to constantly keep on hand and sell the former's patterns, to order at least a stated amount of patterns monthly, and to pay accrued indebtedness on the 15th of each month. The contract was for three years, and longer, if not terminated by three months' written notice of either party. The contract contained this stipulation: "Failure or neglect by either party to perform any provision of this order will, at the option of the other, release the other party from all obligations hereunder." The Butterick Company continued to ship goods under the contract until Paxson Bros. became indebted to them in a certain amount and had several times defaulted in their payments. Paxson Bros. ordered certain patterns, which the Butterick Company refused to ship unless Paxson Bros. settled their past-due indebtedness. Paxson Bros. then notified the Butterick Company that they deemed their refusal to furnish patterns a violation of the contract, and that they elected to treat the contract at an end, and purchased and undertook to sell patterns obtained from another manufacturer. Whereupon the Butterick Company filed its petition against Paxson Bros. to enjoin them from selling any patterns except those of the plaintiff until the termination of the contract. The court granted an interlocutory injunction.

[1] 1. The failure of Paxson Bros. to pay for the patterns agreeably to their contract entitled the Butterick Company to terminate the contract at its option. Failure to make payments for articles delivered under a contract during a series of years, to be delivered in installments and paid for monthly, entitles the vendor to rescind the contract. Savannah Ice Co. v. American Refrigerator, etc., Co., 110 Ga. 142, 35 S. E. 280. It would be unjust to compel the vendor to continue to make deliveries to one who continues to default in his payments. The parties to the contract did not wish any doubt to cling around this principle of law as applied to their contract, and incorporated its essence in the stipulation that "failure or neglect by either party to perform any provision of this order will, at the option of the other, release the other party from all obligations hereunder." When Paxson Bros. ordered additional patterns, the Butterick Company was put to an election to rescind the contract because of the default of Paxson Bros. in making payments or to comply with their covenants. Whether or not we treat the refusal to furnish patterns unless past-due installments are paid as a rescission, certainly it is not in a position, after refusing to furnish patterns, to enjoin the defendants from selling patterns elsewhere obtained, on the ground that they contracted to sell exclusively the Butterick patterns. Smith v. Georgia Loan, etc., Co., 113 Ga. 975, 39 S. E. 410; Harden v. Lang, 110 Ga. 392, 36 S. E. 100.

[2] 2. Although not pressed in the argument, we think, also, that the principle announced in Civil Code 1910, § 5496, controls the disposition of this case. That section reads: "Generally an injunction will not issue to restrain the breach of a contract for personal services, unless they are of a peculiar merit or character, and cannot be performed by others." The grounds set forth in the petition for injunction were that the plaintiff conducted its business through exclusive agencies, and the success of a particular agency depends upon the character and business enterprise of the agent and the location of the agency's establishment, with reference to the number of persons or establishments capable of undertaking an agency of this kind in a given locality, and the damages for breach of contract cannot be estimated, because the plaintiff's injury is not confined to loss of sales, but includes loss of commercial prestige, loss of custom, and loss of those advantages which are the natural accretion of a substantial business, which would result from the agent abandoning his contract with the plaintiff and engaging to sell the patterns of a competitor; that the damage is irreparable, because it is unable to procure, in the vicinity of the defendants' premises, an equally competent agency for the sale of its products. Insolvency was neither alleged nor proved. Nor did it appear at the hearing that the plaintiff was not able to procure other merchants to sell its products, or that the defendants possessed any special facilities superior to other merchants in the town for the sale of their wares. We think the case as made by the evidence is controlled by the cited Code section, and by the case of Hammond v. Georgian Co., 133 Ga. 1, 65 S. E. 124.

1. REFERENCE (§ 100*)—REPORT—EXCEPTIONS AND HEARING THEREON.

On the hearing in the trial court of exceptions of fact to an auditor's report, no new evidence other than that introduced before the auditor will be considered, except in those cases where a new trial would be granted after verdict on account of newly discovered evidence. Civ. Code 1910, § 5145.

2. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

In an action for injury to a passenger from the sudden starting of a train while she was attempting to alight, where the court charged that, if plaintiff bought a ticket for a certain destination, the defendant was bound to stop the train a reasonable length of time to let her alight in safety, and that if they did that, and she failed to exercise ordinary care by which the injury could have been avoided, she cannot recover, the use of the conjunctive clause at the end of the instruction is not ground for new trial, as confusing the defenses open to defendant under Civ. Code 1895, §§ 2321, 3830, of exercise of reasonable care by defendant and contributory negligence by plaintiff, where other portions of the charge separately stated that if she did not use ordinary care she could not recover, and that if the carrier used the degree of diligence required it was not liable.

3. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTION—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

In an action for injuries to a passenger, an instruction that if plaintiff had had an operation performed for adenoids, and was already suffering from the same, and afterwards received the injury alleged, the jury should look to the evidence and see whether the sickness came from the operation or from the act of the railroad company, is not ground for a new trial, as an expression of opinion by the court that the act of the railroad company, if it caused the injury, was a negligent act, nor that the railroad company was necessarily the cause of the injury, if the operation was not the cause, where the court also instructed that if the sickness, pain, and suffering occurred on account of the operation, plaintiff would not be entitled to recover, but if it resulted from the alleged act of the railroad, and the railroad was at fault, negligent in not exercising the diligence required by law, she would be entitled to recover for whatever pain and suffering resulted from the act of the defendant company.

Error from Superior Court, Fayette County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

Action by A. L. Sams against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

C. E. Battle, Howell Hollis, and Blalock & Culpepper, for plaintiff in error. J. W. Wise, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. The defendant in error (hereinafter referred to as the plaintiff) sued the plaintiff in error (hereinafter referred to as the defendant) for damages because of the alleged negligence of the defendant in not stopping the train on which the plaintiff was a passenger a sufficient length of time after it reached her destination at Woolsey, Ga., to allow her to alight in safety, and in causing the train to suddenly start and violently jerk while she was on the steps of the car in an effort to disembark, thereby throwing her from the car and injuring her. A verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and to the order of the court refusing it a new trial the defendant excepted.

[2] One ground of the motion for a new trial is as follows: "Because the court erred, as movant insists, in charging the jury as follows: 'If Miss Sams boarded the train at the time stated, and her destination was Woolsey, if she bought a ticket and got on the train expecting to get off at Woolsey when the train arrived there, and they had taken up her ticket, they were bound to stop that train a reasonable length of time, so as to let her alight in safety. If they did that, and she failed herself to exercise ordinary care and diligence required of her, by which the injury she alleges could have been avoided, then she cannot recover'—the vice complained of being the conjunctive clause last added to the charge quoted; defendant contending that, if it had stopped the train a reasonable length of time for her to alight in safety, it had discharged its duty to her, and would not be liable, without further qualification, but the joining of the qualification added by the court confuses and confounds the defenses open to the defendant as embodied in Civ. Code 1895, §§ 2321, 3830, and imposes a greater burden upon the defendant than is authorized by the laws, deprived it, as it does, of the defense that its servants and agents had exercised all care and diligence." The charge excepted to was not error requiring a new trial, for any reason assigned in the exception thereto, in view of the entire charge.

The court charged the jury, in different portions of the charge, as follows: "Miss Sams was required to use ordinary care and diligence to protect her person from injury, while traveling as such passenger. If she did not use ordinary care and diligence to protect her person, she cannot recover. * * *

A carrier of passengers, and this railroad was the carrier of passengers when it undertook to carry plaintiff from Atlanta to Woolsey, Ga. She was a passenger, and they were bound to extraordinary diligence on the part of themselves to protect her life and person; but said carrier of passengers is not liable for injuries to the passenger if they use such diligence. * * *

No person shall recover damages from a railroad company for injury to himself or his property, where the same is done by his consent, or is caused by his own negligence. If the complainant and the agents of the company are both at fault, the former may recover, but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of default attributable to him. If the evidence shows that the plaintiff was less at fault than the defendant, and that by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence she could have prevented the damage she alleges she sustained, if she sustained any, then the plaintiff could not recover; but if the evidence shows that the plaintiff is less at fault than the defendant, and by the exercise of ordinary care could not have prevented or avoided injury, if any is shown, then in that kind of a case, if both are at fault, the plaintiff may recover, but the damage shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of default attributable to her. If the plaintiff could have avoided the injury to herself by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, she cannot recover. If the injuries complained of were not caused by the negligence of the defendant, and as alleged, she cannot recover. * * *

If the railroad took up her ticket and stopped there at that station, they had to exercise extraordinary care and diligence in protecting her to alight in safety; and if they failed to stop a sufficient length of time to give her a reasonable opportunity to alight, and before she had time in the exercise of a reasonable amount of ordinary diligence on her part, they started the train with such a sudden jerk, before she had time to leave the train, and if you believe in so doing they were not exercising extraordinary care and diligence, and she was injured as she alleges, and the same is shown by the evidence, she would be entitled to recover."

In view of the above quoted portions of the charge, we do not think the jury were, by the charge excepted to, misled into the belief that the plaintiff could recover if it appeared that the defendant was guilty of the negligence alleged, even though the plaintiff could have avoided the consequences of the same by the exercise of ordinary care, nor was the jury led into the belief that the plaintiff could recover, even though the defendant was not guilty of the negligence alleged. The court several times told the jury that the plaintiff could not recover if the injury was the result of her failure to exercise ordinary care and diligence, nor could she recover if she was not injured by reason of the alleged negligence of the defendant. In view of the entire charge, the charge excepted to was not error, requiring a new trial, for any reason assigned.

[3] The only other ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial is as follows: "Because the court erred, as movant insists, in charging the jury as follows: 'If this young lady had had an operation performed for adenoids, and if she was already sick, suffering from the same, and if she afterwards received the injury alleged at this place, and afterwards was laid up for some time, and suffered pain, and was sick, look to the evidence and see whether or not you can determine from the evidence, with a reasonable degree of certainty, whether that sickness came from that operation or from the act of the railroad company'—the error and vice complained of being that the charge is an expression of opinion by the court in the use of the last clause therein, 'or from the act of the railroad company,' tantamount to a statement by the court that the act of the railroad company, if the same caused the injury, was a negligent act. And the charge quoted also tended to impress the jury that, if the operation alleged was not the cause of the injuries alleged, then the railroad was necessarily the cause, and would be liable therefor, without regard to whether the railroad was negligent or not."

After giving the charge above quoted, in immediate connection therewith the court instructed the jury as follows: "If her sickness, pain, and suffering occurred on account of the operation performed, then plaintiff would not be entitled to recover in this case; but if the sickness, pain, and suffering resulted from the alleged act of the railroad, and you find the railroad was at fault, negligent in not exercising the diligence required by law, which I have already charged you, then she would be entitled to recover for whatever pain and suffering resulted from that act of the defendant company. That is a plain proposition, and it is for you to determine. Work it out with a view of determining what is right between these parties. You are supposed to be impartial between the parties. Let your verdict speak the truth. When you write it, it ought to be the truth as clearly as 12 honest men can write it. There is no claim for lost time. The claim for physician's bill has been abandoned. Therefore do not consider it at all in this case. In the event you find the railroad is liable, and that plaintiff is entitled to recover in this case, she can only recover for pain and suffering, and then only on account of pain and suffering resulting from the alleged injury in the manner and form described."

The evidence was undisputed that after the alleged negligent acts of the defendant the plaintiff underwent pain and suffering. She contended that this pain and suffering was caused by the alleged negligent acts of the defendant, causing her to be thrown from the train. The defendant contended that such pain and suffering, if the plaintiff underwent any after the time of the alleged negligent acts of the defendant, were the result only of an operation for adenoids, which the plaintiff had had performed in Atlanta on the day of the alleged injury. The charge excepted to was not harmful to the defendant, in view of the issues made by the pleadings and the evidence, especially in view of the other instructions given the jury, above quoted.

[1] The only other grounds of the motion for a new trial are the general grounds that the verdict is contrary to law and evidence and without evidence to support it. The evidence was sufficient to support the verdict. Judgment affirmed.

DREW et al. v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 16, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 124*)—JUSTIFICATION—DEFENSE OF PERSON OR PROPERTY.

It may be stated as a general rule that, if a trespass on person or property amounts to a felony, the killing of the trespasser will be justifiable, if necessary in order to prevent it; but a trespass which amounts to a misdemeanor only will not justify a killing.

(a) The doctrine of reasonably apparent necessity, as the equivalent of actual necessity, is to be taken in connection with this rule.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 184-188; Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 124*)—JUSTIFICATION—SELF-DEFENSE—AGGRESSION.

If an owner of property is authorized to use reasonable force for its protection, or recapture from a fleeing thief, and does no more, and such thief resists the owner with force, his conduct may be such as to place him in the position of the aggressor, and to authorize the owner to defend himself by the use of further reasonable force.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 184-188; Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

3. HOMICIDE (§ 124*)—JUSTIFICATION—MAKING ARREST.

If one steals the property of another and flees, and the owner, upon learning later of the theft, pursues and overtakes him at a distance from the place where the larceny was committed, and without any effort to retake possession by peaceable means, and without any necessity to take life, fires upon the thief and kills him, such a killing is not justifiable, though the theft be a felony.

(a) The right to arrest an escaping felon, under Penal Code 1910, § 921, involves a different principle from mere recaption of property.

(b) There was no error in charging in accordance, with the principles above ruled; the presiding judge having instructed the jury as to the law of voluntary manslaughter, as well as that of murder and justifiable homicide.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 184-188; Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

4. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 124*)—JOINER OF PARTIES—SEPARATE ASSAULTS.

While the charge of the court was not free from criticism, nothing in it requires a reversal of the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 332; Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

Error from Superior Court, Chattooga County; Jno. W. Maddox, Judge.

Sam Drew and Charley Smith were convicted of murder, and bring error. Affirmed.

P. D. Wright and W. M. Henry, for plaintiffs in error. Jno. W. Bale, Sol. Gen., and H. A. Hall, Atty. Gen., for the State.

LUMPKIN, J. Sam Drew and Charley Smith were convicted of the murder of Love Dean. There was but one eyewitness, who gave substantially the following account of the transaction: The defendants were at a dance at night. It was reported to Drew that his mule and buggy, which had been left standing near by, were gone. He and Smith and the witness gave chase. They overtook the mule and buggy about a mile and a quarter from the starting point. The buggy was then turned across the road and standing still. A man was sitting in it, who afterward appeared to be Dean. Drew called to the person in the buggy to stop. Drew asked, "Who in the hell is that?" The man in the buggy answered, "Me." When they ran up to the buggy, he reached back "this way" (the witness illustrating). He was not trying to strike Drew or Smith, or do anything to them to cause them to shoot him. Drew fired at him twice with a pistol. The decedent sprang from the buggy and ran. Drew fired a third shot. He said something to Smith, which sounded like "Hand me." Smith ran around the buggy and fired a pistol at the decedent, who fell. Each of the defendants said he thought he had fired the fatal shot. They did not go to the place where the decedent fell. When the witness asked Drew who the decedent was, Drew said that it was Dean. Drew and Smith told the witness not to say anything about the killing, but that, if it went to court, they should all tell the same tale, and say that they found the mule and buggy at a certain telegraph pole, which was about a quarter of a mile from the scene of the homicide, and that they went no further than that point. After the shooting they went back to the dance, and remained there for a while. Next day the dead body was found, with three wounds upon it, one in the back of the head, which was fatal, one in the side, and one in the arm. The sheriff testified that Drew said "he killed Love Dean on account of his stealing his mule and buggy, or that he and Charley Smith had killed him." This was said in the presence of Smith. The latter said that he did part of the shooting, and that he shot the decedent because he had two quarts of whisky in the buggy, which the decedent carried away, "and that he shot him because he got his whisky." The defendants introduced no evidence.

Drew's statement did not materially conflict with the evidence, except that, when he asked who it was in the buggy, and the person in it answered, "Me," the statement added: "At the same time throwing the lines over the dashboard, and reaching down in the buggy; and as he came up I shot. I thought he was going to do something to me. I knew he was a horse thief; had no other thought; did not know it was Love at all, if I had known that it was Love, I would not have shot." The statement of the defendant Smith included the following: "He threw the lines over the dashboard, and reached down, and jumped up. When he did that, Sam shot, and then he turned and jumped over the right wheel of the buggy, and then ran, and Sam shot twice more. I had two quarts of whisky in the buggy, and I thought he had the whisky, and I was going to stop him to see who it was. I thought he was a horse thief, going through the country stealing, and I shot. But I did not shoot to hit him, but to stop him. I did not know who it was, and I was mad, and bad excited. If I had known it was Love, I would not have done it for anything in the world." The defendants were convicted of murder, and recommended to life imprisonment. After the refusal of a new trial, they excepted.

[1] The charge of the court was not altogether exact in some particulars. But, under the evidence, and in the light of the entire charge, we do not think a reversal should be granted. There was ample evidence to authorize a charge on the subject of conspiracy or concert of action in the commission of the homicide. The killing of a human being in self-defense, or in defense of habitation, property, or person, against one who manifestly intends or endeavors, by violence or surprise, to commit a felony on either, is justifiable homicide. Penal Code 1910, § 70. It has been held that, if a trespass on the person or property of another amounts to a felony, the killing of the trespasser will be justifiable if necessary in order to prevent it, but that a trespass which amounts only to a misdemeanor will not justify a killing, and also that the right of an owner to protect his property against a robber does not end at the moment that the taking is accomplished, so as to prevent the owner, before the robber has gotten away with the article taken, and while the crime is still progressing in his presence, from protecting his property. Crawford v. State, 90 Ga. 701, 17 S. E. 628, 35 Am. St. Rep. 242.

[2] The subject of recaption of property by the owner of it from one wrongfully taking it, and the limitation of the use of force in connection therewith, has given rise to much learned discussion and the drawing of various distinctions, resulting in some differences. The facts of the case before us do not require a discussion of these distinctions and differences. It may be said that the taking of human life by a private person is a grave matter, and is generally to be justified only as an actual or reasonably apparent necessary defensive or preventive measure against a trespass amounting to a felony. Sometimes a lawful act by an owner of property may be met by force on the part of a thief or trespasser, so as to authorize counter force to be used. There may be exceptional facts, as indicated in the Crawford Case, supra. Instructive discussions of the subject will be found in 1 Bishop's Crim. Law (8th Ed.) §§ 849, 853; Wharton on Homicide, §§ 524, 525; Storey v. State, 71 Ala. 329; note to Barnes v. Martin, 82 Am. Dec. 670, 673 (15 Wis. 240); Weaver v. State, 19 Tex. App. 547, 53 Am. Rep. 389; Commonwealth v. Donahue, 148 Mass. 529, 20 N. E. 171, 2 L. R. A. 623, 12 Am. St. Rep. 591; Gyre v. Culver, 47 Barb. (N. Y.) 592; Waterman on Trespass, § 167; State v. Doolley, 121 Mo. 591, 26 S. W. 558; McClelland v. Kay, 14 B. Mon. (Ky.) 103, 106, et seq.; Gray v. Combs, 7 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 478, 23 Am. Dec. 431; State v. Moore, 31 Conn. 479, 83 Am. Dec. 159; 1 Horr & Thomp. Crim. Def. 891, 900, and note.

[3] In the case before us, the presiding judge charged that if the defendants were in pursuit of their property, or that of one of them, believing it to have been stolen, they would have had the right to use just such force as was necessary to recover the property and to arrest the party in possession of it, but could not shoot such party in revenge; that if, when the defendants approached the buggy, the party in possession of it made a demonstration as if seeking to get hold of a weapon, or in some other way was threatening an attack on the defendants, and his conduct was such as to excite their fears, as reasonable men, that their lives were in danger, or that some serious bodily harm was about to be committed on them, or either of them, and they acted under the influence of those fears, and not in a spirit of revenge, and shot and killed the decedent, they should be acquitted. He also charged as to the possibility of reducing the homicide from murder to manslaughter by reason of passion arising from the conduct of the decedent in taking the property or in his conduct when the defendants approached him. The defendants thus got the benefit of a charge as favorable as they could expect on the theories arising from the evidence and statements. Whether or not there was any inaccuracy in charging as to reducing the killing to manslaughter if Drew believed he had to shoot to recover his property, we do not think there should be a reversal. Drew's own statement was that he thought the man in the buggy was "going to do something to" him, and he shot. The evidence did not indicate any apparent necessity to shoot merely to recover the property (if that would suffice), or to arrest a felon, nor did Drew so claim.

[4] Nor, under the particular facts of this case, do we think that a new trial should be granted on account of the charge as to the possible forms of verdict, if the jury believed the defendants acted in concert, or if they did not. If two persons pursued a third as a thief having property of each of them, with the common purpose of overtaking him and recapturing the property, and upon overtaking him both fired at him with pistols as he ran, and he was killed, this presented no case of separate and independent assaults, and the rule in such cases, as laid down in Walker v. State, 136 Ga. 126, 70 S. E. 1016, did not apply. The charge may have been inaccurate in some respects, but was, in its entirety, as favorable to the defendants as the evidence and statements authorized, perhaps more than they could have required. No new trial should be granted.

Judgment affirmed.

SOUTHERN PINE CO. v. DICKEY.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 17, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. REFERENCE (§ 101*)—REPORT—EXCEPTIONS.

"The auditor shall make an accurate report of all motions made before him, and of his rulings thereon, and reduce to writing a brief of the oral and documentary evidence submitted by the parties. But, at the request of either party, any original document introduced in evidence shall be properly identified and attached to the report in lieu of a brief thereof." Civil Code 1895, § 4585 (Civil Code 1910, § 5131). "After hearing the evidence and argument, the auditor shall file the evidence and a report, in which he shall clearly and separately state all rulings made by him, classify and state his findings, and report his conclusions upon the law and facts." Civil Code 1895, § 4587 (Civil Code 1910, § 5133). "For indefiniteness, omissions, errors of calculation, failure to report evidence, errors of law, or other proper cause, the judge may recommit the report for such further action as may be proper," etc. Civil Code, 1895, § 4593 (Civil Code 1910, § 5139). It follows that the report of an auditor, which failed to "clearly and separately state all rulings made by him, classify and state his findings," or in which his findings commingled matters of fact, of law, of argument, and conclusions of law, was not in compliance with the provisions of the statute quoted, and should, upon motion of the party dissatisfied therewith, have been recommitted for the purpose of requiring the auditor to clearly and separately state all his rulings, and to classify them into findings of fact and findings of law, and after so doing to report his conclusions of the law and the facts to the court.

(a) There are good reasons for the requirement of the statute that all rulings made by the auditor should be clearly and separately stated, and that his findings of fact and of law should be separately classified. If the findings of an auditor should commingle matters of fact, of law, of argument, and conclusions of law, the party desiring to except to such findings, in so far as they related to a fact or facts, would, in a case at law, be placed at a disadvantage when the issue made by his exceptions to such findings was submitted to the jury, because the whole finding, in which law, fact, argument, and conclusions of law were commingled, would have to be read to the jury, and in this way they might be unduly influenced by the matters of argument and law to the prejudice of the excepting party. Moreover, a party desiring to file exceptions to the report of an auditor is required to separately classify them as "exceptions of law," and "exceptions of fact," and all such "exceptions shall clearly and distinctly specify the errors complained of." Civil Code 1895, § 4589 (Civil Code 1910, § 5135). The requirement of the statute in respect to a clear and separate ruling made by an auditor, and the classification of them into findings of law and findings of fact, necessarily tends to greatly aid parties desiring to except to his findings, and to classify his exceptions as exceptions of law and of fact, and to relieve parties in making issues by exceptions, and the court in the disposition of them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reference, Cent. Dig. §§ 169-180; Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

2. REFERENCE (§ 88*)—REPORT—FINDINGS OF LAW.

Of course, the rulings of the auditor upon the admission or rejection of evidence are rulings of law, and should be clearly and separately stated and classified as findings of law, and not merely stated in a brief of the evidence made and filed by him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reference, Cent. Dig. § 134; Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

3. REFERENCE (§ 101*)—REPORT—EXCEPTIONS.

The report of the auditor in this case failed to comply with the provisions of Civil Code 1895, § 4587 (Civil Code 1910, § 5133), above quoted, and on this account the court erred in refusing to recommit the report upon the motion of the plaintiff in error, based upon such failure.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reference, Cent. Dig. §§ 169-180; Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

4. REFERENCE (§ 101*)—REPORT—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

It appears from the brief of the evidence filed by the auditor that he failed to report therein all of the evidence submitted on the hearing before him, a report of various documents as having been put in evidence, and which he had filed with the clerk of the court, and thereby made them a part of the evidence reported by him. This was not a compliance with the provisions of Civil Code 1895, § 4585 (Civil Code 1910, § 5131). This action upon the part of the auditor was also made a ground of the motion to recommit the report. The court should have either recommitted the report on this ground, or required the auditor to make an additional report of evidence submitted to him, embracing the documents or the material portions of the same, which he had filed with the clerk, and so reported, instead of embracing them in the brief of evidence which he filed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reference, Cent. Dig. §§ 169-180; Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

5. ASSIGNMENTS NOT CONSIDERED.

In view of the foregoing, we do not deem it proper to pass upon any of the other assignments of error.

After the report has been recommitted, and another report made in accordance with the rulings we have announced, either party will be at liberty to make such exceptions thereto as are proper.

1. CONTRACTS (§ 212*)—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 92*)—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—PERFORMANCE BY PLAINTIFF.

A contract, the legal import of which is that it shall be performed "presently," means, not that it may be performed "within a reasonable time," but that it must be performed "immediately; now; at once."

(a) Applying this rule to the facts of the present case, the purchaser of the land in question was not entitled to specific performance of the contract.

2. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 148*)—PLEADING—DEMURRER.

In a suit for specific performance, an amendment to the petition, alleging an agreement extending time for the payment of the balance of the price by the plaintiff, was properly allowed over the objection that it sought by parol to add to or vary the terms of the written contract, which was required by the statute of frauds to be in writing, where the amendment did not affirmatively show that the transaction set forth was in parol.

Error from Superior Court, Morgan County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action by J. T. Studdard against O. M. Hawkins. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

George & Anderson and F. C. Foster, Sr., for plaintiff in error. S. H. Sibley and O. L. Williford, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. This is the second appearance of this case before the Supreme Court. See 132 Ga. 265, 63 S. E. 852, 131 Am. St. Rep. 180, where a statement of the facts is given. Hawkins contracted to sell to Studdard a described parcel of land, and executed the following receipt: "Rutledge, Ga., Apr. 15, 1905. Received of John F. Studdard twenty-five dollars, closing purchase of the Hanleiter place, containing 187.6 acres one tract, and one 4 acres more or less, at $15.00 per acre." When the case was formerly here, it was ruled that this receipt contained the entire contract, and that the legal import of the contract was that the balance of the purchase money was to be paid presently, and that a mere parol agreement of the parties to the writing, made subsequently to its execution and delivery, fixing a subsequent specified time for the balance of the purchase money to be paid, was not admissible to illustrate the time within which the balance was to be paid.

[2] Upon the second trial an amendment to the fifth paragraph of the petition was allowed, over the objection of the defendant that it sought by parol to add to or vary the terms of the written contract, which was required by the statute of frauds to be in writing, which amendment was as follows: "On the afternoon said sale was made and presently thereafter, plaintiff, being ready and willing to make full payment for said land, so informed defendant, who requested plaintiff to delay payment until December 1st. Accordingly, on December 1, 1905, plaintiff tendered to defendant, in lawful money, all that was due him on said land as aforesaid, which tender was refused and declined. Plaintiff owed defendant no interest, because defendant, by plaintiff's consent, had occupied said premises for the year 1905, and the use of them was worth more than the interest on the purchase price." As it did not affirmatively appear from this amendment that the transaction therein set forth was in parol, the court did not err in allowing it. Crovatt v. Baker, 130 Ga. 507(3), 512, 61 S. E. 127. This is on the theory that the amendment sought to set out a written agreement between the parties, extending the time for the payment of the balance of the purchase money. The allegations of the amendment were not, however, sufficient to constitute a tender by Studdard of the balance of the purchase price for the land. Taking the facts set out therein to be true, there was no offer on the part of Studdard, although it was alleged that he was ready and willing to do so at the time indicated in the amendment, to pay the balance of the purchase money. As there was no offer on his part to pay, there was, of course, no refusal on the part of Hawkins to accept. What is stated in the amendment, in effect, amounts only to an agreement between the parties to postpone the payment of the balance of the purchase money until December 1st following. This being true, it was merely an attempt by a parol agreement to change the terms of the contract as to the payment of the balance of the purchase money, and was futile, as this court formerly ruled in this case. See, also, Willis v. Fields, 132 Ga. 242, 63 S. E. 828. Of course, if the agreement had been in writing, it might have been effective. The evidence shows that the transaction set out in the amendment was wholly in parol.

[1] As previously ruled in this case, as already herein indicated, the balance of the purchase money under the contract was to be paid "presently." The word "presently" has been defined in the law dictionaries as follows: "Immediately; now; at once." Black; Cyclopedic; English; Anderson; Ralpalje & Lawrence. Webster's International Dictionary defines the meaning of "present" to be: "At once; without delay; forthwith; also, less definitely; soon; shortly; before long; after a little while; by and by." The evidence fails to disclose any act or conduct on the part of the defendant, Hawkins, which tended to prevent or deter the plaintiff, Studdard, from tendering the balance of the purchase money "presently," as required by the contract. According to the evidence, the only tender made by Studdard was on December 1, 1905, 7½ months after the making of the contract under which the balance of the purchase money was to be paid "presently." Certainly the length of time cannot be said, in the circumstances and under the undisputed evidence in the case, to have been made "presently" and in compliance with the contract.

As the balance of the purchase money was to be paid "presently," the doctrine of reasonable time for making such payment was not applicable to the case. The same rule which prevails in a cash transaction applies in this respect to this case. "Time is not generally of the essence of a contract, but by express stipulation or reasonable construction it may become so." Civil Code 1895, § 3675(8); Civil Code 1910, § 4268(8). There was no contemplation of credit by the parties to the contract in the present case, the payment of the balance was a condition precedent to the sale, and the time of payment, being "presently," was necessarily of the essence of the contract; and, as Studdard failed to comply with this condition precedent in accordance with the contract, Hawkins was not bound to carry out his part of the contract, and Studdard was not entitled to specific performance. In 1 Addison on Contracts (Morgan's Ed.) § 320, it is said: "A contract to do a particular thing 'directly,' or 'as soon as possible,' or 'forthwith,' does not mean that it is to be done instantly; but there must be no delay in performance, and such a contract requires a much more speedy fulfillment than a contract to do a thing within a reasonable time. When a party covenants to pay money 'immediately on demand,' the word 'immediately' must receive a reasonable construction, so as to allow the debtor time to procure the money, and, if the demand is not made by the creditor himself, to inquire into the authority of the person making it." See, also, in this connection, Sentenne v. Kelly, 59 Hun, 512, 13 N. Y. Supp. 529; Lewis v. Hojer (Com. Pl.) 16

N. Y. Supp. 534; Tobias v. Lissberger, 105 N. Y. 410, 12 N. E. 13, 59 Am. Rep. 509.

In none of the cases cited and relied on by counsel for the defendant in error, wherein the doctrine of reasonable time as to the payment of purchase money was applied, did it appear that such payment was, under the contract, to be made "presently," but in all of them credit was given, and it could be well inferred from the facts that the day fixed for performance was, in accordance with the intention of the parties, named merely in order to secure performance within a reasonable time; and therefore equity would not refuse to enforce the contract if the promise required to be so performed was performed within a reasonable time.

In what has been said, we have in effect passed on all the grounds of the motion for a new trial of a controlling nature. Under the facts of the case and the law applicable thereto, Studdard was not entitled to specific performance of the contract, and the court erred in overruling the motion made for a new trial by Hawkins.

PAYNE v. SUPREME RULING OF FRATERNAL MYSTIC CIRCLE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 19, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

INSURANCE (§ 198*)—MUTUAL BENEFIT INSURANCE—RECOVERY OF PREMIUMS PAID—PLEADING.

The petition as amended did not set forth a cause of action, and was properly dismissed on general demurrer.

Exceptions from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Action by George E. Payne against the Supreme Ruling of the Fraternal Mystic Circle. From a judgment dismissing the petition on general demurrer, plaintiff excepts. Judgment affirmed.

George E. Payne, a resident of Augusta, Richmond county, brought an action against the Supreme Ruling of the Fraternal Mystic Circle, an incorporated insurance fraternal association, with its principal office at Philadelphia, Pa., and an agency and place of business in the city of Augusta. The substance of so much of the petition as is here material is as follows: In 1906 the Modern Puritans, a similar association to the defendant, and of Norfolk, Va., issued to the plaintiff two certificates, dated, respectively, April 23d and July 31st, by which the life of plaintiff was insured for the benefit of his wife in stated amounts, and on each of which the plaintiff was to pay a given sum monthly as premiums. On December 31, 1906, the American Guild, of Richmond, Va., assumed all of the responsibilities covered by the certificates issued to the plaintiff by the Modern Puritans, issuing to the plaintiff two certificates in lieu of those of the last-named association. On May 27, 1907, the defendant assumed all of the liabilities to the plaintiff on the certificates issued to him by the American Guild, and issued to him two certificates, on which he was to pay the same monthly premiums as on the original certificates. In the plaintiff's applications to the Modern Puritans for certificates of insurance, which applications were accepted, it was stated that the plaintiff was a wholesale liquor dealer. He has ever since remained in this business.

On March 24, 1909, the plaintiff sent to the defendant from Augusta the following letter: "The Fraternal Mystic Circle, Philadelphia, Penn.—Sirs: I have just received from Mr. Fred W. Thomas notice to pay my monthly dues for March. I have heard in the meantime that a policy held by a person engaged in the sale of liquors, in your order, is void; and I want to know the facts in this particular. I made application for the policy in question with the Modern Puritans, then it was transferred to the Guild, and then to the Mystic Circle. Now, when I made this application I was engaged in the whisky business, and the agent that took my application did so in my place of business and with full knowledge of same; and I ask you to look on the original application and see what I said my occupation was. I am not going to stand for an additional 75 cents per thousand on my policy; neither will I lose what I have paid. I ask that you mail the original application to your representative, Mr. Fred W. Thomas, which will settle the question in dispute. Hoping to hear from you by return mail, I am respectfully, [Signed] Geo. E. Payne."

On March 27th following the plaintiff received from the defendant this reply: "Geo. E. Payne, Augusta, Ga.—Dear Sir and Brother: I am in receipt of your favor of the 24th inst., and in reply will say, by referring to your application for membership, we find that you stated that you were a wholesale liquor dealer. The constitution and laws of the Modern Puritans provide that no person shall be admitted to nor hold membership in the Modern Puritans who is engaged as 'principal, agent, or employe in the sale of spirituous or malt liquors as a beverage.' We do not know how or why the Modern Puritans accepted your application for membership, unless they placed an interpretation upon the laws of their order to mean a person engaged in the wholesale liquor business was not selling liquor as a beverage. Be that as it may, when you became a member of the American Guild by reason of that organization having reinsured the business of the Modern Puritans, you became subject to their constitution and laws, and their constitution and laws provide that a person who is engaged in the manufacture, sale, or delivery of intoxicating liquors, either as principal, agent, or servant, shall be classed as hazardous and pay a rate of 75 cents per $1,000 per month extra; and we took the business over subject to these restrictions. It appears from a letter written by Mr. Floyd Thomas, under date of March 10th, that you are in the soft-drink business, and, not handling liquors, would not be subject to this extra rate. We are willing to let the past go; but if in the future you engage in the liquor business you would become subject to the requirements of the constitution and laws, and the most favorable classification that could be given you would be the classification of the American Guild, which provides for an extra premium rate. Very truly and fraternally yours, [Signed] J. D. Myers, Supreme Recorder."

On April 9th thereafter the plaintiff sent the defendant the following letter: "The Fraternal Mystic Circle, Philadelphia, Pa.—Sirs: I have your letter of March 27th, and would have replied sooner, but have been out of the city. In reply I will say that if it be true, as you state in your letter, that the Puritans do not insure persons engaged in the sale of liquors, then I have no insurance; but they received my money and receipted for it from time to time, as the Guild did, and yourselves. Now, there is only one thing I can do, and that is ask for the money back that I have paid, with legal interest. I see very plain from your letter your stand in this matter; nothing more or less than to try to swindle me out of what I have paid. But I will spend as much more before I will submit to any such treatment. I will give you your choice of settling this with me or the courts. [Signed] Geo. E. Payne."

The plaintiff thereupon brought suit against the defendant for all the premiums he had paid to the several insurance associations, with interest thereon at 7 per cent. per annum, "for the average time since the payment of the same." The petition was dismissed on general demurrer, and the plaintiff excepted.

B. B. McCowan, for plaintiff. Wm. H. Barrett, for defendant.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). Under the record and the briefs of counsel for the respective parties, the case is made to depend on whether the letters which passed between the parties, set forth in the foregoing statement of facts, show that the defendant committed a breach of its contract of insurance contained in the certificates it issued to the plaintiff. A careful reading of the letters will show, in our opinion, that the contract of insurance as exhibited by the certificates was rescinded or repudiated by the plaintiff, and not by the defendant. While it may be inferred from the letter written by the plaintiff to the defendant, on March 24, 1909, that the plaintiff was then engaged in the sale of liquors, and had been in such business from the time the original certificates were issued to him by the Modern Puritans, it is clear from the responsive letter written by the defendant March 27th that the defendant did not understand that the plaintiff was then engaged in such business. In this letter the defendant informed the plaintiff that in a letter written by Thomas on March 10th, who appears to have been the defendant's agent, the plaintiff was then engaged "in the soft-drink business," and not in the handling of liquors, and would therefore not be subject to the payment of the extra rate imposed on members of the association selling liquor. In this letter the defendant stated, in effect, that, whatever may have been the rights of the plaintiff in the past, it was willing "to let the past go," but that if in the future the plaintiff should engage in the liquor business he would become subject to the payment of the extra premium rate for those engaged in such business.

The plaintiff was therefore put upon notice that the defendant understood from its agent, Thomas, who had notified the plaintiff to pay his March dues, that the plaintiff was not then engaged in the sale of liquor; and the plaintiff, instead of informing defendant that its understanding as to this matter was incorrect and that he was still engaged in the liquor business, interpreted the letter of the defendant to be a rescission of the contract of insurance certificates held by him, and demanded of the defendant repayment to him of all premiums he had paid, with interest thereon, and soon thereafter brought his suit for the same. The plaintiff misinterpreted, we think, the letter of the defendant as being a rescission or repudiation of the certificates. This letter stated that, as the plaintiff was not then engaged in the sale of liquor, he was not subject to the extra premium, but that, in the event he should in the future engage in such business, then he would be subject to the extra premium. It does not appear where Thomas, the defendant's agent, was located, nor where the plaintiff did business as a wholesale liquor dealer, and we cannot legally assume that he was engaged in such business in Augusta in 1909 in violation of the general prohibition law. From what has been said, it follows that the court properly dismissed the petition on general demurrer.

Judgment affirmed.

ATLANTIC POSTAL TELEGRAPH-CABLE

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 16, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 122*)—ORDINANCES—VALIDITY—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where an attack is made on the reasonableness of an ordinance because of certain extrinsic facts, the burden is on the party attacking the ordinance to prove such facts, and upon his failure to carry this burden the ordinance will not be declared invalid. In this case the plaintiff failed to carry the burden of proof.

Error from Superior Court, Chatham County; W. G. Charlton, Judge.

Action by the Atlantic Postal Telegraph-Cable Company against the Mayor and Aldermen of Savannah and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Anderson, Felder, Rountree & Wilson and Garrard & Meldrim, for plaintiff in error. Samuel P. Adams and R. J. Travis, for defendants in error.

EVANS, P. J. When this case was before us on a writ of error to the judgment dismissing the petition on demurrer, it was held that the allegations of the petition were sufficient to call upon the city to show that the tax was reasonable, either by contesting the truth of the plaintiff's allegations, or by showing other matters which might tend to explain or lessen the evidentiary value of the plaintiff's allegations, if proved on the trial. 133 Ga. 66, 65 S. E. 184. The case as made by the petition was that there were two telegraph companies operating in Savannah, the Western Union and the plaintiff; that the former was a pioneer in the field, and possessed certain advantages because of that fact, and the number of offices and the interstate and intrastate business of both companies were compared; that the plaintiff did an unprofitable business, although it was conducted as conservatively and judiciously as the Western Union's; and that its business was proportionately equal to that of the Western Union. The inference of fact sought to be established by these allegations was that the tax was unreasonable, when considered in connection with the total telegraph business done in Savannah, and the demand of such a tax tended to promote a monopoly, as it could only be paid by the Western Union because of its superior advantages, which were not obtainable by other telegraph companies.

On the trial the plaintiff submitted proof tending to show that it operated its Savannah office at a loss, but failed to submit evidence to establish the allegations of its pe-tion upon which we placed our decision in passing on the demurrer. The isolated fact that the business of the plaintiff was conducted at a loss does not make the tax excessive. An occupation tax only becomes unreasonable when applied to the municipality as a whole. Mayor, etc., of Savannah v. Cooper, 131 Ga. 876, 63 S. E. 138. The burden was on the plaintiff to show the unreasonableness of the tax, and it failed to submit evidence sufficient to overcome the presumption in favor of the reasonableness of the ordinance. Under such circumstances it is idle to inquire into the correctness of the criticisms on the charge, or the appositeness of the requests to charge which were denied. "Wrong directions, which do not put the traveler out of his way, furnish no reason for repeating the journey." Cherry v. Davis, 59 Ga. 454, 456.

1. BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS (§ 38*)
—SECURITIES—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS.

The provision of the act of 1896 (Acts 1896, p. 52), as changed by the act of 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 62), which declares that every building and loan association shall deposit with a legal depository of the state, or with a trust company, to be selected by the board of directors, 75 per cent. of the mortgages or other securities received by it in the usual course of its business, in trust for all its members and creditors, does not operate to charge any particular mortgages or securities, not deposited, with a trust as against persons taking them bona fide and for value. Nor are persons dealing with such an association bona fide and for value put on inquiry, by reason of such law, to ascertain whether the association has complied with it.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Judge.

Equitable petition by one Sanders and others against the American National Bank and others, in which E. J. Steed filed an intervention. From the decree, intervener brings error. Affirmed.

Robt. L. Berner and Claud Estes, for plaintiff in error. Lane & Park, W. J. Grace, T. E. Ryals, R. L. Anderson, and Guerry, Hall & Roberts, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. Sanders and others filed an equitable petition against the Equitable Banking & Loan Company and others, for the purpose of having the assets of the company placed in the hands of a receiver and reduced to cash, and to have the fund used for the payment of debts. Among the defendants were the Home Savings Bank, which held a considerable amount of the securities of the company as trustee for its bondholders, and the American National Bank, which held certain of the assets of the company to secure an indebtedness to it. E. J. Steed filed an intervention, in which he claimed that neither the Home Savings Bank nor the American National Bank acquired any title, interest, or lien in, to, or upon the assets of the Equitable Banking & Loan Company. It appeared that originally the company was incorporated, under the name of the Equitable Building & Loan Association, to do a building and loan business. Afterwards it changed its name to the Equitable Banking & Loan Company, and proceeded to discharge some of the functions of a bank. Steed deposited money with it as a savings bank, at interest. When the company failed, much the larger part of its indebtedness was on account of interest-bearing deposits. There were also about $1,200 of fixed-dividend stock, $1,700 of paid-up stock, and $5,940 of preferred stock. The regular building and loan installment stock had been reduced to $849.11. The case was, by consent, submitted to the presiding judge, to pass on the issues both of law and fact, without a jury. He held that the trustee of the bondholders and the American National Bank were entitled to priority as to the assets held by them as security, to the extent of the indebtedness so secured. Steed moved for a new trial, which was refused, and he excepted.

[1] 1. The corporation involved in this case was born as a building and loan association, and died in the effort to be a bank. Its charter gave it no authority to do a banking business, nor could the superior court confer such power upon it. When it changed its name from "Building & Loan Association" to "Banking & Loan Company," the use of the word "Banking" was a misnomer. The act of 1896 (Acts 1896, p. 52) provided, among other things, that every building and loan association should deposit with the Treasurer of the state, or with a legally incorporated and organized trust company, to be selected by the board of directors, "in trust for all its members and creditors, seventy-five per cent. of the amount of all mortgages or other securities received by it in the usual course of its business." The act of 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 62) differed from that of 1896 by omitting the provision as to the Treasurer, and inserting in lieu thereof, "one of the legal depositories of the state." This act required a deposit of 75 per cent. of the amount of such securities, but it did not itself select which securities should be deposited, or charge any particular securities with a trust, before their deposit, at least as to third parties acting bona fide, for value, and without notice. Persons dealing with such an association were not bound at their peril to see that it had made the deposit. In the absence of anything to show the contrary, it might be presumed that there had been such compliance. Morgan v. Interstate Building & Loan Association, 108 Ga. 185 (4), 187, 33 S. E. 964. The theory that any person who dealt with the association and took any of its securities was put on notice or inquiry by the act itself, and held the securities charged with a trust, and that this was true, even if they were transferred, for value and for an entirely different purpose, to a corporation with which they might have been deposited, is untenable. It is also not to be overlooked that the plaintiff in error did not deal with the debtor as a building and loan association, but as a bank of deposit, or savings bank, and his claim arose from a character of business which neither its charter nor the acts above cited contemplated.

[2] 2. The case was, by consent, submitted to the decision of the presiding judge without a jury. The grounds of the motion for a new trial are really only elaborations of the position that, under the law, the evidence did not authorize the judgment or decree, and specifications of certain reasons why it was contended that this was true. The judgment or decree, as to questions of fact, stands like the finding of a jury. Upon a review of the whole case, we cannot say that such judgment was erroneous. It was contended that the contract with the trustee for the bondholders was not authorized. But it was executed in the name of the company, by its president and its treasurer, apparently with a seal attached; and while the minutes of the company did not show direct authority for the contract made, there were various entries tending in that direction. In the minutes of the directors appeared the statement that a committee was appointed to prepare "the copy" for an issue of bonds. At a later meeting, "the issue of $25,000 of 7 per cent. gold bonds was approved, to be secured by mortgages and real estate held by the company." Again, there appeared an entry that "it was deemed an opportune time to issue some 7 per cent. gold bonds, authorized some time ago, and the president was authorized to advertise the same for sale." Incorporated in the minutes were monthly statements made by the president to the board of directors, which showed receipts from the bonds issued. Still later was an entry that, "on motion, the president was authorized to make other banking arrangements with such institutions as will offer the best accommodations," and that the president was authorized to make a loan of $5,000 specified, "and also such loans as might be needed." The original trustee for the bondholders failed, and a similar agreement was made with a second institution. This was known to all of the directors, and the bonds were issued under the trust contract, and certified by the trustee. That the contract and the transfers upon the security deeds placed in the hands of the trustee were not recorded did not render the transaction invalid as against the plaintiff in error. The grounds of the motion for a new trial did not expressly make the point that a transfer of a security deed does not carry with it a transfer of title to the land. But the notes secured by them were transferred to the trustee, and, under the trust contract, the trustee had at least an equitable lien, and a right superior to that of the plaintiff in error.

The transfer of certain securities to a bank for a loan was also attacked for want of authority on the part of the president of the association to contract the debt and give the security, and on the ground that the loan was made after the insolvency of the association, and that the bank had notice thereof. In the light of the facts above cited, and of the other evidence in the record, there was no error in holding that the bank had the right to realize from such securities the amount due to it. Upon the whole case, the presiding judge did not err in the decree which he entered.

Judgment affirmed.

1. NEW TRIAL (§ 124*)—PROCEEDINGS TO PRODUCE—GROUND OF MOTION.

A ground of a motion for a new trial should be complete in itself, or rendered so by an exhibit attached to the motion. Accordingly, it has been repeatedly ruled that a ground based upon the admission or rejection of evidence presents nothing for adjudication, when such evidence is not set forth therein, either literally or in substance, nor attached as an exhibit to the motion. Shaw v. Jones, 133 Ga. 446 (9), 66 S. E. 240.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 250-253; Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

2. INSTRUCTIONS—EXPRESSION OF OPINION.

The judge did not express an opinion as to what had been proved in any of the instructions to the jury of which complaint was made.

3. TRIAL (§ 244*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

An assignment of error upon the ground that the judge, after fully charging all of the contentions of the plaintiff, failed to charge one of the principal contentions of the defendant

"until after his charge in chief to the jury," was without merit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 244.*]

4. PAYMENT (§ 77*)—TRIAL (§ 193*)—INSTRUCTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF AS TO PAYMENT—EXPRESSION OF OPINION BY JUDGE.

On the trial of an action for land, the plaintiff relied in part for a recovery upon 20 years' adverse possession, and the defendant contended that the land had been purchased by the plaintiff from the defendant's predecessor in title under a parol agreement, and that, though the plaintiff went into possession, he had never paid the purchase price. The court instructed the jury as follows: "That the law presumes that after 20 years the purchase price was paid, if nothing to the contrary be shown to you. If there were any admissions made by the plaintiff in this case, admissions should be scanned with care by the jury. You ascertain if there were any admissions made that the price was not paid, and you decide under the ruling given you whether or not the price was paid." Such charge was not "erroneous for the reason that the same fails to explain to the jury under what conditions the law would presume that the purchase price had been paid after the expiration of 20 years," nor because the court therein intimated and expressed "an opinion as to the weight and consideration to be given by the jury as to admissions," nor because that portion of the charge to the effect that "you ascertain if there were any admissions made to you that the price was not paid" placed "a greater burden upon the plaintiff [the defendant?] than the law requires"; nor was the charge erroneous "for the further reason that, if the testimony disclosed that there was a contract of purchase by the plaintiff from the defendant, the burden would then rest upon the plaintiff to show that he had paid the purchase price, and no prescription could ripen in his favor until that was done." Hodges v. Stuart Lumber Co., 128 Ga. 733, 58 S. E. 354, and citations.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 713*)—RECORD—MATTERS PRESENTED FOR REVIEW.

It appears from the motion for a new trial and the approved brief of the evidence that certain deeds were put in evidence by the plaintiff, upon which he relied as color of title. In neither the motion for a new trial nor in the brief of evidence as approved by the judge does even the substance of such deeds appear. Following the brief of evidence are copies of certain deeds sent up in the record, which are in no way made a part of such brief. These documents cannot be considered by this court, as they constitute no part of the brief of evidence.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 926*)—REVIEW—PRESUMPTIONS IN APPELLATE COURT.

One of the contentions of the plaintiff below was that he had title by prescription under color and seven years' adverse possession. It appears from the motion for a new trial made by the defendant below that the plaintiff put in evidence certain deeds under which he claimed as color. It appears from evidence submitted in behalf of the plaintiff that he was in adverse possession for more than seven years after the execution and delivery to him of such deeds. As neither these deeds nor their substance, except as to the parties thereto and dates thereof, appear either in the motion for a new trial or the brief of evidence approved by the judge, this court will assume that such deeds covered the land in dispute.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 363*)—SALES UNDER ORDER OF COURT—AUTHORITY OF ADMINISTRATORS—PLACE OF SALE.

Where the court of ordinary grants an order to an administrator to sell the wild uncultivated lands of his intestate either at private or public sale, the administrator may sell as authorized. If the land to be sold is located in a county other than that of the administration, and the administrator elects to sell at public sale, the situs of the sale is the county having jurisdiction of the administration of the estate, in the absence of a provision in the order of sale fixing the place of sale in the county where the land to be sold is located.

Error from Superior Court, Early County; W. C. Worrell, Judge.

Action by Columbus Heard and others, executors, against N. L. Sheffield and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

J. E. Hall, for plaintiffs in error. D. F. Crosland, R. H. Sheffield, C. L. Glessner, and J. R. Pottle, for defendants in error.

EVANS, P. J. The writ of error is to the grant of a nonsuit in an action of ejectment. The plaintiff would have made out a prima facie case if his last muniment of title had been admitted in evidence. The rejected deed was from William M. Weaver, executor of William W. D. Weaver, to Columbus Heard. The subject-matter of the suit was a lot of wild land located in Early county, and title to it was shown to have been in William W. D. Weaver, of Greene county, at the time of his death. There was introduced in evidence an order from the court of ordinary of Greene county, passed at the November term, 1898, granting to William M. Weaver, executor of William W. D. Weaver, leave to sell the wild land of his intestate at public or private sale as he deemed for the best interest of the estate. The rejected deed was duly recorded, and recited that it was made pursuant to a sale under this order at public outcry before the courthouse of Greene county, and that the grantee was the highest and best bidder thereat. It is stated in the bill of exceptions that the defendants objected to the introduction of the deed in evidence "on the ground that the sale therein was void, the statute (Civil Code 1895, § 3448) directing that wild land be sold at private sale, and the deed was inadmissible for the reason that the executor named in said deed had no right under the law and under the order hereinabove set out to sell said land at public outcry in Greene county, Georgia, but that the land, being wild land, should have been sold in the county of its situs, to wit, Early county, inasmuch as the same was sold at public outcry." The objection was sustained. Thereupon the case was nonsuited on the evidence before the court.

We think the court erred in sustaining the objection urged against the reception of the deed in evidence. The Code declares that, before an administrator can sell the land of his intestate, he must procure an order from the court of ordinary having jurisdiction of the administration, granting him leave to sell. The sale must be at public auction, after due advertisement, in the county having jurisdiction of the administration, unless by special order a portion of the land is sold in another county where the land lies. Civ. Code 1910, § 4028. Where the land to be sold is wild land, the Code provides: "On application by the administrator and due notice advertised as herein-after provided in case of lands, the ordinary may grant an order authorizing the administrator to sell, at private sale, wild uncultivated lands lying in counties other than that of the administration: Provided, no objection is filed by any one interested in the estate, and the ordinary is satisfied that such sale is preferable." Civ. Code 1910, § 4024 (Civ. Code 1895, § 3448). These two provisions of the Code are in pari materia, and are to be construed together. The rule which they prescribe for the sale of land by an administrator is that land belonging to an intestate shall be sold at public sale in the county having jurisdiction of the administration, except in two instances. One exception is that, in case a portion of the land to be sold lies in a county other than where the administration of the estate is had, the ordinary may by special order authorize the sale to be had in the county of the situs of the property to be sold. The other exception relates to the sale of wild land located in a county other than that of the administration, in which case the ordinary may authorize the administrator to sell such land at private sale. If the land to be sold is located in the county of the administration, whether it be wild or improved land, the sale must be public, and must take place in the county having jurisdiction of the administration of the estate. If the land be wild uncultivated land, and located in a county other than that of the administration, then the ordinary may authorize it to be sold either at public or private sale; and, if at public sale, the situs of the sale is the county of the administration, unless the order specially designates the place of sale in the county where the land lies. The obvious purpose of the Code section authorizing a private sale of wild and scattered land is to allow the administrator, when interested parties do not object and the ordinary deems that a private sale will be more advantageous, to privately negotiate a sale and consummate it without further formality than to make a deed. It was not intended to make this an exclusive mode of sale of wild land, since, if the ordinary should decline to permit a private sale of the land, the sale must be public and in the manner prescribed generally for the sale of land. Hence we conclude that the deed was admissible in evidence as against the objection urged against its admission; and, if this deed had been received in evidence, the grant of a nonsuit would have been erroneous.

Judgment reversed.

VINTON v. POWELL et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 18, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INFANTS (§ 24*)—ADVERSE POSSESSION—INFANCY OF OWNER.

Time does not run against the equitable estate of minors, where the legal estate does not reside in one authorized to assert their rights. Civ. Code 1910, § 4173.

(a) Accordingly, where it was alleged in the petition that the father of the plaintiff's ward died seised and possessed of a given tract of land in the fall of 1899, that he was at the time of his death the absolute owner thereof, that no administration had ever been had upon his estate, that the wards were all of his children and were minors at that time, that a guardian was appointed for them November 4, 1901, and it appears that the action was brought by their guardian against their mother, claiming as an heir, and others holding by deed under her and in possession of the premises, the defendants did not have title to the land by prescription under color and seven years' adverse possession, although they were in actual possession of the same, claiming title thereto, from October, 1900, because, even if prescription would run against minors represented by a guardian (see Wood v. Haines, 72 Ga. 189), seven years had not elapsed from the appointment of the guardian on November 4, 1901, to the bringing of the suit by him for his wards, on April 20, 1906.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Infants, Cent. Dig. § 25; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

2. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION (§ 90*) — RIGHTS OF HEIRS—ACTION TO DETERMINE RIGHT.

The petition as amended was for the establishment of title to undivided interests in the plaintiff's wards, and for the recovery of their proportion, for the partition of the premises, for the cancellation of deeds as clouds upon their title, for the reformation of another deed, and to recover for rents, profits, and waste. It set forth a cause of action sufficient to authorize the relief prayed for, except the cancellation of deeds and recovery for the whole of the mesne profits and waste. The allegations show that the defendants claiming under the widow had title to her interest, which made them tenants in common with the plaintiff's wards; and accordingly there was no ground for the cancellation of the deeds under which the defendants held. As to the mesne profits and waste, the plaintiff's wards would be entitled to only their undivided interests.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

3. PLEADING (§ 259*)—AMENDMENT—AMENDMENT OF ANSWER.

The amendment to the answer of the defendants, that they "deny that they hold under any common source of title with the plaintiffs, but claim a complete legal title to the premises," was properly allowed over the objection "that such amendment was contrary to law."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Dec. Dig. § 259.*]

4. DEPOSITIONS (§ 83*)—TRANSMISSION TO COURT—INDORSEMENT BY POSTMASTER.

"Whenever any package containing interrogatories or depositions shall be received by mail, the postmaster of the office to which they are directed shall immediately, upon their receipt, indorse upon the package the fact of its reception by due course of mail, and at once deliver the package to the clerk, or presiding judge, or justice of the court to whom it is directed." Civ. Code 1910, § 5890.

(a) Where a package purporting to contain interrogatories was delivered, by the postmaster of the office to which it was directed, to the clerk of the superior court without an indorsement by such postmaster upon the package that it had been received by due course of mail, and a written motion was made to suppress the interrogatories for the absence of such receipt upon the package, and thereafter counsel for the party in whose behalf the interrogatories had been sued out took the package from the clerk's office, without the knowledge of the judge, and without any order authorizing counsel so to do, and carried the package to the post-office, and there had the postmaster to enter thereon the required receipt, the court did not err in suppressing and excluding such interrogatories, although counsel taking the same from the clerk's office and having the postmaster to enter his receipt upon the same may have acted in good faith. Civil Code 1910, § 3333. It follows that the owner of property on the day when the state authorities annually fix the time for the valuation of property for state and county taxes is liable for the municipal tax for that year, and is therefore the proper person against whom a tax execution should be issued.

Error from Superior Court, Stephens County; J. J. Kimsey, Judge.

Affidavit of illegality on levy of tax execution between Mrs. G. B. Perteet and A. L. Fricks. Judgment by a justice in favor of Mrs. Perteet was reversed by the superior court on certiorari, and she brings error. Reversed.

R. C. Ramey, for plaintiff in error. Fermor Barrett, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. On April 9, 1909, A. L. Fricks conveyed to Mrs. G. B. Perteet a house and lot in the city of Toccoa. In June, 1909, the city assessors assessed the realty in the city of Toccoa for taxation, and the tax was levied by ordinance in September, 1909. The property conveyed by Fricks to Mrs. Perteet was assessed for taxation as the property of A. L. Fricks, and, Fricks refusing to pay the tax, Mrs. Perteet paid the tax fi. fa. and had the same duly transferred to her, and she then had the tax execution levied on property of Fricks, whereupon he filed an affidavit of illegality. The justice of the peace decided the question in favor of Mrs. Perteet, and Fricks, by certiorari, took the case to the superior court, where the certiorari was sustained, and only a question of law being involved, a final judgment was entered, sustaining the affidavit of illegality filed by Fricks, whereupon Mrs. Perteet sued out a writ of error to this court.

It will be seen that the only question to be decided is, When did the lien for municipal taxes for 1909 attach to this real estate? If it attached before the property was bought, then Fricks should pay the taxes. If the lien for taxes attached subsequently to the conveyance of the property to Mrs. Perteet, she ought to pay the taxes, and the court properly entered a final judgment sustaining the illegality. In the year 1874 the city of Toccoa was organized under a charter granted by the superior court of Habersham county, which embraced a provision of the act of 1872 (Acts 1872, p. 22) embodied in Code 1873, § 791 (Political Code 1895, § 704), as to towns so incorporated, that the lien for municipal taxes attaches on realty "from the time the same are assessed or imposed." In 1897 the charter granted by the Legislature took the place of the old charter granted by the superior court, and made nugatory any provisions of the former charter, including the Code section referred to. Walker v. McNeely, 121 Ga. 114, 48 S. E. 718. Therefore the contention of counsel for defendant in error that the question made is controlled by that Code section is unsound.

It is insisted by learned counsel for plaintiff in error that, as it is not provided in the act of incorporation, or in any city ordinance passed in pursuance thereof, when the lien for municipal taxes shall attach, the question is governed by the general law of the state; and it is agreed that for the year 1909 March 31st was the day fixed by the state authorities as the day for the making of returns of property for the purpose of state and county taxation for that year. We are inclined to think that, without reference to whether any provision on the subject was made in the act of incorporation or by ordinance or not, the general law on that subject does control. It is desirable that there should be uniformity on this question, and that the liens for state, county and municipal taxes throughout the entire state should attach on the same day, and this uniformity seems to be the statutory purpose. Section 3333 of the Civil Code of 1910 fixes the rank of liens for taxes as follows: "Liens for taxes due the state or any county thereof, or municipal corporation therein, shall cover the property of taxpayers liable to tax, from the time fixed by law for valuation of the same in each year until such taxes are paid," etc. This law is general in its terms, and in our opinion applies to all municipalities, as well as to the state and counties, and fixes the date when the liens for taxes shall attach as the same for state, county, and municipal taxes. This seems to be the view entertained by the authorities of the city of Toccoa on the subject; it being agreed that the uniform custom of the city authorities has been to assess realty taxes on the date set by the state authorities for making the return of property for taxes for state and county purposes. But such we think to be the law on the subject, regardless of any custom.

It being agreed that March 31, 1909, was the day fixed by the state authorities as the day for the making of returns of property for the purpose of state and county taxation for that year, it follows that the lien for the taxes for that year attached on all realty on that date, whether the taxes were state, county, or municipal taxes, and the owners of realty on that date were the proper persons to pay the taxes and against whom tax executions were properly issued; and it being admitted that on that date the property conveyed by Fricks to Mrs. Pertee on April 9th was owned by the former, the tax execution was properly issued against him. The lien for taxes attached to his property, and his subsequent conveyance did not divest this lien, and we conclude that the court erred in entering up a final judgment in favor of Fricks, and that, on the contrary, the final judgment should have been in favor of Mrs. Pertee.

Judgment reversed.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; A. E. Calhoun, Judge.

Action by T. C. S. Johnson against John Pappa. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & Heyman, for plaintiff in error. Westmoreland Bros., for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Miss Johnson sued Pappa, alleging that when she was a minor she paid over to him the sum of $600 upon the purchase price of a parcel of land, and that on or before her arrival at majority she repudiated the transaction. The suit was for the recovery of the sum so paid. At the trial it developed that Miss Johnson had not paid the money personally. It was paid over by an attorney of her mother. The plaintiff set up that while her mother had paid over the money, or had caused it to be paid over, it was money of hers (the plaintiff's); that her father had died a few years before, leaving some property and some money; that the mother had taken a portion of the money and invested it in a stock of goods and in certain furniture; that the goods and furniture had been destroyed by fire, and that this money had been collected on the insurance policy, and that it had been agreed between the mother and the children, some of whom, including the plaintiff, were still minors, that the plaintiff might have $600 of this money as her part of her father's estate; and that the mother, in causing the attorney to pay over the money to the defendant, was paying it over for and on behalf of the plaintiff. The defendant set up that, if the money belonged to the plaintiff, he did not know it; that he and his agent, acting for him, took it as being the mother's money, and supposed it to be hers; that the insurance policy was in the mother's name, and the attorney who paid it over held it for her.

The court instructed the jury that, before the plaintiff could recover, she would have to show two things: First, that the plaintiff paid the defendant the money, or caused some one else to pay it for her; and that the defendant took it, knowing that it was her money. This issue was fairly and squarely submitted to the jury, and they found in favor of the defendant. There is no evidence that the plaintiff herself paid over the money. We doubt very much that she showed any title to the money at all. If the plaintiff had herself made the payment to the defendant, he could not have set up that it was not her money. At most, the plaintiff had only an equitable interest in the money. There had been merely an agreement (probably an invalid agreement) that her mother might pay this money over to her as her part of her father's estate, but it had never been paid over. But, conceding that the mother held it as trustee for her, it was only an implied and not an express trust, and the defendant, having taken the money from the mother without notice of the plaintiff's title, is to be protected. Even if the evidence did not demand the verdict, we have no hesitancy in saying that the finding of the jury was fully authorized, and that, after carefully examining all the errors assigned in the record as to the rulings of the court, we find no reason for reversing the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

1. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*) — SALES OF STANDING TIMBER — CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT — ACTION — BURDEN OF PROOF.

The plaintiff's action was based upon a promissory note. The defendant pleaded that the note was given for the purchase price of certain standing timber, and that, after only a part of the timber had been cut, the plaintiff sold the remaining timber to a third person for more than enough to pay the balance then due upon the note. On the trial it appeared that the plaintiff had sold the timber to the defendant, subject to the limitation that it was to be cut within two years. The cutting began, but was discontinued. The plaintiff in parol agreed that he would not insist upon the two-year limitation, and that the defendant might have a longer time in which to cut it; but no definite period was named. After the lapse of seven years (i. e., five years from the time the original lease expired), the defendant having made no further effort to cut the timber, the plaintiff sold it, along with the timber on certain other lands, for a gross sum. Held:

(a) Even if the parol agreement made during the time set in the original contract was legally enforceable, it had the effect of extending the defendant's right to cut the timber only for a reasonable time.

(b) In determining what would be a reasonable time to allow as to this extension, the duration of the original lease must be considered; and, as the original lease ran for only two years, it would be unreasonable to construe the parol agreement as extending the lease for five years more.

(c) The defendant's title to the timber had reverted to the plaintiff before the latter resold it.

(d) Even if this were not true, the burden was upon the defendant of furnishing to the jury the data upon which a just abatement of the purchase price could reasonably be estimated, and the proof is not sufficiently specific in this respect.

(e) The court did not err in directing a verdict for the plaintiff.

2. PLEADING (§ 129*) — ANSWER — ADMISSIONS.

One paragraph of the plaintiff's petition alleged the giving of the statutory notice for the purpose of collecting the attorney's fees stipulated for in the note, and a copy of the notice was set out. The defendant answered equivocally, alleging that for lack of sufficient information, based upon lack of recollection, he could neither admit nor deny this paragraph of the petition. Held, that the fact whether the notice was or was not personally served upon the defendant was a matter with which he was charged with knowledge, and that, as he failed to deny it, the court properly construed his answer as admitting it.

MILNER v. TYLER. (No. 2,994.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Sept. 11, 1911.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 65*) — CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT — SALE BY TRACT OR ACRE.

Where a bond for title, after locating a tract of land as being in a given county and district, describes it as follows: "Seventy-five acres of land, more or less, in one body, bounded [by certain definitely described boundaries]" — it was a sale by the tract, and not by the acre.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 93-96; Dec. Dig. § 65.*]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 80*) — REMEDIES OF VENDOR — ACTION FOR PRICE — BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where the vendee in possession under a bond for title containing a description such as that set forth in the preceding headnote seeks to defend against an action brought to recover a portion of the purchase price, on the ground that the tract contained only 55 acres by actual survey, the burden is upon him of showing that the vendor, in making the sale, perpetrated actual fraud upon him, though the amount of the deficiency in acreage is a circumstance to which the jury may look, together with all the other evidence, in determining whether there was actual fraud or not.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 132; Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 317*)—REMEDIES OF VENDOR—ACTIONS FOR PRICE—VERDICT.

The verdict was contrary to the evidence.

Error from City Court of Forsyth; W. M. Clark, Judge.

Action between Eva Milner and A. L. Tyler. From the judgment, Milner brings error. Reversed.

R. W. Milner and R. L. Williams, Jr., for plaintiff in error. J. M. Fletcher and A. M. Zellner, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff sued upon a promissory note of $200, representing the unpaid balance of the purchase price—$650—which the defendant was to give for a tract of land, as to which he held a bond for title, containing the description set forth in the first headnote. The defendant pleaded that the tract contained only 55 acres, and claimed an abatement of the purchase price accordingly. The jury "split the difference" between the parties, and gave the plaintiff judgment for only $100. The charge of the court is not contained in the record; but the trial judge certifies as being true a ground of the motion for new trial which complains that the court neglected and refused to charge the jury that the sale was by the tract or body, and that, to be entitled to an apportionment or rescission, the vendee would have to show intentional fraud and deception on the part of the vendor.

[2] The vendee is not entitled to an apportionment of the purchase price, unless both fraud and deficiency are shown. White v. Adams, 7 Ga. App. 764, 68 S. E. 271, and cases cited therein. Even though the quantity is specified "more or less," a gross deficiency may be sufficient to justify a finding of willful deception or of mistake amounting to fraud, so as to authorize "an apportionment of the price according to relative value." Civil Code 1910, § 4122. The deficiency in such cases is not conclusive of fraud, but is evidentiary of it.

[3] The apportionment, when made, should be in accordance with the rule of relative value. There are cases where the apportionment according to relative value is not to be determined by a mere comparison of the number of acres described in the bond for title with the admitted deficiency, though that is the ordinary rule by which the calculation is to be made. See White v. Adams, 7 Ga. App. 764, 68 S. E. 271.

[1] In this case there was nothing in the evidence to justify a calculation otherwise than according to the ordinary rule. So that, if the jury found that there was fraud, they should have found an abatement of the purchase price sufficient in amount to have prevented any recovery by the plaintiff, as there was no dispute as to the amount of the deficiency in acreage. On the other hand, if the jury did not find there was fraud, they should have found for the plaintiff for the full amount sued for. The finding in favor of the plaintiff for any sum is, under the facts of the case, equivalent to a finding that there was no fraud. Hence the verdict, which made a mere arbitrary deduction in the purchase price, is contrary to the law and the evidence.

Judgment reversed.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Alexandria.

Ejectment by Anna T. Marbury and another against Bessie W. Jones. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

The following is a plat of the property in controversy:

Francis L. Smith and Lewis H. Machen, for plaintiffs in error. J. K. M. Norton, for defendants in error.

WHITTLE, J. This writ of error is to a judgment for the defendant in error, Bessie W. Jones, who was the defendant in an action of ejectment brought by the plaintiffs in error, Anna T. Marbury and Eliza H. Marbury, to recover an estate for their joint lives and for the life of the survivor in a strip of land fronting 4 feet 11 inches on the north side of Prince street, in the city of Alexandria, and extending back between parallel lines perpendicular to the front line 94 feet.

The square embracing the land in controversy and the respective holdings of the plaintiffs and defendant is bounded on three sides as follows: By Prince street on the south, by Royal street on the east, and by Pitt street on the west—and comprised (in the original plan of the city) two lots, each containing one-half of an acre. Lot No. 61 composed the eastern, and lot No. 111 the western, half of the square. The former lot "binds" 176 feet 7 inches on Royal street, on the east, with a frontage of 123 feet 5 inches on Prince street, on the south. Lot No. 111 is bounded by lot No. 61 on the east, and has an equal frontage, 123 feet 5 inches, on Prince street, the original location of the east line of Pitt street forming its western boundary, and was so recognized and described in conveyances of subdivisions of lot No. 111 made prior to the year 1800. Before that date a brick dwelling, known as the John Dundas house, stood on the northwest corner of lot No. 111, the western gable of which overlapped the eastern line of Pitt street, as then located, 8 feet 3 inches. Presumably for the purpose of leaving the John Dundas house undisturbed, the council of Alexandria, on February 5, 1800, passed an ordinance establishing a new location for Pitt street, the east side of which was on a line with the west gable of the Dundas house.

While this change in the location of Pitt street obviously did not affect the paper titles of property holders in that square, it practically resulted in adding 8 feet 3 inches to the lots adjoining Pitt street on the west.

For it is unquestionably the general rule, that the grantee of a city lot bounded by a street, subject to the right of way, owns to the center of the street (Schwalm v. Beardsley, 106 Va. 407, 56 S. E. 135; Durbin v. Roanoke Building Co., 107 Va. 753, 60 S. E. 86); and, consequently, where the location of the street in front of such owner's lot is changed, for a distance not exceeding one-half the width of the street, the abandoned portion necessarily inures to his benefit.

The defendant, Bessie W. Jones, derived her title mediately through Joseph Wilson, who, in the year 1786, conveyed to Josiah Watson the southwestern portion of lot 111 (lot E) on map No. 3 (which is filed as a part of this opinion) as follows: "A part of the lot described in the plan of the said town by number (111), the same being bounded as follows, viz.: Beginning at the corner of the said lot (111) binding upon Prince street and Pitt street, and running thence by Pitt street 94 feet; thence easterly, with a line parallel to Prince street, 49 feet; thence, southerly, with a line parallel to Pitt street, 94 feet, to Prince street; thence, with Prince street, to the beginning."

It will be observed that this deed antedated the change of location of Pitt street; and the description of lot E then given has been substantially followed from that time, through intermediate conveyances, down to and including the deed of July 2, 1882, from Caroline M. Mason to T. Marshall Jones, trustee of his wife, Bessie W. Jones, the defendant.

The plaintiffs' paper title embraces lots F, G, H, I, and a part of A, as shown on map 3. This property was formerly owned by the Bank of Potomac, and passed by successive conveyances to the Farmers' Bank of Virginia (the Alexandria Branch), and the First National Bank of Alexandria, Va. The buildings on this property were erected and used for many years for banking purposes, and the predecessors in title of the plaintiffs, 70 years or more before the institution of this suit, inclosed their property with massive brick walls, which are still intact. These walls, which separate lots F and I from lot E, are designated on map 3 by crossmarks.

It plainly appears from the evidence of the plaintiffs that, beginning at the southwest corner of lot 111, a line 49 feet east on Prince street will extend to the Marbury wall on the east, and that a line extended 94 feet north from the same point will reach the Marbury wall on the north. It is clear, therefore, that lot E, which is within the paper title of the defendant, includes the land in controversy. It is equally true that, unless the plaintiffs' line is to be extended westwardly upon the theory that their holdings have been enlarged by reason of the relocation of Pitt street (a pretension plainly without merit), their paper title does not embrace the land in dispute.

But the plaintiffs also insist that they have acquired the land by adverse possession under color of title. Upon that theory of the case they introduced evidence that the strip of land was an alleyway entered from Prince street through an archway, supported by brick pilasters, connected with the Marbury wall on the east and the wall of an old building on the west; that it was closed by a gate, secured by a lock, the key to which was in the possession of the bank people and subsequently of the plaintiffs; that the strip of ground was paved with bricks, and for many years had been used by the bank officers, and other occupants of the bank property, as a means of access to a toilet on their premises.

Let it be conceded that by this user the plaintiffs' predecessors in title acquired the strip of land by adverse possession; nevertheless, the testimony of the defendant (from the standpoint of a demurrer to the evidence) shows that the possession of those under whom the plaintiffs claim wholly ceased shortly after the close of the Civil War, that the archway on Prince street was planked up at that time, and that the defendant and her predecessors in title took actual possession of the strip by virtue of their paper title, and have held the possession hitherto.

The individual possession of the defendant is contemporaneous with the conveyance from Caroline M. Mason of lot E to her trustee July 2, 1882. On September 8, 1882, she and her husband and trustee conveyed to B. F. Peake 20 feet, more or less, off the east side of lot E, beginning at the middle of the east wall of a brick dwelling then in course of erection by the defendant on the western part of lot E, running thence to the Marbury line, and put him in possession up to the Marbury wall, including the whole of the strip in controversy. Thereupon Peake erected a brick dwelling upon his lot, extending slightly over the western line of the strip in dispute. He laid his pavement in front on Prince street on a line with the Marbury wall, and had a gate opening into his yard between the brick wall and his house occupying the entire space, and cultivated the ground up to the wall in flowers. Peake had occupied the house and premises for about eight years without objection, when a brother of the plaintiffs asserted title to the strip of ground, and threatened to dispossess him and erect a fence along the west line of the strip, unless he would acknowledge the Marbury title, and hauled a load of lumber there for that purpose. Accordingly Peake made verbal acknowledgment of the Marbury claim. A few months afterwards, on March 25, 1889, Peake and wife, by the same description contained in the Jones deed to him, conveyed his lot to Hulfish, trustee, to secure debts. On November 19, 1891, Peake entered into a written agreement, acknowledging the Marbury ownership of the land, and stipulating to pay an annual rental of $1 for the use thereof until the lessor should elect to annul the agreement. Peake having made default in the payment of the debts secured in the trust deed to Hulfish, the property was sold, and bought by the defendant, Bessie W. Jones, who was placed in possession and received her conveyance on July 1, 1902.

[1] The first assignment of error is to the exclusion by the circuit court of the lease from Marbury to Peake. The contention of the plaintiffs in that regard is that the written agreement and antecedent parol acknowledgment by Peake of the Marbury title created the relation of landlord and tenant between them, which prevented Peake, and also the defendant, who obtained possession under him, from denying the Marbury title.

We think it clear that the agreement made by Peake with Marbury, after he had given the deed of trust, could not in any way affect the rights of the trustee, or his purchaser, the defendant.

The principle is stated in Jones on Mortgages (6th Ed.) § 676, as follows: "Of course, the mortgagee is not affected by any act of the mortgagor in passing any right of his in the premises to third persons, whether by deed, or by confession of judgment, or otherwise. He cannot bind the mortgagee by any contract or deed prejudicial to his title. He cannot create an easement in the land to the prejudice of the rights of the mortgagee. The mortgagor's assignee has no greater rights than the mortgagor himself."

Section 679: " * * * Neither can the mortgagor or his grantee, by any subsequent arrangement themselves, affect the mortgagee's lien, or prevent its operation to the full extent of the mortgage." See, also, section 1202.

In Creigh's Heirs v. Henson, 10 Grat. 231, Judge Moncure, in delivering the opinion of the court, observes: "The possession of a grantor in a deed of trust, after the execution of the deed, is not adverse to the title of the trustee, but only as his tenant at will or sufferance. The trustee may eject him without notice, or, without ejecting him, may convey the trust subject to a purchaser, whose tenant at will or sufferance the grantor will then become, and by whom he may in like manner be ejected without notice. A person who purchases the trust subject, or any part of it, from the grantor, with notice of the deed of trust or after its due registration, stands in the place of the grantor, and bears the same relation that he does to the trustee and purchaser from him. These propositions, as general rules of law, will not be denied."

The foregoing principles are familiar to the profession, and fully sustain the ruling of the circuit court in excluding the agreement in question.

[2] The court admitted evidence of Peake's verbal acknowledgment of the Marbury claim, made prior to the execution of the deed of trust to Hulfish; but the acknowledgment was without the knowledge of the defendant, who had previously conveyed the disputed land to Peake and put him in possession thereof. In these circumstances this parol agreement cannot operate to interrupt the otherwise continuous adverse possession of the defendant.

The principle is thus stated in 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 506: "The possession must be inconsistent with the apparent or record title of the grantor, else it will not be sufficient to impose upon the purchaser the duty of making further inquiry; the reason being that in such a case the possession is presumed to be under the grantor's title."

In other words, Peake's possession, after the parol agreement with Marbury, was consistent with his apparent title and previous possession under the defendant, and the defendant, at the sale of the lot by Hulfish, trustee, became a purchaser thereof for value and without notice of the parol agreement. The principle stated in the text is sustained by Townsend v. Little, 100 U. S. 504, 3 Sup. Ct. 857, 27 L. Ed. 1012, and other authorities cited in the notes.

[3] The next assignment of error relates to giving, refusing, and amending instructions. One of the defendant's instructions, which undertook to define adverse possession, was objected to because it omitted to state that possession, to be adverse, must be under color of title. That defect, however, was cured by another instruction, which distinctly informed the jury that such possession must be under color or claim of title, so that the jury could not have been misled by the omission.

[4, 5] It is not necessary to notice in detail objections to other instructions, or the last assignment of error, that the verdict was contrary to the law and evidence, as, under the evidence, no verdict in favor of the plaintiffs could have been properly rendered. The burden rested upon them to recover by the strength of their own title, and not upon the weakness of the defendant's title. Their evidence not only fails to measure up to that fundamental requirement in an action of ejectment, but even upon a comparison of titles the defendant showed the better right to the land in controversy.

The result of our consideration is that the judgment is plainly right, and must be affirmed.

Affirmed.
